

✓57870

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

57870

VOLUME CXLII

JANUARY 1, 1936, to JUNE 27, 1936

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

INDEX TO VOLUME CXLII

JANUARY 1, 1936, to JUNE 27, 1936

(Nos. 3678-3704)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
Arc Architecture
C Correspondence
Ct Cartoon
D Drama
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
M Music
MP Moving Pictures
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1-28	January 1	433-464	April 8
29-56	January 8	465-496	April 15
57-84	January 15	497-532	April 22
85-112	January 22	533-564	April 29
113-140	January 29	565-596	May 6
141-168	February 5	597-628	May 13
169-204	February 12	629-660	May 20
205-232	February 19	661-692	May 27
233-260	February 26	693-724	June 3
261-296	March 4	725-756	June 10
297-332	March 11	757-788	June 17
333-364	March 18	789-824	June 24
365-396	March 25	825-856	June 27
397-432	April 1

A

AAA. See Agriculture
Æ. See Russell, G. W.
Abbott, Edith
Unemployment relief, federal; S..... 346
Abyssinia. See Italo-Ethiopian war
Academic freedom
Appropriation for investigation of communism in New York state schools and colleges; EP..... 663
City college; dismissal of M. U. Schappes; E..... 634
Educators condemn invasions; EP..... 299
Pittsburgh university blacklisted by American association of university professors; EP..... 3
Teachers' loyalty oath, District of Columbia; movement to repeal. P. W. Ward; S..... 371
Teachers' loyalty oath, Massachusetts, protests against; EP..... 334
Teachers' loyalty oaths, opposition to; EP..... 87; EP..... 457
Tufts professors resign rather than sign oath of loyalty; EP..... 3
Workers' schools threatened. M. Bonner; C..... 185
Adamic, Louis
Bridges, H.; S..... 576; see also C..... 723
Cherry time in San Joaquin valley; S..... 840
Deportations to Germany; S..... 377; see also EP..... 759
Adler, Eleanor H.
Seeks letters of F. Adler; C..... 73
Adler, Felix, letters sought. E. H. Adler; C..... 73
Aeronautics; disasters, recent; E..... 500
Agricultural adjustment administration. See Agriculture Agriculture
Agricultural adjustment administration:
Farmers' fate following invalidation; E..... 88
Killed by supreme court; EP..... 61; see also C..... 130
Large payments under; EP..... 498
Processing taxes ordered returned, by supreme court; EP..... 85
Program, new. P. W. Ward; S..... 93
Views of. P. W. Ward; S..... 93
Views of W. Lippmann. H. Broun; S..... 129
"Aid" for, in Alabama and elsewhere; EP..... 436
Alabama; conditions. C. Beals; S..... 444; 475
Rehabilitation. T. Burke; S..... 106; see also C..... 362
Share-croppers' union; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Arkansas, vigilante terrorism. P. W. Ward; S..... 440

Farm bill, new; EP..... 262
Farm program, administration; EP..... 169
Measures for aid; prospects not encouraging; EP..... 113
Packers, bill to control. P. W. Ward; S..... 471
Social planning, rural, national conference on. P. W. Ward; S..... 440
Soil conservation act escape headman's ax. Fritz; Ct..... 120
Southern; share-croppers, cotton, unite in Southern tenant farmers' union strike; E..... 794
Southern; share-croppers' misery and hope. H. L. Mitchell and H. Kester; C..... 184
Southern tenant farmers' union members in Arkansas blacklisted; EP..... 114
State aid planned under soil conservation act; EP..... 141
Ah, wilderness. M. Van Doren; MP..... 84
Airplanes. See Aeronautics
Alabama. See Agriculture
Alcala Zamora, President Niceto. See Spain
Aliens. See Immigration
Alpert, Augusta
Community school, Brooklyn, establishment; C..... 824
American artists' congress, drawings from international exhibition..... 640
American association of social workers; meeting. P. W. Ward; S..... 243; see also EP..... 207
American can company; salaries not to be made public; EP..... 58
American civil liberties union; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
American federation of labor
Committee for industrial organization; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Executive council meeting; measures taken; EP..... 142
Industrial versus craft unionism, fight; EP..... 261
Lewis, John L., takes over leadership of American union movement; E..... 208
Lewis-Green battle; issue joined on steel; EP..... 629
Split with mine workers not inevitable. H. Broun; S..... 220
American league against war and fascism, conference; EP..... 87
American liberty league; activities for "farmers"; EP..... 534
American library association; Negro librarians, treatment of; C..... 691
American museum of natural history; directors; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
American newspaper guild. See Newspapers
American newspaper publishers' association on Black committee's work; EP..... 566
American student union, formed; E..... 33
American telephone and telegraph company, investigation of. P. W. Ward; S..... 403
Lobbying. P. W. Ward; S..... 471; 603
Amlie-Benson bill. See Youth
Amoskeag company, holding, and Amoskeag manufacturing company, operating; EP..... 31
Amsterdam News. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
Anderson, Mary
Women workers, laws for; C..... 854; see also E..... 727
Anderson, Maxwell; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Annie Oakley. M. Van Doren; MP..... 84
Anthologies, poetry. B. Belitt; S..... 648; see also letters..... 722
Anti-fascism. See Fascism
Anti-semitism. See Jews
Anti-trust laws; steel companies accused of violations; EP..... 398
Sugar institute; move against; EP..... 171
Arabs. See Palestine
Architect and the world. A. Mayer; S..... 43
Arkansas. See Agriculture
Armament limitation and disarmament
Japan to press for elimination or reduction of larger vessels; EP..... 86
Japan's withdrawal from London conference; EP..... 114
Naval treaty, signing; EP..... 435
Sessions, fruitless; EP..... 2
Armaments
British taxation, heavy; EP..... 567
Or collective law? E..... 238
Race. O. G. Villard; S..... 350

Soviet activity in face of war threat. L. Fischer; S..... 442
United States preparing for war; E..... 436
See also Munitions of War
Arms. See Munitions of war
Armstrong (cartoonist)
German "honor and freedom"; Ct..... 148
Art
Artist and the ice age, the; S..... 418
Artists. H. Broun; S..... 280
Censorship. See Censorship, art
Criticism and taste. J. W. Krutch; S..... 517
Works progress administration activities; EP..... 827
Associated press; Wagner-Connelly act, attack on. H. Broun; S..... 157
See also Newspapers
Athletics, school; traitor to his school. W. T. Lucas; S..... 16
Austria
Intervention by Germany, rumored; EP..... 566
Nazi flood dammed. L. Fischer; S..... 246
Politics and government; volcano. M. W. Fodor; S..... 673
Socialists and communists, trial of; E..... 402
Authors
On being contemporary. W. Troy; S..... 511
"Outmoded." J. W. Krutch; S..... 190
Smooth-paper reality. D. Van Doren; S..... 844
Automobiles; company unions. A. Luchek; S..... 74
Workers' convention; E..... 602
Aviation. See Aeronautics

B

B., B.
Room in red and white, a; D..... 167
B., F. A.
Borden company, strike, threatened; C..... 495
Bacon, Peggy; drawing, colored folks..... 411
Bacon, short-weight. R. Brindze; S..... 254
Baer, Walter E.; deportation threatened; EP..... 399; C..... 531
Baldwin, Roger N., and C. Lamont
Harvard heretics and rebels; S..... 733
Baldwin, Roger N.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Banker Lunkhead. J. T. Farrell; S..... 642
Bankruptcy; Section 77-b of national act, attack on. P. W. Ward; S..... 795 Bargaining, collective. See Labor
Beals, Carleton
Alabama; farm conditions; S..... 444, 475
Scottsboro interview; S..... 178
Scottsboro puppet show; S..... 149
Beard, Charles A.
Supreme court and the constitution; S..... 405
Beard, Charles A.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Bedding, black lists. A. B. Johnson and R. Brindze; C..... 104
Bell, Edward W.
Veblen and Henry George; C..... 659; see also..... 321
Bellinger, F. C., open letter to; E..... 338
Belitt, Ben
Poetry, anthologies; S..... 648; see also letters..... 722
Bendiner, M. R.
Safety at sea; and seamen's strike; S..... 542; see also EP..... 534
Berry committee on industrial policy reports; EP..... 366; see also C..... 531
Bilbo, Theodore, Senator; speech. P. W. Ward; S..... 440
Birth, painless, attacks on; E..... 699
Bisson, T. A.
Conflict in Outer Mongolia; S..... 507
Bitter stream. J. W. Krutch; D..... 559
Black, Hugo L.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Black committee. See Lobbying investigation; Freedom of the press
Black legion; exposed; EP..... 695
Power behind; P. W. Ward; S..... 731; see also E..... 728
Blanton, Tom; record as enemy of labor, anti-semitic, etc.; EP..... 828
Blum, Léon. See France
Bolaffio, Robert
Butler, Nicholas Murray, on dead universities; C..... 159
Bonheur, le. M. Van Doren; MP..... 360
Bonner, Miriam
Workers' school threatened; C..... 185
Bonus. See Veterans
Books
Banned; E..... 34

- Murder and Karl Marx. M. McCarthy; S. 381
- Mystery and detective stories, and criticism of M. McCarthy. W. Seagle; C. 494; see also 468
- Boondoggling; habits of field mice investigated; EP. 115
- Borah, Senator William E., fight against. R. L. Neuberger; S. 610
- Borden company, threatened strike. F. A. B.; C. 495
- Bourke-White, Margaret
Photographing this world; S. 217
- Bouton, S. Miles
Germany, prophecy by Heine; C. 659; see also 505
- Boxing; Schmeling-Louis fight. J. T. Farrell; S. 834
- Brazil, fascism in. W. Frank; C. 495
- Brenner, Anita
Spain mobilizes for revolution; S. 546
- Bridges, Harry: Rank-and-file leader. L. Adamic; S. 576; see also C. 723
- Brigham, G. R.
Chain gangs, Georgia; C. 18
- Brindze, Ruth
Facts for consumers; S. 21, 77, 104, 132, 187, 254, 349, 415, 481
Comment on articles. W. Glyn; C. 463
- Brite, Mary D.
Mountjoy case; C. 496
- British cabinet. See Great Britain
- British-Italian relations; war seen as inevitable in Italy; EP. 695
See also Italo-Ethiopian war
- Britt, George
Farley and possible re-election of Mayor LaGuardia; S. 341
- Broun, Heywood
And W. H. Chamberlin; letter by Chamberlin; C. 18
American federation of labor and united mine workers; S. 220
American newspaper guild's move toward unionization; S. 745
Associated press attack on Wagner-Cornery act; S. 157
Cabinet, next; S. 514
Communist party and the united front; debate with D. Scheyer. 19
Conviction in Milwaukee; S. 551
Courts, federal, decisions by; S. 385
Green and Lewis speeches; S. 220
Hagood, General, punishment of; and McCormick comment on coming election; S. 351
Hearst, W. R.; S. 615
Hearst and Landon; S. 779
Hearst, anti-laborite; S. 584
Hearst's convention; S. 800
Hughes, chief justice, switch on AAA decision; S. 253
Judges, race-track and others; S. 647
Knox, F.; S. 843
Knox and the Newspaper guild; S. 253
Knox; thrift habits; S. 351
Lewis, J. L., not overpaid; S. 253
Lewis, J. L.; speech not adequately reported; S. 47
Liberty and license; S. 483
Lippmann, W., on AAA decision; S. 129
Loose construction; the Republican party's "Liberty at the crossroads"; S. 180
Miami, Florida; S. 483
Morgan at munitions inquiry; S. 103
Newspaper methods; S. 351
Page praised. E. M. S.; C. 723
Painting; S. 280
Pontius Pilate, chapter from possible biography; S. 711
Radio entertainment; S. 686
Radio programs; S. 752
Republican party's broadcast, "Liberty at the crossroads"; S. 129
Republican presidential candidates; S. 220
San Francisco "reds"; S. 103
Smith attack on Roosevelt; S. 157
Supreme court; S. 103
Sutherland, Justice; S. 103
Taxi driver not a good source of news; S. 253
Veterans of future wars; S. 417
Waiters' strike at Jack and Charlie's; S. 157
Winchell, W., tooth; S. 47
Wisconsin News strike; S. 320, 451
- Browder, Earl; discusses communism; EP. 333
- Brown shoe company. See Labor—National labor relations board
- Bryan, William Jennings, and the war. J. M. Leyda; C. 17
- Buchman, Reverend Frank N. D., leader of Oxford group, helps democrats; EP. 826
- Budget, federal. See Finance, public
- Buildings, New York; service strike; EP. 298; EP. 333; E. 338; E. 370; EP. 434; EP. 535
- Bullitt, William C., accused by This week of anti-Soviet activity; EP. 790
- Bureau of agricultural economics; doctors cotton report. P. W. Ward; S. 243
- Burke, Kenneth
New music society concert; M. 27
- Burke, Tom
Farm rehabilitation, Alabama; open letter to R. Tugwell; S. 106; see also C. 362
- Burke, Tom, on The Nation's honor roll for 1935 9
- Bury the dead. J. W. Krutch; D. 592
- Business
National industrial policy; EP. 366; C. 531
Pick-up in 1935; EP. 58
- Butler, General Smedley D., suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C. 73
- Butler, Nicholas Murray; dead universities and Casa Italiana. R. Bolaffio; C. 159
On child labor; E. 469
- C
- Caldwell, Erskine
Jesus Lopez; S. 545; C. 595
- California
After EPIC. L. Symes; S. 509; see also C. 660
Gallagher, L., as radical defense lawyer, in Sacramento and elsewhere. J. A. Washburn; C. 17
Jesus Lopez, and other holders of small properties, versus real estate developers. E. Caldwell; S. 545; C. 595
Labor; cherry time in San Joaquin valley. L. Adamic; S. 840
Los Angeles border patrol. R. M. Packard; C. 295; EP. 367
Sacramento criminal-syndicalism case. H. Solow; C. 158; see also C. 296
Sales tax, opposition to. J. H. Ralston; C. 660; see also 509
- California, steamship. See Shipping
- California, university of; vote against compulsory military training. L. Davies; C. 332
- Call it a day. J. W. Krutch; D. 201
- Calles, Plutarco Elias. See Mexico
- Campaign, presidential. See Presidential election of 1936
- Cannon, James P.
Hearst and Trotsky; C. 396
- Capital punishment. O. G. Villard; S. 513
- Carlson, Oliver
San Francisco waterfront; S. 105
- Cartoons. See Armstrong; Fritz
- Carver, Professor Thomas Nixon; scheme for saving country; EP. 599
- Casa Italiana, Columbia university. See Fascism
- Case of Clyde Griffiths, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 427
- Catholic church. See Germany
- Ceiling zero. M. Van Doren; MP. 203
- Censorship, art; Wyoming university bans nudes; EP. 335
- Censorship, literary; books banned; E. 34
- Censorship, moving pictures; It can't happen here, by S. Lewis, barred; EP. 235
- Chain gangs, Georgia. G. R. Brigham; C. 18
- Chamberlin, William Henry, and H. Broun; C. 18
- Chambers of commerce as fascist. E. Seeley; S. 473
- Chaplin, Charlie. M. Van Doren; MP. 232
- Chaplin, John R.
Hollywood goes closed shop; S. 225
Charlie Chan's secret. M. Van Doren; MP. 203
- Chase, Stuart
Tennessee valley authority; S. 702; EP. 727; S. 738; S. 775; S. 804
- Cheese; facts for consumers. R. Brindze; S. 254
- Cherry time in San Joaquin valley. L. Adamic; S. 840
- Chiang Kai-shek. See China
- Chicago
Milk strike, report on; EP. 631
Politics; case of R. M. Sweitzer. E. A. Lahey; S. 12
Prostitution in. T. N. Hall; C. 496
- Chicago Daily News and the Newspaper guild. H. Broun; S. 253
- Child-birth, painless, attacks on; E. 699
- Child labor, is it abolished? E. 469
- Children of the revolution. M. Van Doren; MP. 560
- China
Chiang Kai-shek denounced by son; EP. 235
Civil war threatened; EP. 758
Communism; news from red China; E. 89
- Chinese-Japanese relations
Anti-Japanese movement growing; EP. 790
Chinese students' activity against Japan; EP. 30; EP. 142
- Japanese smuggling operations in north China; EP. 663
- Japan's new "lifeline"; E. 5
- Mongolia attacked by Japanese; EP. 29
- News of military suppression of freedom in China withheld by American press; EP. 535
- Christ; chapter from possible biography of Pontius Pilate. H. Broun; S. 711
- City college. See College of the city of New York
- Civil liberties union. See American civil liberties union
- Civil rights
Attacked on several fronts; EP. 298
LaFollette resolution for investigation passed; EP. 758
Upheld in Seattle. C. Stevens; S. 252
Violations, investigation proposed. P. W. Ward; S. 731
- Cities. See Municipal bankruptcy act
- Clark, John A.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935 9
- Clas, A. R.
Slum clearance; C. 595; see also 410
- Clerk, the, tactics and. J. W. Krutch; S. 616
- Cleveland convention. See Presidential election of 1936
- Cloistered. M. Van Doren; MP. 753
- Clurman, Harold
Krutch review of Paradist lost, play; C. 72
- Coal
Great Britain; government preparing to take control; EP. 31
Guffey act; and consumer. P. W. Ward; S. 303
Before supreme court. O. K. Fraenkel; C. 564
Declared unconstitutional; E. 664
Invalidation by supreme court. P. W. Ward; S. 700
- Cohan, George M. in Dear old darling. J. W. Krutch; D. 359
- Collective bargaining. See Labor
- College of the city of New York; academic freedom; dismissal of M. U. Schappes; E. 634
President Robinson, move for removal; EP. 170
- Colleges
Commencement addresses; EP. 789
Dead, in Italy, and Casa Italiana, Columbia university. R. Bolaffio; C. 159 Labor difficulties; E. 5
See also Students
- Colonies, demand for. O. G. Villard; S. 319
- Columnists. See Newspapers
- Columbia university. See Fascism
- Commencement address; EP. 789
- Commerce chambers, fascist. E. Seeley; S. 473
- Committee for industrial organization of the American federation of labor; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935 9
Reports; EP. 366; see also C. 531
Work; EP. 598
- Common man, faith in; E. 264
- Communism
Discussed by E. Browder and J. Stalin; EP. 333
In New York state schools and colleges; appropriation for investigation; EP. 663 Murder and Karl Marx, in mystery novels. M. McCarthy; S. 381
"Red" scare. Fritz; Ct. 240
See also China
- Communist party; united front; debate between D. Scheyer and H. Broun 19
- Community school, Brooklyn, establishment. A. Alpert; C. 824
- Companies, holding. See Holding companies
- Conference, naval. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Congress
Action and non-action on bills, before adjournment. P. W. Ward; S. 763 Adjournment rush imperils needed legislation. P. W. Ward; S. 667
Business, unfinished; E. 730
Cleaning up the calendar. P. W. Ward; S. 603
Ends work; EP. 825
Investigations to continue; EP. 758
Powers, greater, by constitutional amendment needed; E. 696 (with opinions); see also 760
- Congress of associated country women of the world, meeting; E. 793
- Constitution, United States
Amendment for giving greater powers to congress needed; E. 696 (with opinions); see also 760
And her "protectors." Fritz; Ct. 212
And the supreme court. C. A. Beard; S. 405
- Consumers, facts for. R. Brindze; S. 21, 77, 132, 187, 254, 349, 415, 463, 481
- "Consumers' project." P. W. Ward; S. 303
- Consumers' research; violation of federal labor law found; decision in employees' strike; EP. 171
- Convict labor. See Labor
- Convicts. See Prisons and prisoners
- Coolidge-Kerr immigration bill. See Immigration
- Copeland bill. See Food and drug bill

- Copeland-Roper act. See Shipping
Corporations; earnings rise; EP..... 398
See also Finance, public (for articles on tax on surpluses).
Correspondents, foreign. See Newspapers
Costigan, Senator, to retire. P. W. Ward; S. 539
Cotton textiles, Japanese, tariff increased; EP 694
Cotton workers. See Agriculture
Country doctor, the. M. Van Doren; MP.. 429 Courts
Again hold labor act unconstitutional; EP 1
Federal, decision by. H. Broun; S.... 385
Lower courts, judges; and Ritter conviction; EP..... 534
Roosevelt administration and. P. W. Ward; S..... 181
Craig, Madeline
Quilts for labor; C..... 660
Cramer, Madelyn A.
Parole system; C.. 853; see also E..... 570
Creel, George, out of WPA. P. W. Ward; S. 303
Crime and criminals
"Big shots," immunity. E. H. Lavine; S. 241
Lehman prevention program; EP..... 206
Parole and murder; Titterton case; E..... 570; see also letters..... 853
See also New York state; Prisons and Prisoners
Criticism; and taste. J. W. Krutch; S.... 517
Eternal principles. P. C. Jones; C.... 73
Critics, literary. J. W. Krutch; S..... 22
Note on literary criticism. J. T. Farrell; S..... 276; 314
Responsibility of editors. J. W. Krutch; S..... 679
Cuba; M. M. Gomez elected president; EP.. 86
Curley, Governor James M. See Massachusetts
Currency; inflation talk in the air. M. S. Stewart; S..... 306
- D
- Damascus. See Syria
Dash, Karen
Slum-clearance farce, in Detroit; S.. 410; see also C..... 595
Daumier
Drawing; European equilibrium..... 348
Drawing; peace on a bicycle..... 409
Davis, Horace B.
Liberalism, test of; C..... 531
Davies, Louise
University of California vote against compulsory military training; C..... 332
Dean, Vera Micheles
Responsibilities of peace; S..... 244
Dear old darling. J. W. Krutch; D..... 359
Democratic party
National committee members. P. W. Ward; S..... 128
Smith, Alfred E., and Roosevelt. O. G. Villard; S..... 211
Smith attack on Roosevelt administration; E..... 144
Smith's "show"; H. Broun; S..... 157
Talmadge, Governor, anti-Roosevelt rally. P. W. Ward; S..... 153
Washington convention indorses production-for-use platform; EP..... 791
See also Presidential election of 1936
Dentistry; painless; discovery of Doctor L. L. Hartman; EP..... 143
Deportations; Baer, Walter E., case of; EP 399
To Germany. L. Adamic; S.. 377; see also EP..... 759
De Selincourt, Basil
Seeks letters from A. D. Sedgwick; C.. 185
Detective stories. See Books
Detectives, private, as labor spies; E..... 117
Detroit; slum-clearance farce. K. Dash; S..... 410; see also C..... 595
Dialectical materialism and nature. B. D. Wolfe; C..... 431; see also..... 288
Dilliard, Irving
Supreme court justices; C.. 495; see also 379
District of Columbia; teachers' oath bill; movement to repeal. P. W. Ward; S. 371
"Jim crowism." P. W. Ward; S..... 403
Doctors. See Medicine
Donnelly, Marion
Will neutrality keep us out of war? Prize-winning student editorial; EP 567
Drama. See Theater, the Drawings from international exhibition, American artists' congress..... 640
Dressmakers' strike. D. Scheyer; S..... 224
Dubrovsky. M. Van Doren; MP..... 492
Duff, Dorothy Manley
Negro librarians at convention; C..... 691
Duffy, Edmund
Elephant goes west; Ct..... 796
Dutton, Charles J.
Prisoners on parole; C..... 853
Dwight, Mabel
Merchants of death; illustration..... 272
- E
- Eberle, Examiner. See Labor—National labor relations board
Editorial board, Encyclopedia of the social sciences; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Editorial, student, prize-winning; EP.... 567; 582
Editorials. See Newspapers
Editors, radical, summoned for "questioning" in New York; EP..... 114
Responsibility of. J. W. Krutch; S.... 679
Edmunds, Abe Craddock
Biography; P..... 255
Edward VIII; foreign policy; EP..... 170
Election, presidential. See Presidential election of 1936
Elections, for house of representatives and senate. P. W. Ward; S..... 538
Electric power. See Power and power industry
Elevator strike. See Buildings, New York
Elevators, hat removing in; EP.... 663; see also C..... 824
Ellenbogen-Wagner bill. See Housing
Ellis, Havelock; introduces sex to the English public; Ct..... 420
Encyclopaedia of the social sciences, editorial board; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
End of summer, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 291
Engelbrecht, H. C.
Control of sale of munitions of war; S.. 10
England. See Great Britain
Englewood, New Jersey; families feeding on garbage; EP.. 31; see also C, 130; C, 223
EPIC. See California
Ethan Frome. J. W. Krutch; D..... 167
Ethiopia. See Italo-Ethiopian war Europe
Arms over Europe:
III. Italy at war; First impressions. L. Fischer S..... 14
IV. Why Mussolini went to war. L. Fischer; S..... 67
V. Mussolini outbluffs England. L. Fischer; S..... 123
Equilibrium; Ct..... 348
France the center of the situation; EP.. 497
Situation following defeat of sanctions against Italy; E..... 829
War; can it be averted? E..... 665
European war. See World war
- F
- Facts for consumers. See Consumers
Far east. See Japanese-Russian relations
Farm bill. See Agriculture
Farmer-labor party, Minnesota, to meet; EP. 367
Convention; EP..... 433
Convention. O. G. Villard; S..... 842
Farmers. See Agriculture
Farley, James A.; and re-election, possible, of Mayor LaGuardia of New York City. G. Britt; S..... 341
Farrell, James T.
Fall of J. Louis; S..... 834
Literary criticism; S..... 276; 314
Mr. Lunkhead the banker; S..... 642
Farrell, James T., on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Fascism
American. E. Seeley; S..... 473
American league against war and fascism, conference; EP..... 87
Brazil. W. Frank; C..... 495
Casa Italiana, Columbia university, still a center of fascist propaganda. R. Bolaffio; C..... 159
French. See France
Syracuse, New York, trial city; EP.... 30
Federal communications commission; white-washes radio division; P. W. Ward; S. 243
Feinstein, Isidor
Starving on relief; S..... 186
Feinstein, Isidor, suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C.... 73
Fentrick, George
Suggests F. E. Townsend for The Nation's honor roll for 1935; C..... 73
Feuchtwanger, Lion
"Germany... a winter's tale"; S.. 505; see also C..... 659
Fey, Harold E.
Militarizing the Philippines; S..... 736
Field, Alice Withrow
Prostitution in the Soviet union; E.. 369; S..... 373
Field mice, habits investigated; EP..... 115
Films. See Moving pictures
Finance, public
Bonus may open way to unrestricted spending; EP..... 113
Budget, federal, in chaos; E..... 209
Corporation surpluses, tax on, proposed; E..... 337; E..... 568
Battle over. M. Lerner; S..... 669
Battle over. P. W. Ward; S..... 700
Bill amended; EP.... 434; EP..... 725
- Government income and expenditures rise; EP..... 630
Income-tax collections rise; EP..... 398
Peril to federal credit. P. W. Ward; S. 128
Processing taxes, AAA, ordered returned, by supreme court; AN..... 85
Taxation policy, Roosevelt, unsound; E. 265
Taxation program, proper, time for; EP 169
Taxation; "soaking the rich." G. Terborgh; S..... 479
Fiorenza, John, murder of Mrs. Titterton; E..... 570; see also letters..... 853
First national bank of Detroit; failure. P. W. Ward; S..... 128
Fisher, Dorothy Canfield
France; Ravage article on politics; C. 463; see also..... 347
Fischer, Louis
Anti-Nazi feeling in Germany; S..... 176
Arms over Europe:
III. Italy at war; First impressions; S..... 14
IV. Why Mussolini went to war; S. 67
V. Mussolini outbluffs England; S. 123
Austria dams Nazi flood; S..... 246
Germany prepares for war; S..... 311
Italy and Europe; S..... 643
Mail censored by soviet authorities; C.. 464
On A. Harris's review of Webb's book on Russia; C..... 756; see also..... 518
Poland; Between poverty and war; S.. 343
Soviet armament activity in face of war threat; S..... 442
Soviet constitution, new; S..... 772; see also E..... 761
"Fixed trusts." See Investment trusts
Floods; eastern states; EP..... 397
Johnstown, second. M. S. Stewart; S.. 447
Florida canal. P. W. Ward; S..... 215
Fodor, M. W.
Austrian volcano, the; S..... 673
Hitlerism, spread outside Germany; S.. 154
Follow the fleet. M. Van Doren; MP..... 360
Food and drug administration, attacks on. P. W. Ward; S..... 603
Food and drug bill; Copeland bill, "doctored." P. W. Ward; S..... 667
Drive for. P. W. Ward; S..... 603
Killed in congress; EP..... 825
Food inspectors imperilled. R. Brindze; S. 254
Foreign correspondents. See Newspapers
Foreign policy association; prize, with The Nation, for editorial, awarded to M. Donnelly; EP..... 567; 582
Foundations; readjustment of finances; EP.. 2
Fraenkel, Osmond K.
Coal, convicts, and the supreme court; C..... 564
France
Blum, L.; the Kerensky of France? EP 662
Center of European situation; EP..... 497
Election; EP.... 234; EP.... 536; EP.... 567
For the future. M. E. Ravage; S.. 549
Left victory. M. E. Ravage; S. 573; see also EP..... 567
Results; EP..... 597
Socialists in power. M. E. Ravage; S..... 706
Finance and politics; EP..... 630
Laval wins vote of confidence; EP.... 29
Politics; elections, coming; fascist brutality; EP..... 234
Fascism, decline of. M. E. Ravage; S..... 347; see also C..... 463
Right stiffened by Hitler. M. E. Ravage; S..... 408
Sarraut cabinet takes office; EP.. 142
Problems, political and economic; EP.... 790
Strikes, and the government; EP.. 757; see also..... 765
Frank, Waldo
Fascism in Brazil; C..... 495
Frazier, Senator Lynn J. See Social security
Frazier-Lemke bill. See Mortgages
Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
Freedom of the press
Black committee condemned by American newspaper publishers' association; EP 566
German newspapers under Hitler. F. Höllering; S..... 151; E..... 145; S..... 182
Hughes, Rupert, and the Screen writers' guild. H. Broun; S..... 678; see also EP..... 662; letters..... 755
Menaced by American newspaper guild, R. Howard thinks; EP..... 662
Newspapers' responsibility for defending civil liberties; E..... 145
Upheld by United States supreme court; EP..... 234
Freedom of speech and press, recruit from American legion committee; EP..... 598
Freedom of the seas. See Neutrality
Freud, Sigmund, at eighty; EP..... 631
Friendships and politics. O. G. Villard; S.. 211
Fritz (cartoonist)
Constitution, United States, and her "protectors"; Ct..... 212
Morgan and war loans; Ct..... 92
New year; tight-rope walker; Ct..... 8

"Red" scare; Ct..... 240
Republican party, campaign contributions; Ct..... 64
Soil conservation act escapes headman's ax; Ct..... 120
Townsend plan; Ct.....36; see also C..... 295
Frontier, M. Van Doren; MP..... 84
Furtwangler, Wilhelm; appointment to conduct New York Philharmonic-Symphony concerts; EP..... 299
"Fury," film on lynching; EP..... 759
Review by R. Giroux; MP..... 821
Future veterans. See Veterans of future wars

G
Gallagher, Leo, as radical defense lawyer. J. A. Washburn; C..... 17
Gamble, Robert H.
Unemployment relief in Englewood, New Jersey; C..... 223
Gannett, Frank E.
Reply to inquiry on desirability of amendment of constitution..760; see also 696
Garrison, Lloyd K., reply to inquiry on desirability of amendment of constitution 697
Garrison, Paul
Committee on national industrial policy, report on; C.....531; see also EP..... 365
Gas, natural; service suppressed; EP..... 86
Gauley Bridge, West Virginia. See Silicosis
George, H., and T. Veblen. E. W. Bell; C.....659; see also..... 321
George the fifth, death; EP..... 113
George White's scandals. J. W. Krutch; D..... 55
Georgia; chain gangs. G. R. Brigham; C..... 18
Germany
Anti-Nazi feeling. L. Fischer; S..... 176
Case for tears. S. Hetzler; C..... 332
"Cultural campaign"; EP..... 299
Deportations to. L. Adamic; S.....377; see also EP..... 759
Economics; Göring supersedes Schacht as dictator; EP..... 566
Election, Hitler style; EP..... 433
Financial difficulties nearing crisis; EP..... 663
French right stiffened by Hitler's reichstag speech. M. E. Ravage; S..... 408
Fugitives in peril if deported from United States; EP.....759; see also..... 377
Gustloff affair; E..... 210
Heine's prophecy. S. M. Bouton; C.....659; see also 505
Hitlerism, responsibility for. L. A. Greenberg; C.....659; see also..... 505
Hitler's "good faith"; Ct..... 439
Hitler's remilitarization of the Rhineland. O. G. Villard; S.....416
"Honor and freedom," restoration. Armstrong; Ct..... 148
Isolation fought by attempts to make alliances; EP..... 263
Japan. See Japanese-German relations
Jews. See Jews
Locarno treaty breaking denounced by French and British; EP..... 467
Mann, Thomas, opinion of Nazism; EP..... 367
Militarism, heightened; E..... 237
Newspapers. See Newspapers
Olympic games. See Olympic games
Peace gesture, Hitler's. Low; Ct..... 407
Persecution of "non-Aryans" denounced by J. G. McDonald; EP..... 29
Prepares for war. L. Fischer; S..... 311
Refugees, McDonald report to League of nations; E.....61; see also C..... 130
Rejects powers' peace proposals; EP..... 466
Rhineland crisis. J. Gunther; S..... 407
A success? E..... 401
Crisis over; E..... 368
Violates Locarno treaty by moving troops into Rhineland; E..... 335
Roman catholic monks, trial; EP..... 726
Schurz celebration at Libar. O. G. Villard; S..... 778
Theater, under Hitler. L. T. Mowrer; S..... 477
Trade policy; EP..... 758
Trials, political; reports suppressed; EP..... 59
Underground war against Nazis. J. Herbst; S..... 41
Winter of. L. Feuchtwanger; S.....505; see also C..... 659
Youth in. S. Heym; S..... 836
See also Heidelberg, university of; Hitlerism
Ghost goes west, the. M. Van Doren; MP..... 138
Gilbert and Sullivan. J. W. Krutch; D..... 592
Giroux, Robert
Comment on Brindze articles; S..... 463
Fury; MP..... 821
Secret agent; MP..... 821
Gold, Michael
Squaring the circle, play; C..... 104
Goldwater, Doctor S. S.
Reply to Villard article, on Harlem hospital; with reply by Mr. Villard; C..... 251

Gomez, Miguel Marino. See Cuba
Goodyear tire and rubber company. See Rubber
Gorki, Maxim, death; EP..... 826
Gorman, Francis, suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C..... 73
Göring, General. See Germany
Graham, Frank Porter; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Granite. J. W. Krutch; D..... 138
Great Britain
Cabinet, a house divided. H. J. Laski; S..... 575
Cabinet rejects motion for better distribution of raw materials; EP..... 205
Coal mines; government preparing to take control; EP..... 31
Foreign policy. O. G. Villard; S..... 614
Foreign policy, new king's; EP..... 170
National government split over attitude toward Germany; EP..... 466
Royalty; EP..... 113
Taxation, heavy, due to armament; EP..... 567
See also British-Italian relations
Great Ziegfeld, the. M. Van Doren; MP..... 560
Greece; fascist dictatorship averted; EP..... 170
Green, William; reply to inquiry on desirability of amendment of constitution.. 697
Speech at miners' convention. H. Broun; S..... 220
See also American federation of labor
Greenwood county, South Carolina, grant for hydroelectric plant upheld; EP..... 262
Griffith, Virgil A.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Gregory, Horace
On anthologies of poetry; C.....722; see also 648
Group theater; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Guffey act. See Coal
Guffey subsidy bill. See Shipping
Gunther, John
Rhineland crisis; S..... 407
Guns. See Armaments
Gustloff affair; E..... 210

H
H., A.
Curley article sells out The Nation in Boston; C.....628; see also..... 540
Hagood, General, punishment of. H. Broun; S..... 351
Hall, T. N.
Prostitution in Chicago; C..... 496
Halperin, Samuel
Arab and Jew; C, with editorial comment.....822; see also EP.....694; 708
Hanson, Lawrence E.
Middle class, crisis of; C..... 45
Harding, T. Swann
Prostitution—"in a nice way"; C.....531; see also E..... 369
Hardy, Lamar, appointment opposed by Association of the bar of the city of New York; EP..... 87
Case against; New York newspapers silent; EP..... 2
Harlem. See Negroes
Harlem hospital; reply by Commissioner Goldwater to Villard article, with reply by Mr. Villard; C..... 251
Harrison, Henry
On anthologies of poetry; C.....722; see also 648
Hartman, Doctor LeRoy L. See Dentistry
Harvard university, heretics and rebels. R. N. Baldwin and C. Lamont; S..... 733 Tercentenary celebration; U.S.S.R. neglected; EP..... 727
Hathaway, Clarence, questioned in New York; EP..... 114
Hats in elevators; movement for doffing; EP.....663; see also C..... 824
Hauptmann, Bruno Richard. See Lindbergh, C. A., junior Hayden, Charles; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Haymarket riot; E..... 537
Hearst, William Randolph
And nomination of Landon. H. Broun; S..... 779
And Trotzky. J. P. Cannon; C..... 396
Anti-laborite. H. Broun; S..... 584
Committee on, suggested. G. Davis; C.....159; see also..... 63
Discovers a new secret society; E..... 6
Dodging matter of naming him. H. Broun; S..... 615
Hearst's convention. H. Broun; S..... 800
How to expose. O. G. Villard; S.....63; see also C..... 159
Objection to Black investigation overridden; EP..... 397
Reply to inquiry on desirability of amendment of constitution...760; see also 696
Restores Saint Donats. A Welsh correspondent; S..... 250

Heidelberg university, invitations to celebration; EP.....299; E, 338; C, 396
Herbst, Josephine
German underground war; S..... 41
Herndon, Angelo; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Herne, H.
People's theater associates; C..... 364
Hetzler, Siegfried
Germany, a case for tears; C..... 332
Heym, Stefan
Youth, German; S..... 836
Hicks, Granville; all under the rule of John Reed. S. Van Veen; Ct..... 586
Hitlerism; spread outside Germany. M. W. Fodor; S..... 156
Holding companies; Amoskeag company, holding, and Amoskeag manufacturing company, operating; EP..... 31
Höllering, Franz
German newspapers under Hitler; S.....151; E.....145; S..... 182
Hollywood, California; ignorance, political. M. Ryskind; S.....278; see also C.....431; 612
See also Moving pictures
Hollywood tea party. M. Ryskind; S..... 581
Holmes, Judge Edwin R. P. W. Ward; S..... 181
Holmes, Oliver Wendell. M. Lerner; S..... 746
Homestead strike; E..... 537
Honor roll, The Nation's, for 1935..... 9
Hopkins, Harry L.; contentions on unemployment refuted. P. W. Ward; S..... 243
Hopson's choice. P. W. Ward; S..... 795 Housing
Administration program; EP..... 169
Government program, failure to launch; E..... 145
Government program held up. P. W. Ward; S..... 243
New York state authority act upheld; E..... 401
Project at Bound Brook, N. J., called unconstitutional; EP..... 661
Slum-clearance farce, Detroit. K. Dash; S.....410; see also C..... 595
Wagner-Ellebogen bill; EP..... 466
Wagner-Ellebogen bill in peril; EP.....631; P. W. Ward; S.....635; S..... 763
Housman, A. E.; death; EP..... 599
Howard, Roy W.
On Newspaper guild; C.....755; see also EP.....662; 678
Howe, Ben
Cats, dogs and children; C.....130; see also EP..... 31
Hudeburg, Charles
Flowering, the; P..... 518
Hughes, Chief justice, Charles Evans; switch on AAA decision. H. Broun; S..... 254
Hughes, Rupert; and the Screen writers' guild. H. Broun; S.....678; see also EP.....662; letters..... 755
Hull, Cordell; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
Hungary; prison, and case of M. Rakosi. L. Santo; C..... 295
Hutchinson, Paul
Methodists retreat; S..... 742
Hydroelectric power. See Power and power industry

I
I want a policeman. J. W. Krutch; D..... 138
Idiot's delight. J. W. Krutch; D..... 490
Immigration; Coolidge-Kerr bill for deportation of aliens guilty of "moral turpitude"; EP..... 367
Income tax. See Finance, public
Industrialists' maintenance of power; E..... 500
Industry; regulation before United States supreme court. O. K. Fraenkel; C..... 564
Industry and labor. See Labor and industry
Inflation. See Currency
Injunction, government of; EP..... 365
Inquirer, Philadelphia. See Philadelphia Inquirer
Insecure old woman, an Social insecurity; C..... 690
Insurance, social. See Social security
Insurance, unemployment; New York law upheld; EP..... 534
It can't happen here, film. See Censorship, moving pictures
International mercantile marine company; must build successor to Leviathan; EP..... 2
Intolerance. M. Van Doren; MP..... 429
Investment trusts; London stock exchange proposals for regulation of "fixed trust"; EP..... 58
Ireland; Free state dissolves republican army; peace overtures to Great Britain; EP..... 826
Iron and steel. See Steel and iron Isolation, United States; E..... 238
Italo-Ethiopian war
American exports to Italy jump; EP..... 263
Conquest by Italy must not be recognized; E..... 698
Difficulties in way of Italian victory not overcome; EP..... 434

- Ethiopia's collapse and Europe's peril; E 599
 Europe misses the bus. Lou; Ct. 645
 Italian victories; Mussolini demands all of Ethiopia; EP. 533
 Italian "victory." O. G. Villard; S. 646
 Italy and Europe. L. Fischer; S. 643
 Italy at war: First impressions. L. Fischer; S. 14
 League of nations. See Italo-Ethiopian war—Sanctions, League of nations
 Mutiny of two Italian regiments; EP. 59
 Mussolini outbluffs England. L. Fischer; S. 123
 Neutrality legislation, opposition to, in Washington. P. W. Ward; S. 128
 Oil exports to Italy; New York Times figures and others; EP. 206
 Peace, responsibilities of. V. M. Dean; S. 244
 Sanctions, League of Nations:
 British surrender on; E. 829
 Case for; EP. 498
 Difficulties in applying sanctions to Italy; E. 4
 Embargo, oil, to be imposed on Italy; EP. 297
 Embargo on Italy lifted by United States; EP. 826
 League council meeting to consider retention of sanctions against Italy; EP. 630
 League falters; E. 117
 Oil sanctions abandoned by United States; EP. 205
 World public opinion. O. G. Villard; S. 7
 Successes, Italian; EP. 466
 Why Mussolini went to war. L. Fischer; S. 67
 See also Neutrality
 Italy; nationalization of industry, by Mussolini; E. 438
 Universities, dead. R. L. Bolaffio; C. 159
 See also British-Italian relations; Italo-Ethiopian war
 It's love again. M. Van Doren; MP. 687
 Itto. M. Van Doren; MP. 203
 Ivens films. M. Van Doren; MP. 687
- J
- Jack and Charlie's restaurant. See Waiters
 Japan; elections; step toward liberalism; EP. 263
 Politics; cabinet, new; militarism more firmly in the saddle; EP. 335
 Politics; fascism misses fire; E. 301
 See also Chinese-Japanese relations; Japanese-German relations; Japanese-Soviet relations Japanese-German relations; military agreement reported; EP. 467
 Japanese-Soviet relations
 Japanese attacks on Mongolian people's republic renewed; EP. 435
 Mongolia—red or white? E. 502
 Outer Mongolia, conflict in. T. A. Biss; S. 507
 War prospects diminished despite clashes in far east; EP.
 Jefferson, Thomas, memorial project; Saint Louis. P. W. Ward; S. 267
 Jerome, Helen; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935. 9
 Jesus Christ; chapter from possible biography of Pontius Pilate. H. Broun; S. 711
 Jews
 And the world. B. Stolberg; S. 766;
 see also EP. 759
 Anti-semitism, German and other. O. G. Villard; S. 279; see also C. 463; C. 691
 Anti-semitism, German, concealed temporarily, for Olympic winter sports; EP. 206
 German:
 Ghetto, possible consequences. W. Zukerman; S. 154
 St. Louis conference on measure for rescue and repatriation; EP. 143
 Persecution denounced by J. G. McDonald; EP. 29
 Palestine, need for building. L. Lewishohn; C. 130; see also E. 61
 Poland; anti-semitism rampant; EP. 535
 World congress, danger in setting up international executive body; EP. 759; see also 766
 See also Palestine
 "Tim crowism." See Negroes
 "John and Mary." H. Broun; S. 180
 Johnson, A. B.
 Black lists and bedding; C. 104
 Johnson, Alvin
 Kipling, Rudyard; S. 192
 Johnson, Alvin; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935. 9
 Johnson, Ethel M.
 Defense of Secretary Perkins; C. 628; see also 303
 Johnstown flood, second. M. S. Stewart; S. 447
- Jones, J. Edward, retreat under securities act held constitutional; EP. 465
 Jones, Philip C.
 Criticism, eternal principles; C. 73
 Jones and Laughlin steel company. See Labor unions Journalism. See Newspapers
 Judges. See Courts
 Judges, race-track and others. H. Broun; S. 647
- K
- Kay, Helen
 League of women shoppers; C. 18; correction 464
 Kendrick, Benjamin B., and M. C. Proctor
 Farmers and planters; C. 130; see also E. 61
 Kenney, Marion Louise
 Minimum-wage law for women; C. 464; see also EP. 334
 Kent, Rockwell; drawing, 1775-1936. 414
 Kester, Howard, and H. L. Mitchell
 Share-croppers; C. 184
 Kester, Howard; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935. 9
 Kingsbury, John A., case of. J. Rorty; S. 801
 Kipling, Rudyard. A. Johnson; S. 192
 Klausler, Alfred
 On "Sawdust Caesar," by G. Seldes; C. 364; see also 108
 Kline, Herbert
 Hollywood fights back; S. 612; see also 431
 278; C. 429
 Klondike Annie. M. Van Doren; MP. 429
 Knox, Frank; thrift habits. H. Broun; S. 351
 See also Presidential election of 1936
 Kramer bill. See Sedition
 Kringer, Ray L.
 Brown shoe company, smashing of unions; S. 131
 Krutch, Joseph Wood
 Artist and the ice age, the; S. 418
 Authors, "outmoded"; S. 190
 Bitter stream; D. 559
 Bury the dead; D. 592
 Call it a day; D. 201
 Case of Clyde Griffiths, the; D. 427
 Criticism and taste; S. 517
 Critics, literary; S. 22
 Dear old darling; D. 359
 Editors, responsibility of; S. 679
 End of summer, the; D. 291
 Ethan Frome; D. 167
 George White's scandals; D. 55
 Gilbert and Sullivan; D. 592
 Granite; D. 138
 I want a policeman; D. 138
 Idiot's delight; D. 490
 Lady precious stream; D. 202
 Libel! D. 55
 Love on the dole; D. 329
 Mainly for lovers; D. 329
 Mid-west; D. 112
 Movies, not so hopeless; S. 585
 Murder in the cathedral; D. 459
 On your toes; D. 559
 Paradise lost; D. 72; see also letters. 72
 Poetry, modern, difficulty of; S. 283
 Political subject, in literature; S. 353
 Russet mantle; D. 167
 Saint Joan; D. 392
 Shakespeare in Hollywood; S. 107
 Tactics and the clerk; S. 616
 Victoria regina; D. 83
 Winterset, critics' prize winner; S. 484
 Ziegfeld follies; D. 231
- L
- Labor
 And social security. P. W. Ward; S. 635
 Automobile. See Automobiles
 Child. See Child labor
 Convict; banning of goods from interstate commerce upheld by supreme court. O. K. Fraenkel; C. 564
 Difficulties in colleges; E. 5
 Minimum-wage law, New York, invalidated by United States supreme court, in Tipaldo case; E. 727; see also letters, with editorial comment. 854
 National labor relations board:
 Brown shoe company, smashing of unions. R. L. Kringer; S. 131
 Decisions for and against act, on collective bargaining; EP. 435
 Examiner Eberle's "wondrous" report on Brown shoe company. P. W. Ward; S. 243
 Guffey act creating labor board held unconstitutional; E. 664
 Madden, J. W., education at public expense. P. W. Ward; S. 440
 Saposs, D., director of board's research and statistical section. P. W. Ward; S. 440
 Party, in 1940; E. 729
 Quilts for. M. Craig; C. 660
 Railroad. See Railroads
 Shipping. See Shipping
- Wagner-Connelly disputes act declared unconstitutional; EP. 1
 Walsh-Healey bill for federal regulation of labor and hours on government business, work for. P. W. Ward; S. 763
 Welfare, The Nation's index. 78, 188
 Women's minimum wage law, New York, declared unconstitutional; EP. 334; see also C. 464
 See also California; Picketing; Strikes
 Labor and industry. 19, 47, 74, 105, 131, 160, 186, 224, 252
 Labor party. See Party, new, liberal Labor relations board, national. See Labor unions
 Labor unions
 Associated press attack on Wagner-Connelly act. H. Broun; S. 157
 Brown shoe company; smashing of unions. R. L. Kringer; S. 131
 Company, Detroit. A. Lucchek; S. 74
 See also Railroads; Steel and iron
 Efforts thwarted by activities of employers before National labor relations board. P. W. Ward; S. 440
 Federal funds used to help manufacturers dodge organization. P. W. Ward; S. 181
 Industrial organization movement gaining headway; EP. 598
 Industrial versus craft unionism, fight in American federation of labor; EP. 261
 Lewis, John L., takes over leadership in America; E. 208
 Rat, remove the; E. 117
 Unionism, opposition to. P. W. Ward; S. 503
 See also American federation of labor; Railroads; Steel and iron; Strikes
 Labor's non-partisan league; formation. P. W. Ward; S. 471
 Lady precious stream. J. W. Krutch; D. 201
 La Follette, Suzanne
 New Jersey's army of unoccupation; S. 608
 LaGuardia, Fiorello H. See New York city
 Lahey, Edwin A.
 Chicago politics; case of R. M. Sweitzer; S. 12
 Lamont, Corliss, and R. N. Baldwin
 Harvard heretics and rebels; S. 733
 Landon, Governor Alfred Mossman. See Presidential election of 1936
 Lane, Professor Arthur; resigns rather than sign loyalty oath; EP. 3
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1935. 9
 Lans, Asher
 Suggests additions to The Nation's honor roll for 1935; C. 73
 Laski, Harold J.
 British arms inquiry; S. 272
 British cabinet—a house divided; S. 575
 League of nations, remains of; S. 102
 Laval, Pierre. See France
 Lavine, Emanuel H.
 "Big shots" in racketeering, immunity; S. 241
 League of nations; remains of. H. J. Laski; S. 102
 See also Italo-Ethiopian war
 League of women shoppers. H. Kay; C. 18; correction 464
 Lehman, Governor. See New York state
 Leiser, Clara
 Seeks letters of W. E. Leonard; C. 628
 Leisure class, Morgan theory; E. 209
 Leonard, William Ellery; letters sought. C. Leiser; C. 628
 Lerner, Max
 Corporate tax battle; S. 669
 Holmes, Oliver Wendell; S. 746
 Riddle of the supreme court; first article; S. 121; second, 213; third, 273
 Supreme court, fate of; S. 379; see also C. 495
 Levenson, Lew
 Soap boxes in Hollywood; C. 431; see also 278
 Leviathan, steamship; successor to be built by International mercantile marine; EP. 2
 Lewis, John L., not overpaid. H. Broun; S. 253
 On The Nation's honor roll for 1935. 9
 Reply to inquiry on desirability of amendment of constitution. 697
 Speech at miners' convention. H. Broun; S. 220
 Speech inadequately reported. H. Broun; S. 47
 Takes over union leadership in America; E. 208
 Lewis, Sinclair, suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C. 73
 See also Censorship, moving pictures
 Lewishohn, Ludwig
 Palestine, building; C. 130; see also E. 61
 Leyda, John M.
 William Jennings Bryan and the war; C. 17
 Libel! J. W. Krutch; D. 55

- Liberal papers barred from Oregon penitentiary. E. Steward; C..... 660
- Liberal party. See Party, new, liberal
- Liberalism, test of. H. B. Davis; C..... 531
- Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
- Liberty and license. H. Broun; S..... 483
- Liberty and tear gas; E..... 500
- "Liberty at the crossroads." See Republican party
- Librarians, Negro, treatment of, at convention. D. M. Duff; C..... 691
- License and liberty. H. Broun; S..... 483
- Lincoln's birthday celebration; EP..... 233
- Lindbergh, Charles Augustus junior
- Hauptmann, Bruno Richard, and capital punishment. O. G. Villard; S..... 513
- Hauptmann execution; EP..... 467
- Lindberghs leave America. O. G. Villard; S..... 35; see also C..... 185
- Linville, Doctor Henry Richardson. V. T. Thayer; C..... 496
- Lipp, Frances M.
- On anthologies of poetry; C..... 722; see also 648
- Lippmann, Walter, on AAA decision. H. Broun; S..... 129
- Literary critics. See Critics, literary
- Little Lord Fauntleroy. M. Van Doren; MP 560
- Lobbying activities, investigation by Black committee; E..... 336; P. W. Ward; S..... 371
- Accused of tyranny; E..... 33
- Fight against. P. W. Ward; S..... 339
- House overrides Hearst objection; EP..... 397
- Injunction, government by; EP..... 365
- Revelations; EP..... 534
- Work. P. W. Ward; S..... 503
- Locarno treaty. See Germany
- London naval conference. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Longshoremen. See Shipping
- Lopez, Jesus. E. Caldwell; S..... 545; C..... 595
- Los Angeles border patrol. See California
- Lou
- Missed the bus; Ct..... 645
- Lous, Joe, fall of. J. T. Farrell; S..... 834
- Louisiana; Long machine makes truce with Roosevelt; EP..... 207
- Love on the dole. J. W. Krutch; D..... 329
- Lovett, Professor Robert Morss, suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C..... 73
- Low
- Crises, war; Ct..... 443
- Peace gesture, Hitler's; Ct..... 407
- Loyalty oaths. See Academic freedom
- Lucas, William T.
- Traitor to his school; S..... 16
- Luchek, Anthony
- Company unions; S..... 74
- Lundberg, Ferdinand
- Landon build-up; S..... 833
- Lundeen, Ernest, on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
- Lunkhead the banker. J. T. Farrell; S..... 642
- Lynchings, in 1935; EP..... 58
- Moving picture, "Fury"; EP..... 759
- Lyons, Eugene
- Squaring the circle, play; C..... 104
- Curley and his gang; S..... 540; see also C..... 628
- M
- Macleish, Archibald
- Speech to the detractors; P..... 284
- Macmillan, Frederick
- Seeks biographical material on Æ (G. W. Russell); C..... 46
- Madden, J. Warren; education at public expense. P. W. Ward; S..... 440
- Magazines; smooth-paper reality. D. Van Doren; S..... 844
- Mahoney, Jeremiah T.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
- Mail censorship by soviet authorities. L. Fischer; C..... 464
- Making of a king, the. M. Van Doren; MP 138
- Mann, Thomas, opinion of Nazism; EP..... 367
- Man's children, a. M. Van Doren; MP..... 138
- Marble workers. See Vermont marble company
- Marburg, Anita
- Marble strike, Vermont; S..... 413; see also C..... 495
- Marcantonio, Congressman V.; arrested in WPA demonstration; EP..... 235
- On The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
- Marder, Louis
- Privacy, new law advocated; C..... 185; see also 35
- Marshall, Margaret
- Steel workers, organization; S..... 637
- Maslow, Alexander
- Testament of I. P. Pavlov to young Russian scientists; C..... 596
- Massachusetts; Jim Curley and his gang. L. M. Lyons; S..... 540; see also C..... 628
- Massachusetts WPA refuses to recognize U. S. S. R.; letter by M. E. Sanger. 532
- Materialism, dialectical, and nature. B. D. Wolfe; C..... 431; see also 288
- Materials, raw; British government rejects motion for better distribution; EP..... 205
- Maury, Reuben
- Daily News*, New York, editorial on Titterton case; C..... 723; see also E..... 570; C..... 853
- Maverick, Maury
- Chaos and cowardice in Washington; S. 305
- South is rising; S..... 770; see also E..... 762
- Stand on hat-removing in elevators and other questions; C..... 824
- Maverick, Maury; bill against militarism. P. W. Ward; S..... 303
- Chivalrous congressman; EP..... 663
- On The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
- May day in America and Europe; progress; EP..... 565
- Mayer, Albert
- Architect and the world; S..... 43
- May's department store strike, report on causes and workers' conditions; EP..... 499; correction..... 660
- McCarthy, Mary
- Murder and Karl Marx; S..... 381
- McCarthy, Mary, criticism. W. Seagle; C..... 494; see also 468
- McCarthy, Mary, and M. Marshall
- On advertising in Yale Review and Virginia Quarterly; C..... 18
- McCormick, Robert R.; comment on coming election. H. Broun; S..... 351
- McDonald, James G.; denounces persecution in Germany; EP..... 29
- Report to League of nations on German refugees; E..... 61; see also C..... 130
- McKillips, Budd L.
- Company unions on the railroads; S..... 48
- Meat packers, bill to control. P. W. Ward; S..... 471
- Medicine; medical care; resignation of J. A. Kingsbury from post of executive secretary of Milbank fund. J. Rorty; S..... 801
- Mendl, Lady, and The Nation. H. A. Whipple; C..... 46
- Methodist episcopal church, conference not anti-radical; EP..... 631
- Retreat on social questions. P. Hutchinson; S..... 742
- Mexico; Calles, P. E., exiled; EP..... 499
- Calles return bring crisis; EP..... 1
- Revolution, bloodless. G. Stern; S..... 605
- Meyers, J. O.
- Proletarian defects; C..... 159; see also 82
- Miami, Florida. H. Broun; S..... 483
- Mice, field, habits investigated; EP..... 115
- Middle class, crisis of. L. E. Hanson; C..... 45
- Mid-west. J. W. Krutch; D..... 112
- Mielziner, Jo; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
- Migrants, problem of; EP..... 367
- Milbank fund; resignation of J. A. Kingsbury. J. Rorty; S..... 801
- Miles, Josephine
- Upon twelve; P..... 807
- Militarism; Maverick bill against. P. W. Ward; S..... 303
- Syracuse a trial city; EP..... 30
- See also Armaments
- Military training; California university votes against compulsory training. L. Davies; C..... 332
- Milk; control act, New York state, supreme court decisions; EP..... 233
- Strike, Chicago, report on; EP..... 631
- Milky way, the. M. Van Doren; MP..... 492
- Millis, Walter
- Last war and the next. I. Morgan, money, and war; S..... 95
- II. What does neutrality mean? S..... 125
- Millis, Walter, on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
- Mills, Clark
- January crossing; P..... 807
- Minimum wage law. See Labor
- Minneapolis; federal court decision in strike; EP..... 207
- Minnesota farmer-labor party to meet; EP..... 367
- Mississippi. See Negroes
- Mitchell, H. L., and H. Kester
- Share-croppers; C..... 184
- Mock, Hugo
- Anti-semitism; C..... 463; see also 279; C..... 691
- Modern times. M. Van Doren; MP..... 232; 429
- Mongolia. See Chinese-Japanese relations; Japanese-Russian relations
- Montjoy, John, case of. M. D. Brite; C..... 496
- Morgan, J. Pierpont, and world war loans. Fritz; Ct..... 92
- At munitions investigation. H. Broun; S. 103
- Theory of leisure class; E..... 209
- Morro Castle, steamship; convictions. O. G. Villard; S..... 175
- Two officers convicted of criminal negligence; EP..... 143
- Mortgages; Frazier-Lemke bill for farm relief, objectionable features; E..... 633
- Moses, W. R.
- Such as the trick chameleon; P..... 807
- Moving pictures
- "Documentary" and "social," Ivens pictures. M. Van Doren; MP..... 687
- Films, early, shown in Museum of modern art; E..... 118
- "Fury," film on lynching; EP..... 759
- Hollywood, closed shop. J. R. Chaplin; S..... 225
- Hollywood fights back. H. Kline; S. 612; see also 278; C..... 431
- Movies on trial, the (book). M. Van Doren; S..... 203
- Not so hopeless. J. W. Krutch; S..... 585
- Shakespeare in Hollywood. J. W. Krutch; S..... 107
- See also Censorship, moving pictures; Hollywood, California; and Giroux, R., and Van Doren, M., for reviews
- Mowrer, Lilian T.
- Hitler's totalitarian theater; S..... 477
- Mr. Deeds goes to town. M. Van Doren; MP 623
- Mr. Lunkhead the banker. J. T. Farrell; S. 642
- Municipal bankruptcy act, invalidated by supreme court; EP..... 694
- Munitions of war
- Guns and airplanes smuggled into Bolivia; EP..... 205
- Inquiry, British. H. J. Laski; S..... 272
- Morgan at Nye committee investigation. H. Broun; S..... 103
- Nye committee report; EP..... 533; EP..... 757
- Sale, how to control. H. C. Engelbrecht; S..... 10
- See also Armaments
- Murder and capital punishment. O. G. Villard; S..... 513
- Murder and Karl Marx. M. McCarthy; S. 381
- Murder in the cathedral. J. W. Krutch; D. 459
- Murder; parole and murder; Titterton case; E..... 570; see also letters..... 853
- Music
- New music society concert. K. Burke; S. 27
- Records, recent. H. Simon; S..... 259, 330, 393, 460, 529, 593, 657, 720, 785
- Comment on Simon articles. M. S. Weinstein; C..... 463
- Muspratt, Clifford
- On anti-semitism; C..... 691; see also 279, 463
- Mussolini, Benito. See Italo-Ethiopian war; Italy
- Mystery stories. See Books
- N
- Nation, The*
- Barred from Oregon penitentiary. E. Steward; C..... 660
- Changes; EP..... 261
- Comment on new format; C..... 395; 463
- Curley article causes sell-out in Boston. H. A.; C..... 628; see also 540
- Editors suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C..... 73
- Excerpts from The Nation of seventy years ago; EP..... 828; 855
- Honor roll for 1935..... 9
- Honor roll for 1935; additions suggested. Letters by A. Lans and G. Fentrack; C..... 73
- Labor welfare, index of. See Labor
- Praise for Adamic article, and Broun page. E. M. S.; C..... 723
- Prize, with Foreign policy association, for editorial, awarded to M. Donnelly; EP..... 567; 582
- Reproved (?) for comment on Lady Mendl. H. A. Whipple; C..... 46
- National bankruptcy act. See Bankruptcy
- National conference on rural social planning. P. W. Ward; S..... 440
- National education association, convention of department of superintendence for academic freedom; EP..... 299
- National labor relations board. See Labor
- National negro congress. See Negroes
- National peace conference. O. G. Villard; S. 550
- Neutrality proposal; E..... 32; EP..... 57
- National student league, executive committee suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C..... 73
- National student strike committee, suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C..... 73
- Natural gas. See Gas, natural
- Naval conference, London. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Naval limitation. See Armament limitation and disarmament
- Navigation and steamboat inspection, bureau of; "insubordination" in. P. W. Ward; S..... 243
- Navy, United States; big-navy advocates winning; EP..... 598
- Nazism. See also Austria; Germany

- Negroes
Harlem, slumbering fires. O. G. Villard; S. 99
"Jim crowism" in Washington. P. W. Ward; S. 403
Librarians, treatment of, at convention. D. M. Duff; C. 691
Mississippi; convictions of three for murder set aside; EP. 263
National negro congress advances unity; E. 302
Republican convention, Negroes at. P. W. Ward; S. 731
Scottsboro case:
Interview. C. Beals; S. 178
Powell, O., shot by sheriff; EP. 141
Trial = puppet show. C. Beals; S. 149
Nemser, Hyman, not guilty of extortion. 464; see also 18
Neuberger, Richard L.
Political notes from the northwest; S. 610
Neutrality
Administration program dictated by business. P. W. Ward; S. 243
Bill, strengthening; E. 32
Bill, weaknesses of; E. 173
Freedom of the seas; EP. 114
Legislation delayed; EP. 141
Legislation to be abandoned at this session of congress; EP. 205
National peace conference proposal; E. 32; EP. 57
Proposal; EP. 57
Prize winning student editorial; EP. 567; 582
Roosevelt betrayal. O. G. Villard; S. 239
What does it mean? W. Millis; S. 125
See also Italo-Ethiopian war
New Jersey; army of unoccupation. S. La Follette; S. 608
Unemployed, demonstration by; EP. 565; E. 569
New music society concert. K. Burke; M. 27
New Republic, The; editors suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C. 73
New year; tight-rope walker. Fritz; Ct. 8
New York city; charter, proposed; EP. 566
Politics; LaGuardia's chances for re-election. G. Britt; S. 341
Prostitution in; E. 369; see also C. 531
Unemployment relief. See Unemployment relief
New York building service strike. See Buildings
New York state
Appropriation for investigating "communistic activities" in schools; EP. 663
Criminal laws; Lehman movement for revision; EP. 206; EP. 235
Election for governor; Lehman decision not to run again; EP. 693
Housing authority act upheld; E. 401
Lehman proposals to the legislature; EP. 57
Minimum-wage law. See Labor
Republicans and their presidential candidate; EP. 57
Social security program in peril; EP. 632
New York Times
Dispatch from Spain; misinformation and distortion; EP. 264
Failure to print report of attack on Tsinghua university; EP. 535
Oil exports to Italy; figures by New York Times, and other figures; EP. 206
News, lighter side of; E. 830
Newspapers
American newspaper guild:
Amsterdam News strike won; EP. 30
Associated press discharge of M. Watson. H. Broun; S. 385
Broun conviction in Milwaukee. H. Broun; S. 551
Knox, Frank, and the guild. H. Broun; S. 253
Menaces freedom of the press, Roy Howard thinks; EP. 662
Move toward unionization. H. Broun; S. 745
Philadelphia Inquirer opposition; hearing; EP. 3
Wisconsin News strike. H. Broun; S. 320; S. 451
Columnists. O. G. Villard; S. 147
Editorials, Six-star service; EP. 695
Foreign correspondents. G. Seldes; S. 375
German, under Hitler. F. Höllering; S. 151; E. 145; S. 182
Labor news inadequately reported. H. Broun; S. 47
Methods. H. Broun; S. 351
Printing the news. H. B. Swope; C. with editorial comment. 221
Publicity drives Lindberghs from America. O. G. Villard; S. 35; see also C. 185
See also Freedom of the press
Nichols, Dudley
On Screen writers' guild; C. 765; see also 678
Night at the opera, a. M. Van Doren; MP. 28
Nobel prize for peace; Von Ossietzky, imprisoned, nominated; EP. 498
Non-partisan league, labor's, formation. P. W. Ward; S. 471
Norris, George W., reply to inquiry on desirability of amendment of constitution 697 Northwest, political notes from. R. L. Neuberger; S. 610
Novels. See Books
Nude in art. See Censorship, art
Nye, Senator Gerald P.; suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C. 73
Nye committee. See Munitions of war
O
Oaths, loyalty. See Academic freedom
O'Connor, Representative, John; fight against "anti-red" bills. P. W. Ward; S. 215
Odets, Clifford; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935. 9
O'Hara, Elmer B., conviction. P. W. Ward; S. 215
Oil. See Italo-Ethiopian war
Old-age pensions, Townsend plan
Article by P. W. Ward 37
Difficulties; EP. 434
Good for Townsend. Fritz; Ct. 36; see also C. 295
Mulcting the aged; E. 470
To be investigated; EP. 264
Old curiosity shop, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 84
Olympic games; winter sports; anti-semitism concealed; EP. 206
On your toes. J. W. Krutch; D. 559
One rainy afternoon. M. Van Doren; MP. 753
Oregon penitentiary bars liberal papers. E. Steward; C. 660
O'Shea, James J.; indicted on charge of theft of Detroit city funds. P. W. Ward; S. 405
Ossietzky, Carl von, imprisoned, nominated for Nobel peace prize; EP. 498
Outer Mongolia. See Japanese-Russian relations
Otis, Judge Merrill O., declares Wagner-Connelly act unconstitutional; EP. 1
Oxford group. See Buchman, F. N. D.
P
Pacifism; growth. O. G. Villard; S. 710
National peace conference. O. G. Villard; S. 550
Packard, Rose Marie
Los Angeles border patrol; C. 295
Packers. See Meat packers
Painting. H. Broun; S. 280
Palestine; Arab-Jewish conflict; EP. 535
Arab-Jewish conflict, and British policy. A. Viton; S. 708; see also EP. 694; letters 822
See also Jews
Paradise lost. J. W. Krutch; D. 27; see also C. 72
Paraguay; fascist regime effect; EP. 366
Parole. See Prisons and prisoners
Party, new, liberal; labor party coming; E. 468
Passing of the third floor back, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 623
Patterson, J. M.
Reply to inquiry on desirability of amendment of constitution. 760; see also 696
Paylov, Professor I. P.; testament to young Soviet scientists. A. Maslow; C. 595
Pay. See Salaries
Peace, responsibilities of. V. M. Dean; S. 244
See also Pacifism
Peace prize. See Nobel prize for peace
Pearce, Charles A.
On publication of book, M-day; C. 494
Peg of old Drury. M. Van Doren; MP. 623
Pekin, Illinois; general strike; EP. 207
Pensions, old-age. See Old-age pensions
People's theater associates. H. Herne; S. 364
Perkins, Secretary Frances. P. W. Ward; S. 303; see also C. 628
Visited by sailors' delegates. P. W. Ward; S. 571
Philadelphia Inquirer; hearing in case of its opposition to American newspaper guild; EP. 3
Philippine islands, militarizing. H. E. Fey; S. 736 Photograph records. See Music
Photography, modern. M. Bourke-White; S. 217
Pickering, Ruth
Trudi Schoop, and her comic ballet; S. 84
Picketing; mass, picketing held not unlawful in May's department store case; EP. 143
Pittsburgh, university of; blacklisted by American association of university professors; EP. 3
Plow that broke the plains, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 753
Poems
Biography. A. C. Edmunds. 255
Flashing cliff, a. M. Rukeyser. 807
Flowering, the. C. Hudeburg. 518
Genesis. T. Roethke. 807
January crossing. C. Mills. 807
Revisitation. S. Sassoon. 134
Speech to the detractors. A. Macleish. 284
Such as the trick chameleon. W. R. Moses. 807
Upon twelve. J. Miles. 807
Poetry; anthologies. B. Belitt; S. 648; see also letters. 722
Modern, difficulty of. J. W. Krutch; S. 283
Poland; anti-semitism rampant; EP. 535
Between poverty and war. L. Fischer; S. 343
Politics and friendships. O. G. Villard; S. 211
Polka, 1936; Ct. 345
Pontius Pilate, chapter from possible biography. H. Broun; S. 711
Pope, Senator James Pinckney, fight against. R. L. Neuberger; S. 610
Porto Rico. See Puerto Rico
Post, Charles J.
Marble strike; C. 495; see also. 413
Pound, Ezra, devotions. S. Van Veen; Ct. 553
Powell, Ozie. See Negroes—Scottsboro case
Power and power industry
Lobby still active in Washington. P. W. Ward; S. 795
Public "authorities" in prospect; EP. 262
Public works administration's right to make grant for public plant upheld; EP. 262
Power in United States, how maintained; E. 500
Presidential election of 1936
Democratic party:
Convention; E. 828
Landslide; E. 601
General:
Election of delegates; EP. 466
Landon and Roosevelt. P. W. Ward; S. 831
McCormick comment. H. Broun; S. 351
Northwest, political notes from. R. L. Neuberger; S. 610
Republican party:
Agony over nomination. P. W. Ward; S. 538
Campaign contributions. Fritz; Ct. 64
Candidates; EP. 57
Convention. O. G. Villard; S. 797
Convention, address to; E. 759
Convention outcome a change in control by political gang; platform; E. 791
Elephant goes west. E. Duffy; Ct. 796
Hearst's convention. H. Broun; S. 800
"Liberty at the crossroads." H. Broun; S. 180
Knox, Frank, biography. H. Broun; S. 843
Knox, campaign. R. G. Swing; S. 219; S. 248
Landon build-up. F. Lundberg; S. 833
Landon gives views; EP. 629
Landon nomination, and Hearst. H. Broun; S. 779
Landon, possibility. P. W. Ward; S. 39; 70; EP. 59
"Liberty at the crossroads." H. Broun; S. 180
Negroes at convention. P. W. Ward; S. 731
Outlook. O. G. Villard; S. 677
Possibilities. H. Broun; S. 220
Press. See Freedom of press; Newspapers
Prisoner of Shark Island, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 292
Prisons; liberal papers barred from Oregon penitentiary. E. Steward; C. 660 Parole and murder; E. 570; see also letters 723, 853
See also Chain gangs
Privacy, new law advocated. L. Marder; C. 185; see also. 35
Private life of Louis XIV, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 138
Prize fighting. See Boxing
Processing taxes. See Agriculture
Proctor, Mary Catherine, and B. B. Kendrick
Farmers and planters; C. 130; see also E. 61
Production-for-use platform endorsed by Washington state democrats; EP. 791
Progress in United States, indications of; E. 264
Proletarian defects. J. O. Meyers; C. 159; see also 82
Prostitution in New York city and in the soviet union. A. W. Fields; S. 369; S. 373; see also C. 531
Public finance. See Finance, public
Public works administration; abandonment, proposed; EP. 434
Right to make grant for construction of hydroelectric plant upheld; EP. 262

Puerto Rico, independence offer, specious; E. 567 Tydings bill for independence, opposition to; EP. 726
Pugilism. See Boxing
Pulitzer prizes; EP. 597

Q

Quilts for labor. M. Craig; C. 660

R

Race prejudice; Warren bequest to Yale; EP 171
Racketeers. See Crime and criminals
Radicals; bills against, fought by Representative O'Connor. P. W. Ward; S. 215
Editors summoned for "questioning" in New York; EP. 114
Radio; entertainment. H. Broun; S. 686; S. 734
Railroads
Company unions. B. L. McKillips; S. 48
Labor, "coordination allowances"; EP. 695
Labor; Wheeler-Crosson bill for re-employment or compensation; EP. 334
Loans to, rates forced down; EP. 115
Passenger fares reduced; EP. 1; EP. 293
United States steel corporation, ownership of roads. P. W. Ward; S. 403
Rakosi, Mathias, in Hungarian prison. L. Santo; C. 295
Ralston, Jackson H.
California sales tax; C. 660; see also. 509
Ravage, M. E.
Decline of French fascism, the; S. 347; see also C. 463
Elections, for the future; S. 549
France on strike; S. 765; see also EP. 757
French left victory; S. 573; see also EP. 567
French socialists in power; S. 706
Hitler stiffens French right; S. 408
Rat, labor. See Labor unions
Rates, passenger. See Railroads
Raw materials. See Materials
Reading. See Books
Records, phonograph. See Music
"Reds." See Communists
Rees, John, robe of; work of Granville Hicks. S. Van Veen; C. 587
Refugees. See Germany
Relief. See Unemployment relief
Remington-Rand company, strike; EP. 790; EP. 827
Republican party; brain trust scheme for saving country; EP. 599
Broadcast, "Liberty at the crossroads"; S. 129
Washington and Lincoln, vested interest in; EP. 233
See also Presidential election of 1936
Resettlement work, struggle over; EP. 661
Rhineland. See Germany
Rhodes. M. Van Doren; MP. 360
Rice, Elmer, resignation as New York regional director, WPA theater project; E. 174
Rich; "self-sacrifice." O. G. Villard; S. 583
"Soaking." G. Terborgh; S. 479
Richberg, Donald, back with railroad brotherhoods. P. W. Ward; S. 303
Rieve, Emil, appointment to United States delegation to International labor office meeting. P. W. Ward; S. 635
Rights, civil. See Civil rights
Ritter, Judge, conviction after impeachment; EP. 534
Robertson, Frank
Akron, death rattle in; S. 309
Robinson, Frederick B. See College of the city of New York
Roethke, Theodore
Genesis; P. 807
Roman catholic church. See Germany
Room in red and white, a. B. B.; D. 167
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
Addresses; Baltimore; EP. 497; E. 536
Jefferson day, in New York; EP. 565
On tour of southwest; EP. 789
Administration:
Adoption of Republican policies. O. G. Villard; S. 384
Attack by Alfred E. Smith; E. 144; O. G. Villard; S. 211
Chaos and cowardice in Washington. M. Maverick; S. 305
Confusion, picture of; E. 172
Courts, attitude toward. P. W. Ward; S. 181
Farm program; EP. 169
Financial policy. P. W. Ward; S. 215
Housing program; EP. 169
Taxation policy, unsound; E. 265
Three years; E. 300
Tyranny, charges of; E. 336
Youth, hold on; EP. 497
And Landon. P. W. Ward; S. 833
Cabinet, next. H. Broun; S. 514

Message to congress. P. W. Ward; S. 65; E. 60
Neutrality policy. O. G. Villard; S. 239
Orders investigation of steel industry; EP. 827
President and constitution; Roosevelt's dilemma. O. G. Villard; S. 91
Social security, speech on, at Baltimore; E. 536
Roosevelt, Mrs. Franklin D. O. G. Villard; S. 482
Roper, Secretary Daniel C.; visited by sailors' delegates. P. W. Ward; S. 571
Rorty, James; J. A. Kingsbury; case of; S. 801
Ross, Governor Ben, political career. R. L. Neuberger; S. 610
Rothschild, John
Travel, articles on; S. 462, 562, 626, 689
Rubber; Akron, Ohio; death rattle heard in Goodyear strike. F. Robertson; S. 309
Goodyear strike settled; EP. 398
Rukeyser, Muriel
Flashing cliff, a; P. 807
Rural social planning. See Agriculture
Russell, G. W. (E.); bibliographical material sought. F. Macmillan; C. 46
Russet mantle. J. W. Krutch; D. 167
Russia. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
Ryskind, Morrie
Hollywood, no soap boxes in; S. 278; see also C. 431; 612
Hollywood, tea party; S. 581

S

S., E. M.
Thanks for Adamic article on H. Bridges, and Broun page; C. 723
Sacramento. See California
Safety at sea. See Shipping
Sailors. See Labor
Saint Donats restored by Hearst. A. Welsh correspondent; S. 250
Saint Joan. J. W. Krutch; D. 392
Saint Louis, Missouri; Thomas Jefferson memorial project. P. W. Ward; S. 267
Salaries, large, published; EP. 86
Publication restrained; EP. 53
Sales tax. See California
San Francisco; "red." H. Broun; S. 103
Waterfront. O. Carlson; S. 105
San Joaquin valley. See California
Sanctions. See Italo-Ethiopian war
Sanger, Mary Elizabeth
U. S. S. R. and WPA; C. 532
Santo, Lettau
Hungarian prison, and case of M. Rakosi; C. 295
Saposs, Dave, director of National labor board's research and statistical section. P. W. Ward; S. 440
Sassoon, Siegfried
Revisitation; P. 134
Saxton, Stanley E.
Vermont, truth suppressed; C. 822; see also 413; C. 495; 659; C. 822, 824
Schacht, Hjalmar. See Germany
Schappes, Morris U. See College of the city of New York
Scheyer, David
Dressmakers' strike; S. 224
Scheyer, David; debate with H. Broun on Communist party and the united front 19
Schiller, Morris Joseph, inventor. S. Stone; C. 17
Schmeling-Louis fight. J. T. Farrell; S. 834
School athletics; traitor to his school. W. T. Lucas; S. 16
Schools, workers', threatened. M. Bonner; C. 185
Schoop, Trudi, and her comic ballet. R. Pickering; S. 84
Schurz, Carl, and celebration at Libar. O. G. Villard; S. 778
Science, and conventions of scientists; E. 62
Scottsboro case. See Negroes
Screen writers' guild, the, and Rupert Hughes. H. Broun; S. 678; see also EP. 662; letters 755
Scrooge. M. Van Doren; MP. 84
Seagle, William
Murder, Marx and McCarthy; S. 494; see also 468
Seamen. See Labor
Seattle upholds civil liberty. C. Stevens; S. 252
Secret agent. R. Giroux; MP. 821
Secret society, new; E. 6
Section 77-b. See Bankruptcy
Securities act held constitutional; EP. 465
Securities and exchange commission, restrained from making public American can company salaries; EP. 58
Sedgwick, Anne Douglas; letters sought. B. de Selincourt; C. 185
Sedition; Kramer and Tydings bills; EP. 87
Seeley, Evelyn
Our number one fascists; S. 473

Seldes, George
Newspaper foreign correspondents; S. 375
Seldes, George; suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C. 73
Seligman, Edwin R. A.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935. 9
Selincourt, Basil de
Seeks letters by A. D. Sedgwick; C. 185
Shakespeare, William. See Moving pictures
Share-croppers. See Agriculture
Shaw, George Bernard; okays a few saints; C. 453
Sheehan, Victor; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935. 9
Shipping
Bridges, Harry, leader of longshoremen. L. Adamic; S. 576
Labor conditions, bad, on American ships; EP. 366
Labor wars; EP. 171
Safety at sea:
And labor; E. 501
And seamen's strike. M. R. Bendiner; S. 542; see also EP. 534
Drastic action needed; E. 666
Morro Castle convictions. O. G. Villard; S. 175
See also Morro Castle (steamship)
Steamship California strike; safety at sea involved; E. 666 Strikes:
All waterfronts in unrest; EP. 534
Delegates appear before Secretaries Perkins and Roper. P. W. Ward; S. 571
Eastern, ends; EP. 725
Gulf and west ports; EP. 59
San Francisco waterfront. O. Carlson; S. 105
Steamship California; strikers fined and discharged; EP. 398
West and east coast. L. Adamic; S. 576
Subsidies:
Copeland-Roper act. P. W. Ward; S. 403
Direct, Guffey bill for; EP. 299
Mail, eliminated from appropriation bill; EP. 366
Speed of subsidized vessels investigated; EP. 115
Shoemaker, Joseph; six policemen arrested in killing, Tampa; EP. 3
Shostac, Percy
Vermonters still on strike; C. 659
Show boat. M. Van Doren; MP. 753
Silicosis; at Vanetta, West Virginia, near Gauley Bridge; EP. 115; 162
Simon, Henry
Music, recorded; S. 259, 330, 393, 460, 529, 593, 657, 720, 785
Comment on articles. M. S. Weinstein; C. 463
Simonds, Frank H.; death. O. G. Villard; S. 147
Six-star service, offer of editorials; EP. 695
Slums. See Housing
Smith, Alfred E. See Democratic party; Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
Smith, Governor Charles M.
Vermont strike; C. 824; see also 413; C. 459; 659; C. 822
Smith, Winifred
Heidelberg and Vassar; C. 396; see also EP. 299; E. 338
Soaking the rich. G. Terborgh; S. 479
Social planning, rural. See Agriculture
Social security
Frazier, Senator, introduces bill; administration act inadequate; EP. 30
Insecurity. An insecure old woman; C. 690
Labor and social security. P. W. Ward; S. 635
Legislation; E. 401
Roosevelt's Baltimore speech; E. 535
Socialist party; New York state; split; E. 90; see also C. 431; EP. 693 Soil conservation. See Agriculture
Solow, Herbert
Sacramento criminal-syndicalism case defense; C. 158; see also C. 296
Song and dance man, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 429
South, the; progress in; E. 762; see also 770; 775
Sick; E. 33
Southern tenant farmers' union. See Agriculture
Spain
Alcala Zamora, President, dismissed; EP. 499
Elections; progressives win; EP. 234
Moves left; E. 266
News from, distorted by New York Times; EP. 264
Politics; liberal government in peril; EP. 365
Revolution, mobilizing for. A. Brenner; S. 546
Special correspondent, a
Vermont: State of anarchy; S. 675
Speechmaking. H. Broun; S. 220
Squaring the circle, play. E. Lyons and M. Gold; C. 104

Stalin, Joseph; discusses communism; EP... 333
 States' rights issue; E..... 632
 Steel and iron
 Companies accused of violating anti-trust laws; EP..... 398
 International affiliation, movement for; EP..... 726
 Investigation ordered by president; EP. 827
 Justice in; E..... 537
 Labor:
 Company unions. R. M. Stein; S.. 160
 Fight against unions, by companies; E..... 537
 Homestead strike of 1892; E..... 537
 Jones and Laughlin fights unions; EP..... 367
 Workers, organization. M. Marshall; S..... 637
 Workers, organization along craft or industrial lines; EP..... 629
 Workers to be organized; EP..... 662
 Workers to be organized on industrial lines; EP..... 758
 Stein, Rose M.
 Company union in steel industry S.... 160
 Stern, J. David
 Reply to inquiry on desirability of amendment of constitution. 760; see also... 696
 Stern, George
 Mexico's bloodless revolution; S..... 605
 Stern, Seymour
 "Movies on trial, the," review by M. Van Doren; C..363; see also..... 203
 Stevens, Cole
 Seattle upholds civil liberty; S..... 252
 Steward, Earl
 Liberal papers barred from Oregon penitentiary; C..... 660
 Stewart, Maxwell S.
 Inflation; talk in the air; S..... 306
 Johnstown flood, second; S..... 447
 Stolberg, Benjamin
 Not a satirist; C..... 595
 Jew and the world, the; S..... 766; see also EP..... 759
 Talmadge, Governor Eugene; S....269; 316
 Stone, Sam
 Morris Joseph Schiller, inventor; C.... 17
 Story of Louis Pasteur, the. M. Van Doren; MP..... 292
 Strand, Paul
 Krutch review of Paradise lost, play; C. 72
 Strikes; Minneapolis; federal court decision; EP..... 207
 See also Borden company; Buildings, New York; Consumers' research; Dressmakers; May's department store; Newspapers; Pekin, Illinois; Remington-Rand company; Rubber; Shipping; Steel and iron; Vermont marble company; Waiters
 Student editorial, prize-winning; EP....567; 582
 Student league for industrial democracy, suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C..... 73
 Students, American, unite in American student union; E..... 33
 Subsidies, shipping. See Shipping
 Sugar institute; move against anti-trust laws; EP..... 171
 Supreme court, United States
 And the constitution. C. A. Beard; S. 405
 Cases involving regulation of industry. O. K. Fraenkel; C..... 564
 Decisions in seven cases; EP..... 694
 Decisions on New York state milk control act; EP..... 233
 Fate of. M. Lerner; S..... 379
 Hughes switch on AAA decision. H. Broun; S..... 253
 Influence for overthrow of United States government. H. Broun; S..... 103
 Kills agricultural adjustment administration; E..... 61; see also C..... 130
 Minimum-wage law, New York, decision against; E..... 727; see also letter, with editorial comment..... 854
 Odd man, education of; E..... 146
 Orders processing AAA taxes returned; EP..... 85
 Reaffirms intent to fight attempts to curb powers; EP..... 598
 Riddle of. M. Lerner; S..121, 213, 273, 379; see also C..... 495
 Saint Joseph stockyards case decision; EP..... 598
 Tennessee valley authority decision; E.. 236
 Surpluses. See Corporations
 Sutherland, Justice George. H. Broun; S. 103
 Swanson, Secretary Claude; dominated by red-baiters. P. W. Ward; S..... 243
 Sweden; budget; increase for social and cultural purposes; EP..... 170
 Sweitzer, Robert M.; case of. E. A. Lahey; S..... 12

Swing, Raymond Gram
 Knox, Frank, presidential candidate; S..... 219; 248
 Landon, Alf. M.; S....39, 70; see also EP..... 59
 Switzerland; Gustloff affair; E..... 210
 Swope, Herbert Bayard
 Newspapers and the news; C, with editorial comment..... 221
 Symes, Lillian
 After EPIC in California; S..... 509; see also C..... 660
 Syracuse, New York, trial city for fascism; EP..... 30
 Syria; general strike in Damascus, outcome of. A. Viton; EP..... 435; S..... 448
 Syrkin, Marie
 Arab and Jew; C.... 822; see also EP..... 694; 708
 Szold, Henrietta; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
 T
 Tactics and the clerk. J. W. Krutch; S.. 616
 T., V.
 On anthologies of poetry; C....723; see also..... 648
 Tale of two cities, a. M. Van Doren; MP. 84
 Talmadge, Governor Eugene. B. Stolberg; S..... 269; 316
 See also Democratic party
 Tampa, Florida; six policemen arrested in case of killing of J. Shoemaker; EP.3; EP..... 661
 Tariff, United States
 Corporation beneficiaries; EP..... 498
 Cotton textiles, Japanese, duty increased; EP..... 694
 Countervailing duties imposed on German goods; EP..... 758
 Taste and criticism. J. W. Krutch; S.... 517
 Tax, sales. See California
 Taxation. See Finance, public
 Taxi driver not a good source of news. H. Broun; S..... 253
 Teachers college; labor difficulties in dining hall; E..... 5
 Teachers' loyalty oath. See Academic freedom Teeth. See Dentistry
 Tennessee valley authority
 Constitutionality; EP..... 85
 New deal's greatest asset. S. Chase; S..702; 738, 775, 804; see also EP... 827
 Reorganization, coming, reported; EP. 827
 Supreme court decision on validity of act; E..... 236
 Terborgh, George
 "Soaking the rich"; S..... 479
 Thälmann, Ernest; news suppressed; EP.... 59
 Thayer, V. T.
 Honor to H. R. Linville; C..... 496
 Theater, the; German, under Hitler. L. T. Mowrer; S..... 477
 Winterset, critics' prize winner. J. W. Krutch; S..... 484
 See also B. B.; Krutch, J. W.; Pickering, R.
 Theater associates, people's. H. Herne; C. 364
 These three. M. Van Doren; MP..... 492
 Things to come. M. Van Doren; MP.... 560
 Third party. See Party, new, liberal
 Thirty-nine steps, the. M. Van Doren; MP. 203
 This week. See Bullitt, W. C.
 Thomas, J. H., downfall. O. G. Villard; S. 744
 Thomas, Norman; suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. A. Lans; C.... 73
 Three women. M. Van Doren; MP..... 492
 Times, New York. See New York Times
 Tipaldo case. See Labor
 Tire manufacturing companies; EP..... 31
 Titterton murder; E..... 570; see also letters..... 723; 853
 Todd, Constance Leupp
 Women's work, and equality; letter, with editorial comment; 854; see also E.. 727
 Townsend, Doctor F. E., defiance of congress. P. W. Ward; S..... 700
 Suggested for The Nation's honor roll for 1935. G. Fentrick; C..... 73
 Townsend plan. See Old-age pensions
 Trail of the lonesome pine, the. M. Van Doren; MP..... 360
 Travel, articles on. J. Rothschild; S....462; 562, 626, 689
 Trotsky, Leon, and Hearst. J. P. Cannon; C. 396
 Troy, William
 On being contemporary; S..... 511
 Truth in securities act held constitutional; EP..... 465
 Tufts professors resign rather than sign oath of loyalty; EP..... 3
 Tugwell, Rex; open letter to, on farm rehabilitation in Alabama. T. Burke; S..... 106; see also C..... 362
 TVA. See Tennessee valley authority
 Tydings bills. See Puerto Rico; Sedition
 Tyranny, in Roosevelt administration; E.... 336

U

USSR. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
 Unemployment
 Englewood, New Jersey, families feeding on garbage; EP..31; see also C..130; C..... 223
 Middle class, crisis of. L. E. Hanson; C..... 45
 New Jersey. See New Jersey
 Organizations of unemployed unified; EP. 499
 Unemployment insurance. See Insurance, unemployment
 Unemployment relief
 Federal, failure of. E. Abbott; S.... 346
 Federal, today and tomorrow; E..... 174
 Inadequacy shown by survey by American association of social workers; EP.... 207
 Increase in January; EP..... 297
 New York city; Works progress administration, a hard job, ill done; E. 438
 Starving on relief. I. Feinstein; S.... 186
 Stepchildren of recovery; E..... 400
 Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
 Armament activity in face of war threat. L. Fischer; S..... 442
 Bullitt, W. C., accused of anti-soviet activity; EP..... 790
 Constitution, new. L. Fischer; S..772; see also E..... 761
 Democracy; E..... 761; see also..... 772
 Food exports; EP..... 299
 Mail censored. L. Fischer; C..... 464
 Neglected at Harvard tercentenary; EP. 727
 Not recognized by Massachusetts WPA. M. E. Sanger; C..... 532
 Oil exports to Italy; figures by New York Times, and other figures; EP.. 206
 Prostitution in. A. W. Field; E..369; S..... 531
 "Utopia." W. H. Chamberlin; C..... 18
 See also Japanese-Russian relations
 Unions, company and other. See Labor unions
 United mine workers
 Doubling of salaries of officials. P. W. Ward; S..... 215 Speeches at convention. H. Broun; S.. 220
 Split with American federation of labor not inevitable. H. Broun; S..... 220
 United States
 Arming for war; E..... 436
 Finances. See Finance, public
 Isolation; E..... 238
 Power in, how maintained; E..... 500
 Progress, indications of; E..... 264
 Prosperity, new; E..... 600
 Seventy years ago; excerpts from The Nation; EP..... 828; 855
 United States steel corporation, ownership of railroads. P. W. Ward; S..... 403
 Universities. See Colleges
 Untermeyer, Louis
 On anthologies of poetry; C..... 722; see also..... 648
 V
 Van Doren, Dorothy
 Smooth-paper reality; S..... 844
 Van Doren, Mark
 Ah, wilderness; MP..... 84
 Annie Oakley; MP..... 360
 Bonheur, le; MP..... 203
 Ceiling zero; MP..... 203
 Charlie Chan's secret; MP..... 560
 Children of the revolution; MP..... 753
 Cloistered; MP..... 429
 Country doctor, the; MP..... 492
 Dubrovsky; MP..... 360
 Follow the fleet; MP..... 84
 Frontier; MP..... 138
 Ghost goes west, the; MP..... 560
 Great Ziegfeld, the; MP..... 429
 Intolerance; MP..... 687
 It's love again; MP..... 203
 Itto; MP..... 429
 Klondike Annie; MP..... 560
 Little Lord Fauntleroy; MP..... 138
 Making of a king, the; MP..... 492
 Man's children, a; MP..... 429
 Milky way, the; MP..... 203
 Modern times; MP..... 232; 429
 Movies on trial, the (book); S..... 203
 Mr. Deeds goes to town; MP..... 623
 Night at the opera, a; MP..... 28
 Old curiosity shop, the; MP..... 84
 One rainy afternoon; MP..... 754
 Passing of the third floor back, the; MP. 623
 Peg of old Drury; MP..... 753
 Plow that broke the plains, the; MP... 292
 Prisoner of Shark island, the; MP.... 138
 Private life of Louis XIV, the; MP... 203
 Reply to S. Stern's criticism of his review of "The movies on trial"; C.363; see also..... 203
 Rhodes; MP..... 360
 Scrooge; MP..... 84
 Show boat; MP..... 753

- Song and dance man, the; MP..... 429
 Story of Louis Pasteur, the; MP..... 292
 Tale of two cities, a; MP..... 84
 These three; MP..... 492
 Things to come; MP..... 560
 Thirty-nine steps, the; MP..... 203
 Three women; MP..... 492
 Trail of the lonesome pine, the; MP..... 350
 Voice of Bugle Ann, the; MP..... 360
 We are from Kronstadt; MP..... 687
- Van Veen, Stuyvesant
 Hicks, Granville, and John Reed; Ct.. 587
 Pound, Ezra, devotions; Ct..... 553
- Vanetta, West Virginia. See Silicosis
- Vassar college, and invitation to Heidelberg university. W. Smith; C.....396; see also EP.....299; E..... 338
- Veblen, Thorstein, and Henry George. E. W. Bell; C.....659; see also..... 321
- Venizelos, Eleutherios, death; EP..... 399
- Vermont marble company strike
 Article by A. Marburg, 413 (see also C, 495); by P. Shostac, 659; letters, 822, 824
- Veterans
 Bonus; passage held certain, EP, 85; majority in both houses, EP, 113; bill passed; EP..... 142
 Veterans of future wars. H. Broun; S..... 417
 Article by O. G. Villard; S..... 450
 Bonuses. C. Berlinrut; C..... 532
 Not for college students only. C. Berlinrut; C..... 532
 Spirit of; EP..... 399
 Treason among. L. Wechsler; S..... 672
- Victoria regina. J. W. Krutch; D..... 73
- Villard, Oswald Garrison
 Harlem hospital; reply to Commissioner Goldwater; C..... 251
- Issues and men:
 America's betrayal, in entering world war; S..... 119
 Anti-semitism, German and other; S..279; see also C..463; C..... 691
 Armament race; S..... 350
 British foreign policy; S..... 614
 Colonies, demand for; S..... 319
 Columnists in journalism; S..... 147
 Farmer-labor party convention; S..... 842
 Harlem, slumbering fires; S..... 99
 Hauptmann execution, and capital punishment; S..... 513
 Hearst, how to expose; S.....63; see also C..... 159
 Hitler remilitarization of the Rhineland; S..... 416
 Italian "victory"; S..... 646
 League of nations, and world public opinion; S..... 7
 Lindberghs leave; S..35; see also C. 185
 Morro Castle convictions; S..... 175
 National peace conference; S..... 550
 Pacifism, growth of; S..... 710
 Politics and friendships; S..... 211
 Republican convention in Cleveland; S..... 797
 Republican outlook; S..... 677
 Rich, "self-sacrifice"; S..... 583
 Roosevelt adoption of Republican policies; S..... 384
 Roosevelt and neutrality; S..... 239
 Roosevelt and the constitution; the president's dilemma; S..... 91
 Roosevelt, Mrs. Eleanor; S..... 482
 Schurz, Carl, and celebration at Libar; S..... 778
 Simonds, Frank H., death of; S..... 147
 Thomas, J. H., downfall; S..... 744
 Veterans of future wars; S..... 450
 Wolff, Theodor; "The eve of 1914"; S..... 482
- Virginia Quarterly, advertising in. M. McCarthy and M. Marshall; C..... 18
- Viton, Albert
 Arabian-Jewish conflict, and British policy; S..708; see also EP.....694; letters..... 822
 Damascus, general strike in; S..448; see also EP..... 435
- Voice of Bugle Ann, the. M. Van Doren; MP..... 360
- W
- Wages. See Labor
- Wagner-Connery act. See Labor
- Wagner-Ellenbogen bill. See Housing
- Waiters
 Strike at Jack and Charlie's restaurant, New York. H. Broun; S..... 157
- Waldman, Louis
 Socialist party factions; C.....431; see also E..... 90
- Walsh-Healey bill. See Labor
- Walton, Eda Lou
 On anthologies of poetry; C..722; see also..... 648
- War
 Crises. Low; Ct..... 443
 Germany prepares. L. Fischer; S..... 311
 Munitions. See Munitions of war
- Profits; Nye committee investigation; E. 89
 See also Armaments; Europe; Italo-Ethiopian war; Neutrality; Peace; World war
- War, world. See World war
- War-profits bill revision; EP..... 467
- Ward, Paul W.
 AAA decision; results; S..... 93
 AAA program, new; S..... 440
 Adjournment rush imperils needed legislation; S..... 667
 American telephone and telegraph company, investigation of; S..403, 471, 603
 Attack on Section 77-b of national bankruptcy act; S..... 795
 Bilbo, Senator, speech; S..... 440
 Black legion; power behind; S.....731; see also E..... 728
 Civil rights, violations, investigation proposed; S..... 731
 Congress, action and non-action on bills, before adjournment; S..... 763 Congress, cleaning up the calendar; S.. 603
 "Consumers' project"; S..... 303
 Costigan, Senator, retirement; S..... 538
 Creel, G., out of WPA; S..... 303
 Democratic national committee members; S..... 128
 Elections for house of representatives and senate; S..... 538
 Finance, public; peril to public credit; S..... 128
 Financial policy, administration's; S.. 215
 First national bank of Detroit; failure; S..... 128
 Florida canal; S..... 215
 Food and drug administration, attacks on; S..... 603
 Food and drug bill, "doctored"; S..... 667
 Food and drug bill, drive for; S..... 700
 Guffey law, supreme court decision; S.. 181
 Holmes, Judge Edwin R.; S..... 403
 "Jim crowism" in Washington; S..... 635
 Labor and social security; S..... 471
 Labor's non-partisan league, formation; S..... 181
 Labor unions; federal funds used to help manufacturers; S..... 831
 Landon and Roosevelt; S..... 339
 Lobbying investigation, Black committee fight against; S..... 371
 Lobbying, investigation of; S..... 440
 Madden, J. W., education at public expense; S..... 303
 Maverick bill against militarism; S..... 440
 National conference on rural social planning; S..... 440
 Navigation and steamboat inspection bureau, "insubordination" in; S..... 243
 Negroes at Republican convention; S.. 731
 Neutrality legislation, opposition to, in Washington; S..... 128
 O'Connor, Representative, fight against "anti-red" bills; S..... 215
 O'Hara, E. B., conviction; S..... 215
 O'Shea, James J., indictment; S..... 403
 Packers, bill to control; S..... 471
 Perkins, Secretary; S..303; see also C. 628
 Railroads, ownership by United States steel corporation; S..... 403
 Republican agony; S..... 538
 Richberg, D., back with railroad brotherhoods; S..... 303
 Rieve, E., appointment to United States delegation to International labor office meeting; S..... 635
 Roosevelt administration and the courts; S..... 181
 Roosevelt message to congress; S..... 65
 Saint Louis; Thomas Jefferson memorial project; S..... 267
 Seamen's delegates visit Secretaries Perkins and Roper; S..... 571
 Ship subsidy act, Copeland-Roper; S.. 403
 Smith speech against Roosevelt; S..... 153
 Talmadge anti-Roosevelt rally; S..... 153
 Tax on corporation surpluses, battle over; S..... 700
 Teachers' oath bill, District of Columbia, movement to repeal; S..... 371
 Townsend, Doctor F. E., defiance of congress; S..... 700
 Townsend plan; S..... 37
 Unionism, opposition to; S..... 503
 United mine workers; doubling of officials' salaries; S..... 215
 Wagner-Ellenbogen housing bill in peril; S..... 764
 Wagner-Ellenbogen bill to be double-crossed; S..... 635
 Walsh-Healey bill, labor fight for; S.. 764
 Warren, Arkansas; violation of Wagner act by leading citizens; S..... 440
 Woodring, assistant secretary; S..... 538
 Works progress administration; arrests under, and other abuses; S..... 571
 Works progress administration; helps to erect private factories; S..... 303
- Warren, Charles Howard. See Yale university
- Warren, Arkansas; violation of Wagner act by leading citizens. P. W. Ward; S. 440
- Washburn, J. A.
 Leo Gallagher, as radical defense lawyer; C..... 17
- Washington, D. C. See District of Columbia; Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
- Washington letters. See Ward, Paul W.
- Washington state; Democratic convention indorses production-for-use platform; EP 791
- Washington's birthday celebrations; EP.... 233
- Watson, Morris. See Newspapers—American newspaper guild
- We are from Kronstadt. M. Van Doren; MP..... 687
- Wealth, "self-sacrifice." O. G. Villard; S.. 583
 "Soaking." G. Terborgh; S..... 479
- Webster, W.
 Minimum-wage law for women; C..464; see also EP..... 334
- Wechsler, James
 Treason among future veterans; S.... 672
- Weinstein, M. S.
 Comment on Simon articles; S..... 463
- Welsh correspondent, a
 Hearst restores Saint Donats; S..... 250
- Wheeler-Cross bill. See Railroads
- Whipple, H. A.
 Mendl, Lady, attire, and comment by The Nation; C..... 46
- White, Pierce; cotton farmer, Alabama; case of. R. G. Tugwell and T. Burke; S.....106; C..... 362
- White, William Allen
 Reply to inquiry on desirability of amendment of constitution...760; see also..... 696
- Wilson, Woodrow, uses of; E..... 116
- Winchell, Walter; tooth. H. Broun; S.... 47
- Windrip, Buzz—Governor of Georgia. B. Stolberg; S.....269; 316
- Winslow, Earle M.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1935..... 9
 Resigns rather than sign loyalty oath; EP..... 3
- Winter, Ella
 California criminal syndicalism prisoners; write to parole board! C...see also C. 158
- Winterset, critics' prize winner. J. W. Krutch; D..... 484
- Wisconsin News. See Newspapers
- Wolfe, Bertram D.
 Dialectical materialism and nature; C.....431; see also..... 288
- Wolff, Theodor; book, "The eve of 1914." O. G. Villard; S..... 482
- Women
 Congress of associated country women of the world, meeting; E..... 793
 Equal rights amendment, movement for, and opposition; EP..726; see also letter, with editorial comment..... 854
 Minimum wage law. See Labor
- Workers. See Labor
- Woodring, Assistant secretary of war. P. W. Ward; S..... 538
- Works progress administration
 Arrests for picketing and other abuses. P. W. Ward; S..... 571
 Art, activities in; EP..... 827
 Helps to erect private factories. P. W. Ward; S..... 303
 Massachusetts division refuses to recognize U. S. S. R. Letter by M. E. Sanger; C..... 532
 Meeting of strikers, New York, police brutality; EP..... 235
 New York; formation of "anti-red" unions urged; EP..... 298
- Rice, E., resignation from theater project, New York; E..... 174
 See also Unemployment relief
- World war
 America's betrayal. O. G. Villard; S. 119
 Bryan, William Jennings, and the war. J. M. Leyda; C..... 17
 Last war and the next. I. Morgan, money, and war. W. Millis; S..... 95
 II. What does neutrality mean? S. 125
 Morgan and war loans. Fritz; Ct.... 92
 Wilson, Woodrow, uses of; EP..... 116
 Wolff, T., "The eve of 1914." O. G. Villard; S..... 482
- WPA. See Works progress administration
- Writers. See Authors
- Wyoming, university of. See Censorship, art
- Y
- Yale Review, advertising in. M. McCarthy and M. Marshall; C..... 18
- Yale university; Warren bequest for selected students; EP..... 171
- Young, G. H.
 Townsend the emancipator; C..295; see also..... 36

- Young, Mahonri
Prize fight; etching..... 835
Youth; and crime; Amlie-Benson bill for investigation not likely to pass; EP.. 399
Outlook; EP..... 497

Z

- Zamora, President Niceto Alcalá. See Spain
Ziegfeld follies. J. W. Krutch; D..... 231
Zioncheck, Congressman Marion A., fight against. R. L. Neuberger; S..... 610
Zukerman, William
German ghetto, possible consequences; S 154

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.
The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

- B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

- Abandoned wood, the. M. Saint-Hélér.
Translated by J. Whittall; AN..... 558
Abinger harvest. E. M. Forster; B..... 780
Actor's blood. B. Hecht; B..... 286
Adams, Grace; R..... 163
Aesthetic analysis. D. W. Prall; B..... 752
Africa dances. G. Gorer; B..... 24
Age before booty. M. J. Dorman; B..... 424
Akagi, Roy Hidemichi
Japan's foreign relations, 1542-1936: A short history; B..... 684
Aldington, Richard
Artifex; AN..... 426
Aldous Huxley. A. Henderson; B..... 588
Alfau, Felipe
Locos; B..... 848
Alien Americans. B. Schrieke; B..... 850
Allen, James S.
Negro question in the United States, the;
B..... 845
America goes to press. L. Greene; AN..... 591
American chamber of horrors. R. de F.
Lamb; B..... 356
American neutrality, 1914-1917. C. Seymour; B..... 109
American points of view. A reader's guide, 1935. Edited by W. H. Cordell and
K. C. Cordell; B..... 420
Angell, Sir Norman
Raw materials, population pressure, and war; AN..... 654
Antony (Viscount Knebworth): A record of youth. Earl of Lytton; B..... 652 Architecture of H. H. Richardson and his times, the. H. R. Hitchcock, junior;
B..... 198
Arctic adventure. P. Freuchen; B..... 554
Armstrong, H. C.
Unending battle; B..... 229
Armstrong, Hamilton Fish, and A. W.
Dulles
Can we be neutral? B..... 196
Arnold, Thurman W.
Symbols of government; B..... 51
Artifex. R. Aldington; AN..... 426
As they revealed. P. Wylie; B..... 486
Asch, Sholem
Mottke the thief; AN..... 259
Autobiography. J. Cournos; B..... 258

B

- Babson, Naomi Lane
Yankee Bodleys, the; AN..... 528
Baker, Ray Stannard
Woodrow Wilson: Life and letters. Volume V. Neutrality, 1914-1915; B..... 109
Balcony, the. A. Bell; AN..... 327
Barr, Stringfellow
Mazzini; B..... 164
Barzun, Jacques; R..... 164, 256
Bates, Ernest Sutherland, and O. Carlson
Hearst: Lord of San Simeon; B..... 649
Beany-Eye. D. Garnett; AN..... 167
Beard, Charles A.
Economic interpretation of the constitution of the United States; B..... 452
Beauties and furies, the. C. Stead; B..... 751
Bedside book of famous American stories, the. Edited by A. Burrell and B. A.
Cerf; AN..... 328
Belitt, Ben; R.. 54, 164, 356, 454, 522, 619, 814
Bell, Adrian
Balcony, the; AN..... 327
Belomor. M. Gorki; AN..... 290
Benedict, Ruth; R..... 24
Bentley, Phyllis
Freedom, farewell; AN..... 58
Berman, Edward
Life insurance—a critical examination; B 750
Best short stories 1936 and the year-book of the American short story. Edited by Edward J. O'Brien; AN..... 851

- Biography of Percival Lowell. A. L. Lowell;
B..... 256
Black man's verse. F. M. Davis; AN..... 328
Blackmur, R. P.; R..... 79, 618, 817
Bones of contention. F. O'Connor; B..... 556
Bonner, Willard Hallam
De Quincey at work; B..... 820
Borah of Idaho. C. O. Johnson; B..... 718
Bourman, Anatole, and D. Lyman
Tragedy of Nijinsky, the; B..... 590
Bowen, Elizabeth
House in Paris, the; B..... 425
Boyle, Kay
White horses of Vienna and other stories, the; B..... 286
Bradford, Gamaliel
Elizabethan women; AN..... 558
Brailsford, Henry Noel
Voltaire; B..... 325
Break the heart's anger. P. Engle; B..... 454
Brenner, Anita; R..... 194
Brindze, Ruth; R..... 356
Brooke, Iris
English costume of the later middle ages:
The fourteenth and fifteenth centuries;
AN..... 720
Browder, Earl
What is communism? B..... 526; letters by the author and the reviewer, L. M.
Hacker..... 787, 788
Brown network, the. The activities of the Nazis in foreign countries. Introduction by the Earl of Listowel; B..... 557
Bryan, William Jennings, biography. W. C.
Williams; B..... 587
Buck, Pearl S.
Exile, the; B..... 195
Bullett, C. J.
Significant moderns, the; B..... 782
Burke, Fielding
Stone came rolling, a; B..... 54
Burns, Eveline M.
Toward social security; B..... 422
Burns, Eveline M.; R..... 819
Burnshaw, Stanley
Iron hand, the; AN..... 290
Byron: The years of fame. P. Quennell; B. 136

C

- Cabell, James Branch
Preface to the past; B..... 286
Can we be neutral? A. W. Dulles and H. F.
Armstrong; B..... 196
Carlson, Oliver, and E. S. Bates
Hearst: Lord of San Simeon; B..... 649
Cheese it—the cops! E. H. Lavine; B..... 487
Childs, Marquis W.
Sweden: The middle way; B..... 358
City planning: Housing. Volume I. Historical and sociological. W. Hegemann; B 553
Cleghorn, Sarah N., autobiography. Introduction by R. Frost; B..... 525
Clemens, Samuel Langhorne; Mark Twain.
The man and his work. E. Wagenknecht; AN..... 201
Clemens, Samuel Langhorne, notebook. Edited by A. B. Paine; AN..... 258
Codman, Florence; R..... 198
Cole, G. D. H.
Economic planning; B..... 134
Collected poems. T. S. Eliot; B..... 680
Coming American fascism, the. L. Dennis;
B..... 196
Correspondence of Thomas Hardy. Edited by the late P. Toynbee and L. Whibley;
AN..... 82
Cosmopolitans. W. S. Maugham; AN..... 328
Cournos, John Autobiography; B..... 258
Cozzens, James Gould
Men and brethren; B..... 79
Crane, Nathalia
Swear by the night; B..... 454
Crime, four books on; B..... 487
Crime's nemesis. L. S. May; B..... 487
Crimson patch, the. P. A. Taylor; B. 458;
see also C..... 494
Criteria for the life history: With an analysis of six notable documents. J. Dollard; B..... 590
Crossroads of the Caribbean. H. de Leeuw;
B..... 489
Cummings, E. E.
Tom; AN..... 82
Cushing, Harvey
From a surgeon's journal: 1915-1918; B 715

D

- Daghileff. His artistic and private life. A.
Haskell, in collaboration with W.
Nouvel; B..... 26
Daly, James
One season shattered; B..... 199
Dance. L. Kirstein; B..... 200
Darby, Hugh H.; R..... 24
Darkness and dawn. A. Tolstoi. Translated by E. Bone and E. Burns; B..... 522

- Davis, Frank Marshall
Black man's verse; AN..... 328
Davis, Maxine
Lost generation, the; AN..... 528
Days of wrath. A. Malraux; B..... 810
Deák, Francis, and P. C. Jessup
Neutrality: Its history, economics and
law. Volume I: The origins; B..... 196
Dean, Vera Micheles; R..... 811
De Kruif, Paul
Why keep them alive? B..... 390
De la Mare, Walter
Poems, 1919-1934; B..... 749
De Leeuw, Hendrik
Crossroads of the Caribbean; B..... 489
Denlinger, Sutherland, and Lieutenant-Commander C. B. Gary
War in the Pacific; B..... 684
Dennis, Lawrence
Coming American fascism, the; B..... 196
De Quincey at work. W. H. Bonner; B..... 820
De Quincey, Thomas, two books on; B..... 820 Destructive element, the. S. Spender; B. 352;
see also..... 418
Deutschland und die Vereinigten Staaten in der weltpolitik. A. Vagts; B..... 620
Dewhurst, Frederic; R..... 488
Dictatorship in the modern world. Edited by
G. S. Ford; B..... 353
Disraeli; biography, Young Mr. Disraeli.
E. Thane; B..... 520
Dollard, John
Criteria for the life history. With an analysis of six notable documents; B.. 590
Dorman, Morgan J.
Age before booty; B..... 424
Douglas, Paul H.
Social security in the United States; B. 422
Dramatis personae. W. B. Yeats; B..... 780
Duhamel, Georges
Fortunes of the Pasquiers, the; AN.... 137
Dulles, Allen W., and H. F. Armstrong
Can we be neutral? B..... 196
Dupee, Frederick; R..... 136
Duranty, Walter; R..... 714

E

- Eat, drink, and be wary. F. J. Schlink; B. 356
Eaton, Horace Ainsworth
Thomas de Quincey. A biography; B.. 820
Eckstein, Gustav
Hokusai; B..... 110
Economic interpretation of the constitution of the United States, an. C. A. Beard;
B..... 452
Economic meaning of the Townsend plan, the.
By a University of Chicago round table; H. D. Gideonse, editor; B..... 424
Economic planning. G. D. H. Cole; B..... 134 Education before Verdun. A. Zweig. Translated by E. Sutton; B..... 617 Eighteenth century miscellany, an. L. Kronenberger; B..... 619
Eliot, T. S.
Collected poems; B..... 680
Elizabethan women. G. Bradford; AN..... 558
Ellis, Havelock
Studies in the psychology of sex; B.... 386
Engels, Friedrich, biography. G. Mayer; B. 748
England made me. G. Greene; B..... 256
Engle, Paul
Break the heart's anger; B..... 454
English costume of the later middle ages:
The fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.
I. Brooke; AN..... 720
Epitaph on George Moore. C. Morgan; AN.. 427
Epstein, Abraham
Insecurity, a challenge to America; B. 819
Epstein, Abraham; R..... 422
Ersikine, John
Influence of women and its cure, the;
AN..... 391
Ethics of power, the. P. Leon; B..... 784
Europe under the terror. J. I. Spivak; B. 849
Eve of 1914, the. T. Wolff; B..... 389;
O. G. Villard; S..... 482
Evolution of modern psychology, the. R.
Müller-Freienfels. Translation and introduction by W. B. Wolfe; B..... 163
Exile, the. P. S. Buck; B..... 195
Ezekiel, Mordecai
$2500 a year; B..... 488

F

- Fabricius, Johan
Son of Marietta, the. I. Clephane and D.
Hallett, translators; B..... 355
Fadiman, Clifton; R..... 681
Falk, Edwin A.
Togo and the rise of Japanese sea power;
B..... 684
Falk, I. S.
Security against sickness; B..... 846
Fallada, Hans
Once we had a child; B..... 388
Fallas, Carl
Wooden pillow, the; B..... 163
Farewell, Mr. gangster! H. Corey; B..... 487

- Farrell, James T.
Note on literary criticism; B..... 808
- Farrell, James T.; R..... 783
- Farson, Negley
Way of a transgressor, the; B..... 229
- Fay, Sidney B.; R..... 109
- Fergusson, Francis; R..... 200
- Feuchtwanger, Lion
Jew of Rome, the; B..... 52
- Fighting the underworld. P. S. Van Cise;
B..... 487
- Film and theater. A. Nicoll; B..... 781
- Fire testament. W. Maas; B..... 53
- Firestone, Clark B.
Sycamore shores; AN..... 592
- Fisher, Vardis
No villain need be; B..... 324
- Fitzgerald, Robert
Poems; B..... 227
- Footnote to folly, a. Reminiscences of M. H.
Vorse; B..... 80
- Ford, Ford Madox
Vive le roy; AN..... 657
- Forester, C. S.
General, the; B..... 421
- Forster, E. M.
Abinger harvest; B..... 780
- Forsytes, Pendycies, and others. J. Galsworthy; B..... 26
- Fortune, R. Reynolds; AN..... 137
- Fortunes of the Pasquiers, the. G. Duhamel;
AN..... 137
- Four Georges, the. Sir C. Petrie; AN..... 258
- Freedom, farewell. P. Bentley; AN..... 558
- Freuchen, Peter
Arctic adventure; B..... 554
- Friedrich Engels, G. Mayer; B..... 748
- From a surgeon's journal: 1915-1918. H.
Cushing; B..... 715
- From the kingdom of necessity. I. Schneider;
B..... 256
- Frost, Frances
Innocent summer; B..... 198
- Frost, Robert
Further range, a; B..... 817
- Further range, a. R. Frost; B..... 817
- G
- Galsworthy, John
Forsytes, Pendycies, and others; B..... 26
- Galsworthy, John, life and letters. H. V.
Marrot; B..... 620
- Garnett, David
Beany-Eye; AN..... 167
- Gary, Lieutenant-Commander Charles B., and
S. Denlinger
War in the Pacific; B..... 684
- Gaudy night. D. L. Sayers; B..... 458;
see also C..... 458
- Geismar, Maxwell; R..... 25
- General, the. C. S. Forester; B..... 421
- General theory of employment, interest, and money, the. J. M. Keynes; B..... 485
- Gilbert, E. Albert, and M. Gilbert
Life insurance—a legalized racket; B.. 750
- Gilbert, Mort, and E. A. Gilbert
Life insurance—a legalized racket; B.. 750
- Glaeser, Ernst
Last civilian, the; AN..... 200
- Goldberg, Louis P., and E. Levenson
Lawless judges; B..... 228
- Gorer, Geoffrey
Africa dances; B..... 24
- Gorki, Maxim
Belomor; AN..... 290
- Gray, Thomas, correspondence of. Edited by the late P. Toynbee and L. Whibley;
AN..... 82
- Green lion, the. F. Hackett; B..... 682
- Greene, Graham
England made me; B..... 256
- Greene, Laurence
America goes to press; AN..... 591
- Gregory, Horace; R..... 682
- Guinea pigs no more. J. B. Matthews; B.. 356
- Gunther, John
Inside Europe; B..... 285
- Gustav Stresemann: His diaries, letters and papers. Edited and translated by E.
Sutton; B..... 135
- H
- Hacker, Louis M.; R.. 196, 526; letters by Hacker and E. Browder..... 787, 788
- Hackett, Francis
Green lion, the; B..... 682
- Haddon, A. C., and J. S. Huxley
We Europeans. With contribution by A.
M. Carr-Saunders; B..... 354
- Hamilton, Walton H.; R..... 51
- Hamlin, Talbot; R..... 198
- Handbook of Marxism. Edited by E. Burns;
AN..... 166; correction of price..... 260
- Harris, Abram L.; R.. 518; see also C..... 756
- Haskell, Arnold, and W. Nouvel
Dagileff. His artistic and private life; B.. 26
- Haslet, A. W.
Unsolved problems of science; AN..... 230
- Hazlitt, Henry; R..... 255
- Head o' Whollow. J. Stuart; AN..... 784
- Hearst, William Randolph, two books on; B.. 649
- Hearst: Lord of San Simeon. O. Carlson and E. S. Bates; B..... 649
- Hecht, Ben
Actor's blood; B..... 286
- Hegemann, Werner
City planning; Housing. Volume I. Historical and sociological; B..... 553
- Heiden, Conrad
Hitler; B..... 714
- Henderson, Alexander
Aldous Huxley; B..... 588
- Herskovits, Melville J.; R..... 850
- Hicks Granville
John Reed: The making of a revolutionary; B..... 552
- Hirsch, Felix E.; R..... 389
- Hitchcock, Henry Russell, junior Architecture of H. H. Richardson and his times, the; B..... 198
- Hitler. C. Heiden; B..... 714
- Hitler. R. Olden; B..... 714
- Hokusai. G. Eckstein; B..... 110
- Holtby, Winifred
South riding; B..... 457
- Hook, Sidney; R..... 288 (see also C, 431); 653
- Hoover administration, the: A documented narrative. W. S. Myers and W. H.
Newton; B..... 322
- House in Paris, the. E. Bowen; B..... 425
- Hutchins, Robert Maynard
No friendly voice; B..... 556
- Huxley, Aldous, biography. A. Henderson;
B..... 588
- Huxley, Julian S., and A. C. Haddon
We Europeans. With contribution by A.
M. Carr-Saunders; B..... 354
- I
- If I have four apples. J. Lawrence; AN.. 230
- Imperial Hearst. F. Lundberg; B..... 649
- In dubious battle. J. Steinbeck; B..... 326
- In the second year. S. Jameson; AN..... 391
- Influence of women and its cure, the. J.
Erskine; AN..... 391
- Inhale and exhale. W. Saroyan; B..... 387
- Innocent summer. F. Frost; B..... 198
- Insecurity, a challenge to America. A. Epstein; B..... 819
- Inside Europe. J. Gunther; B..... 285
- Interpretations: 1933-1935. W. Lippmann.
Edited by A. Nevins; B..... 322
- Introduction to dialectical materialism. A.
Thalheimer. Translated by Simpson and Weltner; B..... 288
- Iron land, the. S. Burnshaw; AN..... 290
- Ishimaru, Lieutenant-Commander Tota
Japan must fight Britain; B..... 684
- J
- Jameson, Storm
In the second year; AN..... 391
- Japan, six books on; B..... 684
- Japan must fight Britain. Lieutenant-Commander T. Ishimaru; B..... 684
- Japan's foreign relations, 1542-1936: A short history. R. H. Akagi; B..... 684
- Japan's policies and purposes. H. Saito; B.. 54
- Jaszi, Oscar; R..... 716
- Jessup, Philip C.
Neutrality: Its history, economics, and law. Volume IV. Today and tomorrow; B..... 456
- Jessup, Philip C., and F. Deák
Neutrality: Its history, economics and
law. Volume I: The origins; B..... 196
- Jesus manifest. D. Merejkowski; AN..... 426
- Jew of Rome, the. L. Feuchtwanger; B..... 52
- John Reed: The making of a revolutionary.
G. Hicks; B..... 552
- Johnson, Alvin
Spring storm; B..... 586
- Johnson, Alvin; R..... 553
- Johnson, Claudius O.
Borah of Idaho; B..... 718
- K
- Kang, Younghill; R..... 654
- Kemmerer, Edwin Walter
Money; B..... 229
- Keynes, John Maynard
General theory of employment, interest, and money; B..... 485
- Kingsbury, John A.; R..... 390, 846
- Kirstein, Lincoln
Dance, the; B..... 200
- Knebworth, Viscount, biography. Earl of Lynton; B..... 652
- Kohn, Hans; R..... 620
- Kronenberger, Louis
Eighteenth century miscellany, an; B.. 619
- Kronenberger, Louis; R.. 79, 286, 387, 424, 486, 520, 717, 780, 812
- Krutch, Joseph Wood; R.. 352 (see also 418); 386, 713
- L
- Labor fact book III. Prepared by the Labor research association; AN..... 852
- Lafayette, a life. A. Latzko; B..... 227
- Laloy, Louis
Mirror of China. C. A. Phillips, translator; B..... 654
- Lamb, Ruth de Forest
American chamber of horrors; B..... 356
- Landscape with figures. L. Wiggam; B..... 782
- Langland, William
Vision of Piers Plowman, the. Rendered into modern English by H. W.
Wells; B..... 51
- Lann, Robert; R..... 256
- Laski, Harold J.; R..... 748
- Last civilian, the. E. Glaeser; AN..... 200
- Last puritan, the. G. Santayana; B..... 255
- Latzko, Andreas
Lafayette. A life; B..... 227
- Lavine, Emanuel H.
Cheese it—the cops!; B..... 487
- Lawless judges. L. P. Goldberg and E.
Levenson; B..... 228
- Lawrence, Josephine
If I have four apples; AN..... 230
- Lehmann, Rosamond
Weather in the street, the; B..... 713
- Leon, Philip
Ethics of power, the; B..... 784
- Lerner, Max; R..... 321 (see also C, 659); 452, 552
- Letter from Pontus, a. J. Masefield; B.. 848
- Letters to Harriet. W. V. Moody. Edited, with introduction and conclusion, by P.
MacKaye; B..... 111
- Levenson, Eleanor, and L. P. Goldberg
Lawless judges; B..... 228
- Lewis, C. Day
Time to dance, a; B..... 589
- Lewis, Lloyd, and H. J. Smith
Oscar Wilde discovers America (1882);
B..... 846
- Liberalism fights on. O. L. Mills; B..... 322
- Life and letters of John Galsworthy, the. H.
V. Marrot; B..... 620
- Life insurance—a critical examination. E.
Berman; B..... 750
- Life insurance—a legalized racket. M. Gilbert and E. A. Gilbert; B..... 750
- Like a mighty army—Hitler versus established religion. G. N. Shuster; AN..... 166
- Lippmann, Walter
Interpretations: 1933-1935. Edited by A.
Nevins; B..... 322
- Livingston, Arthur; R..... 420
- Locos. F. Alfau; B..... 848
- Lore, Ludwig; R..... 135
- Lost generation, the. M. Davis; AN..... 528
- Lost plays of Shakespeare's age. C. J.
Sisson; AN..... 785
- Lowell, A. Lawrence
Biography of Percival Lowell; B..... 256
- Lucas, F. L.
Poems, 1935; AN..... 230
- Lundberg, Ferdinand
Imperial Hearst; B..... 649
- Lyman, D., and A. Bourman
Tragedy of Nijinsky, the; B..... 590
- Lytton, Earl of Antony (Viscount Knebworth): A record of youth; B..... 652
- M
- M-day, the first day of war. R. M. Stein;
B..... 424; see also C..... 494
- Maas, Willard
Fire testament; B..... 53
- MacCormick, Austin H.; R..... 487
- MacDowell, E. C.; R..... 354
- MacLeish, Archibald
Public speech; B..... 522
- Malraux, André
Days of wrath; B..... 810
- Manchu abdication and the powers, 1908-
1912, the. J. G. Reid; AN..... 528
- Mann, Thomas
Stories of three decades. H. T. Lowe-
Porter, translator; B..... 814
- Marchand, Leslie A.; R..... 620
- Marching! marching! C. Weatherwax; B.. 82;
see also C..... 159
- Mark Twain. The man and his work. E.
Wagenknecht; AN..... 201
- Mark Twain's notebook. Edited by A. B.
Paine; AN..... 258
- Marrot, H. V.
Life and letters of John Galsworthy, the;
B..... 620
- Marshall, George; R..... 850
- Marshall, Margaret; R..... 816
- Martin, John; R..... 590
- Masefield, John
Letter from Pontus, a; B..... 848
- Matthews, J. B.
Guinea pigs no more; B..... 356
- Maugham, W. Somerset
Cosmopolitans; AN..... 325

- Maurois, André
Prophets and poets. H. Miles, translator; B..... 79
- May, Luke S.
Crime's nemesis; B..... 487
- Mayer, Gustav
Friedrich Engels; B..... 748
- Mazzini, S. Barr; B..... 164
- McCarthy, Mary R. 82 (see also C, 159);
326, 458 (see also C, 494); 848
- McConnaughey, James
Village chronicle; B..... 848
- Mead, Margaret; R..... 590
- Men and brethren. J. G. Cozzens; B..... 79
- Merejkowski, Dmitri
Jesus manifest; AN..... 426
- Middleton, Lamar
Rape of Africa, the; B..... 617
- Millis, Walter; R..... 424; see also C..... 494
- Mills, Ogden L.
Liberalism fights on; B..... 322
- Milton, George Fort; R..... 587
- Mirror of China. L. Laloy. Translated by
C. A. Phillips; B..... 654
- Mitchell, Broadus; R..... 813
- Money. E. W. Kemmerer; B..... 229
- Monogram. G. B. Stern; AN..... 490
- Moody, William Vaughan
Letters to Harriet. Edited, with introduction and conclusion, by P. MacKaye; B..... 111
- Moore, George, epitaph on. C. Morgan; AN..... 427
- Moore, Marianne; R..... 680
- Morgan, Charles
Epitaph on George Moore; AN..... 427
- Sparkenbroke; B..... 618
- Mottke the thief. S. Asch; AN..... 259
- Movies on trial, the. Compiled and edited by W. J. Perlman; B. 203; see also C. 363
- Müller-Freienfels, Richard
Evolution of modern psychology, the.
Translation and introduction by W.
B. Wolfe; B..... 163
- Murry, John Middleton
Shakespeare; B..... 520
- Mussolini, sawdust Caesar. G. Seldes; B. 108;
see also C..... 364
- Myers, L. H.
Strange glory; B..... 651
- Myers, William Starr, and W. H. Newton
Hoover administration, the: A documented narrative; B..... 322
- N
Nations can live at home. O. W. Willcox;
B..... 24
- Negro question in the United States, the.
J. S. Allen; B..... 845
- Neihardt, John G.
Song of the messiah, the; AN..... 166
- Neumann, Robert
Zaharoff; B..... 388
- Neutrality: Its history, economics and law.
Volume I: The origins. P. C. Jessup and F. Deak; B..... 196
- Neutrality: Its history, economics, and law.
Volume II. The Napoleonic period.
W. A. Phillips and A. H. Reede.
Volume III. The world war period.
E. Turlington. Volume IV. Today
tomorrow. P. C. Jessup; B..... 456
- Never say die. J. Paton; B..... 229
- Neville, Helen; R..... 26
- Newton, Walter H., and W. S. Myers
Hoover administration, the: A documented narrative; B..... 322
- Nicoll, Allardyce
Film and theater; B..... 781
- Niebuhr, Reinhold; R..... 784
- Nijinsky, biography. A. Bourman and D.
Lyman; B..... 590
- Nirdlinger, Virginia; R..... 782
- No friendly voice. R. M. Hutchins; B..... 556
- No villain need be. V. Fisher; B..... 324
- Note on literary criticism. J. T. Farrell; B..... 808
- Nouvel, Walter, and A. Haskell
Daghileff. His artistic and private life;
R..... 26
- Noyes, John Humphrey, biography. R. A.
Parker; B..... 25
- O
Obiter scripta. Lectures, essays, and reviews.
G. Santayana. Edited by J. Buchler and B. Schwartz; B..... 524
- O'Connor, Frank
Bones of contention; B..... 556
- Odegard, Peter H.; R..... 353
- Olden, Rudolf
Hitler; B..... 714
- Omura, Bunji; R..... 54
- On the rim of the abyss. J. T. Shotwell;
B..... 811
- Once we had a child. H. Fallada. Translated by E. Sutton; B..... 388
- One season shattered. J. Daly; B..... 199
- Oscar Wilde discovers America (1882). L.
Lewis and H. J. Smith; B..... 846
- P
Parker, Robert Allerton
Yankee saint, a: John Humphrey Noyes and the Oneida community; B..... 25
- Parkes, H. B.; R..... 25
- Paton, John
Never say die; B..... 229
- Penny foolish. O. Sitwell; B..... 717
- Petrie, Sir Charles
Four Georges, the; AN..... 258
- Phillips, W. Alison, and A. H. Reede
Neutrality: Its history, economics, and law. Volume II. The Napoleonic period;
B..... 456
- Poems. T. Fitzgerald; B..... 227
- Poems, 1919-1934. W. de la Mare; B..... 749
- Poems, 1935. F. L. Lucas; AN..... 230
- Prall, D. W.
Aesthetic analysis; B..... 752
- Preface to the past. J. B. Cabell; B..... 286
- Prophets and poets. A. Maurois. Translated by H. Miles; B..... 79
- Public speech. A. MacLeish; B..... 522
- Putt, S. Gorley; R..... 652
- Q
Quennell, Peter
Byron: The years of fame; B..... 136
- R
Rainbow, the. D. R. Richberg; B..... 322
- Raleigh, Sir Walter, biography. E. Thompson;
AN..... 720
- Rand, Ayn
We the living; B..... 522
- Rape of Africa, the. L. Middleton; B..... 617
- Raw materials, population pressure, and war.
Sir N. Angell; AN..... 656
- Raynolds, Robert
Fortune; AN..... 137
- Reactionary essays on poetry and ideas. A.
Tate; B..... 747
- Rebirth: A book of modern Jewish thought.
Selected and edited by L. Lewisohn;
AN..... 137
- Reed, John, biography. G. Hicks; B..... 552
- Reede, Arthur H., and W. A. Phillips
Neutrality: Its history, economics, and
law. Volume II. The Napoleonic period;
B..... 456
- Reid, John Gilbert
Manchu abdication and the powers, 1908-
1912, the; AN..... 528
- Rice, Philip Blair; R..... 53, 134, 227, 522, 589
- Richardson, H. H.; biography. H. R. Hitchcock, junior; B..... 198
- Richberg, Donald R.
Rainbow, the; B..... 322
- Rochester, Anna
Rulers of America: A study of finance capital; B..... 850
- Roger B. Taney. C. B. Swisher; B..... 621
- Roger B. Taney: Jacksonian jurist. C. W.
Smith, Jr.; B..... 621
- Rogers, Lindsay; R..... 322
- Rolfe, Edwin
To my contemporaries; AN..... 784
- Romantic rebels, the. F. Winwar; B..... 136
- Romeo and Juliet. W. Shakespeare. A motion-picture edition; B..... 781
- Roosevelt, Nicholas
Townsend plan, the; B..... 424
- Rorty, James
Where life is better. An unsentimental
American journey; B..... 194
- Rothschild, Richard
Three gods give an evening to politics;
B..... 653
- Rowland, Benjamin, junior; R..... 110
- Rugoff, Milton; R..... 229
- Rukeyser, Muriel
Theory of flight. Foreword by S. V.
Benét; B..... 134
- Rulers of America: A study of finance capital.
A. Rochester; B..... 850
- S
Saint-Hélér, Monique
Abandoned wood, the. J. Whitall, translator; AN..... 558
- Saito, Hiroshi
Japan's policies and purposes; B..... 54
- Salvemini, Gaetano
Under the axe of fascism; B..... 716
- Salvemini, Gaetano; R. 108; see also C..... 364
- Sanfelice. V. Sheean; B..... 812
- Santayana, George
Last puritan, the; B..... 255
- Obiter scripta. Lectures, essays, and reviews.
Edited by J. Buchler and B.
Schwartz; B..... 524
- Saroyan, William
Inhale and exhale; B..... 387
- Sassoon, Siegfried
Vigils; AN..... 528
- Sawdust Caesar. G. Seldes; B. 108;
see also C..... 364
- Sayers, Dorothy L.
Gaudy night; B. 458; see also C..... 494
- Schapiro, J. Salwyn; R..... 325
- Schlink, F. J.
Eat, drink and be wary; B..... 356
- Schneider, Isidor
From the kingdom of necessity; B..... 256
- Schnitman, L. Seth; R..... 750
- Schrieke, B.
Alien Americans; B..... 850
- Schuman, Frederick L.; R..... 196, 456, 850
- Seagle, William; R..... 228, 621
- Security against sickness. I. S. Falk; B. 846
- Seldes, George; R..... 649
- Seldes, Gilbert
Sawdust Caesar; B. 108; see also C..... 364
- Seven sins, the. A. Wurdemann; B..... 23
- Seymour, Charles
American neutrality, 1914-1917; B..... 109
- Shakespeare, two books on; AN..... 785
- Shakespeare. J. M. Murry; B..... 520
- Shakespeare, William
Romeo and Juliet. A motion-picture edition;
B..... 781
- Sheean, Vincent
Sanfelice; B..... 812
- Shotwell, James T.
On the rim of the abyss; B..... 811
- Shuster, George N.
Like a mighty army—Hitler versus established religion; AN..... 166
- Significant moderns, the. C. J. Bulliet; B. 782
- Simonds, Katharine; R..... 354
- "Sir Walter Raleigh: Last of the Elizabethans." E. Thompson; AN..... 720
- Sitwell, Osbert
Penny foolish; B..... 717
- Slade, Caroline
Sterile sun; B..... 783
- Slesinger, Donald; R..... 556
- Smith, Bradford
To the mountain; AN..... 490
- Smith, Henry Justin, and L. Lewis
Oscar Wilde discovers America (1882);
B..... 846
- Social security in the United States. P. H.
Douglas; B..... 422
- Son of Marietta, the. J. Fabricius. Translated by I. Clephane and D. Hallett;
B..... 355
- Song of the messiah, the. J. G. Neihardt;
AN..... 166
- Sound wagon, the. T. S. Stribling; B..... 164
- South riding. Winifred Holtby; B..... 457
- Soviet communism: A new civilization? S. and B. Webb; B. 518; see also C..... 756
- Sparkenbroke. C. Morgan; R..... 618
- Spender, Stephen
Destructive element, the; B..... 352;
see also 418
- Spero, Sterling D.; R..... 845
- Spivak, John L.
Europe under the terror; B..... 849
- Spring storm. A. Johnson; B..... 586
- Stead, Christina
Beauties and furies, the; B..... 751
- Stearns, Harold E.; R..... 80
- Stein, Rose M.
M-day, the first day of war; B. 424;
see also C..... 494
- Steinbeck, John
In dubious battle; B..... 326
- Sterile sun. C. Slade; B..... 783
- Stern, G. B.
Monogram; AN..... 490
- Stewart, Maxwell S.; R. 134, 229, 424, 485, 684
- Stillman, Clara Gruening; R..... 26, 227, 256
- Stolberg, Benjamin; R..... 388, 557
- Stone, Shepard; R..... 555
- Stone came rolling, a. F. Burke; B..... 54
- Stories of three decades. T. Mann. Translated by H. T. Lowe-Porter; B..... 814
- Story of a novel, the. T. Wolfe; B..... 681
- Strange glory. L. H. Myers; B..... 651
- Stresemann, Gustav
Diaries, letters, and papers. Edited and translated by E. Sutton; B..... 135
- Stribling, T. S.
Sound wagon, the; B..... 164
- Stuart, Jesse
Head o' W-hollow; AN..... 784
- Studies in the psychology of sex. H. Ellis;
B..... 386
- Study of Love's labor's lost, a. F. A. Yates;
AN..... 785
- Swear by the night. N. Crane; B..... 454
- Sweden: The middle way. M. W. Childs; B. 358
- Swing, Raymond Gram; R..... 285
- Swisher, Carl Brent
Roger B. Taney; B..... 621
- Sycamore shores. C. B. Firestone; AN..... 592
- Symbols of government. T. W. Arnold; B. 51
- T
Takeuchi, Tatsuji
War and diplomacy in the Japanese empire;
B..... 684
- Taney, Roger B.; two biographies; B..... 621

Tanin, O., and E. Yohan
When Japan goes to war; B..... 684

Tate, Allen
Reactionary essays on poetry and ideas; B..... 747

Taylor, Phoebe Atwood
Crimson patch, the; B.. 458; see also C.. 494

Thalheimer, August
Introduction to dialectical materialism. Simpson and Weltner, translators; B..... 288; see also C..... 431

Thane, Elsywth
Young Mr. Disraeli; B..... 520

Theory of flight. M. Rukyser. Foreword by S. V. Benét; B..... 134

Thinking reed, the. R. West; B..... 354

Thirty-six poems. R. P. Warren; AN..... 391

Thomas, Norman
War. No profit, no glory, no need; AN 136

Thomas, Norman; R..... 358

Thomas de Quincey. A biography. H. A. Eaton; B..... 820

Thompson, Edward
"Sir Walter Raleigh: Last of the Elizabethans"; AN..... 720

Three flights up. Helen Woodward; B..... 25

Three gods give an evening to politics. R. Rothschild; B..... 653

Threescor, the autobiography of Sarah N. Cleghorn. Introduction by R. Frost; B..... 525

Time to dance, a. C. D. Lewis; B..... 589

To my contemporaries. E. Rolfe; AN..... 784

To the mountain. B. Smith; AN..... 490

Togo and the rise of Japanese sea power. E. A. Falk; B..... 684

Tolstoi, Alexei
Darkness and dawn. E. Bone and E. Burns, translators; B..... 522

Tom. E. E. Cummings; AN..... 82

Toward social security. E. M. Burns; B.. 422

Townsend plan, the. N. Roosevelt; B..... 424

Townsend plan, three books on; B..... 424

Tragedy of Nijinsky, the. A. Bourman and D. Lyman; B..... 590

Travels in two democracies. E. Wilson; B.. 816

Trilling, Lionel; R..... 52, 617

Troy, William; R..... 556, 747, 780, 811

Turlington, Edgar
Neutrality: Its history, economics, and law. Volume III. The world war period; B..... 456

Twain, Mark. The man and his work. E. Wagenknecht; AN..... 201

Twain, Mark, notebook. Edited by A. B. Paine; AN..... 258

$2500 a year. M. Ezekiel; B..... 488

U

Uncommon people. H. Hull; AN..... 528

Under the axe of fascism. G. Salvemini; B.. 716

Unending battle. H. C. Armstrong; B.... 229

Unsolved problems of science. A. W. Haslett; AN..... 230

V

Vagts, Alfred
Deutschland und die Vereinigten Staaten in der weltpolitik; B..... 620

Van Cise, Philip S.
Fighting the underworld; B..... 487

Van Doren, Dorothy; R..... 425, 525, 751

Van Doren, Mark; R. 51, 111, 163, 195, 203, (see also C, 363), 286, 324, 388, 457, 520, 586, 651, 715, 781, 820

Van Gogh, Vincent. W. Pach; B..... 391

Vaughan, Richard; R..... 846

Veblen, teachings; B..... 321

Vigils. S. Sassoon; AN..... 528

Village chronicle. J. McConnaughey; B.... 848

Villard, Oswald Garrison; R..... 718

Vincent Van Gogh. W. Pach; AN..... 391

Vision of Piers Plowman, the. W. Langland. Rendered into modern English by H. W. Wells; B..... 51

Vivas, Eliseo; R..... 524, 752

Vive le roy. F. M. Ford; AN..... 657

Voltaire. H. N. Brailsford; B..... 325

Vorse, Mary Heaton
Footnote to folly, a; B..... 80

W

Wagenknecht, Edward
Mark Twain. The man and his work; AN..... 201

Walton, Eda Lou; R..... 199, 749, 782, 848

War. No profit, no glory, no need. N. Thomas; AN..... 136

War and diplomacy in the Japanese empire. T. Takeuchi; B..... 684

War in the pacific. S. Denlinger and Lieutenant-Commander C. B. Gary; B..... 684

Warren, Robert Penn
Thirty-six poems; AN..... 391

Way of a transgressor, the. N. Farson; B.. 229

We Europeans. J. S. Huxley and A. C. Haddon. With contribution by A. M. Carr-Saunders; B..... 354

We the living. A. Rand; B..... 522

Weather in the street, the. R. Lehmann; B..... 713

Weatherwax, Clara
Marching! marching! B.. 82; see also C 159

Webb, Sidney and Beatrice
Soviet communism: A new civilization? B..... 518; see also C..... 756

Wells, Henry W.
Vision of Piers Plowman, the. Modern English version; B..... 51

Wertheim, Barbara; R..... 617

West, Rebecca
Thinking reed, the; B..... 354

Wharton, Edith
World over, the; AN..... 852

What is communism? E. Browder; B.. 526; letters by the author and L. M. Hacker, reviewer..... 787, 788

What Veblen taught. Edited by W. C. Mitchell; B.... 321; see also C..... 659

When Japan goes to war. O. Tanin and E. Yohan; B..... 684

Where life is better. An unsentimental American journey. J. Rorty; B.... 194

White, Leigh; R..... 588

White horses of Vienna and other stories, the. K. Boyle; B..... 286

Who owns America? Edited by H. Agar and A. Tate; B..... 813

Why keep them alive? P. de Kruif; B.... 390

Wiggam, Lionel
Landscape with figures; B..... 782

Wilde, Oscar, discovers America (1882). L. Lewis and H. J. Smith; B..... 846

Willcox, O. W.
Nations can live at home; B..... 24

William Jennings Bryan. W. C. Williams; B..... 587

Wilson, Edmund
Travels in two democracies; B..... 816

Wilson, Edmund; R..... 808

Wilson, Woodrow: Life and letters. Volume V. Neutrality, 1914-1915. R. S. Baker; B..... 109

Winwar, Frances
Romantic rebels, the; B..... 136

Wolfe, Thomas
Story of a novel, the; B..... 681

Wolff, Theodor
Eve of 1914, the; B..... 398; O. G. Villard; S..... 482

Wooden pillow, the. C. Fallas; B..... 163

Woodrow Wilson: Life and letters. Volume V. Neutrality, 1914-1915. R. S. Baker; B..... 109

Woodward, Helen
Three flights up; B..... 25

World over, the. E. Wharton; AN..... 852

Wurdemann, Audrey
Seven sins, the; B..... 23

Wylie, Philip
As they reveled; B..... 486

Z

Zaharoff. R. Neumann; B..... 388

Zaturenska, Marya; R..... 23

Zweig, Arnold
Education before Verdun. E. Sutton, translator; B..... 617

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1936

No. 3678

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	1
EDITORIALS:
The League Struggles On	4
Education Faces the Class Struggle	5
Japan's New "Lifeline"	5
A New Secret Society	■
ISSUES AND MEN. A WORLD PUBLIC OPINION EXISTS. By
Oswald Garrison Villard	7
CARTOON. By Fritz	■
THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL	9
HOW TO CONTROL THE SALE OF ARMS. By H. C. Engelbrecht	10
ANYTHING CAN HAPPEN IN CHICAGO. By Edwin A. Lahey	12
ARMS OVER EUROPE. III. ITALY AT WAR: FIRST IM-
PRESSIONS. By Louis Fischer	14
I AM A TRAITOR. By William T. Lucas	16
CORRESPONDENCE	17
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
The C. P. and the United Front. A Debate between David Scheyer and Heywood Brown	19
Contributors to This Issue	20
Facts for Consumers. By Ruth Brindze	21
BOOKS, MUSIC, DRAMA, FILMS.
"Our Critics, Right or Wrong." By Joseph Wood Krutch	22
Poetic Poetry. By Marya Zaturenska	23
Feeding Ourselves. By Hugh H. Darby	24
Travelers in West Africa. By Ruth Benedict	24
The Oneida Community. By H. B. Parkes	25
That Rebus. By Maxwell Geismar	25
Galsworthy. By Helen Neville	26
Diaghileff. By Clara Gruening Stillman	26
Music: A Bright Evening, with Musicians. By Kenneth Burke	27
Drama: On Good Intentions. By Joseph Wood Krutch	27
Films: Groucho Co. By Mark Van Doren	28

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8;
Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN:
$1 a year additional.

THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS
THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S
ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.
Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Gruening, Circulation

THE DIVINE RIGHT of judges to annul the legislative will of the people has again been asserted. The present occasion is the labor troubles of a flour mill at Aurora, Kansas. Judge Merrill E. Otis, of the Federal District Court in Kansas City, has declared the Wagner-Connery Labor Disputes Act unconstitutional. The now familiar pattern of the judicial life-history of New Deal legislation is being retraced. A small-time Republican judge appointed in the palmy days of the Coolidge Administration rules that a carefully considered act to regulate labor relations, passed after six tragic years of depression, must be thrown on the dump heap. Judge Otis's decision is based on the narrowest possible construction of the commerce power of Congress—so narrow as to limit its scope finally to actual physical transportation across state lines. An entire sequence of Supreme Court precedents stretching back to John Marshall and construing the commerce clause broadly is completely ignored. The familiar bogey is again dragged out that if Congress may regulate collective bargaining in industries that are part of the flow of commerce, "then its power is almost unlimited," nothing remains of the sovereignty of the states, and tyranny is untrammelled.

JUDGE OTIS'S LANGUAGE stops little short of the vituperative. By the Wagner act, he declares, the worker "is dealt with as an incompetent. . . . He is the ward of the United States to be cared for by his guardian even as if he were a member of an uncivilized tribe of Indians or a recently emancipated slave." Thus in a generous burst of feeling the Judge lashes out against any act that would disturb the inalienable right of the worker to be denied collective bargaining and to be exploited to the hilt of economic circumstance. The real meaning of this decision becomes apparent when it is remembered that bourbon strategy is trying to short-circuit the Labor Relations Board and get a Wagner-act case to the Supreme Court under the most unfavorable conditions possible. This case does not involve, as does the Greyhound motor-bus case, for example, an appeal from a decision of the Labor Relations Board. On such an appeal the board's record, embodying an exhaustive investigation of the actual labor conditions at the plant, would go up to the Supreme Court. Since this is not true in the present case, the board would be well advised not to appeal from Judge Otis's decision, but to take its position on something like the Greyhound case.

THE BELATED ACTION of the Interstate Commerce Commission reducing train fares to two cents a mile illustrates one of the unsolved weaknesses of government control as against either competition or public ownership of utilities. If genuine competition could exist in this field, the railways would have reduced fares some years ago as a protection against the inroads of the buses. But largely because of the difficulty of raising rates once they have been lowered by the I. C. C., the Eastern railways have fought every attempt to cut basic fares during the depression—though they introduced special week-end rates in an effort to fill their empty trains. Under a system of state ownership, the rate-making bodies would be presumably not only more sensitive to public opinion but free from pressure from the railways themselves. Under the benign protection of the I. C. C. millions of dollars' worth of railway equipment has lain idle during the depression, and thousands of bondholders have suffered a serious shrinkage of their investments. While there may be some doubt that all the railroads will have a sufficient increase of traffic at two cents a mile to increase net revenues—after making allowances for the extra cost of carrying the additional passengers—there can be no doubt that the railways will once more be serving the ends for which they were intended.

THE RETURN of ex-President Calles to Mexico has precipitated a political crisis which threatens to become even more serious than that of last June. Fearing a coup d'état which would bring the former "iron man" back into power, President Cárdenas has taken swift and decisive action. Five senators, alleged supporters of Calles, have been removed and charged with treason. Charges have also been preferred against the reactionary Morones, former leader of the C. R. O. M.—at one time the most important labor organization in Mexico. The former President and his associates have been formally expelled from the National Revolutionary Party (P. N. R.). Despite a wave of popular protest against his return, Calles has given no indication of leaving, and speculation is active as to his possible backing. This speculation has been enhanced by the fact that Calles traveled to Honolulu in August on the same ship with Postmaster General Farley, and that they both registered at the same hotel. A large number of Mexicans are convinced that this indicates a definite agreement between the two in which Calles promised "industrial peace" and a more lenient attitude toward the Catholic church in return for the support of the Roosevelt Administration. In that case, of course, the President would not need to fear opposition next November from the Knights of Columbus, the Jesuits, and other militant Catholic organizations because of his "weak" Mexican policy. With the record of recent events in Cuba before us, no one can say that such things are impossible; we can only hope that the Administration has more sense than to drag our southern neighbor to the depths to which it has plunged Cuba.

THE NAVAL CONFERENCE has recessed over the holidays after two weeks of fruitless sessions which left the cause of naval disarmament farther from realization than ever. President Roosevelt's plan for a general 20 per cent reduction in naval tonnage was laughed out of court. Japan's plea for a "common upper limit" was definitely rejected. The compromise scheme proposed by the British delegation calling for unilateral declarations of each country's plans for naval construction for the next six years has met vigorous opposition from the Japanese and will probably be dropped. Even if adopted it would be of little value in checking the present naval race. Each country would doubtless place its requirements considerably above its actual building program so as to preserve a free hand. As yet the conference has shown no disposition to consider the naval problem as part of the larger problems of the Pacific with which it is intimately connected. Unless these broader issues are faced, the news from London is bound to be both monotonous and insignificant.

WE ARE GLAD to report that the government stood firm on its demand that the International Mercantile Marine let a contract for the construction of a cabin liner to replace the Leviathan. Had the contract not been let by December 16, the I. M. M. would have had to pay a forfeit of $1,000,000 for laying up the Leviathan—an arrangement that would have been greatly to the financial advantage of the I. M. M. The dead line was originally September 18, but Secretary of Commerce Roper, on the tenuous pretext of additional safety requirements for the new ship, extended it. The new cabin liner is to be built by the Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company. It will be very much like the Washington and the Manhattan, and will cost $11,900,000, three-quarters of which will be a loan from the government. The original bid was for $11,600,000 (no explanation has been given for the subsequent increase), and Shipping Board officials said it was too high. The matter was taken to President Roosevelt, who had before him a report on the failure of the "big four" shipbuilding companies to bid on a previous advertisement for a somewhat larger vessel. Mr. Roosevelt was said to favor a proposal that the bid should be rejected and the vessel built in one of the navy yards unless the price was scaled down. If this was a bluff it failed to work. The government was in a dilemma, for after the questionable postponement of the September 18 dead line Secretary Roper had gone on record that the contract must and should be let by December 16 or the $1,000,000 would be forfeited. For paying the shipbuilders' price Roper and the I. M. M. have only themselves to blame: it was they who broke the original contract—favorable enough to the I. M. M.—stipulating that the Leviathan should continue in service during 1935 and 1936.

THE STRANGEST ASPECT of the Strange Case of Lamar Hardy is the failure of the metropolitan Republican press to seize upon this New Deal misstep for a well-merited attack on the Administration. The President has appointed this man United States Attorney for the financial heart of the country, and no protest is raised. An opposition paper, such as the New York Herald Tribune, could show a very close link between Democratic politics and the State Title and Mortgage Company. It could show that Mr. Hardy won his appointment through the help of Boss Edward J. Flynn of the Bronx, and that Mr. Flynn's firm was counsel for the company. It could show that Mr. Hardy is being sued, with two dozen other former directors, for $5,000,000 by the state Insurance Department, and that his effort to compromise this suit by paying $16,500 failed when Justice Frankenthaler threw the compromise out, the Justice reminding the Insurance Department that it had itself said it had good ground for action, on charges of malfeasance and nonfeasance in making loans to affiliates. It could show that others, party to the same suit and tarred with the same State Title brush, have been accorded high honors by the New Deal: that the Democratic politician James J. Hoey, sued along with Mr. Hardy, is now the New Deal's Collector of Internal Revenue; that Julian M. Gerard, another director, is the New Deal's Regional Administrator for the Federal Housing Administration. The federal government is criminally prosecuting former associates of Mr. Hardy at the moment Mr. Hardy becomes federal prosecutor. A fight in the Senate against Mr. Hardy's confirmation is vitally necessary. But the Herald Tribune and the Hearst press, much as they hate the Administration, have kept quiet. In the higher reaches of finance all men are brothers.

FOUNDATIONS have often been cited as proof of the value of a system wherein a few men are able to acquire great wealth. Without the large grants made possible by private fortunes it would be impossible, it is argued, adequately to endow philanthropic and scientific enterprises which offer no direct advantages either to the politicians or to business itself. The foundations offer that security which is essential to disinterested endeavor—social or scientific. In the light of this theory, it is interesting to consider the expenditures of the leading foundations in the United States during the depression years. Here was a great crisis, calling for dispassionate research; a time when, if ever, there was need for direct assistance in the field of social welfare, economic study, and education. Yet, according to a recent study prepared by the Twentieth Century Fund, the total grants of the sixty-eight leading foundations between 1930 and 1934 declined 53 per cent, although their assets suffered practically no shrinkage. The cut was largely due to a decrease in income from securities, but in some instances the foundations report "a readjustment in finances in the interest of maintaining a satisfactory balance in the investment portfolio." Despite the crisis, the grants for economic studies, while double those of 1930, rank seventh on the list, and were less than one-eighth of the amount set aside for education or for public health. Social welfare ranked third, but showed a decline from 1930, while birth control, ranking twenty-first, received the munificent amount of $1,250 in 1934, a decline of 75 per cent from 1930. At that, however, it was one notch ahead of civil liberties, which received only $1,211 and had dropped 92 per cent in four years. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace curtailed its grants by 73 per cent, on the supposition, we imagine, that its work is nearly completed.

THE SMOKE of a good deal of criticism has come out of subjecting teachers in both state and private institutions to the teachers' oath of loyalty. For a while it looked as if Professor Mather of Harvard would offer a real protest, but lacking the active support of his president or any other member of the faculty, he finally signed the oath, first with reservations and then without. Real fire on the subject, however, has been struck from Tufts College in Boston. Professor Arthur Lane of the Geology Department and Professor Earle M. Winslow, head of the Department of Economics, have resigned rather than sign the oath, in the belief that to do so would mean jurisdiction by the legislature over all teaching, private as well as public. Professor Winslow, at a legislative hearing on the bill, declared that enforced patriotism was a joke, and that "even a scoundrel would take an oath." Thousands of teachers have undeniably taken the oath with tongue in cheek, not because they had any intention of defying the Constitution, but because they believed their patriotism beyond the sort of legislative meddling which the oath implies. To demand that they have the courage of their convictions and refuse to conform, even though it might mean the loss of their jobs, is perhaps impossible in a time of economic insecurity like the present. But one may be thoroughly grateful when two men, distinguished in their professions, refuse to do what so many have done unwillingly.

IT IS REPORTED by the Pittsburgh Post Gazette that the American Association of University Professors will place the University of Pittsburgh on its black list when it meets late in December. If this action is taken, it will be an even sterner challenge to the forces of reaction in education. Blacklisting a university means that none of the 10,000 members of the A. A. U. P. may take a teaching position there without forfeiting his membership in the association. Two investigating committees have established the fact that lack of academic freedom, insecurity of tenure, and irresponsible relations between administration and faculty make the University of Pittsburgh a place to be avoided by American teachers. An A. A. U. P. report further charged that the university permitted the opinions of donors to influence its policies. This accusation led to a legislative inquiry and a warning from Governor Earle that state appropriations to the university would be stopped unless the suspicion of undue influence by trustees were removed. Teachers in many parts of the country, suffering under only a little less insecurity and trustee domination than are attributed to Pittsburgh's big-business cathedral of learning, will watch the action of the A. A. U. P. with the greatest interest.

SIX POLICEMEN were arrested on December 18 charged with first-degree murder in connection with the vigilante attack on three men in Tampa, Florida, resulting in the death of one of the victims. The affidavits on which the arrests were based were picturesque but very much to the point. They charged that the policemen "unlawfully and from a premeditated design to effect the death of" Joseph Shoemaker "did commit an assault upon him" and "in furtherance of assault did burn, beat, and wound the said Joseph Shoemaker . . . thereby inflicting divers mortal wounds from which the said Joseph Shoemaker did languish and on the ninth day of December, 1935, did die." In addition to these arrests, two residents of Orlando, Florida, accused by Sheriff J. R. McLeod of being members of the Klu Klux Klan, were held on the same charge. It remains to be seen whether or not the special session of the grand jury called to investigate the case will return indictments. The attack was particularly vicious; Tampa has publicly and indignantly denounced it; will anybody be punished for it?

PATERNALISM oozing from every pore, Charles A. Tyler, president of the Philadelphia Inquirer (the owner, Raymond Paternotre, a French Cabinet under-official, is too busy in the Chamber of Deputies to pay much attention to his American property), took the witness stand at a National Labor Relations Board hearing in Philadelphia last week to answer the charge that he had refused to bargain collectively with his editorial employees. It was the first newspaper case to be heard under the Labor Disputes Act and naturally was watched with great interest by other publishers who may find themselves in the same predicament. The question of constitutionality, which has dominated the Inquirer's editorial page since the New Deal began, was not directly raised; the management based its refusal on the ground that the local Newspaper Guild did not represent the majority of its editorial employees, although it had previously waived that claim. On the stand Mr. Tyler, who had been vague about such details of his business as the cost of newsprint and ink, professed to know to a man the number of his editorial employees. He said there were 168, but admitted under examination that this figure was padded to include executives at one end of the scale and janitors and charwomen at the other end. He also admitted that while efforts at collective bargaining were being made, the management had adjusted upward several individual salaries, apparently in an attempt to forestall the guild movement. Since the Inquirer avoided the question of constitutionality and devoted all its arguments to the guild's power of representation, it is evident that it intends to leave the more important issue to be dealt with by the Associated Press and its counsel, John W. Davis, in the Morris Watson case. But despite these tactics of evasion and delay, the mere fact that the guild was able to bring a powerful publisher into court is a development which two years ago newspapermen hardly dared imagine.

The League Struggles On

THE scrapping of the Hoare-Laval peace proposals was as convincing an expression of the power of public opinion as the world is likely to see in this age of dictatorships and high-pressure propaganda. In many respects it was the most notable victory which the League has achieved in its fifteen years of existence, demonstrating that that organization is at last more than merely a tool of British and French imperialism. While it might not have been possible for the Council to have acted so decisively if there had been no opposition to the proposals at London and Paris, that opposition was greatly strengthened by the attitude of the small states at Geneva. Nor can it be denied that the successful popular outcry against the dismemberment of Ethiopia marks a significant advance in the development of that type of public conscience which is a sine qua non for the prevention of war. One need only turn back to the Treaty of Versailles or the more recent invasion of Manchuria to realize how substantial the progress in that direction has been.

It is a tribute to the growing significance of collective organization that Sir Samuel Hoare defended his outrageous program on the ground of preserving the League. He was convinced, he assured the House, that the enforcement of oil sanctions would provoke Italy to attack Britain and thus lay the basis for the League's dissolution. No other country except Britain, he complained, had taken effective military precautions. His facts are essentially correct, but it is impossible to follow his logic. Although it is true that Great Britain alone had considered it necessary to back up economic penalties by a show of military force, France had promised assistance to the British fleet in the Mediterranean, and Turkey, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Czecho-Slovakia, and Greece had agreed to give military support in case England became involved in war with Italy. Steeped in the conventional military traditions, Sir Samuel apparently could not see that it was Britain's unilateral naval sanctions and not collective embargoes that first drew the ire of Mussolini and created the danger of Italian attack. Perhaps the best key to the mentality of the man who made this complaint and who is responsible for one of the gravest diplomatic errors in recent years may be found in an address which he delivered a few weeks ago at the annual dinner of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Speaking in the presence of some forty-odd foreigners, including nearly all the leading ambassadors and diplomats in London, Sir Samuel developed at great length the familiar thesis that the British have a peculiar and almost infallible instinct for foreign affairs. We doubt if even Mr. Baldwin would concur in this judgment today.

Sir Samuel's resignation and Captain Eden's assumption of the duties of Foreign Minister have given the proponents of collective security another chance, but the opportunities which existed on December 8 can never be wholly restored. Eden's task is an unenviable one. An oil embargo is impossible for at least another month, and no action is likely to be taken in the meantime to strengthen the existing sanctions or to spread their burden more equitably on the various countries. If Laval remains in power, France may abandon economic penalties altogether. Moreover, no one will ever again take a British statesman quite seriously when he talks about upholding the sanctity of covenants or the necessity of sacrifices for principles. It is plain that for the Conservative government there are no principles above the dictates of expediency. If British policy in these past few months has been based on an apparent recognition of the value of collective action, it is only because England, above all other countries, stands to lose by war.

It would be unfair to suggest, however, that Britain is entirely responsible for the difficulties which the League faces at present. From the beginning France's support of sanctions has been lukewarm, and doubtless Laval subjected Sir Samuel Hoare to considerable pressure to obtain approval of the peace plan. Since France is in a position to profit more than any other country by a strong League, its actions have been particularly indefensible. Nor can the United States escape blame. The very fact that it is not a member of the League confers a special responsibility upon it which it has thus far borne none too graciously. Despite the repeated warnings of the President and the Secretary of State, our exports to Italy of the "sinews of war"—oil, copper, scrap steel, automobiles, tractors, and airplane engines—increased from $18,000 in November, 1934, to $584,000 in the month just past—a rise of over 3,100 per cent. Automobile sales to Italian Africa in November were valued at $71,215 as compared with $6,749 in the same month a year ago, while our oil exports—in the face of a warning by Secretary Ickes and government pressure on American shipping lines—rose from practically nothing in November, 1934, to $451,348 in November, 1935. The increase in the sales of these war materials from October to November was nearly as spectacular. Since the Administration has taken the position that it has no power to prevent American business men from aiding Mussolini in his illegal war, it is scarcely to be wondered that Britain should doubt the League's ability to enforce an oil embargo against Italy. As long as Mussolini can obtain a full supply of essential raw materials in the United States, the League has no immediately powerful weapon except the threat of military action. It is only natural, therefore, that Eden should seek a military understanding with the Little Entente and the Balkan powers. Although such an understanding is theoretically consistent with the principles of collective security, it is likely to have an extremely unfavorable effect on American liberal opinion. Most persons will not detect the vicious circle that lurks behind this attitude. American public opinion is suspicious of the League because it has not found a substitute for armed coercion; yet the United States, by its failure to cooperate fully with the League, is threatening to sabotage the most promising effort which has been made to work out such a substitute. The coming weeks will test not only the League's ability to maintain the principle of collective action in the face of heavy pecuniary losses for each of the member nations, but also America's sincerity in declaring that it desires to avert war. If the past has taught us anything, it is that peace and war profits are mutually incompatible.

Education Faces the Class Struggle

THERE is a pleasant fiction, widely propagated in America, that institutions of higher learning stand above the battle of contending social forces. College and university professors, nurtured on the tradition of academic neutrality, have generally been unable or unwilling to inquire into their dependence on and their connections with the economic structure—into the source and conditions of their livelihood. They have of course heard of taxes and endowments, but they have taken such things for granted, like rain and sunshine, the unsolicited gifts of a beneficent providence. They have refused to admit any direct interest in the sordid conflict over wages and profits, over the division of the social income, over such a material thing as the distribution of bread and butter and clothing.

At Teachers College, Columbia University, this fiction is being rudely shattered. The economic struggle, with practically all its customary features, has raised its head in the laboratories, the lecture halls, and the reading-rooms of the institution. Students and faculty have been learning about wage disputes, labor unions, and picketing, not in some distant steel mill or coal mine, but in their own dining halls. They have heard charges of sabotage, red agitators, and communism, of spies, agents provocateurs, and unjust discrimination hurled back and forth between management and workers. Some members of the staff have begun to wonder whether their relatively high salaries may not be derived in part from the immediate and severe exploitation of labor in their own institution. And some of them are already feeling uncomfortable over the thought that the social and educational theories which they expound in their classrooms are being violated in the labor practices of the university authorities.

For three years the college has been disturbed from time to time by reverberations of labor difficulties in the dining halls. Last summer the trouble came to a head in the dismissal of a worker, a union member, who for many years had given satisfactory service in the cafeteria. Pickets marched up and down 120th Street in front of Teachers College, meetings of protest were organized by sympathetic students, and members of the faculty began to interest themselves in the matter. But owing to the absence of Dean Russell nothing of importance was attempted.

This autumn the struggle was renewed, and the situation was further aggravated by the dismissal of three more workers, all union members. The upshot was the appointment on October 31 of a student-faculty committee of five members to make a thorough investigation of the trouble.

On December 7 the committee turned in a unanimous report. Though couched in moderate language and fully supported by the evidence, the report unveiled a truly shocking situation. The major finding was a series of severe and discriminatory wage cuts during the past five years. Within this period, while the compensation of the management had been held practically stationary, the wages of many of the full-time workers, always meager, had been reduced 40 per cent. The committee also found that the dismissed workers had been "discriminated against because of their union membership and activity," and further that "the conflict between the open-shop practice of Teachers College and the desire of the men to be represented by a labor union of their own choosing is the basic cause of the problem." Dean Russell, rising to the opportunity presented, proposes to review the entire question of labor policy in the institution. Already he has taken steps to appoint another committee, composed of faculty and trustees, to deal with the broader problem.

The investigation at Teachers College is of immediate interest to those who formulate institutional policy. The situation demonstrates the absolute bankruptcy of a program of paternalism. This policy was tried under almost ideal conditions and it failed miserably. The blame cannot be placed specifically either on the organization or on the personalities responsible for executing its policies. Through its devotion to the public education Teachers College has identified itself with the welfare of the masses of the people. The investigating committee found the director of the dining halls to be an admirable and humane person, always ready to give time and funds for the relief of distress among the employees, always ready, in fact, to do anything but treat them as human beings desirous of having something to say about the conditions under which they worked. And yet under such favorable circumstances paternalism failed. If it failed here, where can it succeed?

Japan's New "Lifeline"

IN commenting on the Japanese invasion of North China, it is frequently said that the military leaders in the field have triumphed over the saner counsels of civilians at home. This interpretation may contain an element of truth, but it overlooks the fact that the financial houses which dominate the political life of Japan are among those with the greatest interests in North China. The conquest of Manchuria furnished an outlet for bellicose emotions, but it contributed little to the economic welfare of Japan. Although hailed as the "lifeline" of the empire four years ago, Manchoukuo has proved a bitter disappointment to the business groups which supported the campaign. It has failed to supply a substantial amount of needed raw materials, and its new industries have tended to compete directly with those of Japan. When the costs of administering, defending, and exploiting this region are taken into account, the chances are that it will be a heavy burden on Japan for many years. As a result the business interests have turned to North China to furnish the opportunities lacking in Manchuria.

The extent of these opportunities may be seen in a recent issue of the Far Eastern Survey, a publication of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations. The Mitsubishi, for example, are especially interested in the possibility of developing cotton-growing, since Japan is dependent entirely on imports to meet the demands of its vast textile industry. In an attempt to develop the quality of the Chinese product, the Japanese-controlled Shantung Cotton Improvement Association distributed 47,000 pounds of American seed in 1934 and 80,000 in 1935. A five-year plan calling for the planting of some 2,000,000 acres in North China is under consideration, Japan to be given the right to purchase the entire crop. Some Japanese believe that by the end of this period China will be able to furnish all the cotton now imported from the United States. North China also has rich possibilities for the production of wool, wheat, millet, and kaoliang, though most of these are produced in Manchuria as well.

Although Japan is nearly self-sufficient in coal production, its reserves are small and it has practically no iron. Manchuria has coal, but its iron ore is relatively inaccessible and of a low quality. China ranks fourth in the world in coal reserves, most of which are to be found in the north. Shansi alone contains 80 per cent of the anthracite and 49 per cent of the bituminous reserves of the whole of China. Similarly, nearly half of China's iron reserves are in Chahar, within easy reach of Peiping. Most of these resources are undeveloped because of the lack of transportation facilities, but Japan is reported to be planning the construction of a number of railways to cut across the main north-south arteries which already exist. One would run from Tientsin to Shansi, tapping its vast coal fields, another from Peiping through Inner Mongolia to Manchuria, while still another would open the potentially rich cotton districts along the Yellow River.

Japan's interest in this area is, of course, by no means new. The Twenty-one Demands of 1915, if fully granted, would have presented Japan with virtual economic suzerainty over this entire region. But only within the past few months have Japanese business interests entered the field determined to drive out all competitors. Early in August—only a few days after Yosuke Matsuoka, who represented Japan at Geneva, took over the presidency of the South Manchuria Railway—a subsidiary of the S. M. R., the Hsin Chung Company, was organized with a capital of $2,800,000 to carry on financial, industrial, and commercial activities in China. This marked a definite change in policy on the part of the S. M. R., which has hitherto confined itself exclusively to Manchuria.

In an attempt to gain the support of the Chinese bourgeoisie, the Japanese set up several organizations, staffed by Chinese, the sole purpose of which was to soften the opposition to Japanese penetration. Most important of these is the Hopei Economic Association formed on September 21 with several score leading Chinese bankers and industrialists as members. Nanking spokesmen first represented the organization as an attempt to head off Japanese exploitation of North China through the development of competing enterprises. It soon became known, however, that members were "quite willing to employ Japanese technical advisers and to purchase Japanese machinery and equipment." The two chief organizers immediately set out on an economic mission to Japan, where they participated in the formation of the Sino-Japanese Trade Association, which has as its objective the fostering of friendly relations and cooperation between the two countries. Other bodies for the promotion of "cooperation" have been set up in North China, in the main purely Japanese organizations thinly disguised by Chinese names. Organizations of this type have furnished the spearhead of the so-called "autonomy" movement. As agencies of propaganda they have not been conspicuously successful, but backed by the Japanese army and aided by the Nanking government, the Japanese business interests appear to be rapidly annexing North China to what they now modestly term the "Japan-Manchoukuo economic bloc."

A New Secret Society

SINCE the most recent Hearst exposé is a—to borrow a few adjectives from the cinema—colossal, tremendous, stupendous Public Indictment of some of The Nation's best friends and favorite public characters, it might be just as well to tell the whole story frankly and quietly. It seems that about December 17—and we recall it as a dark night with no moon—a conference representative of twenty-nine organizations met behind closed doors at the Westchester Country Club at Harrison, New York. Probably because the sponsors realized that Mr. Hearst would consider it a better news story, the meeting was not publicized; the New York American says it was—sh!—secret! But since the members of the group have spent a good part of their lives indorsing, by such secret means as the radio, the public lecture platform, and the press, the ideas expressed on the occasion, the secrecy seems dubious.

Everybody at the meeting wore false whiskers—this was not reported by the American, but somebody told it in confidence to Heywood Broun and we were thus enabled to get the story. The spying Hearst reporter who was present disguised as a member of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, however, was able to penetrate the facial herbage and to recognize Dr. James T. Shotwell, Miss Dorothy Detzer, Francis B. Sayre, Frederick J. Libby, and Oswald Garrison Villard in the unpatriotic, un-American, and unsafe gathering. In a general way the subject debated was peace. In the course of the evening plans were discussed—we quote the American—for "a sinister obstructionist stratagem to cripple the army and navy billion-dollar appropriation bill at the next session of Congress," "to press vigilantly to abolish the army and navy sedition bill," and "to seek adoption of the drastic neutrality bill, which would virtually put an end to the munitions and allied industries." The conference, we must further state, went on record as being unequivocally opposed to the R. O. T. C. in colleges. And just to show that it was not all talk, Mr. Hearst declared that the sponsors of this international program of peace were in process of raising a quarter of a million dollars to further their nefarious schemes.

As was to be expected, Mr. Hearst was not content with the spreading of this fearful tale upon the pages of his New York American. He sought from Washington appropriate expressions of horror over the "revelations," and they were indeed forthcoming, in the shape of what the American with commendable originality happily describes as a "storm of protest." The storm as reported in the paper for December 20 consisted of a statement from the American Legion—no particular individual mentioned—that it was diametrically opposed to the program; a statement ditto from the executive secretary of the Sons of the American Revolution, one Frank B. Steele; a statement from the Veterans of Foreign Wars; and a ringing denunciation from Senator Dickinson of Iowa and from Representative McReynolds of Tennessee. Nobody else was quoted. This either means that Mr. Hearst's idea of a storm of protest does not coincide with ours or that the American is suppressing some dandy names until a later date. Well, anyway, Happy New Year, everybody!

Issues and Men

A World Public Opinion Exists

WHATEVER the final outcome of the disaster into which Laval and Hoare plunged the League of Nations, it has had one great result. It has proved anew that in those countries which are not throttled by dictatorships public opinion can rule; that when the facts in a given situation are available, there is also a world opinion capable of overthrowing ministries and reversing national and international policies. Hoare was compelled to resign not merely by the indignation of the British public, shocked beyond measure by the League's betrayal by the English and French governments, but by the universal outburst of anger and criticism in the United States, in the Scandinavian countries, and in the British dominions. This was admitted at the very beginning of the debate in the House of Lords when Lord Davies declared that the Hoare-Laval surrender to Mussolini had "outrageously shocked" the peoples across the Atlantic and that the government had "stemmed the rising tide of cooperation with the League of Nations."

So Sir Samuel Hoare was jettisoned to save the newly constituted British Cabinet, and at this writing it is not yet clear whether the Laval Cabinet will ride out the storm. But enough has happened to make it beyond dispute that there is a profoundly concerned world opinion, more aroused to the danger of war than at any time since 1919, and in many quarters determined to save the League and make it the great instrument for peace that it was intended to be. That such an international uprising would not have come to pass if the proposed robbery of Ethiopia had been a slight one is probably true. From that point of view the very blackness of the British-French perfidy was a godsend. Nobody could quibble about it. Nobody could say that this was not a black but a "gray" case. Nobody could defend the offer to Mussolini of more of Ethiopia than he had asked for. And no sane or honest person will defend it today on the grounds Hoare urged—that it was the only thing to do because England alone was furnishing military and naval forces and the threat of war was alarming. Real statesmen would have foreseen this danger.

But there the fact is. The League has been saved not by the statesmen who pretended to uphold it, and imposed sanctions in accordance with its Covenant, but by the plain people everywhere and the press where it is free. In England the 11,600,000 who voted in the referendum of the League of Nations Union to stand by the League made their power felt. Everywhere liberals and labor organizations responded to the gravity of the situation, and the proposal was killed even before it was submitted to the League by Eden and Laval. It was not necessary for the Council to vote it down, nor was the admirable Ethiopian protest needed to inter, without benefit of clergy, the whole nefarious scheme. That Great Britain and France stand somewhat rehabilitated today is not due to the politicians. They who are so quick to prate about the honor of the country were the ones to betray it. If some of it is left untarnished, that is due again to the aroused opinion of the masses who, we are so often told, cannot be allowed to vote on questions of war and peace because these are too delicate and too involved for the masses to understand. Well, they understood this issue. They were quite able to recognize as black a piece of treachery as could possibly have come to pass.

Of course, the people have been tricked before. Indeed, many of the critics of the League and the cynics in the press declared from the start that "a little war had been arranged" and that it would be stopped and Ethiopia dismembered before any great harm had been done. But these writers reckoned without their host. They overlooked the fact that we have come a long way from pre-war days, that whatever else the League has done it has helped to educate the people everywhere to an understanding of international problems, and that in the United States, too, there are far more people thinking intelligently about foreign affairs than ever before. Here is a vast reservoir of power for honest and intelligent statesmen to draw upon, to turn to for aid and support. Here Baldwin and Hoare would have found, and can still find, their best protection against the threats of war of the irresponsible dictator of Italy. Here is the clearest proof that if they had appealed to all the world for support in their original course they would have been triumphantly upheld. Mussolini, for all his ability to delude his pitiful subjects, could never have held out against the response which these statesmen would have had. But no, your Baldwins and Lavals cannot work in the open, cannot follow a straightforward manly way, cannot take the world into their confidence. They must meet in secret, take counsel of their fears, while lacking the brains even to suspect to what utter humiliation their course is leading them.

Well, let some more statesmen blunder like Baldwin and Laval, and we shall not only have the smaller nations taking the management of the League out of the hands of England and France and making it a really sincere and democratic body, but we may even live to see the peoples taking a stand against all the militaristic and nationalistic policies which are making world recovery impossible. Today let us fall back upon the great achievement abroad and give praise to whom it is due. There is nothing in what has happened to make Hitler or any other dictator rejoice—far from it. As for Mussolini, he must recognize that the campaign against him has now passed out of the hands of perfidious and malleable governments. Baldwin and Laval may have forgotten that Mussolini said to the French Ambassador last summer: "If you brought me Abyssinia on a silver tray, I would not accept it, for I am resolved to take it by force." Others have not. They know that if he is to be encouraged to take Abyssinia, other dictators will follow suit, and the world will be well on the road to chaos and destruction.

Bruce Garrison Villard

Good Luck to You, Young Fellow!

The Nation's Honor Roll

FOR the eighth successive year The Nation offers a roster of Americans who deserve the applause of their countrymen. In a world in which courage is at a premium, they have been courageous; they have been intelligent when intelligence was sorely needed; either in public affairs, science, or the arts, they have made a contribution, by a particular act or in their general behavior, which is worthy of honorable notice.

CORDELL HULL, Secretary of State, for doing all in his power to enforce the existing neutrality act in such a way as to prevent our rendering aid to an aggressor, and for his tireless attacks on existing trade barriers.

HUGO L. BLACK, Senator from Alabama, for his work as chairman of the Senate Committee on Air-Mail and Ocean-Mail Contracts, which decided in favor of government ownership and operation of our merchant marine instead of private ownership and operation subsidized by the government, and for his defense of the public interest in the utilities investigation.

ERNEST LUNDEEN, Farmer-Labor Congressman from Minnesota, for his persistent and vigorous fight against overwhelming odds for adequate social-security legislation.

MAURY MAVERICK, Congressman from Texas, whose refusal to submit to party discipline was in no small measure responsible for the existing neutrality legislation.

VITO MARCANTONIO, of New York, who has been in the forefront of the struggle against social injustice, both in Congress and at home.

The AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION and its director, ROGER N. BALDWIN, for consistent, intelligent, and forthright championship of the American Bill of Rights, at a time when civil liberties are being increasingly threatened.

HOWARD KESTER, of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union in Arkansas, TOM BURKE, of the Share-Croppers' Union in Alabama, and in general the officials and members of these two organizations, who at the continual risk of their lives have fought to establish the elementary rights of the cruelly exploited share-cropper and cotton picker.

FRANK PORTER GRAHAM, president of the University of North Carolina, for years of brave, outspoken leadership in that state in education and social service, and especially for his brilliant address last August at the Williamstown Institute of Human Relations in behalf of social control in the United States and the modernization of the Constitution.

ARTHUR C. LANE, professor of geology at Tufts College, and EARLE M. WINSLOW, head of the Department of Economics at the same institution, the first professors in the country to resign their posts rather than submit to the indignity of the teachers' oath.

JOHN L. LEWIS and the COMMITTEE FOR INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATION of the American Federation of Labor. Mr. Lewis, after a long career marked by vigorous leadership but by little social vision, has now turned his great forcefulness and skill to the building of a strong industrial labor movement, which alone can give the body of mass-production workers the power they should exercise in a democracy.

JOHN A. CLARK, of De Kalb, Mississippi, who in the face of bitter local prejudice defended the case of three Negroes convicted of murder on the basis of vicious third-degree "confessions," and VIRGIL A. GRIFFITH, Associate Justice of the Mississippi Supreme Court, who handed down a courageous opinion supporting Mr. Clark's demand for a new trial.

JEREMIAH T. MAHONEY, for his activities as president of the Amateur Athletic Union in leading and furthering the movement, indorsed by thousands of his fellow-citizens, for non-participation by the United States in Hitler's Olympic games.

ANGELO HERNDON, for the courage and unwavering loyalty to his class which prompted him to return to Georgia to face the almost certain death awaiting him in a sentence of from eighteen to twenty years on the infamous chain gang.

HENRIETTA SZOLD, who at seventy-five years of age, after a crowded lifetime of work in behalf of the oppressed Jews of all countries, is head of the Youth Aliyah movement, which has already transferred almost a thousand German-Jewish children to Palestine and settled them on the land.

CHARLES A. BEARD, for his definitive and crushing characterization of William Randolph Hearst as one who has "pandered to depraved tastes and has been an enemy of everything that is noblest and best in our American tradition."

EDWIN R. A. SELIGMAN, editor-in-chief, ALVIN JOHNSON, associate editor, and the EDITORIAL BOARD of the ENCYCLOPAEDIA OF THE SOCIAL SCIENCES, now complete in fifteen volumes, for a liberal and intelligent treatment of controversial issues in which the contributions of the various social sciences are skilfully integrated.

JAMES T. FARRELL, for the completion with "Judgment Day" of his trilogy of the Chicago streets, one of the most significant and powerful works of the imagination in contemporary letters.

WALTER MILLIS, for his timely and penetrating analysis in "The Road to War" of the forces which drew us into the World War.

VINCENT SHEEAN, for writing in "Personal History" an autobiography which is at the same time a revealing report of the social and political upheavals of our time and a candid study of the growth of a man's mind and spirit under the impact of those events.

HELEN JEROME, for her stage adaptation of "Pride and Prejudice," and the producers and actors of that delightful exhibition.

MAXWELL ANDERSON, for "Winterset," an interesting attempt to treat a contemporary theme in terms of elevated tragedy, and JO MIELZINER, for his beautiful stage designs for the play.

CLIFFORD ODETS and the GROUP THEATER, for the production of Mr. Odets's two plays, "Waiting for Lefty" and "Awake and Sing."

CHARLES HAYDEN and the DIRECTORS OF THE AMERICAN MUSEUM OF NATURAL HISTORY, for the establishment of a Zeiss Planetarium in New York City—one of the most ingenious and effective instruments ever devised for the popular demonstration of a scientific subject.

How to Control the Sale of Arms

By H. C. ENGELBRECHT

THE determining question in munitions control is its purpose. Some have seen munitions control as the open sesame to peace—an obvious misconception. Others have apparently considered it a device for making wars 100 per cent pure by eliminating profiteering and the more obvious frauds. But these are not the primary considerations of governments when they set out to supervise the arms makers. As long as war is part of our political and economic scheme, official action will not be directed to weakening the munitions industries but rather to strengthening them. Munitions control boards will therefore probably concentrate on three objectives, namely: (1) to bring the arms industry into line with national policy, particularly in regard to embargoes, neutrality programs, and foreign relations in general; (2) to establish safety in transportation, especially in sea transportation; (3) to end the most obvious rackets in the industry.

Now, it may be contended that this program is not very far-reaching, which is true enough. None the less, it has useful possibilities if it is intelligently enforced. But there precisely is the rub. Control boards have shown a colossal ignorance of the business methods of the arms makers, and their attempts at supervision have been made at the point where they can be most readily evaded—at the customs. Every exporter knows that export rules are loosely drawn and that the highest fine for any violation is $50. Customs officials still operate under a law passed in 1799 which permits the filing of export declarations even after the cargo has been discharged at the point of destination. There is, moreover, no inspection of outgoing shipments, so that false declarations or evasions of customs control are relatively easy.

This system is virtually made to order for the munitions industry in its circumventing of customs. The methods employed are legion. A simple and common device is to ship munitions without listing them as such. Machinery of all sorts is generally shipped as "parts," and the assembling is done at the point of destination. Since most modern arms are nothing more than complicated machinery which can be taken apart and reassembled, the possible misleading descriptions are numberless. Moreover, many shippers of iron and steel goods list every shipment either as "forgings" or "castings," for purposes of packing and safety in transportation, and these names are handy screens for all kinds of munitions. Concretely, this means that unloaded bombs or grenades are shipped as "steel forgings," and automatic rifles and machine-guns may be listed as "machine parts." It is even possible to consider a complete machine-gun as a "component part" of a tank or an airplane, as General Ruggles suggested in the Hoover conference with the sporting-arms manufacturers. Curiously enough, official export figures in the Monthly Reports of the Department of Commerce list "firearms and ammunition" but no "parts," while under the item "aircraft" the notations of "engines" and "parts" are three and four times as large as those of assembled planes. Thus a goodly portion of exported munitions passes through the customs without being recognizable as such.

There are other useful tricks in this business which any resourceful exporter may employ. Some years ago, for instance, the du Pont Company sold to a Far Eastern firm some TNT which was apparently consigned to Japan. Eventually it reached China, even though an international embargo on arms was in force against that country. The du Ponts might have suspected the shipping orders given them, but they said they did not. At any rate, what happened was this: According to American regulations this cargo of TNT had to be marked either "explosives" or "dangerous," but the purchaser wanted no such notation on the shipment because, he said, anybody in the Far East would recognize that tag and the TNT might be confiscated en route. Accordingly a compromise was worked out by which the TNT was inclosed in a double container. The outer one carried the word "explosives" and thus conformed to the Department of Commerce rules; the inner one bore the notation "trinitrotoluene," which is, of course, the full name of TNT. Out at sea the outer container was removed, and the shipment then bore as label a mysterious six-syllable word which to most persons might mean anything from a drug to a radio part. The TNT arrived safely in China.

In another instance the Bolivian consul gave orders to an American company not to mark arms shipments to his country in any way that would reveal their nature. It was sufficient, he wrote, to give the address and to add "Handle with Care." These orders were obeyed, and there was no trouble at the customs.

These and other subterfuges may explain why the reports of the Department of Commerce on the export of munitions are so exasperatingly inadequate. It is impossible to get from them any idea of the extent or kind of the traffic in arms. The trouble is with the classifications. Certain primary war machines are listed, to be sure, under "firearms and ammunition." Iron and steel scrap, copper ingots, brass ingots, aircraft, and similar items are clearly set forth, and by comparison offer an approximate index to war materials. But the classifications also include such cryptic headings as "industrial chemicals," "explosives," "machinery," "iron and steel manufacture," and others which lead to nothing but guesses and arguments. Recent events have stirred great interest in the traffic in arms. Is it not time that our commerce reports included a classification called "war materials," with descriptive subdivisions, and that exporters were forced to declare the pertinent items? Sharp demarcation lines are of course impossible, but vast improvements can be made in reporting munitions exports.

Since the customs offer little hope of controlling the arms industry, a different method must be tried. The best suggestion so far made is to place government inspectors in the arms factories to supervise everything from the receipt of an order to the shipment and proper listing of the cargo. These inspectors would be faced with the peculiar organization of the American munitions industry. Mitsui in Japan and Vickers in England are able to furnish every type of war engine from complete battleships to bomb fuses. There are no such giant combines in the United States. The industry here is specialized, and one manufacturer builds submarines, for which he must purchase elsewhere the steel and the engines; another makes cartridges, for which he must buy brass and powder and steel-jacketed bullets; and a third turns out grenades and bombs, for which he obtains the bomb body, the fuse, the fins, the TNT, and the propellant charge from other firms. Many of these killing machines move through several plants before everything is assembled. They are then exported by the last factory to handle the materials or by a separate shipping company. Government inspectors would have to be on the alert to be sure that none of these half-finished arms "got lost" somewhere en route and thus evaded their control.

Another matter for them to watch would be the various methods of shipment and the tricks that can be played with them. Shippers designate the different ways of sending goods by the following abbreviations: f.o.b., f.a.s., and c.i.f. (freight on board, freight alongside steamer, and cost, insurance, freight). F.o.b. Detroit signifies that the point of delivery for which the company is responsible is the freight car in Detroit; f.a.s. assures the purchaser that the freight will be delivered alongside the steamer; c.i.f. guarantees delivery at the point of destination in a foreign country. There is also a designation, f.o.b. factory, under which the buyer must call for his goods at the factory. All this refers to charges for loading and shipping, which vary in each case.

But there are possibilities of evasion in these technicalities, as the Nye record indicates. Suppose there is an embargo on the export of arms but nothing is said about sales, as was the case in the Chaco war. The munitions maker thereupon sells his wares to the consul or some other agent of a foreign government, either f.o.b. factory or f.a.s. The arms company, then, is not exporting; it has made a sale and an internal delivery. The foreign agent now has the arms and the problem of exporting. With the loopholes available in customs he does not encounter great difficulties, particularly since the government's attention is fixed on the arms companies and not on some unknown exporter. This sounds like a bad case of quibbling, but it certainly leaves the arms maker in the clear. In a similar way the transshipment of arms is managed. The French weekly Vu recently commented on the present position of Antwerp as a point for the reshipment of munitions. Suppose a French arms maker wishes to ship to Italy. The simplest way is to route the consignment via Antwerp in Belgium. There is no reason why the French government should hold up any munitions destined for Belgium, and it does not. But when these shipments reach Antwerp, the Belgian government does not interfere with them because they are "in transit." How can such practices be stopped without inspectors at the point of production who will be able to discover the ultimate destination of every order?

A far more difficult problem for the control board would be presented by the international tie-ups in the arms industry—branch factories, trade agreements, patent pools, mutual agents, and stock ownership. As long as this internationalization is permitted, embargoes are easily evaded, new developments in arms readily reach even prospective enemies, and a nation's munitions are turned upon itself in times of war. What, for instance, does the British Vickers company care about a British embargo on the sale of arms to Italy when it has branch factories in Italy itself? Or why should du Pont worry about an American embargo in the Gran Chaco war when it could turn over its orders from the belligerents to its British ally, Imperial Chemical Industries, and collect commissions on them? These international tie-ups are certainly against sound national policy, but there are peculiar difficulties in dealing with them because the line of demarcation between war materials and non-war materials is blurred. Nitrogen, for example, has many industrial and agricultural uses; it is also essential for the manufacture of explosives. Is it possible to prohibit the widest possible international distribution of a new nitrogen-fixation process? Can a steel-hardening process be localized if it is used alike for armor plate and for locomotives? No doubt some international ties in the arms industry could readily be cut, particularly those pertaining to patent pools, stockholding, and branch factories in primary munitions, but in the borderline materials it is difficult to take effective action.

National policy would also demand that the control board be empowered to extend the list of materials to be embargoed during a war. There is such a thing as following precedent blindly. Just because the shipment of munitions was an important factor in involving us in the World War, it does not follow that an embargo on "implements of war" alone is the answer to a new war situation. Each situation must be considered realistically, and the control board's powers must be broad enough and flexible enough to lay an embargo on any items which will tend to prolong the war.

Next to making the arms industry conform to national policy, safety at sea concerns the control board. In theory the shipping rules for munitions are made by the Department of Commerce and are enforced by its inspectors. In actual practice the woefully inadequate number of government inspectors throws the burden of enforcement on the steamship companies, which issue booklets of special instructions on the shipment of dangerous cargoes and at times insist on more precautionary measures than the government requires. The Commerce Department's concern in the arms traffic is largely the danger of fire or explosions. Its rules provide that dangerous explosives must be plainly marked, that they must be loaded on freighters, and that the loading must take place at a special wharf. So far, so good.

But immediately certain historical occurrences come to mind. The Lusitania carried 4,200 cases of cartridges, and the Morro Castle on her last trip had a cargo of munitions which was listed as "sporting goods." During one year the latter ill-fated vessel transported 1,500,000 rounds of ammunition and 50,000 pounds of gunpowder to Cuba. A specially constructed magazine in the forward part of the ship housed the gunpowder. Neither the Lusitania nor the Morro Castle violated any law or the rules of the Steamboat Inspection Service. Ammunition may be carried on any passenger vessel, with or without a powder magazine. This may not be unsound policy as far as fire or explosion hazards are concerned, but the matter does not end there.

It is no doubt legal to ship airplanes and their parts, machine-guns, tanks, cannons, empty shell cases, and similar items on any passenger vessel, and these would certainly not constitute any fire or explosion danger. They might, however, endanger the lives of the passengers. The various Cuban factions, for instance, were ready to go to any length to block the arming of their opponents, and there are persistent rumors that the fire on the Morro Castle was directly connected with these group intrigues. In this particular instance the suspicions may be unfounded, but many a "patriot" in the Far East or in South America would stop at nothing to prevent the arming of the "enemy." In times of war, moreover, other considerations completely overshadow the fire hazard, as the Lusitania case demonstrated. Does not the safety of passengers at sea demand that the arms traffic be confined entirely to freighters?

The control board, finally, should turn its attention to the rackets in the arms industry. There is bribery, for example. The manager of a British arms company said: "We fully understand that arms deals are not usually done without some officials getting 'greased.'" The evidence is overwhelming that the Britisher knew what he was talking about. Why not stop this practice at the source? Let government inspectors regularly examine company books, and let them assess heavy penalties wherever bribery is discovered. A little publicity would do no harm either; the bribe takers would scurry for cover as rapidly as the bribers.

Then there is the matter of holding stock in munitions companies. A plan for arms control once proposed at Geneva included the following:

All companies manufacturing or selling munitions shall give full publicity to their . . . stock ownership.

They must not own even in part any newspaper or publish or attempt to publish any propaganda tending to create war scares or influence any government to purchase munitions.

This plan needs emendation to prohibit government officials, members of legislatures, newspaper owners and editors, and others in a position to influence government policy or public opinion from owning munitions stocks. In France and Belgium the tie-up between the munitions makers and the press is notorious, and in Britain the records of Somerset House reveal many leaders in state and church as munitions shareholders. Much sabotaging of disarmament conferences and fomenting of war scares might be checked by restricting the ownership of munitions stocks.

A service would also be done the country if the control board were given authority to examine the accounting of arms companies. Large government subsidies are annually paid to shipowners on the theory that merchant ships constitute part of our national defense. These subsidies are supposed to make up the losses incurred by the companies in operating their ships. But the figures on which losses are computed are all derived from the company, and they are said to include exorbitant salaries, payments to holding companies, fictitious cost items, and various other forms of padding. If government inspectors insisted on uniform bookkeeping which showed true cost items and payments to holding companies, perhaps the need for subsidies would disappear. Such matters have hitherto been left to special investigating committees, but a first-rate munitions control board could handle them more effectively.

It remains to be seen whether Congress will insist on a real control board with adequate authority, and whether the board will be willing and able to use its powers.

Anything Can Happen in Chicago

By EDWIN A. LAHEY

Chicago, December 18

WE of Chicago have a consciousness that gives us strength. We move with the knowledge that anything can happen here, and it lightens the burden of life. The latest example of this is the case of Robert M. Sweitzer, bellwether of the Cook County Democracy, who as an indicted and ousted public official went to trial early in October in the criminal court on the charge of withholding $414,129 of the funds of the county clerk's office, which he vacated in December, 1934, to become county treasurer. Sweitzer explained genially to the jury that he hoped some day to pay the money back, and walked out a free man, "on the road to vindication."

All this was done without apparent damage to the well-fortified local Democratic machine, and it left a cynical portion of the populace with two inferences: (a) that juries are not always very bright; and (b) that if the person involved is a good fellow, the kind people call by his first name, with a record as a vote-getter for the party, no holds are barred. The end is not yet. Sweitzer, a little giddy with his "partial vindication," as he called it, is reported to be toying with the ideas of running again for public office.

Among party heelers and the open-mouthed citizens who sit at their feet there is a residue of affection for Genial Bob. Twenty-four years of public life as a good guy and storyteller have built up something hard to tear down. Public officials instrumental in exposing Sweitzer have been hissed at political meetings. An air of hostility to the state pervaded the courtroom during Sweitzer's trial.

Politicians and other observers are agreed that Sweitzer would not have been forced to undergo a criminal trial except for his own loquacity. Dazed by an exposé in the Chicago Daily News he confessed all to a reporter friend and the managing editor of Hearst's Evening American, telling them of unfortunate investments in a process for manufacturing coal briquettes, of loaning public money to unnamed politicians, and of being a sucker generally with money that didn't belong to him. This story broke while Sweitzer was shadow-boxing with the board of county commissioners over his shortage, and even in Cook County there was nothing to do but demand prosecution.

Sweitzer's trouble began twenty-four years after he had been what he terms catapulted into politics. In 1910 he was an eminently successful salesman for a wholesale grocery house. He and Mark Sullivan, brother of the late Roger Sullivan, Democratic boss, had married sisters, and this tenuous connection with the Democracy brought the offer from Roger Sullivan to place his name on the ballot for county clerk. Sweitzer dropped his sample case and began his new career. He was elected clerk in 1910 and every four years thereafter, leading the Democratic ticket in every election he participated in, sweeping into office in years of Republican victories. Within a few years of his entry into the political arena he was the head man of the party, an inveterate joiner, the town's favorite toastmaster and after-dinner speaker, and the champion of amateur sport.

Twice Sweitzer tried to carry his party into the mayor's office, only to be defeated by Bill Thompson, in 1915 and 1919. These were his only defeats at the polls. A prominent Catholic, knighted by the Pope for his superlative work in organizing the charities of the church, Sweitzer in his campaigns for the mayoralty was the victim of religious whispering campaigns such as no organization except Thompson's could produce. As candidate for county clerk, however, he was never touched.

In 1934, after twenty-four years as county clerk, Sweitzer in his sixty-sixth year decided to become county treasurer, and won that office in the November elections with the same ease with which he had slid into the clerkship. When he moved across the county building into the treasury, where $250,000,000 annually must make its perilous passage through the fingers of politicians, the rafters began to creak. Sweitzer's successor in the county clerk's office was Michael J. Flynn, a hard-headed Irishman who wouldn't sign a receipt for the office and its funds until he had had an auditor check them. "Sure, Mike," said Sweitzer. "That's the correct thing. There's a few things to be fixed up, and as soon as your auditor looks over the office, I'll take care of them."

What happened in the ensuing weeks did not all go into the court record, but it is now old gossip in Chicago. Sweitzer is reported to have explained to the Nash-Kelly directing group of the County Democratic Committee that his accounts as clerk needed some squaring and that he needed some help. Nobody outside that choice group knows whether Sweitzer told a complete story of his shortage at that time, or how far the committee volunteered to go in helping him. At any rate, Sweitzer appeared shortly afterward at Flynn's office with $40,000 in cash that was missing from one of the accounts.

The auditors hired by Flynn were meanwhile burrowing through Sweitzer's records and finding surprising things. A tax-redemption fund was short more than $200,000. Interest earned on public money had disappeared; so-called "vest-pocket" funds, receipts for minor services of the office, were not to be found in anybody's vest. The auditors came through the maze of books with a shortage of $414,129, and frankly declared that further search would probably reveal other shortages. The audit was distressing to the Democratic leaders. Bob was a good fellow. Loyalty is a fine thing. But $414,129, small as it looks on paper in these days of astronomical finance, is a lot of money to have to raise for a shortage. When that fact had sunk into the minds of the Democratic leaders, Sweitzer was on his way out.

There was a decent secrecy to be maintained, however. It was late spring in 1935, and the Democratic Committee was engaged in dominating the selection of a coalition judicial ticket, allotting to the eager Republicans what concessions it chose. Public knowledge of a cesspool in an important Democratic office could probably have given the Republicans courage enough to run their own ticket.

The audit of Sweitzer's funds broke into print too late in May to interfere with the uncontested election of the coalition judicial slate in June. The county board was furnished with an opinion from the state's attorney, Thomas J. Courtney, that it would be within its right to remove Sweitzer from his office of county treasurer if he failed to make an accounting forthwith of his shortages as county clerk.

Sweitzer was summoned before the county board, in a room filled with his ardent admirers, and demand was made on him for payment. Addressing the board graciously, he pointed out that he had not had time to check Flynn's audit, and asked the board to stay its demand. He declared himself ready and willing to pay when he himself determined the amount of his shortage. At this time seven months had elapsed since he had left the clerk's office. The board gave him a week. Sweitzer made a second appearance before the board at the appointed time, and again told the members that he had not had time to determine the accuracy of the Flynn audit. Again he asked for and was granted a continuance on the board's demand for a showdown. He went his blithe way that afternoon to Terre Haute, Indiana, to attend the graduation of a daughter.

On the same afternoon the newspaper story of Sweitzer's own admission of defalcations, disastrous investments, and loans to politicians—whom he has not named to this day—appeared on the streets, and members of the county board, feeling that they had been made to look foolish, immediately rescinded the week's grace which they had that morning given him. He was summoned again to appear before the board as soon as he could return from Terre Haute. Sweitzer later declared sheepishly that he thought his intimate confessions would not be printed "until this thing blew over." He returned to town in a few days, and breezily announced to the county board that he was going to pay up immediately, that day, in fact. He had raised the money. But could the board have patience for a few hours? The money was in San Francisco banks, there was a difference in time, and it would be some hours before the transfer could be made. The board waited. The afternoon came and wore on, and old friends of Sweitzer's wanted to weep for him. Like a panicky child trying to stave off the hour of retribution, he made desperate passes, mysterious telephone calls. Late in the day the county board, finally convinced that he was faking, passed a resolution declaring the office of county treasurer vacant by reason of Sweitzer's shortage as clerk.

Sweitzer could not and would not believe that the ax had fallen. He retreated to the treasurer's office, posted an armed guard, and finally had to be ejected bodily by armed deputy sheriffs and policemen. He walked out in a daze, down a corridor lined with photographers, spectators, and scrubwomen. "We're with you, Bob," shouted a scrubwoman, tugging at his coat. Genial Bob smiled the weariest smile of his career.

Before the hullabaloo of the ouster was settled, Sweitzer was indicted by the Cook County grand jury under an old law making it a felony wilfully to withhold funds from a successor in office. No embezzlement charge was brought against him. The penalty on the withholding charge is one to ten years in the penitentiary.

The prospect of presiding over the trial of Bob Sweitzer was a nightmare to most members of the judiciary, and the case moved slowly on the court calendars. From July until October the indictment went from one court to another on all the dilatory pleas available. It was finally forced to trial in October before Judge John C. Lewe, a vigorous young newcomer on the bench. Sweitzer was represented by Benedict J. Short, a boyhood friend and schoolmate, and one of the smoothest and most ingratiating criminal lawyers in Chicago.

Short and his associate counsel, Harvey Levinson and Ode Rankin, did everything but play soft music on the violin for the jury. The adequacy of the state's audit was attacked; the indictment was a plot to wreck the integrity of the foremost political figure in the city; the defendant was being tried for the faults of a single-entry bookkeeping system. Sweitzer himself took the stand, told the Alger story of his life, of his willingness to make up any shortage if they would only give him a chance to find out what it was. (Eleven months had now passed since he left the clerk's office.) If an earnest presentation of the evidence and the sincere demands of the prosecutors, Marshall V. Kearney and Leslie Salter, that the jurors heed only facts had had any effect on the veniremen, the latter were completely melted when the defense rested.

The jury kept Sweitzer and his attorneys waiting only a few hours. The day after the verdict one of the jurors, an unemployed street-car conductor with a high admiration for Genial Bob and his works, explained: "We had trouble with one fellow for a while. He was holding out for conviction. The trouble with him was, we told him, that he had been listening too much to those state's attorneys."

Another juror, a young clerk in a downtown insurance office, paused in his work long enough to inquire timidly of a reporter who was probing the workings of the jury mind: "After all, Sweitzer said he'd pay the money back, didn't he? He's got it, hasn't he?"

He seemed a little abashed to learn that nobody credits Genial Bob with having a cent today, and the talk turned to the evidence, to the audit upon which the state based its case. "The state's audit?" said this peer of the defendant. "Was that audit the state's? Cripes, we thought it was a defense exhibit."

Arms Over Europe

III. Italy at War: First Impressions

By LOUIS FISCHER

Milan, December 5

THIS is November 30, 1935 A.D. and XIV E.F. Everything began with the march on Rome from Milan on October 28, 1922, and we are now therefore in the fourteenth year of the Era Fascista.

I came across the snowy Alps yesterday into mild-weathered Lombardy. Today I have walked the streets for hours. Every store displays a placard decorated with the national colors—green, white, red—which reads, "This Shop Sells Only Italian Products," or one of another type which admonishes citizens to purchase either Italian goods or exports of non-sanctionist countries. "Patriotic Italians Use Nothing but Italian Medicines," a pharmacy informs the passer-by. A cafe in the impressive, glass-covered bazaar and central promenade, Milan's "Gallery," warns drinkers to "Order Only Italian Wines and Liqueurs." The sign then quotes an appropriate passage from Mussolini. If sanctions continue to be applied rigorously, what is now presumably a voluntary act of patriotism will become a necessity. Meanwhile anti-sanctions propaganda serves to generate bitterness and hatred for foreign countries and to rally the population around the Fascist regime.

Books on East Africa, books on Abyssinia, books on Negro races abound in the bookstores. In every window, prominently placed, is a copy of Emilio Canevari's "British Conquests in Africa," for "by what right," runs the often-repeated Italian argument, "do the English object to our Ethiopian expedition when they have grabbed so much themselves?" By no right; but morality plays no important role in imperialist policy.

The plate-glass window of a stationery shop is covered with postcards and drawings. One painting for sale shows an Italian officer in tropical uniform. He faces a group of Ethiopian chiefs, some kneeling before him, others standing erect and giving the Roman salute. Under these is the inscription, in quotation marks, "The Enemy." Behind him, about to stab him in the back, is a hand with a long dagger marked "Sanctions." Under it is the inscription, in quotation marks, "Our Friends." I note in many places a picture postcard of a pith-helmeted Italian soldier against a background which is the map of Abyssinia. In his hand is a torch which, miraculously, burns green and white and red. On the colored flame is written the word Civiltà, civilization.

"Give Gold and Iron to the Fatherland." On one street I saw a motor lorry pull up to a coffee and tea shop. The crowd looked on while a Black Shirt carried out boxes of empty coffee cans and tumbled them into the truck. Inside was already a heap of scrap iron and tins. A magazine for sale in the kiosks publishes a cartoon picturing a ship laden with gold steaming away from a shore. This is the "Flight of Gold from France." Opposite it Italians are depicted removing their earrings, finger rings, gold watches, and the like, and throwing them into a melting-pot. This is the "Gift of Gold in Italy."

Mussolini photographs are seen everywhere—Mussolini scowling, frowning, pouting, smiling; Mussolini fencing, shooting, swimming, strutting, speaking, playing the fiddle; Mussolini on a cannon, on a tank, on a horse, on a balcony; Mussolini bald, in Roman headgear, in steel helmet, in Fascist cap; Mussolini, Mussolini. He has a sense of the theatrical; Italians like it. In his eyes shine a fierceness and an almost monomaniacal glare which are certainly real enough, yet they seem purposely intensified for effect. The heavy, protruding chin bespeaks force and will-power; the puckered lips tell of a desire to impress and startle.

Several times as I tramped through the poorer sections of Milan I found myself thinking about my early youth. Then it occurred to me that the smell here was the same as that which hovered over the Italian district in South

Philadelphia where I grew up. My Italian playmates, I recalled, were temperamental, boisterous, and daring. Our respective juvenile "gangs" used to hop moving coal trains and pelt one another with coal. But the Italian boys were not good fighters.

In these less prosperous parts of Milan I saw several old posters which announced that the government of the Milan province, "seconding the effort of the central authorities," offered 300 cash prizes of 500 lire each to mothers who would give birth to three live children between October 28, 1931, and October 28, 1936. Preference, the announcement said, would be given to poorer families. Nobody else, I am sure, would compete. Three children in five years! Then the Fascists contend that overpopulation makes Abyssinia a necessity for them. They themselves have deliberately aggravated the problem of excess population. Every day the dailies print official vital statistics to underline the interest which Fascism takes in them. During the last month, according to this evening's paper, there were 1,197 live births in Milan, 967 deaths, and 627 marriages. "The place occupied by woman under the Fascist regime," says an Italian propaganda journal, "is really that of mistress of the house." But she "reaches the phase of an almost religious and divine function when she . . . becomes a mother"—especially if she raises her boy to be a soldier.

This is Sunday, December 1, and I went to the gorgeous marble cathedral with its two thousand marble statues, some of them perched on thin lofty spires, its exquisite stained-glass windows, and its beautiful service and singing. Outside in the piazza a Black Shirt brass band played patriotic hymns. In the small crowd one or two persons applauded each number.

I strolled into a honey exhibit. A big wall was covered by a giant map of Abyssinia on transparent material. Behind it, filling the space from Addis Ababa to the borders of Sudan, was a steel-helmeted head of Mussolini which was lighted up intermittently. Nearby a mechanical bee dipped its proboscis regularly into a flower.

On the main thoroughfares and in side streets as well every available space on building walls is covered with posters. "Viva Il Duce," "Viva Adua Riconquistata," viva the Fascist revolution, viva the glorious and victorious troops in East Africa, viva the King, viva this, viva that. Ubiquitous, too, is a sepia poster of Mussolini's head in steel hat. I notice, however, that many of these posters have been mutilated. Fingers have lifted an edge and pulled off a strip of the paper. Some sharp instrument has scratched a hole in the middle. This interests me. I stroll through street after street. In the central avenues a large number of posters have been damaged. In less frequented streets some of the posters have been totally defaced. I studied the commercial-advertising signs. Most of them were intact; only a few had been tampered with. I took a trolley to the outskirts of town and walked back. If this poster-tearing phenomenon was to be given political significance I had to make sure of my observations. There is no doubt about it: with few exceptions these Fascists posters have felt the hand of a deliberate destroyer. On the periphery of Milan the number of posters was much smaller than in the hub of the city, but these too had lost some, occasionally all, of their surface.

Milan is the largest industrial city of northern Italy with a population of 900,000. It is likewise the mother of Fascism. The most important Fascist dailies still appear in Milan and not in Rome—Il Popolo d'Italia, founded by Benito and edited by his nephew Vito Mussolini, and Corriere della Sera, in which the famous Signor Gayda roasts the British every morning. The Fascists of Milan also have their poster language. They write and scribble in pencil or crayon on the torn placards. They write: "W Il Duce" (W stands for viva), "W Il Re," "M Eden" (M stands for morte, death), "M L'Inghilterra" ("Death to England"). I saw "Porco Eden" twice; "M Negus" twice—the Negus gets very little attention; one "To Hell with England." Several times I read "W Binda" on walls and posters. When I inquired I was told that Binda is a champion cyclist.

Posters are the forums of modern Rome, yet one never sees "W Lenin" as one did in 1919, or "W Staline," or "W Moscow." Where are the millions of Communists and revolutionists from whom Mussolini is alleged to have saved Italy? Many have been "liquidated," imprisoned, or exiled. Many have certainly been converted. Those who remain probably are afraid or are biding their time. No unorganized opposition sticks its neck out very far under a dictatorship. Sometimes an instinct guides political factions; it is obviously too early to write Communist slogans on Fascist propaganda.

The Fascists seek to derive every possible advantage from British hostility and from sanctions. Later, if economic difficulties intervene, not Fascism or the war will be to blame but England and Geneva. What the regime tells its citizens appears from a poster which is frequently encountered and nearly as frequently mutilated.

Milanese [it reads], the seventeenth anniversary of the World War finds proletarian and Fascist Italy aroused and rallied around its King and its Duce, invincible in the defense of its sacred right to live, invincible in its determination to triumph. Soldiers, Black Shirts, Milanese! After Italy lost 670,000 dead and 400,000 wounded in the World War—a million fallen in the cause of the Entente—Geneva moves the monstrous machine of sanctions to imperil the conquest, achieved through the valor and labor of Italy's sons, of that "Place in the Sun" which is indispensable to our existence and which was denied us by Versailles. Soldiers, Black Shirts, Milanese! Against the offensive on our lives and dignity let us strengthen our will and our tenacity in the cause of justice and civilization. Viva Italia, Viva Il Re, Viva Il Duce.

A platoon of sailors dragging some light cannon passed through the central Via Torino preceded by a Black Shirt who whistled in order to attract attention. One old man lifted his hand in the Caesarian greeting. The mass of pedestrians did not even stop to look. Generally speaking, one senses no tension in the air. There is no war atmosphere. At the frontier my luggage was not opened, and neither the border authorities nor the hotel management was very much interested in my passport. On the cathedral piazza a group of some twenty Fascists in varied picturesque uniforms and caps, with their short daggers hanging on their left thighs and Roman capes draped gracefully around their shoulders, stood for hours this morning—I saw them early in the day and saw the same ones again at the end of a long tour of town—doing nothing at all except attracting attention and entertaining one another. They laughed and smoked and slapped one another on the back, but only their military garb might have suggested that Italy was engaged in war—certainly not their demeanor. My impression is that the Fascists, perhaps even the mass of people, still regard the Abyssinian adventure as a big national picnic. They do not take it seriously. It is only beginning to pinch.

Today, December 2, I talked to a big textile manufacturer. He said most of the textile mills of Milan had cotton stocks which would last no longer than another month. They did not think they would get new supplies soon. All the foreign currency and gold the government had was being used to create vast reserves of oil. A felt-hat mill near Milan had raw material for another fortnight. Neither wool nor cotton was being imported in large quantities. I asked him about the Fascist corporations, the framework, in conception, of a new social order. "They are not real," he replied. "Mussolini uses them as a threat to keep us in line. State control is severe, but our capital is our own." He was, nevertheless, violently anti-Fascist. He resented the control. He predicted that sanctions would cause heavy unemployment in the near future.

The government is whipping up sentiment for a new 5 per cent war loan. One loan poster shows an Italian soldier wearing pith helmet and heavy hobnailed shoes and carrying a rifle slung over his shoulders. He is guiding a plow across an Abyssinian landscape. Another depicts a soldier with a number of spades. The purpose is to convince people that the expeditionary force in East Africa will not return. It will stay to till Ethiopian soil, and overcrowding in Italy will thereby be relieved. This remains to be seen. Large-scale white colonization in tropical Africa has no precedent. On a third loan poster stands an Italian officer and his young Ballila boy-scout son at the salute. "For your children's sake, subscribe!" is its appeal.

After working hours I went to a cinema. Cinemas are dark, and in them, therefore, people are free to express or not to express their feelings. The cashier dropped every coin on the glass top of her table and held every bill against a light. The performance started with a Luce newsreel. A ship packed with soldiers leaves a port for Eritrea. No applause from the cinema audience. Tanks run up a hill at Asmara while Italian soldiers look on. No applause. Marshal de Bono, now recalled, reviews a company of Italians near "Adua Riconquistata." One person clapped his hands together once. The sharp noise succeeded by sudden silence was worse than no applause. Soldiers sending part of their wages to their families. No applause.

I asked an Italian artisan why he did not go to Abyssinia. He said, "Let others fight." I put the same question to an employee of the hotel. He said, "Let those fight who have no jobs." He conceived of the war as a sort of public works. There seems to be little enthusiasm for the war. Sanctions and universal foreign opposition, however, have enabled the Fascists to arouse considerable nationalist fervor. It is obvious, nevertheless, that the first fortnight of sanctions plus the possibility of oil sanctions has made the regime nervous.

[The fourth article of Mr. Fischer's series on the European crisis will appear in the issue of January 14.]

I Am a Traitor

By WILLIAM T. LUCAS

OUR football team hasn't won a game this season, and I am the reason. I am a teacher in the local high school, and, unfortunately, most of the football players are compelled by circumstances to attend two of my classes—one in English and one in sociology. According to the rules of our State High School Football Association, each player must pass, each week, three of his prescribed studies in order to be eligible to participate in the game the following week. This season, so the story goes, from two to seven men on our team have been ruled ineligible every week. And I am the devil who has done it—simply because I refuse to do a little lying and cheating and stealing for the sake of the team.

Strange as it may seem, the new principal is squarely behind me in this. He is the man I am taking my orders from. The new principal has repeatedly expressed in faculty meetings his policy regarding athletics. It is this: "School work comes first; sports, second—or maybe third. Equal rights to all; special privileges to none. We want a team on the field we can be proud of, one that will truly represent the honor and purpose of our school. Any teacher who shows favoritism to a football player in the matter of grades will be dismissed from the faculty."

In my own experience such an attitude from a schoolman is something new. And this same new principal is still under thirty, was an athlete himself (and still is), has been a high-school coach, and is a most ardent follower of sports. Not a pupil in the school doubts this last statement; they all regard their principal as a fine fellow, 200 pounds of youth and fun and life, but a man who believes in work. If he expects to hold his job, though, he had better fire me. So "they" are saying.

I'm against athletics. I have it in for the players. A football man couldn't pass my work if he were to make a hundred. Purposely I ask the football players questions they can't answer. I expect football players to know when to use capital letters, periods, and apostrophes. I expect football players to be interested in the effects of illiteracy, the causes of crime, and the characteristics of mob psychology. In grading papers I am always hard on the athletes. If it were not so, the school would have a winning team. That is what "they" are saying on every hand.

The impression that I am the dictator behind the scenes got abroad in the following manner. At the beginning of the present session the principal, who was new to our local way of doing things, asked me to help him straighten out all the school records, and to determine just who was and who was not eligible for athletics, according to work passed and failed during the 1934-35 session. Having taught in the school for the past five years, I knew the system; and orders were orders. During the first week of school it was my unpleasant duty to pass on to the principal the information that a number of "brilliant, experienced football prospects" could not participate in athletics on our teams until they had passed off a semester's work. Any real he-man teacher with a grain of school spirit, pride, or loyalty would have kept his mouth shut, smoothed over the records, and given the boys a chance. If it had not been for me, old Tom, Dick, and Harry—all three—would be on the team right now. So “they” are saying.

Look at old Tom, for instance; 180-pound tackle. The minute I ruled him ineligible he went over to a neighboring school seven miles distant, matriculated, and made the football team in a walk. They didn’t ask old Tom any questions at that school. The principal of that school never wrote to our principal for old Tom’s credits; he didn’t want to know that old Tom had passed only three subjects in our school during the past three years. Recently we played old Tom’s team, and they ran all over us.

Haven’t we played ineligibles ourselves in times past? Of course. We have played men who did not know what it was ever to pass a subject. We have played men who were not even in school the week the game was played. We have played men who were drunk for two days before the game. We have played men who were being paid to play for us. We have played men who bet on themselves and on the team on which they were playing. We have played men who always stopped school as soon as the football season was over, and who did not return until the following year. We have done all this, and nobody thought any the less of us for it. We have had great teams in the past, and our “stars” have been sought after by the college teams, too.

I have been directly approached about my refusal to pass the football players. I have been told that I should make allowances for them. I should not ask them any questions, or I should ask them questions they could answer, or I should give them passing grades on the questions I do ask them. A football player is not supposed “to get an education” during the season. In colleges, if a professor won’t pass the football players, the players are warned not to take that professor’s subjects. It should be this way in high school, but of course it can’t be on account of the limited faculty. But I’m not cooperating.

“They” are saying all this, and still my principal is staying with me. They have been to see him about me, but they can’t budge him an inch. He always tells them: “We want a good football team, but we want good students first. If a boy wants to play football for our school, he must first prove himself worthy by working.”

I’m wondering where the new principal and I will be next year.

Correspondence

Did Bryan Put Us Into War?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I have read the article by Mr. Villard, Honor to William J. Bryan, in your issue of November 20, wherein he says he feels like getting up a mass-meeting in Carnegie Hall in New York, to do honor to Mr. Bryan because of his opposition to our entry into the World War.

I have no desire to detract anything from the Bryan record as portrayed by Mr. Villard. I was as much opposed to this nation going into the horrible mess as was Bryan or Mr. Villard. But before this mass-meeting is called I think it would be well to consider who was responsible for the Administration that got us into the war? Who was responsible for Woodrow Wilson and indirectly for Robert Lansing and Walter Hines Page, the war fans of the Wilson Administration? In 1912, I think it will be found upon investigation, William J. Bryan was a delegate from Nebraska to the National Democratic Convention at Baltimore, and was instructed for Champ Clark, as the choice of Nebraska Democrats for President. After the third ballot in that convention, as I now remember, Mr. Bryan, notwithstanding his instructions, deserted Clark, who had a majority vote in the convention, and supported Woodrow Wilson, giving as his reason that Clark was being supported by Tammany Hall.

Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes in his book “Genesis of the World War” has treated this subject with some speculation on what might have been if Mr. Bryan had observed his instructions and Champ Clark had been nominated and elected President in 1912. It is very likely that we should have avoided the unholy mess and all that followed. It has been said that Bryan did not want Wilson; that he had an inordinate ambition to get the nomination himself. That is the key to the whole situation. Mr. Bryan was indirectly responsible for the economic chaos we are now experiencing as a result of the war.

Plattsmouth, Neb., December 10

JOHN M. LEYDA

No Reward for Merit

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It was with great interest that I read your Reward-of-Merit Story in the October 30 issue. I note particularly that you enjoyed your role as benefactor and should like to do more of it. Permit me to relate the story of Morris Joseph Schiller, 1376 Belt Avenue, St. Louis, Missouri—a story remarkably similar to Mr. Lauste’s. Mr. Schiller came to this country in 1895 and worked as a tailor for years. In his spare time he tinkered with his machine. Eventually he developed a device for pinking and trimming in one operation. This he had patented in 1917—patent number 187,079. In 1921 and 1922 he improved upon his machine and was issued other patents.

Representatives of several sewing-machine companies called upon Schiller. An affidavit was made out and Schiller furnished these men with a sample of his newest machine. This they kept for two months and then returned, broken. Subsequently there appeared on the market four machines that embodied the fundamental principles of Schiller’s or were exact replicas. Since then practically every company that manufactures sewing machines has adopted Schiller’s revolutionary improvements. A golden harvest was reaped but not one dollar went to the inventor. An agent of one of these manufacturers once told Mr. Schiller that his organization was prepared to spend a million dollars to fight his claims.

Mr. Schiller is now sixty-one years old. Broken in health, he subsists on relief. This so far has been his reward for a contribution to industry that has enriched the well-to-do and lightened the load of the worker.

St. Louis, Mo., December 10

SAM STONE

Leo Gallagher

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

As a newspaperman—sympathetic to the defendants—who attended a number of sessions of the Sacramento criminal-syndicalism trial, I was interested in Carey McWilliams’s article on Leo Gallagher in your issue of October 15. The article was obviously occasioned by the dissatisfaction and indignation felt by many radicals and liberals in California over Mr. Gallagher’s conduct of that trial.

As an individual Mr. Gallagher does not need Mr. McWilliams's whitewash. No one in California questions his sincerity and integrity. His defects as a radical defense lawyer lie in an almost psychotic excess of these qualities. A lawyer who cannot keep his head in the courtroom is of no use to his clients, and anyone who has watched Mr. Gallagher shrieking at judge, jury, and prosecutors, challenging a 250-pound opponent to a fight, or exacerbating the nerves even of sympathetic spectators with querulous harangues will appreciate the reply made by Red-Baiter Hynes of Los Angeles to a reporter who commented on the prosecuting attorney's "dumbness." "He doesn't need to be bright. Gallagher will convict them for him."

In a recent labor trial in Eureka, California, three groups of defendants were represented by a local attorney, an attorney for the A. C. L. U., and Mr. Gallagher, respectively. The charges against all were identical. The first two groups were acquitted, by a jury composed largely of workmen. Gallagher's clients drew a hung jury.

A friend of Mr. Gallagher's once described him as "an early Christian martyr who would sizzle with pleasure." That sums it up. Some day even the I. L. D. may learn that there is a difference between a militant defense and a typical Gallagher defense. On that day more of its defendants in the West may be acquitted.

San Francisco, November 15

J. A. WASHBURN

Mr. Chamberlin and Mr. Broun

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I read with interest Heywood Broun's spirited if somewhat imaginative reconstruction of my dark revolutionary past and his criticism of my subsequent writings, in The Nation for October 16. There are one or two points of fact and opinion on which I feel impelled to take issue with my genial ex-boss.

I did not, as Broun suggests, "pick" the New York American as a place for my discussion of the double standard of morals which some American liberals and radicals practice in judging acts of governmental repression in the Soviet Union and in other countries. My article on this subject originally appeared in the Christian Science Monitor and was reprinted by some other newspapers.

And I felt a little regret, on Broun's account more than on my own, when I found him expressing the opinion that I recanted my original faith because I found the Union of Soviet Republics was not Utopia. Surely the tag which some left-wingers insist on pinning to any critic of the Soviet Union, "sour, embittered, disillusioned because he didn't find a Utopia there," is no more profound or original than its familiar right-wing opposing number: "If these alien agitators don't like America, why don't they go back where they came from?"

Looking over the article that aroused Broun's comment I don't find a passage that could be construed as reproaching the Soviet regime for not measuring up to the specifications of Utopia, whatever these may be. What I did point out, with more detailed concrete illustration than I can repeat here, is that in protecting its citizens against arbitrary state-inflicted incarceration, banishment, peonage, and execution the Soviet Union is not only left at the post by imperfect America, but, in more than one respect, is trailing its fellow-dictatorships in Germany and Italy. And I believe Broun will agree with me that neither Nazi Germany nor Fascist Italy could reasonably be mistaken for Utopia.

WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN

Tokyo, Japan, November 18

The Dear Old Chain Gangs

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Reading the very misleading article, Men in Chains, in The Nation for November 13, I am writing to say that I have lived more than five years in Georgia and have driven my own car all over the state and have often observed convicts employed on farms. I have never seen any indications that they were unhappy or dissatisfied. Quite the contrary. The convict labor of Georgia is happy and well cared for. I have never found such a democratic spirit in any state as here in Georgia, where we often stop to speak to the convicts, or they wave to us.

I saw a convict plowing a farm quite alone the other day, with no guards at all. I have often seen them working with farmers. They had no chains on, and with one or two exceptions I have never observed a chain on any of them.

I cannot believe that the conditions described by Myra Page are truthful, because the whole spirit of Georgia is entirely different.

I am a member of the Women's National Press Club of Washington, D. C., and was formerly on the staff of the Washington Post and the Washington Herald, and have contributed to many other newspapers and magazines. I am now director of journalism at Brenau College.

Gainesville, Ga., November 12

G. R. BRIGHAM

The League of Women Shoppers

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

We believe that many of your readers will be interested in the League of Women Shoppers and will see in it an avenue of practical expression of their social concern. The League of Women Shoppers was formed in June, 1935, to "find out and then act" in labor situations affecting them as shoppers. Their basis is to use their purchasing power, collectively, to improve the working conditions of those employed in manufacturing and selling goods they buy. They have already done this with effect in the Ansonia-shoestore, Janice, May-department-store, and other strikes. They have exposed the racket of Hyman Nemser, who, under the guise of a retail clerk's union to which no worker belonged, extorted money from the workers.

First they investigate the particular situation thoroughly; then, if the situation justifies it, they give their support in every way possible—by protest, meetings, speakers, picket lines, and so on.

The League's membership is a broad front of liberal, social-minded women who want to know what is going on and who want to do something about it. We invite the support of your readers.

New York, November 29

HELEN KAY, Secretary

Sorry

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Owing to a curious and regrettable lapse in collaborative checking we stated in our final article on the critics that the Yale Review and the Virginia Quarterly, like the other quarterlies listed, carry no advertising. They do.

MARY MCCARTHY and MARGARET MARSHALL
New York, December 12

Labor and Industry

The C. P. and the United Front

A DEBATE BETWEEN DAVID SCHEYER AND HEYWOOD BROWN

The Record Is Relevant

DEAR COMRADE HEYWOOD BROWN: Perhaps an introduction is in order. I am a member of the Labor Press Unit of the New York Newspaper Guild. As a guild member I have the greatest admiration for the militance, for the energy, for the patience you have shown in organizing and leading the guild in the past two years. But as a guild member I feel acutely unhappy about the political opinions you express and the political naivete you display from time to time—and especially this time about your article, We Want a United Front, in The Nation for December 11.

I think I can legitimately make this my business. After all, part of the prestige you have in the labor movement, part of the audience that reads and respects your opinions, comes because you are president of the guild. Even your unofficial opinions carry weight within the guild, and to a large extent create a certain impression about the guild outside. And Comrade Heywood, to be very frank about it, I think these opinions are lousy.

In writing about the Madison Square Garden debate between Earl Browder and Norman Thomas you accuse Thomas of contemplating far too much the water that has already flowed under the bridge—in short, you object to his bringing in the position of the Communist Party of two or three years or even one year ago. But you're a trade unionist now, Comrade Heywood; you've stopped being a rather romantic revolutionary, and you must realize that the Communist Party of a year ago has laid a pretty stiff curse on the party of today.

If Socialists and Communists achieve a united front, you admit that it will mean little until other "groups" come in. "Groups" is your own word, and I sincerely hope that you mean unions. For a united front that attracted to itself only such twilight fringes of the radical movement as intellectual organizations, lady pacifists, and Greenwich Village clubs would be far worse than useless.

The water Norman Thomas contemplated was not a river of yesteryear. It was a tide, a receding tide, be it hoped, but a tide of terrific resentment against the Communist Party and its policies. What were the accusations he made? First, he brought up the question of dual unionism, the old Communist policy of union-splitting, of building very revolutionary and very small "red unions"; second, the problem of "social fascism," which with its concomitant theoretical hodge-podge represented the standard approach of Communists toward all other working-class organizations. "Social fascism" in its fullest flower meant that the only thing a Communist could do in a union or a fraternal organization was to destroy it—for were not the social fascists fully as dangerous as their open brothers, the fascists?

It is significant that Earl Browder could make no answer to either of these charges beyond a couple of rather smart-alecky and entirely misleading remarks. I don't care and I don't suppose you care that he couldn't answer Norman Thomas. But the tragedy is that more important people than Thomas ask the same questions and that the Communist Party can give no answer. The rank-and-file Socialist asks: "A year ago you told me my leaders were fakers and a curse to the labor movement. Do you want a united front with fakers now, or were you wrong then?" And the Communist Party has no reply. The trade unionist says: "Two years ago you said the American Federation of Labor was an out-right fascist organization and that all really militant workers should leave it and join the Trade Union Unity League. Now you want a united front with this fascist organization and with the men whose names were synonyms for reaction—with Lewis, with Gorman, with Dubinsky, with Zimmerman and Hochman. What has happened? Is it possible you were wrong?" And the Communist Party has no answer.

Comrade Heywood, these are not dead embers. These are vital questions to the class-conscious progressive American workers who must be the spearhead of any united front. Because the Communist Party claims infallibility, because it cannot honestly admit that it has ever erred, these questions, this water under the bridge, form a river dividing the Communists from the workers. If the Communist Party could somewhere secure enough guts to publish a simple statement in the Daily Worker addressed to American labor, saying, "For several years we pursued a false policy in the trade-union field and in our general approach to working-class organizations, a policy we have now abandoned"—if such a statement were made, it would do more toward the achievement of a united front than a dozen hurrah meetings in Madison Square Garden.

I don't think you are contributing much to an improved understanding between Communists and Socialists, Comrade Heywood. You close your Nation article on an extremely ominous note, saying, "If Norman Thomas actually means to obstruct the united front, an appeal should be taken over his head to his followers." Let me cite a parallel you should remember. Several months ago you and other officers of the Newspaper Guild grew righteously indignant because the Washington Guild decided not to pay assessments and wrote to other guilds to do likewise, and, in general, began to function as a separate national office. How much more indignant would you and all guild members be if some outside organization—say, the Jewish Writers' Union—wrote to your members denouncing Heywood Brown as a fat, bureaucratic (or, in left circles, bureaucratic) slob and calling Carl Randau a labor faker and a fascist?

This, in essence, is the "united-front from below"—a tactic which the Communist Party is beginning slowly and hesitantly to abandon as it realizes that disrupting the discipline of an organization and discrediting its leadership is not the ideal method for achieving working-class unity. And you do no service to the Communist Party or to the workers when you rather blunderingly try to pump the breath of life back into this dying tactical mistake.

I hope this is a hard-boiled letter, Comrade Heywood. I wanted it to be because I'm pretty sore about you. You have prestige in the labor movement and among the intellectuals who can be valuable allies of the labor movement if they don't try to run the show to fit their own pretty mental pictures. You have prestige because of the important work you've done in fighting Negro discrimination and because you've laid the foundations for a really good union of newspapermen. Because you're not affiliated with any political party you can speak and be heard without raising the barrier of factional interest.

Why not use that position and prestige constructively? Don't fritter it away by indorsing every crack-brained united front or appeal for a united front just because you feel—and quite correctly—that labor unity in the face of fascism is of vital importance. Learn that unity and a strong, class labor movement are things to be achieved by hard work and good work in the organizations of labor, not in Madison Square Garden. And—if you get a chance, tell it to Earl Browder.

DAVID SCHEYER

We Still Want the United Front

TO much that David Scheyer says in his letter there is no answer except, "Your message received and contents noted." I find nothing in his bill of complaint to change my opinion that the way to get the united front is to abandon recrimination and proceed to move ahead as rapidly as possible. If this is naive I prefer to be naive and help in the fight against fascism rather than be cut down by storm troopers while coldly twiddling a pair of logical thumbs.

David Scheyer reminds me that I should cease being a romantic revolutionist and think of myself as a trade unionist. Obviously labor, and more particularly the industrial unions, would have to be the very backbone of any efficient people's party. But that is no reason at all why Socialists and Communists should not also enter in. Scheyer shouldn't really take this "romantic revolutionist" business so seriously. That's publishers' stuff and two years old at that.

My adversary should not treat me with such condescension as an economic illiterate, although I will plead guilty to being only a freshman. Honestly I don't need to be told that only a short time ago the Communists urged workers to leave the American Federation of Labor and join the T. U. U. L. I am aware that the Daily Worker attacked Lewis, Dubinsky, Gorman, Hochman, and other A. F. of L. leaders. Why shouldn't I be aware of it? At the same time the Worker was referring to me as Hey-Gin Broun. One of Jacob Burck's best cartoons showed me as a child in a perambulator being pushed up Park Avenue by Norman Thomas. My milk bottle was labeled "gin," which was where that strange myth started. Burck has since given me the original. I think it would be foolish, just the same, for me or anybody else to fight a united front because one group had once attacked me.

Naturally Scheyer may say that he was thinking of rather more important feelings than those of a newspaper columnist. It so happens that John L. Lewis was in New York last week to address a meeting of the American Newspaper Guild. After the meeting several guildsmen were talking to Lewis about the "red menace." He was asked whether there were not Communists in the United Mine Workers. He said that of course there were. Out of his long experience as a union leader he offered some advice to a fledgling labor group: "Never refuse to work with anybody who's willing to work with you." I might point out that both Brophy and Powers Hapgood, who were once bitter foes of John L. Lewis, are now organizers in the United Mine Workers.

And, of course, I haven't any intention of saying that Lewis was always right. I wouldn't even say that much for Broun. The Communists did say some very harsh things about him a couple of years ago, and some of them were true. And while I'm indulging in self-criticism I should like to put on the record the fact that I went to Norman Thomas to tell him that I was sorry for several things I had said about him in pieces here and there during the last year. Certainly I'm in no position to criticize people for being captious if I'm captious myself.

"Learn," says David Scheyer in closing, "that unity and a strong class labor movement are things to be achieved by hard work and good work in the organizations of labor, not in Madison Square Garden."

If Mr. Scheyer means what he seems to mean, it sounds very much like the old craft-union tendency toward inbreeding and sterility. Nobody is denying the necessity of hard work, but I deny that there is any virtue in suggesting that the labor movement must be kept small and exclusive. What's the matter with Madison Square Garden? I can think of only one fault. When the labor movement begins to grow along industrial lines and doubles itself and trebles itself, Madison Square Garden won't be nearly large enough for meetings.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's Moscow correspondent, is the author of "Soviet Journey."

H. C. ENGELBRECHT is the author of "One Hell of a Business" and coauthor with W. C. Hanighen of "Merchants of Death," both dealing with the munitions industry.

EDWIN A. LAHEY is a Chicago newspaperman.

WILLIAM T. LUCAS is the pseudonym of a teacher in a Southern high school.

DAVID SCHEYER is a New York labor journalist.

MARYA ZATURENSKA is the author of "Threshold and Hearth," a book of verse.

HUGH H. DARBY is a member of the Department of Biological Chemistry of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York. At one time he was director of the United States Department of Agriculture Station in Mexico City.

RUTH BENEDICT, of the Department of Anthropology of Columbia University, is the author of "Patterns of Culture."

H. B. PARKES, of the English Department of New York University, is the author of a biography of Jonathan Edwards.

MAXWELL GEISMAR is a member of the English Department of Sarah Lawrence College.

Facts for Consumers

THE new General Motors Acceptance Corporation's 6 per cent time-payment plan, now being ballyhooed in radio broadcasts, newspapers, magazines, and billboards, is a remarkable example of dignified flimflam. "Simple as A, B, C, . . . a straightforward business transaction whereby you pay 6 per cent and only 6 per cent" reads the advertisement. Then follows a matter-of-fact explanation of the simple, easy-to-understand plan for which you "A—take your unpaid balance, B—add cost of insurance, C—multiply by 6 per cent," the total being the whole financing cost. The G. M. A. C. adds: "Understand, this is not 6 per cent interest, but simply a convenient multiplier which anyone can use and understand." Obviously, the interest rate cannot both be, and not be, 6 per cent. As Tide, a magazine for advertisers, dryly observes, the rate "has not been brought down to anything like 6 per cent. It is, as a matter of fact, something like 12 per cent; it used to be around 15 per cent. . . . With the 6 per cent scheme G. M. A. C. achieved something specific to talk about that didn't give readers arithmetic headaches." The new twelve months' General Motors plan, like the old, charges interest for the entire period on the amount due at the closing of the contract. This amount is reduced by periodic payments, but for the purpose of reckoning interest charges, G. M. A. C. continues to use the balance originally owed. Even buyers who can do only simple arithmetic should be able to figure out that they are paying General Motors more than 6 per cent for the "privilege of budgeting the cost of your new car . . . to your income."

THE list of expensively advertised products against which the Federal Trade Commission has proceeded is again long. Particularly interesting is the stipulation requiring correction of the claims made for Cocomalt. Its manufacturer has agreed not to represent that Cocomalt contains all the elements necessary to the growth of children, will increase energy, vitality, and weight in all cases, and contains all the vitamins, mineral nutrients, and calories.

Stanco, Inc. (Standard Oil Company of New Jersey), has agreed to discontinue representations that Mistol Drops is an effective remedy for colds or sore throats, or that it will do more than relieve minor nasal irritations or congestions.

Solvex, one of the Dr. Scholl products, in accordance with the terms of a stipulation will no longer be advertised as a cure for athlete's foot or as an ointment that will restore inflamed or scaly skin to normal.

The London Toffee Company and the C. S. Allen Corporation, which formerly represented that their products were made in London, have been ordered to mark packages with a statement that the toffee is made in the United States.

THREE actions against manufacturers of aspirin indicate that the Federal Trade Commission is again attempting to eliminate claims of special efficacy for particular brands. In 1934 the Bayer Aspirin Company was ordered to discontinue advertisements implying or stating that the word "aspirin" is Bayer's trademark, and from asserting, without proper qualifications, that Bayer's Aspirin has "no harmful after-effects . . . does not depress the heart. . . ." Now a complaint has been issued against the Cal-Aspirin Corporation, alleging that Cal-Aspirin is not less toxic and not quicker acting than ordinary aspirin. By stipulation Best Products Corporation has agreed to cease advertising Best's Aspirin as "the aspirin your doctor prescribes." Master Drugs will discontinue assertions that Lord's Aspirin will "bring more efficient relief in ten minutes as compared with the half-hour to an hour's time required by ordinary aspirin." In accordance with the drug law all aspirin must conform to the United States Pharmacopoeia standard of quality. Since February 27, 1917, when the patent expired, aspirin has been a standardized drug. Many manufacturers have found, however, that the public's ignorance of this fact makes it well worth while to advertise special merit for their products.

THE Bureau of Investigation of the American Medical Association has been looking backward, and in a recent issue of the Journal reviews the record of five patent medicines whose highly successful commercial history has been unaffected by public exposés and actions by government authorities. First on the list is Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine, still a best-seller among cold preparations. Thirty years ago the A. M. A.'s analysis disclosed that the preparation contained the heart-depressing cold-tar drug, acetanilide, and also quinine sulphate and caffeine. There was no trace of bromine. In 1915 the A. M. A. reported a change of formula and the substitution of acetphenetidin, also a heart-depressing drug, for the acetanilide. The 1935 package now declares—as the law requires—that each tablet contains one grain of acetanilide. The exploiters of Grove's Bromo Quinine have thus returned to the drug used in their "cure" before the passage of the Food and Drug Act. Their advertising has likewise been unaffected by the stipulation entered into with the Federal Trade Commission in June of this year, which prohibits representations that the nostrum is a cold remedy.

The Journal of the American Medical Association also lists Murine, which before the passage of the Food and Drug Act was advertised as an "eye remedy" and afterward as "a reliable relief for sore eyes"; and Nurito, at present widely advertised for neuritis, rheumatism, neuralgia, and lumbago. In 1914 the Food and Drug Administration issued a notice of judgment against this product, charging misbranding. The formula then included phenolphthalein and amidopyrine (pyramidon). In 1927 the makers of Nurito declared that aspirin had been substituted for amidopyrine. Seven years later, however, the Federal Trade Commission ordered the Nurito Company to discontinue representations of the efficacy of the product, pointing out that Nurito was dangerous in some cases, and that certain of its ingredients were likely to produce toxic effects.

SEEMAN BROTHERS, distributors of White Rose Food Products, are considerably agitated because this column listed the seizure by the Food and Drug Administration of a shipment of White Rose Fancy Shrimp. Their explanation of the circumstances surrounding the seizure is informative. Seeman Brothers, Inc., is not a packer but attaches its White Rose label to products which it buys on its own specifications from packers, unnamed on the brand label. It appears that Seeman Brothers makes no inspection of products while they are being packed, and in the case of the shrimp it was only after the goods reached New York that they were examined and rejected. "At the same time," the company writes, "the Department of Agriculture made its inspection and condemned them." All shrimp now sold under the White Rose label, Seeman Brothers states, is packed in plants which subscribe to the new government-inspection service (see November 20 column).

RUTH BRINDZE

[In the issue of December 18 Miss Brindze described the Newark Museum's Consumer Exhibit and stated that it received almost no notice in local papers. We have since learned that the Newark Ledger for November 10 ran a column-long story on the exhibit.

Miss Brindze cannot answer questions regarding the merits of individual products.—EDITORS THE NATION]

Books, Music, Drama, Films

"Our Critics, Right or Wrong"

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FEW literary articles ever published in The Nation have aroused as much controversy as the series just completed by the Misses Marshall and McCarthy. Armed as they were with neither a rapier nor a bludgeon but with a shotgun instead, their fire was effective over a very wide area and, indeed, reached even the present writer, who, as one of the editors of The Nation, might have seemed to be protected by his position behind the lines. Many of his friends and colleagues have already replied, and he trusts them to look after themselves, but he does, nevertheless, feel moved to supply a few marginal notes inspired by the murderously intended copy as it passed his desk. These notes are not in the nature of either support or rebuttal. They are, ■ marginal notes should be, to the side.

Almost from the beginning it seemed to me that our authors tended to adopt too reverent an attitude toward critics—not, of course, toward the particular ones whom they happened to be discussing but toward that Idea of the Critic with which, by implication at least, their victims were being continuously compared. I take it as a general rule that the more familiar one is with history the less easily one is shocked, and if the collaborators had scrutinized the whole record of literary opinion with as jaundiced an eye as they turned upon contemporary reviewing, then their indignation would at least have lacked that stimulus of surprise without which the true reformer's indignation is not possible. As a matter of fact, the history of literary opinion, even in so far as it concerns itself only with the utterances of persons of mark, is enlivened by a continuous series of gaffes very nearly as ludicrous as any which our authors exhumed from the recent past; and if every man's claim to the possession of decent taste were disposed of as soon as it could be shown that he had exaggerated the merits of a contemporary, then there would hardly be found anyone living or dead who could hold up his head unless he had pushed caution to the point of speaking no good except of the established classics.

Everybody knows—indeed, most persons exaggerate—the number of occasions upon which the genius making his debut was snubbed by the critical bigwigs, but for obvious reasons it is not so often remembered that these same bigwigs were at the same time lavishing unmerited praise upon nobodies. The fame of Keats has, for instance, kept alive the fact that the reception of his first volume was brutal, and that Jeffrey, editor of the most authoritative critical journal of the time, was in part responsible; but the full significance of the occasion is not revealed unless one remembers that at the same time Jeffrey was pontifically examining the merits of now almost unread writers; declaring, for example, that the poetry of Bryan Procter ranked "very high in our estimation" because its character is "to soothe and melt and delight—to purge away the dregs of our earthly passions by the refining fires of imagination." A little later his contemporary Lockhart, another of the biggest of the bigwigs, was declaring that "Jane Eyre" was "worth fifty Trollopes and Martineaus rolled into one counterpane, with fifty Dick-enses and Bulwers to keep them company"; and Byron, who numbered Keats and Wordsworth among his contemporaries, called Samuel Rogers "the last Argonaut of classic English poetry and the Nestor of our inferior race of living poets."

If it be objected, rather irrelevantly, that Jeffrey is no longer regarded as a great critic, let us consider an opinion expressed by one who is still rather generally held to be the greatest critical writer produced in America: "In a vivid wit, in profundity and a Gothic massiveness of thought, in style, in calm certainty and definiteness of purpose, in industry, and, above all, in the power of controlling and regulating his illimitable faculties of mind, he is unequaled." The author of this effusion was Edgar Allan Poe. But who was the supreme genius with the "illimitable faculties of mind"? Aristotle or Sophocles? Shakespeare or Newton? No, it was none of these nor was it anyone like them. It was Bulwer Lytton. Poe, from whom a whole anthology of such weeds might be culled, also remarked of Elizabeth Barrett Browning: "That she has surpassed all her poetical contemporaries of either sex (with a single exception) is our deliberate opinion—not idly entertained, we think, nor forwarded on any visionary basis"; while, speaking of the same lady, Walter Savage Landor, now regarded as the type of austere classical taste, found "in many pages . . . the wild imagination of Shakespeare," and "had no idea that anyone in this age was capable of so much poetry." The fact that Leigh Hunt regarded her "Aurora Leigh" as "a mystic, wonderful, and immortal poem" may be somewhat discounted by the fact that Mrs. Browning said of Hunt's essays, "I hold them at once in delight and reverence"; but one might expand to fill a handsome set of volumes the collection here begun completely at random. The set would not, to be sure, absolutely excuse those of our contemporaries who rank Christopher Morley above Thomas Mann, but the mere marginal note does, I think, at least tend to allay the fear that literature cannot survive the peculiarly hideous handicaps under which it is assumed to be laboring at present.

More serious is the charge that the importance of advertising has tended to transform critical journals into book-sellers' organs, and that reviewers, following suit, have in many cases tended to write as more or less unconsciously venal editors wished them to write. In this charge there is, I think, more than a little truth, and there is also, I think further, good reason for airing the fact. My marginal note will therefore concern itself only with pointing out that Miss Marshall and Miss McCarthy seem to me to fear unduly the scope of the influence exercised by the blurbist disguised as reviewer, and to forget that only that part of the public for whom and to whom he is the natural spokesman takes his opinion rather than that of a more restrained commentator. Those among the book reporters and book chatterers who do actually operate on the lowest level doubtless do help to determine which trashy novel shall be the outstanding trashy novel of the season, but it is not because they exist and function that some trashy novel outsells the better ones. And if our authors implied (they now assure me they didn't!) that if all the reviewers had praised "The Magic Mountain" as highly as some of them praised "Anthony Adverse" the former would have outsold the latter, then they were, I think, again overestimating the critic, to whom they were attributing not only omniscience but omnipotence as well.

The best-seller is no new phenomenon. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" outsold the works of Melville and Hawthorne; Mrs. Henry Wood, author of "East Lynne," was the publishers' delight in Victorian England; and the only persons who are led to confuse the best-seller with the best are those to whom such confusion is natural. Behind the apparent concern that the confusion should exist at all there seems to me to lie in the minds of Miss Marshall and Miss McCarthy a half-defined hope that the best and the most popular might somehow coincide, and I am bound to say that such hope seems to me to be, from the very nature of things, unrealizable. It is generous and laudable to wish for all an equal opportunity to enjoy the highest and the finest, but it seems to me absurd to suppose that the highest reaches of the human mind as developed in any society might be accessible to the majority of the members of that society. My own tenderness toward the common man is, moreover, great enough to make me prefer to see him allowed to have what he most enjoys in literature, and I should look with distaste upon any effective effort to dragoon him—even by the comparatively mild method of inculcating an awe of critical authority—into reading "The Magic Mountain" when he preferred "Anthony Adverse."

"Really vital criticism will probably not come until genuinely critical and independent minds can somehow communicate unhampered with the vast body of the reading public"—so end the articles. But do Miss Marshall and Miss McCarthy really believe that the sinister interests of publishers and editors constitute the effective reason why the "vast body of the reading public" does not prefer the more austere critics? Is it not putting the cart before the horse to suggest that inferior books are popular because the most widely read critics praise them? Would it not be more penetrating to assume that certain critics are the most widely read because they praise the kind of books which become most popular? But by an odd coincidence what I am trying to say was much better said in the same issue of The Nation by one of the critics whom our authors singled out for praise. In two magisterial sentences Louis Kronenberger remarks: "It is very seldom, of course, that a critic who becomes widely influential with the general public is a good critic. He is usually its superior in articulateness, not acumen."

Poetic Poetry

The Seven Sins. By Audrey Wurdemann. Harper and Brothers. $2.

LAST year Miss Wurdemann published a book of short lyrics, "Bright Ambush," which showed such competence in assimilating the clichés and attitudes of current magazine verse that her future seemed to be assured. The Pulitzer award which crowned her work therefore did not come as a surprise. Here was one who could rewrite the best second-rate poets and make them sound more themselves than themselves. Her favorite source of inspiration was Elinor Wylie, and she managed to smooth down Mrs. Wylie's style till it was divested of even that slightly meretricious distinction that was hers. For Miss Wurdemann's verse springs from that bastardized form of the romantic tradition that is the fountain source of our popular magazine verse, a tradition that stems not from the best of Keats, Shelley, and Byron but from their diluted progeny, Leigh Hunt, Tom Moore, Barry Cornwall, Felicia Hemans, Letitia Landon, on to Gabriel Rossetti and Swinburne at their lushest, on to Tennyson at his sweetest. Nor is the influence of Felicia Hemans and Letitia Landon overestimated I think, for they brought feminine adaptability and softness—the brutal will just call it charm—into a movement that was once revolutionary. Their feminine charm soothed even the sharpest critics of their day into gallant if slightly embarrassed acquiescence. We need only remember that Shelley as a young man was rather taken with Felicia Hemans's verse, that Wordsworth, harsh to contemporaries, referred to her as "that gentle spirit, pure as an angel and good," that Letitia Landon sold almost as well as Byron, to realize how much encouragement these women popularizers of the romantic movement received, until their school reached its climax in Elizabeth Barrett Browning and our own Edna Millay.

"Bright Ambush," in the last analysis a lineal descendant of the works of these ladies, exhibited an appalling facility—shopworn subject matter handled in the most pleasant and shopworn manner. Possibly these qualities made its author ripe for the praise of Percy Hutchison and the magazines that support the aesthetic standards of the Poetry Society of America. "She seems one with the older poets," says Percy Hutchison. To the reviewer who assumes the thankless task of putting her work under exact analysis his meaning is more apparent than it is to Percy Hutchison himself. For Miss Wurdemann, in her latest book as well as in "Bright Ambush," is already fixed in her poetic attitudes; her platitudes are static in maturity; it is difficult to see how she can ever change. If one wishes to make allowances for Miss Wurdemann's youth one has only to open Ann Winslow's "Trial Balances" and examine the work of the young poets included there, many of them much younger than Miss Wurdemann. Here are intellectual eagerness, a willingness to grapple with the serious problems of the poetic art, a spiritual awareness. Even from those who are not experimenting with form, one gets an exhilarating impression of writers enriched and not enfeebled by the difficult task of working within the disciplined limitations of a tradition.

In the narrative sequence "The Seven Sins" Miss Wurdemann drops the delicate quivering before obvious prettiness that is so often mistaken for sensitiveness and tries to be big, powerful, grim, and philosophic. It is a difficult job, and Miss Wurdemann is completely unequipped for it. The Seven Sins are personified by seven brothers who upon the death of their father go out into the world "lusting to live alone." We are then told how the life of each of the brothers was made or marred by the possession of his particular one of the deadly sins; all this in the loosest of blank verse interspersed with lyric interludes. Miss Wurdemann's maturity in platitudinous statement is given full play, as is her gift for the obvious rhyme, the shopworn phrase. One has only to cite a few passages from "The Lease of Lust," the poem about Brother Stephen who personifies Lust or, as I should say, The Lustful Way of Life.

There is always a window,
A face looking out,
Laugh to her, sing to her
Turn you about.

There is always a window,
There's always a girl
Who will give a bright blessing
A kiss and a curl.

Or:

Stephen the lover, Stephen the leman
Left the boy he was on the farm for a blur
And any man with a thirst for women
Can find a woman thirstier.

Her talent for repeating platitudes with an air of wisdom can best be illustrated in this verse:

Oh, Stephen was a lover, a lover brave and bold
But the hotter burns the fire, the chillier is the cold.

If I seem unfair I can only refer the incredulous reader to the other poems in the book. He can find in any one of them passages to match these. The book ends on a dreamy, quivering note with a strong echo from Tennyson's "Merlin."

Before any breathing
Came to earth,
Before there was Merlin
To see the gleam,
There was sleep,
Sleep and dream.

Miss Wurdemann's moral is then summed up in an epilogue in which Priapus, Pan, and Prince Apollo are invoked in a curious mixture of Wylie and Swinburne.

The urge of each is the strength of man
Is a flying lash, and a flight to follow.

The book is also hampered by illustrations.

MARYA ZATURENSKA

Feeding Ourselves

Nations Can Live at Home. By O. W. Willcox. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

TWO modern trends are brought together in this book with such clarity and logical force as to command attention. First, the author evaluates autarchy—national self-sufficiency—in terms of population pressure per unit area, and determines the number of people that each unit of area can support with necessary food materials, under existing conditions. Secondly, he presents the new agricultural approach to crop production, to show that with improved methods much larger populations could be supported by a unit area of soil. As the pressure of population on the soil is the basic cause of the present Italian war with Ethiopia and the recent Japanese invasion of Manchoukuo, any method of relieving this pressure is of fundamental interest. The possibilities of scientifically controlled industrial agriculture are given an excellent exposition.

"In plain terms, a soil need not be made much richer to support 40,000 people per square mile under the new agrobiology than to support a population of 2,000 under the empiricism of the old, ineffective, but still largely prevailing agronomy." Wherein lies the difference between the old agriculture and the new? First, in the selection of plants of proved high productivity; second, in supplying raw materials—nitrates, phosphates, and the like, and water—at the time they are needed (this is so obvious that it is hard to realize that innumerable farms with adequate water supplies available still depend on variable rains); third, in the production by geneticists of plants especially adapted to special conditions. The plant geneticist should be to the farm what the designer of machinery is to the factory. Under these conditions crop yields can be multiplied, and a correspondingly greater population supported by a given unit area. Some of these factors are already at work. In Hawaii, while the acreage under cultivation in sugar cane increased only 5 per cent from 1923 to 1932, the tonnage of sugar produced increased by 93 per cent owing to a new variety of cane.

Based on the foregoing type of facts and the needs of a population, the author finds that many badly congested countries, including Great Britain, Italy, and Japan, have enough agricultural area and water within their own boundaries to supply their own people with food. He suggests that if Great Britain, instead of spending $300,000,000 a year on its fleet, used a quarter of that sum on fertilizing its arable soil and on obtaining superior types of plants which already exist, it would in a few years become self-supporting.

Several points in this book will be ardently denied by workers in the agricultural experiment stations. That will be due entirely to the fact that the mechanical concept of the plant either has not reached them or is distasteful to them. Although any schoolbook carries the dictum that the plant is a natural factory, deriving its energy from the sun and its raw materials for synthesis from the soil and air, few farmers and fewer agricultural experts regard the plant in that light.

When the day comes for a planned economy, this book and its predecessor, "Reshaping Agriculture," will serve as useful guides.

HUGH H. DARBY

Travelers in West Africa

Africa Dances. By Geoffrey Gorer. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

A YOUNG Englishman with a habit of wandering and a Negro dancer, a gifted young man of Senegal, met in Paris and planned, over their apéritifs, to see West Africa together. They got a car in Dakar and two Wolofs as interpreter and chauffeur, and started off inland on a great loop that took them as far east as Dahomey. They had set out to see West African dances, and they necessarily chose back roads and villages off the main highways.

Mr. Gorer has vividly set down the record of their journey. The region through which they traveled is bizarre and lends itself easily to a taste for diabolism; it is the country over which Seabrook has gloated. Mr. Gorer is no sensationalist, and he is an intelligent recounter. If we are sane, he says, the Negroes of West Africa are mad, and he liked them. Unfortunately dances, even the strange dances of the Ivory Coast, are hard to render in words and harder yet in snapshots. What could be recorded was his impression of the natives and of their plight under French and English rule. His book is therefore made up largely of such comment, and it sets a high level in travel books. The author would be the first to say that in his casual passage through their territory he had not plumbed the customs of the tribes or plucked out the heart of their mystery, but he was interested in the things that are really interesting, and he sets down what he saw and heard. Inaccuracies are inevitable, but there is no make-believe. His descriptions of dances are as good as such accounts can be; his account of the dance of throwing the children upon the lifted swords should be compared with Seabrook's account of the same dance. I think it comes off much better in Mr. Gorer's less sensational description.

When the author started out on his travels he had no interest in colonial administration and definitely meant to avoid the subject. Once in the heart of French West Africa and the Ivory Coast, however, he discovered that French misrule was not an academic subject but the daily tragedy of several million blacks. He quotes a statement in a conservative French paper that the population of French Equatorial Africa has been reduced 90 per cent in twenty years. This depopulation, which is obvious in French West Africa but for which no figures are available, is due not only to the prevalence of malnutrition and tuberculosis, and the spread of tropical scourges with which the inadequate medical services are not equipped to deal, but to the migration of thousands of villages into "England"—the Gold Coast, Togoland, and Dahomey—where military conscription, terrorism, and the head tax are not the order of the day. The death-rate of the conscripted Negro soldiers of French West Africa is officially stated to be 50 per cent. The plight of the Negroes under the French administration is a situation dark with tragedy, and one which follows with fatal inevitability from the French system. The highest administrators in these colonies receive a maximum salary of $1,000 a year, and the specific administrative measure to prevent them and their even more poorly paid subordinates from stripping the country for their profit is the decree that no administrator may stay more than two years in one colony. The results are obvious; the reign of terror is on. Mr. Gorer has written an account which may well be more convincing to many people than a learned compilation of administrative facts.

RUTH BENEDICT

The Oneida Community

A Yankee Saint: John Humphrey Noyes and the Oneida Community. By Robert Allerton Parker. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.75.

THE most important legacies of Christianity are its doctrine of divine immanence in nature—which implies that every part of human nature is potentially good, and which is symbolized in the myth of the resurrection of the body—and its faith in the progress of mankind toward a kingdom of freedom. These beliefs have usually been suppressed in the Christianity of the churches, but they become explicit in certain forms of mysticism—mysticism which, whether it calls itself Christian or anti-Christian, is still a product of the Christo-European tradition. John Humphrey Noyes is the one American who belongs in the same category as the great European heretics. Born into a New England community and never wholly freeing himself from Puritan modes of thought, he was endowed with an intellectual boldness and a capacity for growth which make him a more significant figure than Thoreau with his chilly self-sufficiency or Emerson with his Yankee caution. Noyes, like many of his New England contemporaries, believed that the millennium was approaching; to this extent he was still the victim of Puritan mythology. What set him apart was that, instead of waiting for supernatural intervention, he set himself to grasp the implications of such a doctrine. If the Kingdom of God was to be achieved on earth, then no part of human nature should be suppressed; he avoided both that subordination of the human reason to the dogmas of faith and that fear of sensuous pleasure which had characterized orthodox Christianity. And if human society was to become perfect, then it must be cleansed of that sense of private ownership which led inevitably to conflict and to the feeling of individual isolation. In the Oneida Community, which Noyes organized, sexual jealousy was avoided through the institution of group marriage, and personal acquisitiveness was replaced by communism. Unlike the founders of other American colonies, however, Noyes realized that human nature must be changed as well as human institutions. The members of the community were carefully indoctrinated and disciplined into the new way of life, partly by Noyes himself, whose emotional richness and breadth of experience made him well fitted for psychological guidance, and partly by the practice of mutual criticism. Ultimately the community was unable to withstand the pressure of the acquisitive society by which it was surrounded, and it relapsed into a commonplace joint-stock corporation; but it had been a successful embodiment of Noyes's doctrines for more than thirty years.

Noyes was at one and the same time a medieval heretic and a utopian socialist. The combination is not so strange as it might appear at first sight, since even Marxist socialism is, in part, an offshoot of the Christian tradition. The dialectic, to the extent that it is used to prove an absolute law of development, and the faith that this development will lead mankind into a kingdom of freedom were derived by Marx from Hegel, and by Hegel from the medieval mystics—from Eckhart and Nicolas of Cusa. But whereas Marx wholly freed himself from theological modes of thought and reinterpreted his mysticism in scientific terms, Noyes set medieval theology and modern socialism in a bewildering juxtaposition. While exploring the methods by which an ideal society might be created, he declared himself to be under the direct guidance of Christ; separating the amative from the propagative function, he rejected the use of contraceptives because he could not find that they had Biblical sanction; beginning with the hope that faith-healing would free mankind from death, he ended by experimenting with selective breeding in the belief that immortality belonged to the species, not the individual. The curious persistence with which he clung to the beliefs of his forefathers—a persistence due chiefly to the sectarian narrowness of the society into which he had been born—prevented Noyes from realizing the full potentialities of his nature. He was a human being of the same kind as Eckhart or Blake or Nietzsche, but not of the same rank; his writings, in spite of their flashes of insight and of the curious experiences which they record, have no literary value.

This is the first complete biography of Noyes which has been published; the two admirable volumes of Mr. George Wallingford Noyes deal only with his early years and do not cover the Oneida experiment. Mr. Parker has a considerable knowledge of religious psychology, he is sympathetic, and he writes well. He is not always wholly accurate—he has not, for example, understood Noyes's peculiar opinions about the millennium; but he is a reliable guide to the facts of Noyes's career and to the organization of Oneida. Nevertheless, a reading of his biography leaves one with a feeling that he has made use of the wrong instruments. Noyes was a man who lived with the most extraordinary intensity; he had, moreover, those messianic illusions which so often characterize those who are conscious of genius and who feel themselves to be ahead of their own time. To give a lifelike portrait of such a man urbanity and sophistication are not enough; it is necessary either to be a disciple or to possess something of the same temperament. This book is a useful and interesting study of a sociological experiment; it is not, however, quite the biography which Noyes himself deserves.

H. B. PARKES

That Rebus

Three Flights Up. By Helen Woodward. Dodd, Mead and Company. $3.

ABOUT ten years ago Helen Woodward published a chatty, unpretentious, and perplexing autobiography. "Through Many Windows" was valuable as a modern success story, a manual of business efficiency, and a penetrating disclosure (before such disclosures were fashionable) of the follies of advertising. But it was chiefly valuable for its portrait of that rebus, Helen Woodward. Here was an avowed radical and a hard-boiled capitalist. Here was the ideal illustration of American individualism—but the illustration insisted on openly condemning individualism. Here was a person who blended the most visionary ideals of social justice with the most cynical trade ethics. Here was a Jew who loved her race and preferred Gentiles. Here was a confessed neurotic who functioned beautifully, a wise critic of humanity and a vendor of trite wisdom, a militant suffragette who despised women.

We read Helen Woodward's second autobiography with these puzzles in our mind. What do we find? A narrative of a seemingly desperate childhood based on insecurity and poverty. A father who is an idealistic intellectual, warped by fate into a thwarted cigar-maker, left with two passions—socialism and horse racing; a father who walks ten miles daily to save sixty cents a week. His wife, an austere, inhibited, realistic peasant, with perspiration her only cosmetic, with no sympathy for socialism nonsense. "You have a home and children, haven't you?" she asks the father. A barren, dark, and ugly railroad flat that was always tense with the conflict between these two ruling personalities. A home life established on the volcano of poverty: strikes, the father losing his job, another job in another city, another utopian vision of better times, another failure. The girl Helen growing up in the midst of this, an insignificant, clumsy little girl who wore glasses to conceal her eyes, who was terrified of broken dolls, who dreamed that the smoking elevated engine was pursuing her, who owned one book—"Stanley in Africa." And we discover finally that this childhood "is always spring" to Helen Woodward, that these years are "bathed in glittering sunshine."

There is much more detail, too much detail without focus: the customs of the immigrant Jews, the habits and thoughts of the respectable poor, the description of cigar-manufacturing, the street scenes of East Side New York in 1880, the treatment of children, the pathetically jolly German Socialist picnics. Some of this is effective, some of it is blurred by lack of structure, by a style that is close to being awkward, by—at times—a curious emotional insensitivity.

We end the book, alas, more puzzled than ever. We know only one thing: this autobiography will annoy and disturb all those groups of people who are busy explaining the world in terms of one idea or another. Helen Woodward won't fit into anybody's pattern. The Marxist will contend she is the official Pollyanna of the proletariat. The psychologists will puzzle over the childhood fears and inferiority pattern of this well-adjusted mechanism. The prophets of impending doom will rage at her cognizant optimism. The modern realists will agree with the skeptical irony of Mrs. Woodward's flapper friend: "You have one of those big, soft hearts!" The critics will be perplexed at a disappointing book that is not really so disappointing. But Helen Woodward will go on demonstrating that human nature, like truth, is complex, perverse, and, save for its own point, pointless.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

Galsworthy

Forsytes, Pendyces, and Others. By John Galsworthy. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THIS posthumous collection includes critical notes, plays finished and unfinished, several short stories, and the discarded opening chapters of a novel; for all its fragmentary air it is comprehensive enough to give the reader a good working idea of John Galsworthy. During his life he was vastly overrated. A great deal of the time he was so hopelessly bad that it is a mystery how he ever got into print, much less became the prominent literary figure that he was. He had very little force. He was essentially British, in the sense that makes one wonder how the British manage to produce literary geniuses; he represented the practical, complacent, judicial side of the national picture—the side that shows itself to best advantage at the Ministry, in Parliamentary debates, or beside a whiskey and soda at a gentleman's club. Throughout his career, at no matter what period of his "development"—if so ambitious a term may be applied to what was merely a succession of repeated marches over the same ground—he was capable of turning out shoddy pieces of criticism like his tributes to Shakespeare and Anatole France, or stories like "The Black Coat" or "A Patriot"—which would disgrace the copybook of a schoolboy. Tolerance is the virtue for which he was chiefly noted; but it was the kind of tolerance that sprang not so much from urbanity or noblesse oblige as from intellectual flabbiness combined with a grave lack of moral fervor. His values, spiritual as well as artistic, were dim; his idealism was so vague and confused that it was often forced for its final solution to rely upon all the vulgar tags and slogans which it had shown itself anxious to avoid.

And yet he had something. Imagination may be too strong a word for it; but it is not too much to say that he drew to a degree upon the imaginative faculty. He never created one complete character, but on occasion he could recognize character. There were times when he came perilously near to casting aside his prudent, easy sentiments and speaking the truth—as a lesser Conrad or a lesser Henry James might have spoken it. Somewhere beneath all the platitudes, fake heroics, and commonplaces of style there was, if one may use the expression, an excellent second-rate novelist. What happened to him—whether he perished for want of air in Edwardian drawing-rooms, or whether he needed for his development an amount of struggle and opposition that never fell to his lot—is material for a fascinating novel, a far more fascinating novel than Galsworthy himself ever produced.

HELEN NEVILLE

Diaghileff

Diaghileff. His Artistic and Private Life. By Arnold Haskell. In Collaboration with Walter Nouvel. Simon and Schuster. $3.75.

THE Diaghileff here portrayed is in sharp contrast to the sinister figure that made the sensation of Romola Nijinsky's life of her husband. Necessarily he was there seen from one angle only, his relation to Nijinsky, but this is the study of a whole personality and a career that had an important creative relation to the whole art life of a generation. The Nijinsky incident thus is seen in an entirely different perspective. There is nothing sensational about this sober presentation, which seeks to interpret all available facts, which neither glosses nor romanticizes its subject's character.

In the background and activities of Diaghileff's youth, now for the first time made public, the author finds the key to the consistency of Diaghileff's career. A remarkable figure emerges, a great impresario, but much more than that, a creative genius whose ideas swept the Western world, who thoroughly understood and gave direction to the synthesis of painting, music, and dance that produced a new art of the ballet, though he himself never painted, composed, played, or danced. He appears as a sort of human life-force working through others, a catalytic agent for talent. Diaghileff's work falls broadly into three periods: the study of the past, a fundamental aspect not generally recognized, the search for a new aesthetic, and the reconciliation of classicism and modernity—one may say also the fusion of Russian and European currents.

The difficulties of collecting this material were great, involving endless trips, visits, conversations, and much sifting of contradictions, inevitable where there are few records and much personal feeling. Diaghileff hated publicity and left few letters. Some information was withheld, some recollections clashed, other memoirs of Diaghileff are in progress. So much the better, for he was closely associated with many of the most interesting artists of his day.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

Music

A Bright Evening, with Musicians

CONCERNING a recent concert at Town Hall under the auspices of the New Music Society—with a symposium by four speakers on "Music in the Crisis." Much more was said during this exceptionally stimulating evening than I could detail, but I should treat at least some salient features.

Aaron Copland began by pleading the cause of the contemporary composer. He complained that since only about one-eighth of our programs is devoted to new work, concerts are little more than museums. He offered a variant of the Zeitgeist doctrine, holding that if audiences are to feel a closer relationship to the music they hear, there must be an element in the composer's work "that is somehow an expression of the times." He did not discuss the ways in which a work is or is not contemporary. If we take a long view of history, for instance, considering cultural trends in terms of millennia rather than decades, we may treat Palestrina as a contemporary of the present, since he belongs to the same continuity as we. And in a short view of history a work written in the twenties has ceased to be contemporary in the thirties.

If art is treated as a commodity—and it now is, though the producers of serious art frequently get less pay for their services than even the pickers of cotton—Copland's complaint is justified. He may rightly ask for more than one-eighth representation of new work on our programs, though this proportion of new to old would be generous from the purely mathematical standpoint. Perhaps the problem will not be solved until art ceases to be considered as a commodity at all. An artist would then be paid for some material services, such as running an elevator or repairing tractors, and his music would be offered to society without charge, quite as a man does not expect to be paid for loving his children. Copland also noted how composers, through being divorced from audiences, tended to develop along tangents of their own. With no one to address, they gratified their sense of communication by tinkering with the medium of communication itself—as one on a desert island might make up a new Esperanto. Accordingly they became too recondite for the layman. He noted the present desire of the composer to simplify this language in the interests of livelier response from the layman, but he admitted the risks of oversimplification.

Copland was here formulating the problem of the expert. Specialization, extreme differentiation of function, is an integral feature of industrialism. An expert in dentistry can far outstrip his patient in the development of his craft and still "communicate"—the communication residing in the removal of the pain and the soundness of the filling. But the aesthetic specialist faces an anomaly. He works in the medium of communication itself; yet by developing it as a specialist—thus doing his utmost as a workman—he threatens to make communication impossible. I doubt whether there will ever be a final answer to this dilemma. It is an irreconcilable dualism inherent in our complex social structure.

After Copland's talk Mordecai Bauman sang two songs by Charles Ives. They were offered as evidence of the ills caused by aloofness from the public. Ives, who anticipated much of Stravinsky and Schönberg, worked in isolation. At times, we were told, he got so far from the tests of production that his lines are practically unsingable. The second song in particular, "Charlie Rutledge," was received with fervor. Though he had developed his resources without reference to a public, he was now found to have a rousing public. In this instance the specialist had been vindicated. The work's somewhat playful exaggeration—in the big, bold, Wild West, tall-story manner—offered good opportunities for acting on the part of the singer; and Bauman rendered it briskly.

Then came something that made the audience a bit sad. Oscar Thompson spoke earnestly in behalf of the critic as impartial, aloof, and Olympian. The critic must not represent "some group, some clique, some movement." Unfortunately the speaker gave no specific tests of this method. There followed five short piano pieces by Schönberg, received respectfully but without fire. (Musicians' music—the "problem of the expert.")

Next a meaty essay by Eisler on Music's Purpose in Society. "The crisis in music being part of a general crisis, music itself must help in removing the crisis." Eisler is our best example of simplification in the interests of propaganda. He takes the limitations of the human voice as his starting-point—thereby getting a practical norm wholly denied those of instrumentalist emphasis, who, like our modern architects, would base their forms on the almost chaotically limitless resources of new materials. He gave many specific recipes for avoiding the music temple of nineteenth-century "appreciation," and for making music serve political gatherings precisely as, in an earlier age, it had served religious gatherings. Some would call "let us be on the side of the angels" poetry and "let us be on the side of the party" prose; in so far as you agree, you will tend to resist Eisler.

Cowell closed the evening with a discussion of The Present Trend, followed by a March written by himself. It was made by maintaining a somewhat pleasant melody against thunder in the bass. For a time the thunder grew alarmingly and threatened to predominate. But there was a fairly happy ending as the pleasant melody, though not completely victorious, regained the ascendancy. Received with acclaim, the piece led to a brief "satire on advertising." The subject offered a pretext for Cowell to let loose his "tone clusters" in an elbowing of scrambled recommendations.

Perhaps, all told, nothing was permanently "solved." But for one evening, at least, much of the composer's plight was solved. Astute people who stayed away weren't so astute either. I have been to no other concert of new music that elicited so much zeal from the audience.

KENNETH BURKE

Drama

On Good Intentions

JUST after I had written the review of "Paradise Lost" which appeared in this column last week, I received my copy of a letter broadcast to the critics by the Group Theater. Inasmuch as I have usually given very warm support to the plays produced by this organization I think I may comment with friendly frankness upon the second paragraph of this letter. It reads as follows:

It is really astonishing to find plays that the reviewers obviously do not think about twice complimented as being a swell evening's entertainment, while they write reviews of a play by an author they unmistakably admire which give the impression that because the play is not quite immortal it is inferior to the run of here-today-gone-tomorrow amusements. We believe it would show far more regard for the theater and for its best public to hold one's reservations of such a play as "Paradise Lost" for studied critical essays in the future and to say right away that it is one of the truly important contributions to our theater—one of the plays that place the theater in the realm of deeply enjoyable art. We believe that when an author of Clifford Odets's caliber writes so rich and varied a play as "Paradise Lost," the least that one might expect is a clear-cut statement to the effect that every sensitive theatergoer must by all means see it.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Seldom, it seems to me, have I observed a blither leap from a false premise, through a spectacular non sequitur, to a conclusion which begs the question. Of course we critics apply different standards to the judgment of different plays. Of course we call a good farce good without meaning to imply that it deserves the same sort of praise as a tragedy equally good in its own more exalted way; and no one would have been angrier than Mr. Odets or the Group if "Paradise Lost" had been described as a skilful tour de force which, of course, no one would take seriously. But that is not all. A pretty good tragedy is not better than a very good farce. A pretty good tragedy is, like a pretty good egg, terrible; and to prefer a pretentious play which doesn't come off to an unpretentious one which does is not to demonstrate refinement of feeling and an exalted mind; it is merely to reveal oneself as a highbrow, a prig, and a "serious thinker." Moralists may continue to dispute just how much good intentions should count for in the realm of action. Perhaps the road to heaven is paved with them. But in the realm of art they count for nothing, and to say that an artist "means well" is not to say anything at all in his favor. As an old theatrical locution has it, "He's good to his mother but he's a bum actor."

As a matter of fact, and cruel as it may seem, good intentions in a bad play are not an extenuation but an aggravation. The artist as artist cannot expect to rely on a heaven in which the broken arch may be completed, and an essential part of the skill which constitutes him artist is the skill which enables him to take care that his reach shall not "exceed his grasp." Mr. Odets is a very "promising" playwright, and perhaps even more than that. But there is in this very fact every reason for judging him by standards complimentary in their severity and every reason against refusing to say that a play vastly inferior to "Awake and Sing" is precisely that. But let me not be misunderstood. "Paradise Lost" is not simply a play not quite worthy of its author. There was a simple reason why I did not "say right away that it is one of the truly important contributions to our theater." The reason is that I did not find it such. "A clear-cut statement to the effect that every sensitive theatergoer must by all means see it" may be "the least that one might expect" if one happens to be offering the play; but all my respect for the contributions which the Group has made in the past and will probably make in the future does not persuade me that I ought to make "a clear-cut statement" which I do not believe.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films

Groucho & Co.

IT is absurd to be serious about the Marx Brothers, as I intend to be. But it would be more absurd to try being funny about them. At their best they are absolute, and this means that "A Night at the Opera" (Capitol) is funny beyond the power of words to be funny. I think I have never seen an audience laugh so long and so hard. But it was not at words—not even at the words which George Kaufman and Morrie Ryskind had written for Groucho and Chico to say, and I do not forget that some of their puns were the best in years. It was at the three mad brothers themselves, Groucho and Chico and Harpo; at them and at the curious, cockeyed power with which they suddenly endowed all life. An energy was there at which one could do nothing but laugh. One could, I suppose, be terrified or bewildered; but that would be because one did not understand.

Understand what? It is absurd to say, since it cannot be said and since anyone not utterly dead knows what it is. Yet if a theory must be had, here one is. The genius of the Marx Brothers is for parody. They never are themselves. They exist too abundantly to be content with being that—they must go on, by the rapidest of transitions, to being something else. Groucho, in my opinion the bright star among the three, is never anything but the thing he is at the moment pretending to be. Resting one foot on a prostrate tenor, and noting that Chico at his side does likewise, he becomes a barfly and calls for two beers. He does not say: "Ha ha! we look like two fellows in a saloon. Let's talk like that." All at once he is talking like that—and in another moment is talking otherwise. For now as he draws a piece of paper out of his pocket he becomes an insurance agent; or as he rides up to the Opera House in an open coach he becomes an elegant and listless gentleman; or as he is wheeled on his great trunk along the passageways of an ocean liner he becomes a traveler through many countries—the staterooms the countries, and their doors his open ports. Set down at his door he instantly becomes what the first person who approaches him suggests to him that he be. He is the wrong thing to all men; and paradoxically enough, by being always this he keeps himself clear in our minds. We know who he is even if we do not know what he is or how to describe him. Like Falstaff he is master of many styles and slave to none. Falstaff is in turn a great lord, a busy general, a confessed coward, an old saint worn down by sighing, a friend abused, a forward liar, a wheedling penitent, a confident rake; nor does such a list exhaust him. He is everything except himself, and at the same time he is the most rigorously defined character in all drama. He is defined by that excess of life in him which makes him delight so endlessly in being others.

Groucho is something like that, and so is Harpo—who knows only the styles of pantomime, since he is mute, but who for an instance provides the great moment of the picture when he becomes an acrobat. The mere sight of the scenery ropes at the Metropolitan is enough; he starts swinging on them in vast curves which keep perfect time with the music of "Il Trovatore" as it rises from the orchestra pit and which keep time also with the ascent and descent of drops behind the tenor as he sings. This last is fitting, for Harpo and his brothers hate the tenor and wish to confound him. He is confounded; another tenor takes his tune; the love story comes out right; and so in one fine lyrical instant, one moment of pure motion toward which all the action of the piece has tended, Harpo swings and swings. Nor is there anything strange about the fact that he does. It is simply his last and best parody—the bit of pretending which absorbs all others, brings the work of art naturally and logically to its climax, and bestows upon it the seal of unity. The unity of "A Night at the Opera" is something which even these madmen have not achieved before. It is exciting and perfect; a sign that they have at last learned how to use every resource which Hollywood can offer them; and the simplest reason I can find for calling them funny beyond the power of words to spoil the fun.

MARK VAN DOREN

Erratum

In the issue of December 4 the price of "The Double Agent" by R. P. Blackmur was listed at $2. The correct price is $3.

SUN
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 8, 1936

No. 3679

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	29
EDITORIALS:
Strengthening the Neutrality Act	32
American Students Unite	33
The South Is Sick	33
Dangerous Reading	34
ISSUES AND MEN. THE LINDBERGH'S LEAVE. By Oswald Garrison Villard	35
CARTOON. By Fritz	36
HOW STRONG IS THE TOWNSEND PLAN? By Paul W. Ward	37
PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES. I. ALF LONDON IS NOT CAL COOLIDGE. By Raymond Gram Swing	39
THE GERMAN UNDERGROUND WAR. I. ANTI-NAZI FEELING RISES. By Josephine Herbst	41
THE ARCHITECT AND THE WORLD. By Albert Mayer	43
CORRESPONDENCE	45
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Walter Winchell's Tooth. By Heywood Brown	47
Company Unions on the Railroads. By Budd L. McKillips	48
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
The Fair Field. By Mark Van Doren	51
The Reality of Symbols. By Walton H. Hamilton	51
The Ambiguity of Feuchtwanger. By Lionel Trilling	52
Affirmation. By Philip Blair Rice	53
As Japan Sees It. By Bunji Omura	54
Dewdrops and Dynamite. By Ben Belitt	54
Drama: For the Defense. By Joseph Wood Krutch	55
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	56

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
RAYMOND GRAM SWING

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional.

THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Gruening, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

JAMES G. McDONALD'S sensational denunciation of the Hitler regime for its continuing and increasing persecution of persons guilty of no crime other than being "non-Aryan" should help to destroy the growing indulgence with which the Nazi dictatorship is being regarded by nations as well as individuals. There is a steady stream of travelers who return to say that Germany is a model of peace and order, which is somehow construed to mean that persecution has ceased, when as a matter of fact it merely means that arrests, mysterious disappearances, and Brown Shirt torturing expeditions take place under cover of night. In Great Britain a definite propaganda campaign is under way seeking to swing public opinion toward Germany; and Sir John Simon, who was one of the most vocal critics of Hitler's terror, has now changed his tune completely, though the persecution of Jews and others has increased rather than diminished with the years. Mr. McDonald's vigorous and moving declaration concerning the plight of minorities in Germany is certain of wide circulation and will carry added weight since it comes from an appointee of the League of Nations. Less encouraging is the fact that its occasion was Mr. McDonald's resignation from the office of High Commissioner for Refugees Coming from Germany, for the reason, apparently, that he considered the task of helping refugees almost hopeless as long as no attempt was made to change the conditions which created them, and that he felt his commission, which is an affiliated rather than an integral part of the League, to be ineffective in coping with the problem. His recital of conditions in Germany will convince every humane person of the need for some concerted move on the part of civilized nations to put an end to them.

ONCE MORE Laval has beaten off a vigorous assault from the left and emerged victor in a vote of confidence. His triumph cannot, however, in any sense be considered an indorsement of the notorious peace terms which he offered to Italy. Not until he had sworn support to Britain and unflinching allegiance to the League was his government saved. For a time it looked as if not even the reluctance of the Radical Socialists to assume power would suffice to prevent them from forcing Laval to suffer the fate of Sir Samuel Hoare. His escape with a greatly reduced majority is generally held to be temporary; his prestige and his authority have been irreparably damaged. Nevertheless, there can be no doubt that Laval as Premier of France is of incalculable aid to Mussolini. He is even credited in certain circles with having suggested the invasion of Ethiopia to Il Duce. Since he gave a personal guaranty of a free hand in Africa, it has been extremely difficult for him to support penalties against Italy. While it is easy to understand the lack of enthusiasm with which the left parties view the prospect of assuming office at this time, it must not be forgotten that the same sort of timidity proved the final undoing of the left in Great Britain and Germany.

THREE TIMES within a week Japanese troops are reported to have launched armed sorties against outposts of the Mongolian People's Republic. The clashes themselves have been relatively minor affairs, occurring at such remote points that no one can be sure about the circumstances surrounding them, but they can be interpreted only as attempts to determine the Soviets' reaction to an invasion of Outer Mongolia. What that reaction would be is not yet certain, though the presence of the Mongolian Prime Minister in Moscow indicates an effort to obtain a guaranty of Soviet support. The 1921 treaty between Outer Mongolia and the Soviet Union, providing that each party shall prevent the formation or sojourn of hostile "governments, organizations, groups, or individuals" on its territory, indicates an extraordinarily close relationship between the two countries; and it is difficult to see how the Soviet government can stand idly by when its Communist sister-state is being attacked by the Japanese. Fortunately for the peace of the world, the unexpected opposition which they are encountering in China is likely to prevent the Japanese from looking further afield for some time to come. Nevertheless, a certain amount of danger exists from militarists on the spot who have repeatedly shown themselves to be none too amenable to discipline from above.

NOT SINCE 1925 have Chinese students played as active a political role as in the past few weeks in their nation-wide protest against Japanese aggression in North China. In the past the unquestioned patriotism and tremendous prestige of the students have usually brought victory to any cause which commanded their united support. In the present crisis, however, they are likely to encounter far stronger opposition, not only from a militant Japan and a subservient Nanking, but from the more "substantial" Chinese elements. While masses of the Chinese people, including small merchants and landowners, appear to sympathize with the anti-Japanese activities of the students, this sympathy is not likely to be as general as it was in 1919 or 1925. Within the past few years there has been a sharpening of political and economic issues. The nationalist movement of 1925-27 came within an ace of developing into a social revolution. Communism has become the sole alternative to Japanese domination in the eyes of thousands of Chinese. Moreover, it is clear that no effective opposition to Japan can be achieved without the overthrow of Chiang Kai-shek, which, again, would have revolutionary implications. Already the students have encountered unprecedented resistance, and to obtain their end they must seek to organize peasants and workers. Whether this will be possible against the forceful opposition of Nanking is an open question. Chiang is weaker than at any time in recent years, but the whole strength of foreign imperialism is behind him.

THE NEWSPAPER GUILD has won another strike. On Christmas Eve the lockout at the Amsterdam News, a Harlem newspaper, ended with the granting of the guild's demands after an eleven weeks' fight during which the newspaper was forced into a receivership largely as the result of the withdrawal of advertising and of reader support. The nine full-time workers among the fifteen locked out are guaranteed that there will be no discharges for at least three months; strike-breakers are to be immediately discharged; the settlement specifies a guild shop with a five-day, forty-hour week, time off for overtime, the establishment of minimum wages, and a 10 per cent increase for those reinstated. It also provides for an adjustment committee, severance notice, and a union contract with the prospective buyers of the News. The News fight, with victory, is a heartening event, though it was in no sense a major battle. The opponent of the guild in this case was armed with none of those economic weapons which are at the disposal of powerful newspapers. But it is such battles carried through to a successful conclusion which will make the guild an effective fighting organization. And there is no doubt that the big publishers find the guild's victories disconcerting. An item which appeared in the New York Times of December 22 suggests as much. This item reported with some detail that the Amsterdam News had gone into receivership, but the principal reason for this state of affairs, namely, the boycott of advertisers and readers which the guild had been able to make effective, was not mentioned. Nor was the connection between the receivership and the strike referred to in the Times account of the settlement. The Times can hardly plead lack of space for this omission; it would seem difficult to deny that when a union bites a newspaper that's news. Unfortunately it is for the Times and its contemporaries to decide which news is fit to print.

WE WELCOME the announcement that Senator Lynn J. Frazier of North Dakota will introduce the revised workers' social-insurance bill in the Senate. As the months pass, the inadequacies of the Administration's so-called security act have become increasingly apparent even to conservative observers. Today, eighteen months after President Roosevelt's stirring speech on social security, only thirty-seven states have old-age pension laws, none offering more than $30 a month. Of these only sixteen meet the basic requirements of the federal act, while six have set no definite date for putting their legislation into effect. Only eight states—Alabama, California, New Hampshire, New York, Massachusetts, Utah, Washington, and Wisconsin—have thus far enacted legislation for unemployment insurance. In many parts of the country efforts to devise laws to meet the federal requirements have encountered almost insuperable obstacles. Criticism from working-class representatives has been directed chiefly against the pay-roll tax, which has been described as an indirect sales tax. Moreover, as Senator Frazier has so admirably pointed out, the present law affords no aid to the millions who are now unemployed and unable to obtain relief or WPA employment. It also fails to cover those who are self-employed—farmers and professional workers—whose resources have been depleted by the depression. The new workers' bill is much longer and more carefully drafted than the old, meeting the objections of those who maintained that the former bill was "impracticable" because of its loose terminology. It sets up a standard of social security covering the whole population and should receive the consideration which was denied it at the last session of Congress.

SYRACUSE appears to be a trial city for fascist pageants. In the fall of 1934 Hearst tested there his university red-hunt methods, and this year the army is holding a rehearsal for a poison-gas attack similar to those put on in European countries. Company C, 108th Infantry, a Syracuse unit of the New York National Guard, planned on November 19 to hold a mock gas demonstration in one of the city parks. Colonel Gibson of Governor's Island, the chemical-warfare expert of the Second Corps area, came on to supervise the trial of the army's new gas masks. Colonel H. Lanza, chief of staff of the Ninety-eighth Division, and his associates looked forward to a fine militaristic propaganda display. But a hitch occurred. A group of citizens, incensed at this scheme to instill the war spirit into the minds of children and adult spectators, called on Commissioner of Parks Barry and urged him to rescind the permit for use of a city park; they won, and the demonstration was held outside the city at the local airport, with few onlookers. About a month later, on December 19, the troops of the same Syracuse unit used the local armory for a night gas attack in No Man's Land. The maneuver was labeled "night operations in a gassed area." In addition to this dramatic mimic warfare, there were drills and gas-mask practice by the C. M. T. C. cadet corps, a speech on the New Aspects of Gas Warfare, including its use by airplanes, by a chemical-warfare expert, and a motion picture dealing with the same subject. There is reason to believe that this is the beginning of a carefully planned campaign by the military to make America gas-conscious. If it is, there ought to be a sufficiently vigorous protest to make it end in Syracuse where it began.

THE ANNOUNCEMENT by Sir Thomas Inskip, attorney general in the National Government, that the state is preparing to purchase control of the coal-mining royalties in Great Britain is being hailed as "socialism" under Tory rule. That the placing of one of Britain's great basic industries under government control has socialistic implications cannot well be denied, but the difference between control by the state of an overdeveloped, bankrupt industry and socialism is so marked that the assumption should not pass unchallenged. The crucial question, of course, is in whose interests the step is being taken. While proponents of the government's action assert that state control will free miners from the yoke of private ownership and materially increase the beggarly wages now paid to the workers, the move is also defended as a protection to the shareholders. Since the returns of the coal industry are dependent on a revival of foreign purchases, it is difficult to see how increased wages can be reconciled with a "fair" return to the owners. The reports of the Statutory Commission in 1919 and the Royal Commission in 1926 showed that reorganization of the mining industry was essential, and the years have demonstrated that it cannot be achieved under private ownership. But a measure which leaves economic and political power undisturbed in the hands of the few can hardly be called socialism—it is more closely related to the paternalistic policies of Nazi Germany.

TWO DAYS after the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company of Manchester, New Hampshire—one of the largest textile mills in the world—had declared itself insolvent and filed a petition for reorganization under the federal bankruptcy act, the Amoskeag Company, a holding company, declared its dividends for 1936—the same rates as those paid during the past two years, $1.25 on common and $4.50 on preferred. The operating company complained in its petition that "the existence of outstanding bonds has required the continued payment of interest out of capital . . .," leading to insolvency. The holding company owns $3,597,300 of the outstanding $11,379,000 of bonds, and some of the stockholders of the holding company own more of the bonds individually. The manufacturing company, which shut down last June (laying off about 9,000 employees), has paid out $2,936,000 in bond interest during the past five years. The extent to which the holding company controls the operating company is shown by the following facts: of the 378,191 voting shares of the operating company 90,181 are owned by the holding company; in addition, 252,135 shares were distributed among stockholders of the holding company in 1927, and presumably a great many of these shares have not since changed hands; of the ten directors of the manufacturing company six are directors of the holding company, and one of the six is president of the holding company; the president of the operating company is a director of the holding company; the secretary and treasurer of both companies are the same.

"I ACCUSE THIRTY-SIX MEN of impairing the happiness and prosperity of a million souls." So begins an editorial by Edward Lyman Bill, publisher of Tires, a trade magazine for the industry. In the November issue of his publication Mr. Bill, with no small amount of courage, attacks the "thirty-six men who are his chief advertisers for the harm they must ultimately do their own labor and the labor indirectly dependent upon them." Today there are 31 tire manufacturers, plus 5 chain distributing companies in the industry, a number whittled down from the 608 companies which were once all active manufacturers. Far out in front stand the big four—Goodyear, Firestone, United States, and Goodrich. The price war between Goodrich and Firestone has for years been savagely affecting the entire industry. Today tires are being shipped to automobile manufacturers at mill-door cost, and discounts as high as 60 per cent are almost standard practice as a result of the killing price competition the leaders are engaged in. The excuse for these tactics is that the industry is capable of producing 69,000,000 tires a year, whereas the current demand is for 49,000,000. According to the Akron Beacon Journal, "Every major effort of key rubber industrialists today is directed at destroying the possessors of the 20,000,000 of excess capacity, instead of toward obtaining a fair price for the finished product—a price that would provide a return on investments in tire companies, supply a wage to factory and office workers permitting them to make purchases beyond the bare necessities, and set the whole industry on a constructive rather than a destructive course." Each manufacturer has pared his production and operating costs to the bone. Naturally it required a unique kind of leadership to shave wages, and Goodyear aspired to the honor. Their thirty-hour week averaged 95 cents an hour and $122 monthly for the employees. They increased the work week to thirty-six hours, netting the employees around $125 a month, and making the substitute hourly rate not much more than 80 cents. There is no choice for the industrialist who has kept his wages up. He must either cut them or be forced out of business, and his employees with him.

JUST TO SHOW that prosperity is not a myth any longer, we cite an item sent in by a faithful contributor from the Englewood (New Jersey) News for December 12. It is in the form of an editorial entitled The Public Feeding Grounds, and it rises to heights of righteous indignation over the fact, reported by the city police, that about a hundred families every week, along with homeless dogs and cats, gain whatever sustenance is theirs from the public garbage dump. "Huge chunks of meat discarded by the various butcher shops are taken home, washed, and cooked by the desperately poor people. Scavengers may be found at the dumps almost daily seeking old clothing, all kinds of wearing apparel, and even splinters of wood for their stoves." The editorial rightly feels this to be a gruesome story not entirely consistent either with our new prosperity or with our inherent wealth as a nation. But the remedy offered by the News is a curious one. It is that no time should be lost in levying taxes for the construction of a public incinerator—to burn, we hasten to say, the garbage, not the poor souls who feed on it. As a final optimistic note, the editorial adds: "Surely some place in this city of ours there must be an agency which can take care of people whose bodies crave food so much that they are forced to eat garbage." It might be more realistic to say that in the city of Englewood, across the river from the richest city in the world, relief agencies are evidently so inadequate that men, women, and children are reduced to the hideous expedient of grubbing for meat along with hungry dogs!

Strengthening the Neutrality Act

ONE of the first tasks before Congress will be that of drafting permanent legislation to replace the neutrality act which expires on February 29. Even at the time of enactment the present law was recognized to be an inadequate protection against a repetition of the events of 1914-17. It was intended merely as a stop-gap to tide over the Italo-Ethiopian crisis, and was limited to six months on the supposition that by the end of that period Congress would have been able to work out a more satisfactory and comprehensive peace program. Its shortcomings have been clearly exposed by the application of League sanctions against Italy. Although the President has gone beyond the letter of the law in warning American business interests that all transactions with belligerents are at their own risk, he has had no power to prevent them from aiding an aggressor, even though the latter's campaign is in violation of the League Covenant and the Pact of Paris. In other words, the United States has inadvertently obstructed the efforts of the League to maintain peace, and unless it desires to be at least partly responsible for the collapse of Western civilization it must find some way to revise its policy.

By far the best proposal thus far advanced is that of the neutrality committee of the newly formed National Peace Conference. The draft bill prepared by this committee provides for a continuation of the present mandatory embargo on the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries, and for the maintenance of the prohibition against the use of American ships for the transport of munitions. It also authorizes the President to impose an embargo on "other articles or commodities essential to the continuing conduct of war," giving him discretion to decide when such a step should be taken and what commodities should be included. The losses resulting from the ban on war materials—not including armament—are to be assumed by the government. In order to prevent indirect trade with belligerents, the export of forbidden commodities to neutrals is to be restricted to the pre-war volume. The President is also authorized to forbid loans and credits to belligerents, and to prohibit American vessels from passing through areas where naval war operations are being conducted. The paradoxical situation created by denying American goods to a country which has been unjustly invaded is partially met by giving the President authority, subject to the consent of Congress, to lift the embargo on shipments to a state which has been attacked in violation of the Pact of Paris—provided the majority of the signatories of the pact concur in this finding. Since the members of the League of Nations constitute more than a majority of the signatories, action such as the League has taken against Japan and Italy would presumably fulfil this condition.

While more satisfactory than any other measure likely to receive consideration by Congress, the National Peace Conference's bill has several obvious shortcomings. In its attempt to bridge the differences between those who believe we can keep out of war by isolating ourselves from all contaminating contacts and those who believe that the United States must join in collective efforts to prevent war, the committee has unduly weakened certain provisions. Most important is the failure to make the imposition of an embargo on loans and credits mandatory. The revelations in the Lansing letters make clear the crucial role played by loans in drawing the United States into the last war, and it is obvious that the most effective way of preventing entangling trade relationships is to require that all transactions be on a cash-and-carry basis. Similarly, the embargo on oil, steel, copper, and cotton and the prohibition against American ships passing through war zones should be mandatory. It is difficult to see, moreover, why the credit embargo should necessarily be imposed on both parties, as is provided in the committee's draft. Since the United States is one of the two leading financial centers of the world, the denial of credits to a country which has been illegally attacked might in some instances work extreme hardship. The provisions for lifting the embargo on the shipment of arms and war materials to the aggrieved party ought logically to be extended to financial measures. Moreover, the requirement of Congressional assent to the lifting of embargoes might prove a serious practical handicap. If Congress were not in session, a President would probably hesitate to summon it for this purpose alone. A sufficient guaranty against partisan action by a future President is contained in the provision requiring a definite declaration by a majority of the signatories of the Pact of Paris.

Perhaps the most conspicuous omission in the draft bill is that of a provision requiring all trade with belligerents to be carried on at the risk of the trader. The President's October proclamation declaring that "people who voluntarily engage in transactions of any character with either of the belligerents do so at their own risk" was not made under the neutrality act but in pursuance of one of his executive functions—that of deciding whether the State Department should file claims against a foreign government. This question of whether an American citizen shall or shall not be protected in carrying on business with a belligerent lies at the heart of our neutrality policy. Insistence on this "right" was one of the basic causes of our difficulties in the World War, and would be even more unenforceable in a conflict involving League sanctions. It is too vital a matter to be left to the discretion of the President, and should be incorporated in our permanent neutrality legislation. The law should also exclude armed merchant vessels from the ports of the United States, a policy which was successfully carried out by the Netherlands during the World War.

Even with these amendments the neutrality law will not be a guaranty against the United States being drawn into war. The lure of profits in a society which exalts profit-making is likely to transcend any legislation. The best protection that the United States can have against war lies in prevention rather than quarantine, and wars cannot be prevented except through collective action. But in view of the strong isolationist sentiment which exists throughout the country, our only immediate safeguard is to adopt neutrality legislation that is at least not inconsistent with the world-wide struggle for collective security.

American Students Unite

SHUNTED about by the authorities of Ohio State University, and protested against by professional patriots, including, of course, the American Legion, the students formerly comprising the National Student League and the Student League for Industrial Democracy met in Columbus on December 28 and constituted themselves the American Student Union. After President Rightmire of Ohio State had at the last moment refused the convention the university campus for its meeting—although all arrangements had been made for holding the sessions there—the local Y. W. C. A. building was obtained as a meeting place. Ohio State refused its halls on the ground that it was necessary to economize on fuel during vacation; the head of a state university supported by public funds was evidently not quite ready frankly and openly to deny freedom of assembly. Nor did the officials of the Y. W. C. A. seem sufficiently moved by Legion protests to refuse their building to these “unpatriotic” students. Five directors of the Y. W. C. A. explained that they could not obtain a quorum to oust the convention, although they requested that the business be terminated “as soon as possible.”

The meetings, therefore, were duly held. The American Student Union was formed. Although Mr. Hearst deserves no credit for it, since it was done to prove how dangerous the students were, the platform of the convention was published in fullest detail in the New York American and doubtless in other Hearst papers. Since charges of un-Americanism have already been made against the union and may be expected to be made again, the program is worth examining in some detail, to see just how “red” these students are. First, by a vote of 244 to 49, the union accepted the Oxford pledge against war, although considerable protest was voiced in the convention, not against the pledge as such, but against the union’s accepting it as a body, on the plea that this action would automatically bar the organization in a good many colleges. The union put itself on record as favoring abolition of the R. O. T. C., and in opposition to fascism, “the war preparations of our own government,” and the “intimidation of professors who dare to grapple with the political and economic facts of life.” Relief for needy students was declared a vital necessity, particularly in the South, where a school-building program must include the “complementary need for providing young people with lunches, shoes, carfare, and homes.” Jim Crowism and segregation in the South were scored, as were “red-baiting crusades,” “loyalty oaths,” “vigilante attacks,” and the “hysterical outcries of the Hearst press.”

We have purposely discussed this program strictly on the basis of the New York American’s news story. Obviously this paper would not play down the “radicalism” of the student groups; obviously every shade of red that could be added to these resolutions would appear. If the American Student Union had come out for the overthrow of the United States government by force and violence we can be reasonably sure that the American would have reported that fact in no smaller than seventy-two-point type. What actually happened was that a group of American students, representing, according to one of their spokesmen, about 20 per cent of the entire student body, disclosed themselves as unequivocally opposed to war and as willing to go on record as refusing to fight in any war; that the same group showed itself aware of the oppressive forces that exist in the United States today—in the South, where Negroes enjoy something less than the rights guaranteed them by the Constitution, in the universities, where teachers are subjected to the pressure of boards of trustees—and conscious of the menace of fascism and the inadequacy of public relief. In other words, the American Student Union judged by its program is about as dangerous, un-American, and red as, say, The Nation, which doubtless for Mr. Hearst would be red enough.

There is just one more thing to add. Assuming that the American Legion is right, and that the students who met in Columbus were unpatriotic and radical, surely no means could have been taken more nicely calculated to strengthen their dissent than those employed by President Rightmire and the local Legion post. Mere expediency, not to mention wisdom—again from the standpoint of the professional patriots—would permit student groups to talk as much as they liked and as long as they liked, on the assumption that talk never hurt anybody and that real protest grows only out of enforced silence. We cannot decide whether to be glad or sorry that the American Legion refuses to see this. The fact that it habitually persists in making a monkey of itself by joining with Mr. Hearst in wild outcries whenever any liberal or radical group tries to talk provides at the best a certain amount of breakfast-table diversion and at the worst makes it clear just where the threat to democracy lies: not in the student groups who hate war and meet to say so, but in those forces of American society which seem to be organized for no other purpose than to deny the principles which the American nation was created to preserve.

The South Is Sick

A GOOD part of the increased importance of the South in the public consciousness, aside from the publicity surrounding Huey Long, is due to the attempt of the Administration to do something for cotton. By cutting down the acreage in cotton the Administration supplied the final push that set the economic structure to crumbling. Tenants who had somehow managed to keep alive in plantation huts found themselves walking the dirt roads with their families and possessions looking for a home. In 1934, according to a study made by Gordon Blackwell of the University of North Carolina, between 8,000 and 12,000 families were displaced in that state. Share-croppers were turned into day laborers. The relief rolls increased. Only the landlords benefited—and presumably the gain of the landlords as a group will be shortlived because of a steadily contracting market. In “The Collapse of Cotton Tenancy,” the summary of a detailed investigation by a group of professors and students at the University of North Carolina, it is pointed out that since the drastic reduction in American production beginning in 1932 there has been a directly compensating increase in cotton-growing abroad, to which must be added the further fact that the last twenty years have witnessed an “almost steady deterioration" in the average quality of the American crop.

The industrial side of the picture is revealed in the familiar pattern of the Northern textile manufacturer who moves South, where the inexperienced worker, fresh from a starved and almost literally moneyless existence on the soil, is more than willing to work for a few dollars a week. The sordid details of this pattern are vividly if incidentally brought out in such an investigation as was reported by Louis Stark in the New York Times of December 22. Like Mary Connor Myers's report of the share-croppers' situation in Arkansas, this report, made to the federal Commissioner of Education, has never been officially released to the public. Although it was completed in June it has been circulated confidentially only among a few government officials and labor-union officers. It deals with the misuse of federal grants to states for vocational-training purposes; and while it covers Northern states as well as Southern, it seems apparent from Mr. Stark's summary that the worst abuses occur in the deep South.

The investigators, Anna Lalor Burdick and Ruth Scandrett, found officially what has been known for some time unofficially, that these funds for vocational-training purposes have been used ever since they were authorized in 1917 for the benefit of private industry. They found that workers are trained on production without pay for six to twelve weeks and then transferred to pay rolls at learners' wages, and that goods thus produced without payment of wages are sold on the open market. They found, moreover, that the superintendent of the factory or the foremen are appointed as teachers and paid at public expense, that persons employed as instructors serve as foremen on production, that public schools rent quarters in which workers are trained for a particular plant, and that communities, particularly in the South, in the attempt to attract industries, offer an "abundant supply of workers with high-school education trained for the factory at public expense," as well as tax exemption for five years, free factory buildings, and contributions toward pay rolls by the community. In one community, according to the report, "everyone in town, even the people on relief, contributed something to the building fund."

The impetus for the plant training schools [says the report] came in most instances from the state departments of education rather than from the local schools. It was difficult to secure definite information as to why a state Department of Education undertook the establishment of plant training programs, but the circumstances . . . indicated that the power companies and local committees from the chambers of commerce . . . requested the aid of public funds in meeting the expenses of instructing workers.

In one instance it was found that the application for funds (such applications are required to be signed by public officials as well as by bona fide labor representatives) had been signed by a merchant as an "official representative of organized labor." It is in such towns as these, needless to say, that labor organizers operate only at the risk of life and limb.

The South is sick. And until the government finds the courage to apply a remedy at least as thoroughgoing as the diagnoses its own investigators and others have made from time to time, the two chief crops of the South will continue to be misery and demagogues.

Dangerous Reading

A GOOD deal of amusement and amazement is to be had very easily by glancing through "Banned Books," an annotated catalogue recently published based on the Junior League exhibition held in New York last spring. Chronologically the authors at one time or another disapproved of range from Homer (whom Caligula tried to suppress) to various of our contemporaries, and not the least amusing instances are those in which works fell into official disfavor for reasons which it would have been difficult to anticipate. In 1931, for instance, the Governor of Hunan Province in China banned "Alice in Wonderland" on the ground "that animals should not use human language and that it was disastrous to put animals and human beings on the same level." But, then, some quarter of a century before, the English Lord Chamberlain for a time forbade performances of "The Mikado" because it might give offense to "our Japanese allies." And in 1935 a first trombone player in Philadelphia refused to take part in the production of "Lady Macbeth of Minsk" because some of the notes in his part were obscene.

Nearly everyone knows that the Catholic church banned "The Decameron" in 1559 but approved a version in which monks and nuns were replaced by laymen, though the story was otherwise unaltered. Nevertheless, objections based on moral grounds are usually the most nearly constant, and in nearly every case the volumes with the longest criminal records are those supposed to offend against decency. Thus Ovid's "Art of Love" has been in continuous trouble from the days when Augustus cited it as the reason for Ovid's banishment down to 1928, when the United States Customs Department was still barring it; and Rabelais has been similarly and continuously attacked. On the other hand, books objectionable for their doctrine at one time and one place are, of course, very likely to be sacred at another. Whether the Bible was "the good book" or a very, very naughty book (much worse than "The Decameron") depended on where and when you happened to live. And if that seems strange, one need only remember that it would be easy to compile a substantial library composed exclusively of works whose character would change from sacred to scandalous or vice versa if they were transported from Russia to Germany. Kant's "Critique" enjoys what must be the almost unique distinction of being on the Catholic "Index" and of having also been banned (1928) in Russia, though the blanket condemnation of all books dangerous to faith or morals which is prefaced to the "Index" is neatly paralleled by the blanket instruction quoted from "The Index of the Soviet Inquisition" and addressed to libraries (1926): "The section on religion must contain solely anti-religious books. Religiously dogmatic books such as the Gospel, the Koran, the Talmud, and so forth, must be left in the large libraries but removed from the smaller ones."

But what we like best of all is the letter received in 1933 by the Weyhe Galleries in New York, signed by H. C. Stuart, Assistant Collector of Customs: "There are being detained . . . two packages addressed to you containing obscene photo books, 'Ceiling Sistine Chapel,' Filles-Michael Angelo."

Issues and Men

The Lindberghs Leave

MORE than five years ago I wrote in The Nation a protest against the shocking hounding of the Lindberghs by the press of the country, the pitiless and utterly indefensible publicity to which they were being subjected, notably by five New York newspapers, saying: "It is a disgrace to the newspaper profession that it has not risen to protect him against a harassment which would make many another man deliberately quit his native land to seek asylum in some journalistically more civilized country." Well, that has now come to pass. The Lindberghs have left the United States in the hope of being able to find in England, one of the most law-abiding countries on earth, a sanctuary where they may be safe from the constant fear that their second son may be taken from them, and where they will certainly be let alone by the press of the country, even if they are not wholly spared by that of our own. They ask nothing more than to be allowed to live their own lives in privacy without having to bring up their child with an armed guard walking alongside the nursemaid, and free from the unending threats against the lives of all of them.

Now of course I admit that the American press has been less responsible for the misery of these two remarkable persons—Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt has just listed Mrs. Lindbergh as one of the ten leading American women—since the murder of their baby than before. None the less, no editor has shown any sympathy whatever or sought to help them by deliberately reducing all publicity to the narrowest limits. That the trial of Hauptmann was a disgrace both to the newspapers and to the legal profession no one will deny. While there are sensational newspapers a plenty in England which reek with personalities and scandals of every kind, one can still visualize what the Herald Tribune and the Times in New York and many other newspapers might have done by just thinking how the Manchester Guardian, the London Times, the Morning Post, the Telegraph, and other high-grade English newspapers would have treated the trial of Hauptmann. Surely never has our press been guilty of greater lack of consideration than in the case of the Lindberghs. It must not be forgotten that when they went on their honeymoon a group of reporters followed them, and as the Colonel described it, ". . . for eight straight hours circled about our boat at anchor in a New England harbor in a noisy motor boat, and occasionally called across the water to us that if we would pose for one picture they would go away." It was at this time that one reporter offered a servant in the Lindbergh household $2,000 to "betray the secrets of the household." During the whole time that Mrs. Lindbergh was an expectant mother the press harped upon this fact without a let-up.

Under these circumstances no one can blame the Lindberghs for leaving the country to which they are devoted, in which they have grown up, which has in many ways been so generous in its approval of their achievements. But there is apparently no alternative. There is no assurance at all that if they stayed on after the execution of Hauptmann, if he is executed, the press would forget about them. Having been so long a journalist, and having run a daily newspaper for twenty-one years, I know well what the arguments of the newspapers are. They declare that he is a national hero; that the public curiosity about him is not mere idle curiosity but a genuinely affectionate interest in him, precisely as the press feels that it is entitled to know all the details of the lives of President and Mrs. Roosevelt and their children. I have never believed that this was a valid argument, either as to the Lindberghs or the President, whoever he may happen to be. Moreover, the well-meaning but ineffective American Society of Newspaper Editors has in its code of ethics for the profession one article which reads: "A newspaper should not invade private rights or feelings without sure warrant of public right as distinguished from public curiosity." No amount of human ingenuity could think up another canon which could be more conspicuously violated by the press to which these editors belong. Yet the society has never protested against this outrage.

The Lindberghs are not the only family that has had to seek refuge abroad from this sort of thing. I recall a very beautiful woman, cursed by enormous wealth inherited from her husband, who told me with tears in her eyes that she had moved to England merely to save her children from the unending newspaper publicity. She said that it would be almost impossible for her as it was to bring up as decent citizens children who at twenty-one would be enormously rich, but that she knew that she could not do it if they were incessantly to be portrayed as the "millionaire kids." She then told me how reporters had waylaid her eight- or ten-year-old son to ask him whether his father, who had died of a bullet wound under unhappy conditions, had been murdered or had killed himself. Any decent newspapers would have recorded the death and then drawn a veil of silence around the case. They would have done so had this happened in a tenement-house family. But merely because these were enormously rich people, week in week out page after page of gossip, tittle-tattle, and scandal, most of it made out of whole cloth, appeared in the newspapers. Not even our best dailies are wholly beyond this sort of thing. It is not merely the desire to sell more papers by sensationalism; it is because they truckle so to wealth. In this respect they are utter toadies. They play up the deeds and misdeeds of innumerable worthless people merely because they are the decadent holders of large means. Where there are decent self-respecting people of great wealth, they focus a constant publicity upon them that is both repugnant and unwelcome. And it is some of these newspapers which, in such cases as that of the Lindberghs, are responsible for the threatening and blackmailing letters the victims receive.

B. Wall Garrison Villard
BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

"My plan is sound. It has solved all my problems."

How Strong Is the Townsend Plan?

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, December 30

FOR the army of masochists quartered in our best conservative clubs and board rooms this is always a delightful season. They have an immense array of torturing thoughts with which to titillate themselves when Congress is about to convene and an election is in the offing—thoughts about the hideous things November-eyed Congressmen may do to them as well as thoughts about the New Deal's continuing threat to all that they, it seems, hold dearer than life itself.

This year they are rather better off than usual, for in the Townsend movement they have a new flagellant for their jaded imaginations. From contemplating its progress they will derive the same sweet shudderings that the holding-company bill, the Wagner act, the securities act, and kindred measures once set up in them. They will imagine the movement growing with such vigor as to smash the Republican strongholds of the East, thereby insuring Roosevelt's reelection. And they will imagine the movement sweeping on with such speed as to force enactment of the Townsend old-age pension plan at the next session of Congress, if not at the one about to open.

Saner men, including those who hope for Roosevelt's defeat, will not entertain any of those fears. They will note, first, that even if the Townsend movement is as strong as its leaders claim, the mechanics of government are such that several more years must pass before the plan has any chance of adoption by Congress. They will note, secondly and on the same basis, that the movement is quite as likely to affect Roosevelt's fortunes adversely as it is to flatten Republican hopes. Finally, they will point out that the strength of the movement, present or potential, is highly debatable and has yet to be demonstrated at the polls.

So far the movement has had only indifferent success in elections outside of atypical localities such as those sections of California colonized by retired Iowa and Kansas farmers whose lives have been extended beyond their means by idleness. From a town in Washington, where the movement is supposed to be strong, there comes a report that, though the local Townsend club boasts 3,000 members, a candidate for public office, running under the Townsend banner and as a member of the club, polled only 300 votes. From Minneapolis there comes a report that the movement was considered so important that in a recent municipal election each ward had at least one aldermanic candidate running as a Townsendite. Some of these were Democrats, some were Republicans. But all the Townsendites, whether Republican or Democratic, were defeated, according to dispatches.

In the recent Congressional by-election in the Third Michigan District, the results were more auspicious for the Townsendites but fell far short of proving the movement's political effectiveness, and it is to the results of this one election that the movement owes its present prominence in the news and in the jitter wells of major party politicians. Had the winner, Verner W. Main, been a Democrat, his victory would have been impressive. But he ran primarily as a Republican, and the district has been overwhelmingly Republican for more than thirty years. Its G. O. P. candidates normally trounce their Democratic rivals by 3-to-1 and 4-to-1 margins. Mr. Main piled up only a 2-to-1 margin. Nor was the size of the vote impressive even for an off-year election, a total of 36,028 votes being cast in a district where the 1932 aggregate was 95,476. It should be remembered, too, that Mr. Main had the support of the regular Republican machine, and that Vandenberg, that varnished vacuum who may get the Republican Presidential nomination, did not hesitate to embrace Main while assailing the Townsend plan. It should be borne in mind, too, that Mr. Main, who was missing no bets, added to his advocacy of the Townsend plan a pledge to vote for immediate payment of the bonus and for balancing the federal budget.

When he won a five-cornered fight in the primary, Main was lavish in his thanks to the Townsendites, and on the day the returns reached Washington, fifteen Congressmen called the movement's national headquarters, seeking information on the plan. But when he became a Congressman by virtue of his victory in the final election, Main praised impartially all the groups that had supported him and gave no special thanks to the Townsendites. The point is, first, that in the 1936 Congressional elections there may be many successful candidates ticketed as Townsendites, either Republican or Democratic, merely because they accepted the badge in the hope it would give them an edge in the primaries. The point is, second, that if the Townsendites are to make their views prevail in Congress they must hold something more than the balance of power in a many-sided primary election; they must be able to control the outcome of a final election and to a degree that will force their candidates to fulfil their pledges.

Apparently, Townsend officials do not feel that they possess such power except in a few isolated localities. They repeatedly proclaim their intention of working through both the Republican and the Democratic machines. All that they are interested in, they vow, is forcing Congressional enactment of the Townsend plan, and to that end they will back any candidate who espouses their scheme. The only departure from that platform has been the recent declaration by Dr. Townsend that, if neither the Republicans nor the Democrats adopt a Townsend-plan plank in 1936, he will launch a third party to back it. I doubt that even Dr. Townsend takes that statement seriously. Certainly it has caused no stir in the Republican or Democratic high commands, which remember that the powerful Anti-Saloon League, though strong enough to force its will upon Congress, never was powerful enough to make a third-party threat stick. Townsend's third-party warning becomes even more feeble when one considers that what is left of the late Huey Long's Share-the-Wealth movement shuns the Townsend plan, and that Father Coughlin has assailed it while, like Borah, admiring its objectives.

The Townsendites claim that they had fifty-six votes in the last session of Congress and they hint that they will have a majority in the House at the next session. But their hint is no better than their claim, which is weak enough. Their claim is based upon the vote on the McGroarty bill, which embodies the Townsend plan although it sets $200 a month as a maximum, not a minimum, pension. It was brought up as an amendment to the Administration's social-security act on April 18 and cast aside after a half-hour of debate. The vote was 206 to 56, the Townsendites polling 21.3 per cent of the total. A few minutes later the Lundeen bill came up also as an amendment and was voted down 158 to 40, its supporters polling 20.2 per cent of the total.

There was no roll call on the McGroarty bill but it can be said fairly that most of its support came from men who are not Townsendites. Many of those who voted for it were Republicans, actuated either by prankishness or a desire to embarrass the Administration. Most of those who voted for it were men fighting not for the Townsend plan but for a liberalization of the Administration's program. One Administration field marshal, Representative Taylor of Colorado, the acting floor leader, voted for the McGroarty bill. The speeches in its behalf were made almost exclusively by California Democrats, but the only opposition speech also came from a California Democrat, Representative Buck. The three Californians who spoke for the bill were Ford, Kramer, and McGroarty. They were aided by Representative Monaghan, a Montana Democrat, and Representative Mott, an Oregon Republican.

Three other Representatives from California supported the bill, but not with speeches. They were Representatives Stubbs, Tolan, and Hoeppel. It was McGroarty who introduced the bill but Hoeppel who had proclaimed it. Hoeppel also sponsored "Technotax: A New Ace in the New Deal." It was a measure to tax machinery according to the number of workers it displaced. Mr. Hoeppel probably will not have an opportunity to sponsor the technotax at the forthcoming session. Or the Townsend plan, either. Mr. Hoeppel on December 12 in the District of Columbia Supreme Court was convicted of conspiring to sell a West Point appointment.

Another last-session Townsendite who deserves mention is Representative Michener, a Republican from the Second Michigan District. He deserves mention only because shortly after the Main victory Mr. Michener's name appeared in the headlines as a new convert to Townsendism. The impression was given that Michener was only one of a covey of Congressmen that Main's triumph had scared into the Townsend camp. If there has been any such scurrying about, it has been noiseless. The thunder has come from the other side. Representative Maverick of Texas, a rising leader of the liberal wing in the House, has come out with a statement in denunciation of the Townsend plan. Down in Tennessee, Senators McKellar and Bachman have united in a similar statement. Out in Kansas, Governor Landon, a Presidential aspirant, has stood pat on his opposition to the Townsend movement, and up in Connecticut, Senator Maloney, a Democrat, publicly has attacked the plan.

The Townsendites have yet to capture a Senator. They claim to have brought several to heel but refuse to name them. The ineffable Borah is flirting with the movement to such good effect that in certain sections of the country his name brings cheers at Townsend-club rallies, but he grows cholerick at any effort to pin him down on the issue.

However much the Townsend movement may grow in the next year, it is certain to make no substantial gains at the next session of Congress, and that is true for at least two reasons in addition to the one springing automatically from the fact that the House and Senate personnel will be the same as at the last session. The first of those reasons is that the machinery of Congress is geared against the Townsend plan. The key committee posts are held by Southerners, and the Southerners are viciously opposed to the plan, which raises for them a race issue. "A $200 monthly pension for niggers? Never!" they snort. It is that idea, rather than the Townsend plan itself, that horrifies such unctuous demagogues as McKellar. Poll the North Carolina delegation, for example, and you will find them unanimous on the Townsend plan. "Fantastic" is the mildest word those gentlemen use, and one of them is the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Representative Doughton, who quite properly bears the nickname "Muley." Such measures as the McGroarty bill are assigned to his committee, and the McGroarty bill will never get back out of Doughton's committee in 1936 as long as he holds the reins. That brings us to the second reason why the outlook for the Townsendites at the forthcoming session is hopeless: both the Republican and the Democratic leaders will be striving to keep dangerous proposals from coming to the fore lest they become issues in the 1936 campaign.

If the Townsendites fail to make their plan a storm center at the session beginning next week—and especially if the machine leaders succeed in completely smothering the McGroarty bill—they will be hard-pressed to make it an issue in the 1936 campaign. But even if they should succeed in making it a campaign issue, it is unlikely to have material bearing upon the Presidential race. It is unthinkable that either the Democratic or the Republican nominee would espouse the plan, though both may utter vagaries which ward heelers can interpret as pro-Townsendisms in sections where the movement is strong. Roosevelt on several occasions has denounced the project in unmistakable terms though the plan itself was not mentioned. He has not been embarrassed on these occasions by the similarity of the AAA's taxing device to the device proposed for financing the Townsend plan. He is committed to his own social-security plan and at the next session of Congress probably will be fighting to keep it from being liberalized, lest the federal budget be thrown further out of balance and the prosperity curve on which his gaze is fixed be reversed by the imposition of additional taxes on industry.

His Republican opponent, faced with the hopelessness of convincing the country that he is more liberal than Roosevelt, will rest his case on economy pledges and the Constitution. With these the Townsend plan certainly is incompatible. If both Roosevelt and his rival denounce or ignore the plan and if its success in the Congressional elections is no greater than now seems likely, the Townsend movement eighteen months hence will be as dead as the chain-letter craze to which it is kin. To keep the movement going, to keep the Townsend Weekly pouring dollars into the pockets of its private owners, Dr. Townsend and co-founder Clements, takes more than the plans professional promoters can provide. It takes the promise of a quick and easy victory. When that disappears, the movement will collapse, along with the enthusiasm of its aged dupes.

Presidential Possibilities

I. Alf Landon Is Not Cal Coolidge

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

THE political oversimplifications in a large country like America are bound to be false. But few are more misleading than those which have made Governor Alf M. Landon of Kansas the foremost candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination. He is known for two things: he balanced his budget, and he is a Kansas Coolidge. To be sure, he has balanced his budget. But so did his predecessors, and under Kansas law, which requires a plebiscite on bond issues, it is difficult to unbalance it. The balanced budget is not the achievement for which Landon is noteworthy. It is that he has imposed the budget system and the pay-as-you-go principle on all Kansas counties, municipalities, and school districts, quite a different achievement and a more meritorious one. He has made 8,000 local boards face the financial realities of local government. They have balanced their budgets, and Governor Landon is always the first to give them the credit for it.

But there is an element of fact in this half of Landon's fame. Budgets have been balanced, and he had something to do with it. There is none at all in the other half. Landon is not a Kansas Coolidge. He is as different from Coolidge as Topeka is from Boston. Coolidge, as a human being, was a tight-lipped, frugal Yankee; as a statesman he was the leading exponent of the hands-off-business school. He did not acknowledge change in the world or try to keep government abreast of change. On the personal side Landon is the friendliest man I ever met in public life, not for the good political reason that friendliness begets friends, but because he likes people and loves to exchange ideas with them. And as a man in politics he knows that the world is changing fundamentally, that it will not wake up some bright morning and find itself back in the economic happiness of 1928, and that the immediate future can only be redeemed by rugged virtues, not "rugged individualism." The virtues, to him, are those Kansas has inculcated in him. First is honesty in matters of money, not the mere honesty of not stealing, but the honesty of not living in the fantasy of financial unrealities. He has watched Kansas farmers struggle with a poverty not surpassed in the drought years in any other state in the Union. He does believe in not spending more than you have, for he has seen thousands of disasters from laxity in over-drafts. But that is not the end-all of his philosophy. He is no throw-back who if elected President would want simply to balance the federal budget, restore business confidence, and ride with streaming hair to the calamity of another depression. Integrity in government finance is to him a pre-condition without which good government is impossible. After that he believes in good government. And there is where the East, thanks to Hearst and the reactionary fanatics who are ready to adopt anybody who might beat Roosevelt, are mistaken about Landon. Only half of him is their man, the half that wants economical administration and realistic finance. The other half is a Kansan, with ingrained conceptions about an Americanism which Hearst forgot some twenty years ago, and which the financial oligarchy of the East never knew.

By this I do not mean that he is a radical. In so far as labels can describe anybody, he is a mild Kansas progressive. He bolted the Republican Party for Theodore Roosevelt in 1912; he bolted again to support William Allen White for governor. White has been his life-long friend, and Landon is as like him in outlook and doctrine as anybody. The radicals of the industrial East, pitted against the tough Eastern Republicans, have swung much farther to the left than Landon, and they look upon the Kansas brand of progressivism as pleasing but somewhat sentimental. Nor is Landon a Norris or a La Follette, for he hasn't their fighting temperament. But he is closer to these two in habits of thought than to Hearst and the Easterners who are espousing his candidacy.

Physically he is not a large man, and with his sparse hair rapidly silvering he looks older than his forty-eight years. All during my first hour with him, in a visit paid a few weeks ago, I was haunted with the sense of having met him before, or of his resembling someone I knew. Then it came to me that he was like Harold Ickes. Certainly he is of the same general type, though Secretary Ickes has a tang that Landon lacks, an acid in him that sends out unexpectedly brilliant and sometimes rockingly funny remarks. None of this acid is in Landon, who is mentally less complicated, and also mentally more accessible. But they are the same kind of American Midwestern product, both partial introverts, both able to talk about ideas in the abstract, both unabashed to believe in old-fashioned virtues.

Landon's head would delight a sculptor, for it is beautifully shaped. His hands are not large and domineering, but of moderate size and sensitive. His outstanding physical features are his eyes. The pupils are large and the eyelids close half over them, and in color they are an unusual carnelian brown. There is light in them, and they peer out of his face, alert and shrewd. His nose is large, and he uses it in speaking, the voice resounding in it like a singer's, only more so, with the result that he nearly speaks with a Western nasalism. The mouth is wide and generous, the chin vigorous. His color is healthy and he wears rimless spectacles.

He has been described as looking like a typical business man, but I could not see why. To meet him without knowing him, one might take him for anything, president of a Western bank, president of a modern university, or an up-to-date large-scale farmer. In fact he is a business man, but not the office-desk sort. He was a law graduate from the University of Kansas, and started in to be a banker. A little experience cured him of that career, and he turned to his father's business of oil. He became an oil operator, and played the hard and precarious game of developing strip wells. He has had to fight the Standard Oil Company, and so he knows competitive business and the meaning of monopoly first hand. Oil has meant an outdoor life for him, and his chief diversion is horseback riding, which, as governor, he apparently has not been able to practice as formerly, with modest consequences at the base of his vest.

He is the only chief executive of any large concern I know who conducts his affairs in a room whose door is not closed. In the Topeka Capitol the governor's office is at the end of a huge anteroom, and his desk is in plain view to anyone who will step over to the side of the anteroom. Visitors waiting their turn with the governor can see him as they wait. Or they can study the portraits, hanging high on the wall, of Kansas's former, often hirsute governors. The day I called I stole many a glance at Governor Landon while he chatted with three men introduced to him by the Chief Justice of the Kansas Supreme Court. When my turn came, the anteroom was nearly empty, for I had come early. I expected to stay only a few minutes, and hoped to be invited for further talk in the evening. But I had no sooner taken my chair and said my first few words than I found myself in the depths of genuine discussion, wrestling with the formidable topic of how to make the capitalist system work. And when I left eighty minutes later, I felt as though I had only begun a conversation that would need a week—or a lifetime—to finish. It was not shut off, but was to continue at lunch, and when I emerged into the anteroom, the visitors who had accumulated there looked at me curiously, wondering what important business could have kept me so long with the Governor.

I was sent to call on F. H. Guild, former head of the Department of Political Science at the University of Kansas, now director of the Research Department of the Kansas Legislative Council. This non-partisan department, financed by the Spelman Foundation, operates to supply the Kansas legislature with factual information and advice, an agency for better government—better because better informed—which is one of the hopeful developments in American affairs. I spent the rest of the morning with Dr. Guild and obtained the data I needed about Kansas, and was back at the Governor's office, as instructed, at 12:15. All but two of the throng had been worked through the office, one of these being an aged Negro. Landon came out, spoke a few words with the first, and then talked for several minutes with the Negro, ending with an order to his secretary. The Negro's arm went around the Governor's shoulder as they finished, and this, more than the sight of provincial Topeka through the window, made me realize that I was in Kansas.

I did not leave the Governor for three hours. First we walked to his executive mansion, ten minutes away, and had lunch alone together. Then he got out his pipe, and we talked until so many visitors had been announced that I refused to stay any longer. The lunch was plain, a dish of soup with celery and hot biscuits, and a steamed pudding with hard sauce. I was asked to take a second helping of soup and declined. "If I tell you it's all you are going to get, won't you take it?" the Governor asked, and I still said no, not really believing him. But there was no main course. I thought this might be evidence of Kansas economy. I knew that all state salaries had been cut 25 per cent, and that the Governor, though the legislature refused to require it, had slashed his own pay from $5,000 to $3,750 a year. I had read about this and had not been impressed, for Landon has a comfortable fortune, as Kansas fortunes go, and is not dependent on his salary. But later I learned that Mrs. Landon sets one of the finest tables in the state, and her colored cook is famous for her art. The lunch was light because the Governor eats sparingly during the day, and since I had been brought along without due notice, I had to take pot luck.

The governor's mansion belongs to the state, so it does not reflect the taste of either of the Landons, which needs to be said. A more conventional middle-class home with less distinction in nearly every piece of furniture in it could not well be imagined. Mrs. Landon, whom I did not meet, is not like this home, for she is a woman of culture, has traveled much, is a musician of parts and an accomplished player of the harp. She is his second wife, the first Mrs. Landon having died soon after their daughter Peggy Ann was born, eighteen years ago. Peggy Ann is now at the University of Kansas. In 1930 Landon married Miss Theo Cobb of Topeka, and there are two children, three and two years old.

After the death of the first Mrs. Landon, the father devoted a great deal of his time to his child, trying to make up for the mother's loss. There is a close companionship between them, and the story is that Peggy Ann engineered the romance that led to the second marriage. Five years ago, when Landon decided to run in his first primary for governor, he prepared for it in a characteristic way. He took Peggy Ann, then twelve, as companion, and donning his soft shirt, soft hat, and high-laced oil boots, motored with her literally into every corner of the state. The costume was no sham, for this is the way he likes to dress. He is the kind of man who is as happy without a necktie as with one. On this trip, wherever he went he would call at the corner store, walk in comfortably, hold out his hand and say, "I'm Alf Landon." He was known everywhere by name, for he had managed the successful campaign of Clyde Reed for governor. On this tour I am sure that he treated the farmers of Kansas as he treated me, making them feel the same ease, informality, and interest. He said nothing about the governorship; hence he made no promises, only friends. And when, the next year, he entered the primary he swept it.

In a subsequent article I shall write about Landon's record, and quote from his speeches what little there is which throws light on his views. For all the time I had with him, and the reading I have done about him, I still feel that I cannot quite appraise him. He is a man formed as much as any man can be by his environment. Like every typical Kansan he is an honest believer in self-government and civil liberties. He knows a great many Kansans intimately, which means that he knows the tragedy of the last years in terms not of statistics but of human beings. He has given co-operation to the New Deal, in so far as a governor was called upon to cooperate with it. He favors social insurance. He understands the force and usefulness of social taxation. He has the warmest recognition of the need for federal relief. After talking with Rex Tugwell about soil erosion, in Washington early this year, he came back to praise him publicly for his intelligence. (Does Hearst know this?) If he were to become President, he would be inclined to keep whatever the Supreme Court left of the New Deal, and build on it. He also would be intensely interested in restoring and strengthening the civil service, and would like to broaden it so that only the top men in the Administration changed with the change of parties, as in England.

But his mind is full of more than these immediate details of government. He sees the interrelationship of things. A Kansan, he is bound to be interested in farm prosperity. But he knows that farm prices depend on foreign as well as home markets. There must be confidence internationally as well as at home; there must be the restoration of the gold standard. And confidence cannot return, or the gold standard be made to work, without the lowering of trade barriers and a free exchange of goods. In the last analysis, there can be no international confidence without peace. So he sees two general approaches to the work of the next President. He must put government finance on a sound foundation to give confidence to business. And then he must look beyond this to a resumption of international co-operation. This is the kind of gospel preached day after day by the Kansas City Star, which is close to Landon, and the ideas have more of a hold in the Middle West than Easterners may credit. Landon thinks in terms like these, though whether he talks that way to William Randolph Hearst and to Republican visitors from points east, I cannot say.

My impression was that Governor Landon, as a potential President, may suffer from the handicaps of his virtues; and his virtues being drawn from his Kansas environment, he will encounter difficulties due to the want of experience that Kansas has not been able to give him. To begin with, Kansas has hardly any industry; hence it has no labor problem. Landon is a friend of labor without, I believe, sensing the tension of the East or the tremendous struggle in Washington during the past two years over collective bargaining, or knowing in detail the tripping and thin-ice skating of President Roosevelt in this field. Furthermore, Kansas is a state without cities. This may be a mercy for Kansas but not for Governor Landon. Politics is child's play in such a state. It is clean-water politics, not pure, but not discolored by the filthy influx from a Tammany in New York, a Kelly machine in Chicago, a Pendergast machine in Kansas City. National politics are always foul from the source. One must wonder how Landon would be able to deal with it. But still more, I wonder how he would deal with the clever, hard-minded Republicans of the East. They are astute; they do not attack an upright provincial by cavalry-charge tactics but by weaving intricate confusion about him. They did it more than once to Roosevelt, a patrician of the East who knew their ways. And Landon lacks life-long friends in all parts of the country, wise men whose guidance he can rely on, and whose judgments he can trust. I am not so much worried about what Hearst would demand of him and get; for Hearst rides lightly to disillusionment. He was ardently pro-Roosevelt four years ago; and in another three years, if Landon were elected, I should expect him to turn on him as he has on Roosevelt. But Landon would have to be made of granite if, in Washington, surrounded by the masters of intrigue, he came through as well as he has in Kansas. I do not say that he is not of granite. I simply don't know.

(A second article by Mr. Swing on Landon as a candidate will appear in the next issue.)

The German Underground War

I. Anti-Nazi Feeling Rises

By JOSEPHINE HERBST

AS I started to write this article a letter came from Germany from the wife of a teacher whose home I visited this summer. There are several children in the family, one a boy of fourteen. The letter covers four closely written pages, and there are practically no personal messages; many words are heavily underscored. I am to remember that people outside Germany are fed on lies and on stories started by petty faultfinders. In the main things are simply splendid. Der Führer has chosen the best and only way. People do not understand the importance of the Jewish question, that it means everything to Germany. The Jews began their treacherous work during the war, when most of them stayed at home piling up wealth. Only the Führer saved the Fatherland from these people, and his warning took years to be heard. A few not so clever people have bungled in handling the Jewish problem, but one should look at history. Where will one find such a bloodless revolution? The victorious usually put their enemies to death, but in Germany they have merely taken them into "protective custody."

Here is a not unintelligent woman writing at a time when Catholics and Protestants are being driven farther into their corners, when opposition opinion has no chance to be heard except through underground channels. Although she has a boy of fourteen who is doomed to serve in a labor camp, she writes only of the Jewish question. To be sure, when I talked with them face to face, this German woman and her husband made many qualifications. No doubt many letters like hers are flooding the mails at the instigation of Herr Goebbels. The one note of realism in the letter is a complaint about prices. Prices are terrible.

In 1922 and 1923 prices were also terrible. It was the period of the inflation. The frightfulness of prices, the daily battle for one egg, a little meat, drove the German people into the arms of Hitler. Hitler's arms were strengthened by the enormous resources of the Krupps, the Thyssens, and other industrialists, who in this last year have been able to declare bigger dividends than before. The Socialists, Communists, and trade unionists had no such backing. In 1930 prices were still the subject of continual complaint. I was in Germany then, and many persons were willing to have anything happen. Some of the unpolitically minded were as ready for bolshevism as for fascism, whichever would give a future to the children. Now, after years of expectation and patience, they still have high and even higher prices. The cost of living rose so sharply this summer that food riots broke out in Berlin and even in small towns in the provinces.

How long will the psychological reasons for submission to Hitler hold in the face of continuing economic instability for the great mass of people? Hitler has been successful in selling to the Germans the idea that he saved the country and all Europe from bolshevism, and that bolshevism is a destructive force, a strictly Jewish movement. Lately the term bolshevism with too much use has begun to lose its sharp edge. The Catholics also have been accused of bolshevism. The result has been to throw them into the opposition movement. In the Saar one of the illegal papers of the underground movement appears with the hammer and sickle combined with the Catholic cross. A priest about to be arrested was warned by the underground route; his house was surrounded by workers and peasants from the neighborhood, few of whom were Catholic, and the troopers coming to arrest him turned back at the sight of the dense crowd.

The existence of the underground movement is denied in the legal press, but twenty illegal papers come out regularly in Berlin alone. Hundreds of others appear irregularly. The papers are distributed by children and by workers during their working hours. The penalty for distributing such contraband may be the concentration camp; it may be death. Strikes are treason, and leaders are punished by death at the hands of a firing squad or by sentences to concentration camps. Yet strikes go on. Dozens occurred last summer, especially in the metal trades. Sometimes the strike consisted in a passive laying down of tools for an hour. Sometimes work was merely slowed up, "sticking," as they term it, "to the hands." Demonstrations used to be made for the release of Thälmann, the Communist leader, but lately there have been none, and it is not known for certain whether he is alive or dead. Only Germans who get their information from the legal press have any illusions about the so-called "bloodless revolution" of the Nazis; blood has flowed and is flowing. But if this last year was marked by the further concentration of wealth in the hands of the big industrialists, it is also notable that in the same period the underground movement made its greatest progress.

The outside world is always impatient of the predicament of a particular nation. Other people are always stupid and gulled by their leaders. Even within Germany itself some underground workers still puzzle at the suddenness of Hitler's blow. How could the powerful trade-union movement have been so easily crushed? The German worker, they say, was ideologically the best-informed worker in the world; he read economics, was versed in Marxist theory. The German worker was also patient and endowed with power to wait and endure. His very virtues became a trap for him. His long training under an earlier militaristic Germany in which order was a god made him an easier dupe.

It has taken time to recover from the blow of Hitler's seizure of power. At first Socialists and Communists did not work together and had no association with outside groups. But conversion is not the aim of the underground. Communists are willing to work with Catholics for religious liberty, and if, as an underground worker told me, half of a group of Socialists working with Communists in getting out a paper turn Communist, such an event is the outcome of an experience and not the focus of the movement. That neutrals have become weary of the parades, the constant orders to beflag houses, to appear on streets for "spontaneous" demonstrations has made it a little easier for the underground to work. The spying eye may not be so willing to see all that goes on around it. Moreover, the circle of Hitler's enemies widens every month. New recruits for the underground are made by Hitler himself. When he dissolves the Stahlhelm he suddenly touches many a family not formerly antagonistic. As yet they may merely not be so ready to hang out flags; they may smother their resentment and grow only a trifle more angry at the rise of prices; but by these tokens they serve the opposition whether they know it or not.

The recent drives against Catholics and Protestants are in reality against all secret enemies of the Third Reich. The theory that the stresses and strains possible in a democracy cannot be allowed to exist in the Nazi state demands eternal warfare against the opposition. In truth the Nazis can continue to exist only by exterminating the enemy. But can they exterminate so many? The underground movement, pressed down, bludgeoned into the earth, spurts up again in a new place. Hundreds of Nazi spies seek to stop the circulation of illegal papers, in vain. With cunning and courage the underground workers carry on their warfare. A neat office worker with a glass eye tears out his glass eye for his secret work, puts on the clothes of a beggar, stumps along with an empty socket in his face, defying identification. A Nazi spy is found out, and on his window in bold letters, no matter where he may move, the information is given that Spy So-and-So lives within. Thus exposed, he is useless; he moves again, can find no hiding.

On the surface these tiny resistances seem mere pin pricks against the powerful front of the Nazis, but this front is to some extent deceptive. A people is made up of individuals, and in all Germany few persons appear happy, few talk freely, there is little play. Only once in several months did I see people having what appeared to be a good time. It was at night in a Nazi neighborhood of little clerks and petty officials. A corner beer cafe was brightly lighted, and through the partly open door voices singing old German songs came out. Through the opening I could see the beer maid standing by the table, swaying and leading the singing while the men waved their mugs. It was the only time I saw this happen—a common event in the old days when people often sang in beer halls. The mood of a people is not to be ignored, especially when at its base there is an organized and growing movement of resistance.

The war preparations of Hitler contain the germs of their own doom. Never did a people want war less and seem more certain to get it. With hypocritical cunning the Nazi leaders attempt to lull the people with talk of pacifism. They were delighted this summer at Mussolini's plans. Whether Italy won or lost, Germany seemed certain to gain. Particularly they hoped that the League of Nations would be discredited. "That foolish collective arrangement" the Germans want to see dissolve of ineptitude; meanwhile, with eyes on Italy, Germany is perfecting its war machine.

The inevitability of war is realized not only by the underground movement but by workers in general. Ask any of them what is ahead, and the brief answer is war. Perhaps this fortifies them so that they are willing to risk the strikes that always bring death or the concentration camp to some of them. They mean to make a fight for their freedom, and it is not by chance that in the underground press they frequently refer to themselves as slaves. Some workers hope that the ever-widening circle of Hitler's enemies will give the underground opposition strength to rid Germany of Hitler even before a great war comes; others feel they can only get rid of Hitler in such a world cataclysm.

The circle of enemies widens as the profits of the industrialists increase, as the living conditions of the workers go down with almost toboggan swiftness. The demonstrations against religious groups are grandstand play. The real enemy at the Nazi throat is bred by the Nazis themselves—the high prices and the depreciated standard of living of the masses. This enemy, of all their enemies, they are unable to down if they wish to protect the fortunes they were put in the saddle to perpetuate and increase. The Krupp works at Essen are working at full speed, but the sick list among Krupp workers went up 75 per cent last year as a result of the lowering of the standard of living.

A maid in a hotel complains that times are bad, tourists few, and only business men appear to travel, but she adds, "Anyhow we have our pride." Hitler reanimated the people by breaking down the Versailles treaty. But pride will not sustain a nation forever. Even Hitler's success with the youth movement carries a taint. Among the ardent Nazi youths many are too young as yet to test this new state. Can it give them jobs? So far its offer to youth is the labor and military camp. And within the labor camps an authentic junior opposition movement flourishes. Tiny leaflets are got out in secret; strikes break out over poor food, working conditions, even over songs they are asked to sing.

In 1924 I visited universities at Bonn, Jena, Freiburg, and Marburg. I lived in student homes where there was literally nothing to eat except black bread, cabbage, and plum jam. Students with set stern faces were already rabidly nationalistic in resentment at their defeat in the war. Maps of the world with patches of color to denote the presence of Germans were on the walls of the homes. At that time students wanted someone to blame. Hitler had begun to shrill in Munich, and his accusations against the Jews were part of his program. But few students knew of him. They were rather accusing the academic world of pre-war Germany with its slavish adherence to militarism. They wanted to get away from the old Germany; they blamed the academic mind and its worship of pure intellect. Students rebelled against old forms, went nature crazy, became vegetarians, gave up smoking, and, in disapproval of the old aristocratic corps, even eschewed beer-drinking. These perfectly good impulses to break the old pattern were frayed and wasted under the vacillating Social Democracy, and like spoiled children who tire of a too indulgent parent, they took to Hitler and his narrow fanaticism. Some of the students of 1923 and 1924 have gone into the camp of the opposition, many have knuckled under to the Nazi rule. This jumble of passions and feelings that followed the war was exploited by the Nazis. The young people have been particularly appealed to. Games and exercises are more diverting than hard studies. A sense of importance has been given to youth which will only be defeated by the actuality of a Nazi state. Can it provide for the future? The answer is, only by war.

Whether the youth will accept war remains to be seen. The older generation is dead against it, but is powerless. The avalanche has been set in motion; let him who can get out of the way. All are caught in the big downward slide. Little children do not spend much time with parents who might try to put anti-Nazi thoughts into their heads. Even on Sundays the child is taken from his parents for long hikes supervised by Nazi teachers. The entire world is being remade for the child in the Nazi form. No wonder parents are full of dread which makes them turn not unwillingly to news of an opposition movement. They may not be part of it, but they no longer are so willing to inform on someone who is.

[A second article by Miss Herbst on the German underground movement will appear in an early issue.]

The Architect and the World

By ALBERT MAYER

SO far as I know, no one has yet adequately examined the reasons for the débâcle—financial and moral—of the practice of architecture in this country, or inquired into the architect's status and influence in the world in which he lives. Certainly construction work will revive sometime. The question is whether the architects will resume the passive role of designing work all of whose essentials have been determined by others, or whether they will become capable of assuming a leading creative role. And if they do rise out of somewhat inglorious ashes, what sort of physical and spiritual frame for what sort of life will they attempt to create? It is as important for the public to demand and accept a grander role for architecture as it is for architects definitely to formulate its content.

To give continuity to such a picture, one must first sketch what the role of the architect has been hitherto, and how far he has himself contributed to the present débâcle. Several points stand out. In the first place, the architect has generally had to solve a set problem, the fundamentals of which have been determined by his client. Though he has often evolved ingenious methods of carrying out the premises, or even adjusted their relative importance, the individual architect has never deeply probed or fundamentally changed the project assigned him, nor have architects as a class taken a sufficiently bold and intelligent and united stand to influence or change the background out of which the fundamental decisions of other persons developed. In the second place, architects have never emerged from being a special class, a very genteel class. Other professions affect life at many points. Lawyers become the majority of our legislators local and national, and furnish all our judges. Engineers affect and even revolutionize our productive processes, and in many cases end up as managers of big business enterprises. College professors educate our youth, become Presidents, form brain trusts, write syndicated articles of wide influence for our newspapers. Architects at most have become members of municipal fine-arts commissions which control civic centers that never are built or make minor decisions concerning the classical façades of those that are. (A notable exception was the influence of Burnham in Chicago.)

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

In short, architects have not been part of the web of life. They have been a luxury class, called on to beautify and make reasonably palatable the products of a hit-or-miss civilization; they have been more or less high-grade embellishers of such a civilization. The more productive have also been good hand-shakers, a requirement which is often even more important than a talent for embellishment. They have contributed nothing independent; they have accepted the premises of over-congestion and its accompanying decay, have been content to help work out ingenious methods for attaining it, have suggested equally ingenious and absurd methods of double-decking and triple-decking highways for relieving it. They have contributed their part to the creation of snobbish and unlovely suburbs; they have acquiesced in the overbuilding of housing for the wealthier classes, and have done practically nothing toward pressing residential construction for the poor. Under the circumstances, with this absence of fundamental thinking and of resulting convictions, with this willingness to swim along with a muddy tide without even realizing its muddiness, there was no chance for architecture as an art to have any real development.

While this analysis may sound harsh, I have no desire to overstate the case. American architects should have full credit for great technical ingenuity in the development of both structural and mechanical methods, and for ingenious planning. But the unpardonable sin has been the use of these to make fundamental absurdities look more and more possible. We as architects have really nothing to complain of. We deserved to get it in the neck, and we have got it in the neck properly. The question now is: What can we do to restore architecture to its rightful social importance and aesthetic distinction, to the position it has had in any great period of architecture?

What is modern architecture? What should an architect be, what should constitute his qualifications? Of all the arts architecture is, of course, the most complex, involving an integration of the most varying types of constituent parts. It involves a background of planning and a feeling for trends—social, economic, physical—in which the particular structure harmoniously finds its place. For the particular structure or set of structures it involves visualizing how people live and work, how they want to live and work. It requires a sense of engineering and of structure, a knowledge of the suitability of materials and their permanence. It requires ability to coordinate the work of specialists who understand the detailed processes in these fields and the ability to check their specialist excesses and to canalize their idiosyncrasies. But these elements are not enough. Alone they tend to result in a rather barren statistical and sociological architecture, which is indeed the trend of the advanced work in this country. In addition to these elements, and above all, it requires on the aesthetic side a deep and permeating sense of what actuates all the arts, an understanding of what in all the arts makes for rhythm and form and color and plastic value. Out of utilitarian fitness the architect must create aesthetic fitness. When I say that it is indispensable to have a knowledge of the fundamentals of music, of sculpture, of painting, of mathematics, I don't mean that it is necessary to play the piano or to solve a differential equation, but I do mean that this whole range should be as a deep well of art from which the architect can draw for his inspiration. I do say that it is not enough to study architectural aesthetics and architectural styles, even when they come to be presented in our educational institutions as living organisms rather than as archaeological perfections. For it is the final problem of the architect to take all the diverse social, economic, physical, and structural elements and to sublimate them into stimulating creations interrelated with each other and with life. The architect must always keep alive an overpowering sense of harmony and of counterpoint, so that in the end his creations are inevitable and simple, so that ordinary people experience a feeling of elation, and a grasp of the ultimate simplicity and purpose of great architecture.

One obvious comment on this is that it demands supermen to carry it out. I think not. In the first place, it will be a good thing if mediocrities do stay out of architecture, if at one end the purely business man and at the other end those who, like a well-known advertiser, simply love nice things, are both discouraged from entering architecture. In the second place, the technical and the artistic elements outlined are similar in kind; they require a mind that unifies and simplifies. Architectural education can and should be reoriented so as to embrace these essential elements in place of the extraneous matters now included and in place of the large bulk of memory items. Finally and most important, collaboration of architects generally and of groups of architects will eliminate the enormous amount of time wasted by duplication of research into materials and methods.

Given such equipment, what should the architect do? One of his main jobs as an individual and as a class is to struggle boldly and tenaciously to establish conditions which will enable him to use such broad-gauged equipment. For in the last analysis it is the public which will determine what role it will let the architect play. We have already noted the background of broad general planning in which the architect's individual creations find an appropriate place. Here the architect has two distinct assignments: one is to help create an overwhelming sentiment in favor of such planning; the second is to take a hand in determining the objectives. It is tacitly assumed among the plan-minded that if such terms as regional planning, city planning, and so on, are accepted, all will be well. But infinitely more important is the question of objective: what does the plan seek, whom will it benefit, and who will pay the cost of the benefits? Nazi plans call for a sort of mythological racial purity with hereditary peasants and a distributive status quo, and the houses they are now building are meager, half-timbered, gabled medieval affairs in or near small villages. The Fascists' plans, like other plans operating on the basis of preservation of present inequality, hark back to ancient glories, and are centered on restoring the aura of ancient Rome. The Russian plan centers about the welfare of an industrial proletariat, and we see enormous primary construction, large housing schemes, parks of rest and culture. Such thumbnail summaries are, of course, oversimplifications, but they do fairly illustrate the issue: that the general ideological and social background determines the architect's work. Architects must also insist on a coordinate status in determining the essentials of a project, instead of as at present simply carrying out in detail the essential factors determined by someone else generally less qualified. An excellent example of how to proceed is furnished by the present housing situation. Instead of the architectural profession flaming into print and into action at the housing fatuities in Washington, it has been with almost no exceptions inarticulate.

In great periods of architecture the architect found himself in harmony with life at large; he was inspired by the current transcendent faith of his time. And indeed he was an important figure of his time, as the architect should be now. For the abbots and the bishops in the Middle Ages, the court chamberlains in ancient Egypt, rather than the actual craftsmen who carried out the detail, were the architects in the modern sense. Great architecture demands first a generally accepted background of life and aspiration of sufficient significance so that the artist and the creator can believe in it with passion and assume with serenity that it exists; and second a position of authority for architecture and the architect commensurate with his importance in a vital civilization and with the extraordinary demands made on him.

From this it can be seen that we are unlikely to achieve great architecture in this country in the near future. The conditions are not here and the architects are not here. Our job in these changing times is to struggle toward establishing the conditions that can produce great architecture, to educate new architects worthy of these conditions, and as far as we can, to create challenging examples which can be the forerunners of something great. The nearest approach to great architecture in modern times, certainly the most challenging mass movement, was the German housing and city rebuilding in the fifteen years after the war. Here the architects became leaders in the demand for a richer life, and simultaneously in the creation of its architectural frame. Of course, all this is changed, and the individuals responsible for it have been dismissed or banished by the Nazis. But what a splendid testimonial to them remains!

On the technical side, architecture has never before had the freedom from limitations of materials and methods that it has now. With steels and alloys, reinforced concrete, glass, insulating materials, electric transmission, with motor cars and aeroplanes, there is almost no limit on design however bold, or on the location of structures. But instead of achieving grander integration, this very structural progress has generally resulted in divorce of structure on the one hand from plan and façade on the other. The structure was made to jump through hoops at the command of fake premises laid down by exploiters and speculators. So that the very instruments that can, and one day will, produce an unprecedentedly splendid architecture have up to now simply accelerated the rate of confusion. Of course, this state of affairs exists not only in architecture but throughout our society. Architects alone won't change it; society must recognize the absurdities and injustices of a system based on exploitation and speculation. However, architects are all but forced to take a lead in such movements, for it is peculiarly their creations that cannot flower in such an atmosphere.

The architect's task is to produce an architecture of content and form as idiomatic of our time as Gothic was of its time. And as the Gothic style was international in its day because of the general similarity of beliefs and of available methods, so there will be an international style of our day, not necessarily "the international style" so-called. It will no more be monotonous than a succession of Gothic cathedrals is monotonous. It will differ as between architects and from place to place and from country to country, but there will be some uniformity of underlying idiom as there always is in all great architecture. It may have the severe beauty of Gropius's Bauhaus, the magnificent scale and open flow of the schools and housing of Romerstadt, the romanticism of Dudok's City Hall in Hilversum, the rocky beauty of some of Frank Lloyd Wright's work, or the fluent transparency of Brinkman and Vander Vlugt's Van Nelle factory. Different as these are they employ means and they meet needs and desires of this time and of no other. But they have an abiding beauty which any age will recognize; they evoke in the beholder emotions and a realization of beauty and fitness as compellingly as Greek temples or Gothic cathedrals. They are the challenging forerunners.

Possibly such a manifesto as this should have been formulated by someone longer in the field of architecture than I. But it is now five years since the visible débâcle of architecture in this country and nothing has been forthcoming. It is time that the theses were nailed to the door.

Correspondence

"The Crisis of the Middle Class"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am an employable man not on relief. For forty years, almost, I have breathed the air of this earth, educating myself, working days and attending law school nights, saving, struggling from the lower rungs of the ladder into the higher responsibilities of a bank executive, and from there—foolishly, as it turned out—into investment banking, a year before the crash. What is there in the world for me and mine today? A man with a daughter of fifteen and another of six and a trusting, hopeful wife cannot nigger about the truth.

I have been a member of the bar for twelve years. Today that great profession offers two truly remarkable openings: firms surcharged with overhead would be delighted to have my name painted upon the door if I would agree to share the overhead, or to take me on as an associate provided I devoted a goodly portion of my time to the more menial duties around their office. Thus far I have not seen my way clear to accept either proposition. I have a shingle, weathering outside the front door. I have the law books which, during fifteen years, have cumulatively cost me many hundreds of dollars. I file ejectments for landlords, now; sue for dinky sums. I wait for fees, and often take them in the form of ice from my ice man or coal from a business man, perhaps oil from another, and good wishes from a number of others. You ask how it is I am not connected with some one of the alphabetical agencies of the New Deal? I am of the wrong political persuasion, it seems.

Have I been to the FERA people? Indeed, I have. Thin soles and frayed underwear and want upon want drove me there in spite of all the pride I ever had. I gave them all the information their forms required and waited. By and by a letter came about the Federal Housing Administration, suggesting that I might qualify as a canvasser. I sent my whole life's history into the local office. Back it came with a letter, "The information has been noted in our records"; and the wait began. The winter grew colder. Wants pressed more insistently. My daughter needed medicine. My wife's folks, with whom we had doubled up, were themselves pressed with mortgage troubles and long unemployment. Beans and potatoes were the mainstays of our diet. Something had to be done. Perhaps the HOLC would take me on. No good, all jobs filled. I had long ago discovered that house-to-house canvassing was not in my line. I could not afford to run around in my car, paying my own expenses, trying to sell something like vacuum cleaners or oil heaters on a questionable commission basis. Back I went to the FERA office. The kindly man sent for my "file," looked at it, folded his hands, and sat for a moment. He said finally: "You're not living in your own house, I see. That means that if you go on the relief rolls you'll get less, by far, than I could give you if you had your own place. It's too bad you have a car. And a very expensive radio, too. But I might overlook those things, seeing it's you. Tell you what: we might arrange a place for you—a sort of domicile for your family. Even if it's only one room, and to all intents and purposes your family is living there, that would put you down as the head of a family. Your chances of getting more would be better, you see?" I nodded. Yes, much better. "Before we go on relief, though, let's see what we can find. There'll be an investigator out here from the in-town office in a week or so. I'll have him look you over with the other men he'll see for a job as interviewer. Pays—ah—lemme see—twenty-four hours a week duty—pays $22.50 a week. Want me to put you down for it?"

Again I nodded. Again the wait. A week, two weeks, a month. The man came from in-town. I sat at his desk. Told him my tale, backwards and forwards, took an hour of his time, though, really, he took an hour of mine, for he admitted to me his ambition to become a lawyer, confessed what a frightfully bad memory he had, jotted down my hint that he read and study Robinson's "The Mind in the Making," Schofield's "The Unconscious Mind," and Pitkin's "The Psychology of Achievement." Nothing happened.

The WPA projects swoon if I try to hit them for a job: they take only those who are on the relief rolls—and I have a five-year-old car and a radio! So I am an employable man not on relief. What can one do?

Brookline, Mass., December 20 LAWRENCE E. HANSON

Is this Sarcasm?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The piece in your issue of December 11 concerning the annual expense of Lady Mendl's attire is such a cheap and unmitigated piece of demagoguery as to shame the meanest Union Square soapbox orator. Just be "realistic," and imagine what kind of a world we'd have if the Lady Mendls and their kind were eliminated. No color, no contrast. Look at England and the pomp and circumstance every time there is a national anniversary or royal wedding. The proletariat just love it.

It is such tawdry sentiments as you express in your article that keep The Nation down to its negligible circulation. You are out of tune with the great mass of Americans whose interests you are supposed to speak for.

Atlanta, N. Y., December 13

H. A. WHIPPLE

A Memoir of Æ

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Macmillan Company of London has arranged to publish a Memoir of Æ (the late G. W. Russell) by his friend Mr. John Eglinton, and I should be extremely grateful to your readers for the loan of any letters or documents by Æ which might be of interest or assistance in this study of his life and work. The utmost care would be taken of any such material addressed to me at this office, St. Martin's St., London, W.C.2, and the papers would be copied and returned with the least possible delay.

London, November 30

FREDERICK MACMILLAN

A 3-Way Guide: TELLS, SHOWS, EXPLAINS:

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

By O. B. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by R. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Oh.M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London, England

— and —

CHARTS OF SEX ORGANS WITH DETAILED EXPLANATIONS

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M.D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital

CONTENTS

- Section I. Bride and Groom
- Section II. The Cold Wife—Frigidity
- Section III. The Unsatisfied Wife
- Section IV. Married Courtship
- Section V. The Perfect Physical Expression of Love
- Section VI. Illustrative Charts and Explanations

THE CHARTS

- Female Sex Organs, Side View •
- The Internal Sex Organs • The External Sex Organs • Female Sex Organs, Front View • Entrance to Female Genital Parts • Male Sex Organs, Side View • Male Sex Organs, Front View • Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views. (Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

“From a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly. As a general thing, even in so-called normal coitus, the man considers only himself and not the woman at all.”

COMMENTS

“This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized.”

—Quarterly Review of Biology

“Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place.”

—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

“Tells the ordinary man and woman what they want to know, simply and directly. I should like to compel everyone—particularly men—to read it (they'd give women a straighter deal if they did).”

—Éthel Mannin in the New Leader

“Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the ‘frigid wife’.”

—General Practice

“The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest.”

—American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

“Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs.”

—Journal of the American Medical Association

* The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

Only $1.95 (Postage 15c extra) EMERSON BOOKS, Dept. 311-N. 333 Sixth Ave., N. Y. C.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Labor and Industry

Walter Winchell's Tooth

By HEYWOOD BROWN

I HAVE screamed on a great many occasions that labor news is very inadequately reported in the newspapers of this country. The best showing is made in New York City with the Times giving the most complete and accurate coverage. The Herald Tribune is well above the average for the rest of the country. But I want to cite one specific instance of recent journalistic shortsightedness. Of course, a single incident does not make a case. But it may be symptomatic, and there is a virtue in specific allegations.

All right, then. John L. Lewis is the president of the United Mine Workers of America, which is the most powerful union in the A. F. of L. set-up. He is, moreover, the driving force in the movement toward industrial unionism. Many people think that the history of America may be largely written, for the next few years at any rate, in terms of the success or failure of this movement. Nobody in the political or economic field would deny that Lewis is one of the most important figures in the current march of events.

He came to New York on December 18 to make a speech before a general meeting of the American Newspaper Guild. The meeting was held at the Hotel New Yorker. It was open, a press table was set up, and reporters were present. No prepared advance copy was offered. Mr. Lewis spoke extemporaneously and without notes for a matter of forty-five or fifty minutes. To some extent the speech was an informal one, extending greetings to the guild. But before he was done, John L. Lewis took occasion to criticize John W. Davis severely for his criticisms of the National Labor Disputes Act. These criticisms were based on a reply issued from the law office of John W. Davis that afternoon in the matter of the Morris Watson case.

This is an action against the Associated Press on behalf of a guild vice-president who was discharged abruptly after seven years of service. It is contended that Morris Watson was fired because of his organizational activities. It is quite possible that the Watson action may be the test case to be brought before the Supreme Court. Lewis, speaking as a labor leader, criticized very sharply the attitude of business men in general who are fighting collective bargaining. It so happens that his address before the guild was the first speech which he has made in New York in a couple of years. If he had been speaking before a publishers' convention or the Pennsylvania Society or the Daughters of the American Revolution, I haven't any doubt that a speech by John L. Lewis would have been pretty fully reported. The fact that his audience was made up of guild members reduced the space allowed in the Times to a few scant paragraphs. And the Herald Tribune made no mention of the story at all.

I was interested because in looking over Mr. Ogden Reid's paper I observed an article of some three or four hundred words on the fact that Walter Winchell had been punched in the mouth by two unidentified assailants and that one of their blows had knocked out a tooth. I was interested because I am a friend of Mr. Winchell's, and, in addition, when people make physical attacks on columnists

I unconsciously identify myself with the victim. It makes my teeth ache all over.

I was less interested than I might have been because Walter Winchell's thrilling experience had already been reported. In fact, Mr. Winchell's tooth broke for the evening papers. Moreover, I had seen him before the Herald Tribune story appeared, and he assured me that no tooth had been knocked out. The cause célèbre boiled down to the fact that a pivot tooth had been slightly loosened. It was already wired back into place by the time Mr. Reid's newsboys were disseminating the momentous and slightly distorted material.

Of course, newspapers are often rushed, and a night editor cannot be expected to look every gift story in the mouth. I'm quite ready to admit that if Walter Winchell is punched, that is news; although I would not put it in the list of either epochal or strange incidents. I have said that Mr. Winchell is a friend of mine, and so I hope he will not take umbrage if I insist that a fighting speech by the most prominent labor leader in America today is more properly a matter of journalistic concern than any porcelainic tragedy in the life of the Mirror's Broadway columnist. I am not maintaining that John L. Lewis is always right; neither is Walter Winchell, for that matter. My contention is merely that Lewis, hot or cold, looms larger in the progress of world affairs.

I do not know that the works of Walter Winchell may not all be printed on vellum immediately after his death and preserved for posterity. But even so, labor and politics are more directly the concern of a daily paper than belles-lettres. Sometimes critics of the press are a little too captious and suspicious. Not every failure to report the news is the result of a deep-dyed reactionary plot. I don't think that Lewis was allowed to come and go without mention in the columns of the Herald Tribune on account of any set and prepared policy of the paper. I am quite ready to give a break to that lively sheet. I am ready to hazard the guess that the omission was due to sheer stupidity.

Nevertheless, I have no desire to shower compliments of this sort on the entire press of the country. I think that, generally speaking, labor is badly reported because newspaper publishers are large owners or, at the very least, represent large owners. Gentlemen of this stripe rather prefer not to have trade unionism talked about. This is particularly true when it comes close home and touches the organization of their own reportorial employees. In the case of the Lewis speech there was the further fact that he attacked the Associated Press in criticizing its counsel, John W. Davis.

Now the Associated Press is a sacred cow to practically all American newspapers. It is the sacred cow because, if I may be permitted to switch metaphors in midstream, the A. P. is the very spinal column of American journalism. Scratch its surface and thousands of papers bleed. But it is essential that when the A. P. is under attack, the fullest publicity should be given to the facts. Otherwise the integurity of the entire American press falls under a cloud. In theory the Associated Press has no editorial position. It is not supposed to be Republican or Democratic, conservative or radical. The fine picture painted for the public is that of a pipe-line through which the news flows freely and without distortion by the introduction of impurities. If this is the case, the Associated Press must report a case in which it is involved just as freely as it would handle a similar situation involving any other organization. So far, it has not done so. There have been several preliminary skirmishes in the Watson case in which the guild has stated its position only to find, "the Associated Press has nothing to say."

Somebody should blast this silent treatment. Indeed, I think that organized labor will learn that it is gravely handicapped until it gets fairer news treatment for those matters which concern its very life. We shall have to grow up to a point where John L. Lewis is not obscured in the shadow of Walter Winchell's tooth.

Company Unions on the Railroads

By BUDD L. MCKILLIPS

BEHIND barbed-wire stockades, and with professional strike-breakers, armed guards, and stool pigeons functioning as midwives, railroad company unions were born by the score in the summer and fall of 1922. With the aid of periodical financial transfusions from railroad treasuries, frequent bribery of leaders, and systematic coercion of members, they lived a hot-house life until 1933. Then the workers, inspired by new federal railroad labor legislation and an intensive campaign launched by the A. F. of L. Railway Employees Department, began gleefully kicking them into the boneyard.

They kicked hard and frequently. As a result, bona fide international labor organizations replaced approximately 550 company unions on seventy-seven railroads between June, 1933, and November, 1935. There are still about fifty roads—most of them small lines—to be "mopped up." The Pennsylvania system and the Santa Fé are the only large company-union strongholds left; and a serious breach was made in the Santa Fé fortress during October when the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks won a union-representation election conducted by the National Mediation Board among 5,000 clerical employees. In general, company unionism on the railroads has been confined to shop and roundhouse employees. Clerks, maintenance-of-way employees, and telegraphers have suffered from it to some extent on a few roads. It is practically non-existent in the train and engine services.

Prior to 1922 company unions were almost unheard-of on the railroads. On July 1 of that year the Federated Shop Crafts—Machinists, Boilermakers, Blacksmiths, Electrical Workers, Carmen, and Sheet Metal Workers—went on a nation-wide strike against a 10 per cent wage cut, the second within twelve months. The Stationary Firemen and Oilers struck a few weeks later.

Three days after the shopmen walked out, Ben W. Hooper, chairman of the now defunct United States Railroad Labor Board, issued a proclamation that was applauded by every hard-boiled anti-union boss in America. Hooper, a former Republican governor of Tennessee whom President Harding had appointed as a neutral member of the board, showed his impartiality by declaring in his proclamation that men taking the strikers' jobs would not be strike-breakers but would be performing an "indispensable service," and, therefore, "entitled to the protection of every branch of the government." Furthermore, Hooper asserted with great emphasis, each railroad "should take steps as soon as practicable . . . to form some sort of association" of the "replacement men." The railroads wasted no time in taking Mr. Hooper's advice. The steps were identical in almost every case. Railroad officials picked a few key men in each shop as committeemen for the new organization. Railroad attorneys drafted constitutions and by-laws. Thus the company unions were born.

Late in September the strike was settled on a number of the roads, and relations between the managements and the standard unions were resumed on those lines. The roads which did not settle dug their company unions in deeper. "Yellow-dog" contracts were instituted on a wholesale basis. Some railroads offered special inducements to make company unionism attractive. On the Atlantic Coast Line any shopman who did not pay his dues to the company union promptly each month was classed as "inefficient" and had his pay reduced two cents an hour. If that penalty didn't bring him to time he was fired or given obnoxious jobs around the shop.

Not all the company unions had dues. In some cases the railroads openly paid all expenses. For a long time the Pennsylvania spent one million dollars a year to keep its fourteen company unions going. Less generous railroads made the employees pay part of the bills. The process was simple. Each employee automatically became a company-union member, and the monthly dues were deducted from his pay checks. But whether the railroad paid all the bills or forced the employees to bear part of the expense, the result was always the same—the management absolutely controlled the company union, hand-picked its officers, approved its constitution, and drafted all "agreements."

I have examined scores of these constitutions and alleged agreements. All contain loopholes through which any railroad could drag its largest locomotive. For instance, here is the working-hours provision in the Pennsylvania company-union agreement: "The normal working hours will be eight per day but may by mutual agreement exceed nine hours per day." The important question of seniority rights is disposed of in the statement that the "employer is to be the judge."

The Pennsylvania "agreement" is a 117-page closely printed booklet. It contains complicated wage provisions covering thirty-two day-wage rates, eighteen piece-work factors, and thousands of piece-work prices. I spent two weeks among the road's 12,000 shop employees at Altoona, Pennsylvania, and did not find a single man who understood what that cross-word puzzle of rates meant. The agreement was drafted by the company and approved after "five hours' study" by a hand-picked committee. T. H. Davis, the chairman of this committee, admitted to a Congressional committee in 1934 that after his group approved the agreement, the Pennsylvania management paid him $275 a month to "represent" the men.

What happened on the Pennsylvania was typical of what was going on in company-union circles on the other railroads. The man whom the Great Northern picked as general chairman for its shopmen had been exposed a few years before as an operative for a labor-spy agency. The leader of the Minneapolis and St. Louis company-union movement had been expelled from a bona fide labor organization for an attempted betrayal of his fellow-workers.

The whole story of railroad company unions is a sordid one. So-called agreements were approved when they called for wages ten to fifteen cents lower than the rate for the same kind of work on lines where the bona fide organizations had contracts. Time and one-half for overtime was eliminated in scores of instances. Other valuable working conditions, which had prevailed for years before the company unions were formed, were wiped out.

During the more than eleven years that these fake organizations flourished there is no case on record in which a single one of them initiated a move for increased wages, sought to secure beneficial labor legislation, or lifted a finger to prevent wage cuts. On the other hand, when the bona fide unions would open negotiations for wage increases on roads where they had agreements, other railroads—company-union lines—would hurriedly "negotiate" a new wage agreement with their own hand-picked committees, granting an increase of a cent or two an hour, a fraction of what the real unions were asking on competing roads.

A classic illustration of this trickery was exposed in 1929 in the decision of the United States Supreme Court against the Texas and New Orleans and in favor of the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks. In 1927 the brotherhood—an A. F. of L. union—asked the Southern Pacific for a wage increase. The S. P., for operating purposes, is divided into two parts. East of El Paso it is called the Texas and New Orleans. On the western part of the system the wage question went to arbitration and the brotherhood won. On the lines east of El Paso—the T. and N. O.—the management attempted to set up a company union.

In a letter to President McDonald of the Southern Pacific, H. M. Lull, executive vice-president of the T. and N. O., explained why he had made this move. He said that on the basis of the award on the western lines the clerks under his jurisdiction were likely to get an increase of $340,000 a year. "If we are successful in setting up a company union," said Mr. Lull, "I am satisfied we can make a settlement at a cost not to exceed $75,000 a year." In other words, a company union among the clerks alone on one-half of the Southern Pacific was worth $265,000 a year.

The A. F. of L. unions made repeated attempts to organize the company-union roads. Employees, however, were discriminated against or fired outright when they showed symptoms of wanting to discard the dummies. With the exception of the Chicago and Alton, where the shopmen killed their company union in 1928, little progress was made until 1933. The downfall of the company unions began in March, 1933, when the standard railroad labor organizations, through Senator George Norris of Nebraska, amended the federal Bankruptcy Act so that any railroad in re-

THE PASSING OF THE NAIL FILE

TWENTY YEARS AGO, the wise car driver carried a nail file to clean the platinum points in the distributor.

Today, the nail file is banished from the automobile tool kit. Tungsten points, developed in the General Electric Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, N. Y., have replaced soft and expensive platinum. There is little need to file tungsten points. Hidden away, requiring no attention, they break electric circuits half a million times an hour and save car owners millions of dollars a year.

Is this all G-E research has done for 24 million car owners? No! It has given new welding methods—and a stronger and safer car at lower cost; Glyptal finishes—and the expense of repainting your car is postponed for years; headlights and highway lighting—night driving becomes safer for motorist and pedestrian.

Every product that carries the G-E name has built into it the results of G-E research. Other industries—and the public that buys the goods of those industries—have benefited by this research, that has saved the American people from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric.

96-186H

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

ceivership was forbidden to (1) spend any funds to maintain company unions; (2) require any employee to sign a "yellow-dog" contract; (3) fail to notify all employees "by an appropriate notice that said [yellow-dog] contract has been discarded and is no longer binding on them in any way."

The big Missouri Pacific system was then in receivership. Its company unions crashed. Others began to crumble on roads which were going through the wringer.

In 1934 the standard organizations staged another Congressional battle for the right of the workers to choose their own unions. This drive ended in June when Congress amended the Railway Labor Act of 1924 so as to provide stiff penalties—fines and imprisonment—for any railroad, solvent or bankrupt, which gave financial aid to a company union and for any railroad official, or his "agent," who interfered in any way with the right of employees to belong to labor unions of their own choosing.

The old United States Mediation Board, which had never been anything except an asylum for needy politicians, was scrapped and a new three-member National Mediation Board created to administer the revised Railway Labor Act. Headed by Dr. William M. Leiserson, a labor economist of national reputation, the new board has supervised union-representation elections, investigated alleged acts of coercion by rail officials, and functioned thoroughly in a fair and decent manner. In addition to Dr. Leiserson, the members of the board are James W. Carmalt, former chief examiner for the Interstate Commerce Commission, and Otto S. Beyer, a consulting engineer, who replaced John Carmody when the latter was transferred to the National Labor Board.

Legislative broadsides against company unions were followed by the launching of intensive unionization campaigns on the part of standard organizations in shops and round-houses throughout the land. Many of the railroads made various undercover attempts to keep their company unions going. Open financial assistance had to be withdrawn, but there is no question that some of the roads found methods to provide the dummies with funds. Many of the company unions also received a helping hand in the form of lay-offs for men who joined bona fide organizations. The Southern Pacific, in October, 1934, when the Mediation Board was preparing to hold a representation election on that system, made an "agreement" with its company union whereby 40 per cent of the shop employees were to be laid off. The word was then passed that this lay-off would not be made if the A. F. of L. were "kept off the lines." This was coercion of the worst kind. But less than three months later 6,416 of the Southern Pacific's 8,619 shopmen voted for representation by the A. F. of L. Railway Employees Department.

The organization movement started in 1933 hit high speeds throughout 1934. The Union Pacific, fifth largest railroad in the nation, went A. F. of L. on the day President Roosevelt signed the Railway Labor Act amendments. The big Illinois Central, the Northern Pacific, the Rock Island, the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western, and the Nickel Plate were among the roads on which the shopmen won A. F. of L. representation during 1934. The gains of the bona fide unions have continued through 1935. During the twelve months ending June 30, 1935, thousands of workers voted in representation elections conducted by the board. Seventy-three per cent voted for the standard unions.

The Brotherhood of Railway Clerks has practically eliminated company unions so far as clerical workers are concerned. The Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees is doing the same thing for section men and other track workers. The Order of Railroad Telegraphers is driving out the few dummies that plagued it. The Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, an A. F. of L. union composed exclusively of colored workers, put the Pullman Company's union out of business last July by a vote of 5,931 to 1,422.

The standard unions have met with some setbacks in their campaign. They lost the representation election among shopmen on the Atlantic Coast Line by a few votes. Charges of coercion by the management were investigated by the National Mediation Board and found to be substantiated. A new election was ordered, but this is being held up by an injunction secured by the company union. An injunction is also blocking a Mediation Board poll among Western Maryland shop employees.

On the Rock Island a year and a half ago the A. F. of L. shop craft unions won the election and negotiated an agreement with the management. But Federal Judge Richard J. Hopkins of Topeka, Kansas, was still refusing as late as November 6, 1935, to dismiss an injunction he issued in July, 1934, requiring the Rock Island to continue deducting company-union dues from employees' wages. This puts the Rock Island management in the peculiar position of violating the Railway Labor Act by continuing the company-union check-off, and running the risk of being cited for contempt of court if it quits acting as a dues collector for the illegal and defunct dummy.

There are some tough fights ahead of the standard organizations before the last company union is abolished. The diehard railroads are making a determined stand in a number of instances through an organization known as the Brotherhood of Railroad Shop Crafts of America. It claims to be an "independent labor organization." Facts show otherwise, however. This "brotherhood" was founded at Chicago early in July, 1934, at "a gigantic convention" (according to press releases sent to all newspapers at that time) of "delegates representing more than 70 per cent of the shop workers from seventy-five railroads." A few days later more press releases told of a "monster mass-meeting" of Altoona shopmen to form a local union of the "new brotherhood." The press releases were sent out by L. T. Henderson, a high-powered publicity man for the Pennsylvania. There were exactly twenty delegates, representing no one except the reactionary element in railroad management, at the "gigantic" Chicago convention, and only 110 at the "monster mass-meeting" in Altoona. Eighty-nine of the 110 were identified as Pennsylvania shop foremen and other officials.

To complete the exposé of the fake, the Wall Street Journal unwittingly spilled the beans by frankly explaining to its big-business readers that the railroad managements "cooperated" in creating the "brotherhood" because "development of a national union out of the so-called company unions is necessary under the new Rail Labor Act, which requires a union to be national before it can be recognized by the National Board of Adjustment"—a sub-tribunal of the National Mediation Board. This explanation was captioned: "Carrier-Supported Body Is Opposed to A. F. of L."

[This is the first of a series of articles on company unions. The second—dealing with company unions in the automobile industry—will appear next week.]

Books and Drama

The Fair Field

The Vision of Piers Plowman. By William Langland. Newly Rendered into Modern English by Henry W. Wells. With an Introduction by Nevill Coghill. Sheed and Ward. $3.

WILLIAM LANGLAND, or whoever it was that wrote "Piers Plowman" (it may have been not one man but five, and if it was one man he may have been William de la Rokele), was a contemporary of Chaucer, and to a reader of modern poetry this is the most interesting fact about him. For in the sense that Chaucer was modern he was not; he was medieval, as Chaucer was in part but only in part. The medieval part of Chaucer has ceased to be wholly intelligible and naturally interesting; and the same thing goes, tragically or not, for Langland in his entirety. Langland cannot be understood today without a commentary which is almost as long as he is; Chaucer can be understood wherever there is an interest in personality and in the kind of narrative which returned to England with the Renaissance—the kind represented by the "Canterbury Tales," by the plays of Shakespeare, and by the modern novel. To say that Chaucer and Shakespeare and Tolstoy are more complex than Langland is to stray from the truth and to miss the point of the comparison. They are vastly more simple. Their works contain many elements, but the reference is always single—it is to the nature of man as we have known him since he became once more the measure of all things. His life may have its ups and downs, but it follows a single line—the curving line of nature. For Langland there was the God of nature, too; stories for him took place at the same time on earth and in heaven, and the least number of meanings that a narrative could have was four: its "simple" meaning, to adopt Mr. Coghill's nomenclature, its "transferred" meaning, its "moral" meaning, and its meaning in eternity. Now all this may have been other than complex to a medieval reader, since he could accept such a system of references without effort. But there is little use in pretending that we can go the whole way even with effort. Something has been lost out of the world, and it probably cannot be replaced. There may be another Middle Ages ahead of us, but the chances are slight that it will be like Langland's.

A reader coming eagerly to another translation of this famous poem is bound in some measure, then, to be disappointed. If he has heard that it describes fourteenth-century England he will find it doing so in a way for which he has not been prepared. There are no individuals, picturesque or otherwise, though there are landscapes and interiors; there are only classes and trades, and among them move abstractions with such names as Lady Meed, Dowell, and the Active Man. Nor will the classes be clear, since they are not entities to be contemplated in themselves. They lead us like everything else in the poem to the fourth level of theology; where, since we have no theology of our own, we wander through a maze of capitalized words which even a historian of philosophy cannot make lucid to us as they once were lucid. Least of all, knowing beforehand that the poem is eloquent concerning the miseries of the medieval poor, may we expect that a revolution is recommended by the poet. Revolutions take place in history but not in heaven. Langland was simply reminding his England of what the unchanging universe was like; and we are both too fond of change and too skeptical about the universe to be capable of following where he goes. This is not to say that we are superior. It is only to say that some clocks cannot be turned back.

When every such thing is said, the poem remains vigorous and impressive, and Mr. Wells has done more than any of his predecessors in translation to make it sound like the masterpiece it originally was. He has understood the alliterative measure as no one else has done, for he has heard it and felt it, and I fancy that the measure is restored in his pages to its pristine effect. He has preserved in nearly every line the feminine ending of Middle English; but what is more important, he has steadily provided the poem with a speaking voice of its own, ■ a passage taken more or less at random warmly proves:

In the histories of holy saints it is hard to witness
That God rewards double rest to any rich person.
There is much mirth among the rich with meat and fine clothing,
And there is much mirth in May among wild creatures,
And as long as summer lasts they live happily.
But beggars about midsummer go breadless to supper,
And winter is yet worse, for they are wet-shod wanderers,
Frozen and famished and foully challenged
And berated by rich men so that it is rueful to listen.
Now Lord, send them summer or some manner of happiness
After their going hence for what they have here suffered.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Reality of Symbols

Symbols of Government. By Thurman W. Arnold. Yale University Press. $2.50.

GOVERNMENT may, I suppose, be defined as the tangle of usages by which the activities of individuals are imperfectly domesticated to the service of the commonwealth. If so, it is much too vital and disorderly an affair to be captured within the trim lines of a political system or expounded in the precious dialectic of a textbook. It is a drama in which the officers of state are merely the cast in the foreground, and a host of actors back of the limelight give character and direction to the performance. They are animated by the miscellany of motives—group interest, public purpose, and personal ambition—which impels all human conduct. The intricate rules of the eternal game dictate an ever-shifting outcome.

Among the counters with which the game is played are "symbols." A party identifies its petty interest with a universal value or an eternal cause. A wet does not defend his thirst, but personal freedom. It isn't the privilege of the employer to exploit workers which is important, but freedom of contract. A failure in personal justice finds an excuse in the integrity of the law; an abuse of power is sanctioned as ■ necessary respect for authority. A national isolation wears the garb of traditional Americanism. On the English coat-of-arms "Dieu et Mon Droit" proclaims the divine sanction of imperial aggression.

At this moment the clash of interests in American government is a battle of symbols. A chain of dailies—whose slogan should really be "an un-American newspaper for uninformed readers"—is attempting to identify everything of which the proprietor disapproves with communism. An association of manufacturers—hardly itself immune to the charge—is seeking to fasten "fascism" upon an unfriendly Administration. For years ■ immunity of corporations to regulation has invoked the rights of the individual in its defense; and of late the lawlessness of business—in defying the processing tax, the Guffey coal act, and the registration of holding companies—has been wrapped in the unction of reverence for the Constitution.

It is the part of such stage-play in politics which tempts Thurman Arnold's curiosity in "Symbols of Government." If he were a Victorian he would look upon such lapses from rationality as frivolities in need of eradication. If he were an evangelical reformer he would make of a series of pamphlets a blast in a crusade for a return to reason. But he is the kind of realist—if there is any such thing—who knows that a veil of make-believe lies between man and his social world and that to most persons symbols are more real than realities. To him this truth is inescapable—so it is, so it has always been, so until the crack of doom it must continue to be.

But the primacy of make-believe is more than a matter of current drama. It has thoroughly penetrated into all our explanations of the affairs of mankind. The author insists that a symbolic man—not the human creature of kindness and greed, love and lust—animates every one of the social sciences. To him a current medicine is based upon “the conception of a body as mechanically constructed as an automobile”; psychiatry won its entrée on the fiction “of an abstract man with a subconscious mind.” Law—“a moral and logical science”—had to postulate “an abstract man” who needed to be preached at and “was capable of being trained by judicial parables and statutory exhortations.” The economic man—invented to explain “why humanitarian and moral ideas cannot be pushed too far”—is “an automatic fellow”; with “intelligent selfishness” his “sins will all cancel each other.” As purpose varies, so must the symbolic man respond. The economic man is “an automaton who needs only to be wound up and set going.” The legal man, on the contrary, is “a sinner,” who must constantly “be subjected to the influence of ideals held just in front of his nose.”

In like manner a make-believe—without which it would be impossible to get on—has woven itself into the very fabric of our culture. The pomp, ritual, and rhetoric are the very essence—not ornamental attendants—of the judicial process. A conception of a bench of wise and informed—but human—judges doing their fallible best with the causes which come their way would not do. The necessities of justice demand the fiction of it-is-not-I-who-speaks-but-the-law-which-speaks-through-me. A real law enforcement may be an utterly unattainable ideal. It is no more possible to enforce all the laws on the statute books than to establish a theology upon “all the texts in the Bible.” But upon auspicious occasions—as, for example, the Boston police strike—it has proved a mighty shibboleth. The current processes of law still bear the impress of the primitive ceremonials out of which they sprang. A great hazard—perhaps the greatest hazard to the New Deal—is the necessity of submitting the validity of measures of public policy to trial by an ordeal of legalism.

But a cursory review presents the flavor rather than reveals the richness of the book. It is easy enough to quarrel. The reader may deny that man loves to sit at the window and watch himself go by dressed in a motley of uniforms. Instead, he may insist that it is the need for conformity to different aspects of a heterogeneous culture which forces upon man a multiple personality. The critic may, in the words of a Negro preacher, exclaim that such a doctrine would “destroy all the theology in the world.” But here the author has his come-back, in that if his theses “came to be generally accepted, they would no longer be true.” And, if he wishes, he can point a moral and put his argument to practical account. If you would reform an institution, don’t shock those you would convert with radical theories. Capture the symbols of the enemy and attack in the name of the thing you would amend. If Congressional enactments are set aside, it is possible to appeal from the gloss of judicial decision to the text of the sacred parchment. A Presidential campaign, in a protest against the judiciary, might invoke the slogan Back to the Constitution.

The mark of the book is its freshness. The author has at Princeton, at Harvard, and at Yale been persistently exposed to the higher learning. Yet he has, for all the compulsions of the academies, kept a mind free from the inhibitions of conventional scholarship. The ten slender chapters contain nothing approaching a definitive statement of his subject; they are a first, not a last, word on his subject, and nowhere does he rub elbows with the absolutes of dogma. But I know of nothing as joyous and virginal which has of late come out of an ancient fortress of learning. An untainted mind alone could epitomize a smug orthodoxy—much in evidence of late—as “an unwillingness to have us get out of the depression by the use of unsound economics.”

WALTON H. HAMILTON

The Ambiguity of Feuchtwanger

The Jew of Rome. By Lion Feuchtwanger. Translated by Willa and Edwin Muir. The Viking Press. $2.50.

IT is hard to understand why Lion Feuchtwanger is not a more impressive novelist than he is. Perhaps this is an ungrateful thing to say of a writer who gives us as much as Feuchtwanger does. No one else exploits so persistently and so intelligently the theme which occupies the author of “Power,” “Success,” and “Josephus,” the theme of men in search of social justice; nor is there anyone else who has as much talent for presenting the societies in which that search goes on. Feuchtwanger cannot write without the widest perspectives of history, and that is why his books (with the exception of the rather feeble “The Oppermanns”) always afford a mature and, indeed, a noble emotional experience. Yet somehow the last great quality is always lacking; the apocalyptic vision of the great novelist is not here. Feuchtwanger’s post-war Germany or his imperial Rome are unforgettable, but his books themselves do not haunt one, as Stendhal’s historical novels do, for example, or Tolstoy’s.

But after all, Feuchtwanger’s may be in itself a special achievement and a special genre, and he, perhaps, may better be called a remarkable novelistic historian than a remarkable historical novelist. “The Jew of Rome,” then, is a better title for this sequel to “Josephus” than “Die Söhne,” which the author called it, for the two sons of Josephus, the Jewish Simeon and the Graeco-Roman Paulus, are, like all the other people of the novel, little more than instruments in their father’s dialectic attempt to discover the meaning of the Roman and the Judaic principles.

The ancient world offers no more fascinating character than Josephus, the historian of the Jewish wars of the Romans, and none more representative of the interpenetration and confusion of peoples, cultures, and tendencies. Of royal blood and priestly descent, he symbolized the vanished political power of Judaism. As a distinguished scholar in the Jewish law, he was identified with the intellectual tradition that was shaping the life of a people whose center was still the Temple but who were living in huge communities in many lands. For a time an Essene, he had affinity with the ascetic cult that contributed so much to early Christianity. But it is the ambiguity of his being at once a Jewish nationalist and a Graeco-Roman cosmopolitan that gives Josephus his dramatic and historical interest. For when Judaea attempted rebellion against its master, Rome, he joined the rebels and was a brilliant leader in the hopeless struggle until he suddenly went over to the enemy under peculiarly reprehensible circumstances; and saw the destruction of the Temple from the Roman lines.

The sparse historical record does not give the motive for this desertion, but Feuchtwanger’s earlier novel, “Josephus,” undertook to explain it by picturing Josephus as above all a man searching the history of nations for the principle that is to dominate and shape the future. Feuchtwanger’s Josephus identifies himself with Rome, not out of cowardice or for advantage, but because he understands that the dream and the method of the Jews have failed to create a world of justice, and he believes that with Rome lies the future.

In "The Jew of Rome" Josephus begins to doubt the validity of this judgment. He is still the prey of his faculty for volte-face, yet his sudden turns are not weaknesses but the method of his search for the principle of future justice. The liberal cosmopolitanism of Rome is no longer satisfying; he becomes a Jewish nationalist. But his great desire is still to be a citizen of the world, and he finds in the Jewish ideal a core of aspiration for a world order transcending nationalism. Yet the doctors of Judaism, in the effort to preserve what they believe to be the essential Jewish principle, are hedging their people about with a fence of ritual. Josephus is momentarily attracted by the anti-formalism of the anti-nationalism of the early Jewish Christians. And every now and then he glimpses, though reluctantly, the economic principle that is modifying all the other principles.

In the end, Josephus resolves his ambiguities in yet another ambiguity. He knows that he is irrationally but ineluctably Jewish, yet he conceives, with Philo, that the Jewish God is reason, the Logos. And when Domitian maliciously invites him to humiliate himself by marching in the procession that is to dedicate the arch to Titus, the destroyer of the Temple, all Josephus's nationalistic, irrational pride urges him to refuse. Refusal means almost certain death and he desires this honorable consummation; by it he can win respect from Rome and establish again the pride of the Jews. But to establish the pride of the Jews may well stimulate them to political intransigence which would be courageous but utterly vain, for reason assures him that the day of Jewish political power is gone. To save his people from a hopeless rebellion he passes, suffering, under the arch.

Perhaps this resolution in ambiguity which Feuchtwanger uses in all his books is the source of their ultimate lack of force. Their author, unable to give the affirmative answer to history, is unwilling to make the tragic answer that justice can never triumph. He puts off the question by a poetic and ambiguous gesture: "Will justice come?"; "Let us trust to the future." But perhaps, if one cannot respond with the revolutionist's affirmation, the tragic answer is the only one that can give literature its ultimate force.

LIONEL TRILLING

Affirmation

Fire Testament. By Willard Maas. With an Introduction by S. Foster Damon. The Alcestis Press. Limited Edition. $7.50.

"FIRE TESTAMENT" is a first volume of exceptional promise. It combines a studied and sure technique with a spontaneity of feeling that amounts often to ingenuousness. Willard Maas's verse is free from the doubts that beset not only an older generation but also many writers of his own; he is not prematurely weary and does not pose as such. If his poems in consequence do not voice any of the subtler inflections of the spirit, they achieve by way of compensation a note of sustained ecstasy that is rare today. Whether the subject be love or revolution, the poem reveals the mind at the moment of awakening to self-consciousness in an affirmation of strength and beauty.

The state of mind is presented by imagery that is objective in two meanings of the word: it is concrete, external, and sensuous, and its import readily communicates itself through the poem to other minds than the poet's. In the latter respect, therefore, Mr. Maas departs from the symbolist masters whom

PORGY & BESS

Album — Recorded by Lawrence Tibbett — Helen Jepson

with the original chorus, and orchestra conducted by Alexander Smallens

All America is excited over this extraordinary new Gershwin masterpiece—the most successful popular opera ever written by an American composer.

Based on the famous play of Negro life, "Porgy and Bess" is not only one of the most intensely-absorbing musical dramas ever staged—it is also Gershwin at his best, Gershwin with hundreds of new ideas and scores of haunting new melodies.

In this specially-planned Album, the lovely lyric soprano of Helen Jepson contrasts with the colorful brilliance of the greatest living operatic baritone, Lawrence Tibbett. Here are the dramatic highlights of the entire opera... Tibbett singing The Buzzard Song, It Ain't Necessarily So, I Got Plenty of Nuttin', Where is My Bess?... Jepson singing Lullaby and My Man's Gone Now... Tibbett and Jepson together in the Summertime scene and crap game, with A Woman is a Sometime Thing, and Bess, You is My Woman Now.

4 12-inch Red Seal records—5 great scenes in all—$6.50. This special album of Gershwin's greatest work makes a marvelous gift . . . to yourself or any other music-lover you know!

VICTOR

RCA Victor
Division, RCA
Manufacturing
Co., Inc.,
Camden, N. J.

RECORDS

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

"touching her lips to April." It spreads rapidly from phrase to phrase, manifesting itself most generally in the hyperbole of popular romance: one recalls Fairinda's look of "tenderness held in the violet prism of her tears," her "twilit eyes," the "showery scandal" of falling plum blossoms, Britt pressing his mouth "deep among the curls of his most beloved," and feeling his "strong body . . . full of a gorgeous cry." The same sentimentality of approach recurs to hinder a tough and growing evocation of character. Somewhat naively, it helps to fashion certain of Miss Burke's Communist spokesmen—like Derry and Schermerhorn and Rafe—in the image of scholarly patriarchs and rural seers, who "tower in the moonlight" and throw out a "prophet's challenge" with a "beatific valor." The infection reaches its most disturbing epitome in the tableau vivant of Ishma's husband expiring in a mob scuffle, while Fairinda, "sustained by youth and love," trolls out the strains of "Fling Wide the Gates, O Jerusalem."

It is disconcerting to find Miss Burke as deeply moved, at such moments, as her strikers. This is intended both as tribute to her sincerity and as criticism of her urbanity as an artist. Surely the first law of the revolutionary is to keep his powder dry.

BEN BELITT

Drama For the Defense

"LIBEL!" (Henry Miller's Theater) is an ingenious courtroom melodrama brought from England by Gilbert Miller. It is a well-knit tale and beautifully staged, but to me the outstanding feature was the performance of one Wilfred Lawson as counsel for the defendants. Mr. Lawson—described in the program as "for many years a pillar of Shavian revivals" who has appeared in most of the leading roles at the Malvern Festivals—is not given the easy task of shining alone. Opposite him, as the counsel for the plaintiff, is that seasoned player Ernest Lawford, and in the nominally central role is Colin Clive, who played Captain Stanhope in "Journey's End" and who shines again despite an accent which always troubles me somewhat when he plays parts like this. Mr. Lawson, nevertheless, by the force and variety of his acting, rises head and shoulders above all the others. Very shortly after the curtain goes up he manages somehow to focus attention upon himself by the glance of sardonic determination with which he catches for a moment the eye of his junior, and from then on he dominates pretty continuously the whole proceedings.

Except on one or two unimportant occasions he never leaves his bench and the range of emotions permitted him is extremely narrow. Indeed, it hardly includes more than relentless fury and sardonic determination; yet there is no suggestion of monotony, and the impression of power, ready at any moment to be released, is continuous. Among other things, Mr. Lawson is one of the few actors who can control their actual physical appearance. It is, for example, not an illusion but a fact that his face changes color in anger. Though this is, of course, a mere detail and though it would be impossible to single out any one elemental feature of his method which would account for the effect he creates, yet the effect is doubtless due to innumerable details so united that the impersonation is, to an extraordinary degree, whole and continuous.

All too many actors—including many very good ones—seem to me to act only by fits and starts. They rise to their big moments—perhaps even to their lesser ones—but they cease to exist when there is not a specific scene to demand something of them, going out like candles between the moments when there is a definite occasion for shining. But Mr. Lawson

1837

1937

TO WRITERS

Living in the United States

Little, Brown & Company

Offer a Centenary Prize of $5,000 for the most interesting unpublished American work (NOT FICTION) submitted to them before

October 1, 1936

To be published in book form during the year 1937.

The Publishers hope that this contest will result in the publication of a really distinguished book either by some one of unquestioned reputation or by a new writer of demonstrated ability, and that the volume will take its place as one of the outstanding publications of the House which, through its record of almost one hundred years of book publishing, has contributed many volumes of first importance in the field of American letters.

For detailed information address The Centenary Prize Contest
LITTLE, BROWN & CO., 34 Beacon St., Boston, Mass.

☐ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says ☐

Boy Meets Girl. Cort Theater. Rough and ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

Dead End. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. Superbly acted by a group of boys. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

First Lady. Music Box. Comedy hit about a feminine feud in Washington society. Jane Cowl and Lily Cahill puncture one another with sharp implements in the forging of which George Kaufman had a hand.

Jumbo. Hippodrome. Paul Whiteman, Jimmy Durante, and a remarkable clown named A. Robbins surrounded by acrobats and animals. Literally better than a circus.

Let Freedom Ring. Civic Repertory Theater. A second chance for this drama of a strike in a Southern mill. I found it hard going, but it has been highly praised.

Paradise Lost. Longacre Theatre. Clifford Odets' complicated picture of a family composed exclusively of pathological futurists. He calls it a picture of the middle class but it strikes me as somewhat less than typical.

Porgy and Bess. Alvin Theater. The well-known play turned into an opera by George Gershwin. One of the big hits of the year but to me less effective than anything so elaborate ought to be.

Pride and Prejudice. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaption, brilliantly staged and acted. It gave me more pleasure than any other play of the season.

The Taming of the Shrew. Guild Theater. The play is gentle Shakespeare's most ungente farce, and the players are Lunt and Fontanne. The result is exhilarating.

☐ THEATRES ☐ LECTURES ☐

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents
(In association with John C. Wilson)

The Taming of the Shrew

with ALFRED LUNT AND LYNN FONTANNE
THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Evs. 8:40. Matinees Thursday & Saturday, 2:40

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S

PORGY and BESS

Book by DU BOSE HEYWARD

Lyrics by DU BOSE HEYWARD and IRA GERSHWIN

Directed by ROUBEN MAMOULIAN

Orchestra conducted by ALEXANDER SMALLENS

ALVIN THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Evs. 8:40. Matinees Thursday & Saturday, 2:40
Prices: Evgs. $1 to $3. Matinees $1 to $2.50

"The best our stage has to offer here and now." Heywood Brown, World-Telegram.

Paradise Lost

By Clifford Odets

LONGACRE THEATRE, 48th St., West of Broadway.
Eves. 8:30. Mats. Wed. and Sat. 2:30.

IN CLEVELAND

Norman Thomas vs Earl Browder

Socialism or Communism

"HOW SHALL WE FIGHT FASCISM?"

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11th, 1936—8 p. m.

EUCLID AVENUE BAPTIST CHURCH

East 18th St. and Euclid Ave.

Tickets for Sale at Socialist Party Office—605 Prospect-Fourth Bldg.
Admission—Balcony 30c; Orchestra 50c; Reserved Section $1.00

Winter Term Registration Now Going on at the WORKERS SCHOOL

35 East 12 Street

Courses in:

Tel: ALgonquin 4-1199

Political Economy
Marxism—Leninism
Historical Materialism
History
Trade Union Problems
Russian

Origin of Man and Civilization Socialist Construction in the U. S. S. R.
Social and Political Geography
Literature

Revolutionary Journalism, etc.

Descriptive Catalogue Obtainable Upon Request

The Nation and Harpers Magazine for $6.50 separately only $9

Subscriptions may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Payment may be made in thirty days —but order at once.

The Nation 20 Vesey Street New York City

Please send me The Nation and Harpers Magazine for one year. ☐ I enclose my check for $6.50 OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

1-8-36

is there all the time, and one is aware of the fact that he is. Indeed, so continuous is his presence that, to me at least, the action seemed to revolve around him and events took their meaning from his reaction to them. I can only hope that he will stay long enough in New York to give us a taste of his quality in other roles.

As for the play itself, it is, as I remarked before, ingenious and well knit. The events are extraordinary enough, but they are at no time completely incredible, and by comparison with some of our own courtroom dramas, "Libel" seems gratifyingly restrained. Certainly the suspense is admirably maintained to the very last moment, and if the play has a defect in structure that defect resides in the fact that this suspense is snapped too quickly and that one finds oneself turned into the street without being allowed a proper interval in which to adjust oneself to the changed situation. In mystery plays where the ending is completely incredible and serves only to bring a curtain down it is doubtless wise to treat the conclusion as a mere formality to be got through as quickly as possible. In a case like the present, where credulity is not to be subjected to intolerable strain, it would be wiser, I think, to allow time for comprehension.

The twelfth edition of "George White's Scandals" (New Amsterdam Theater) will probably not get much of the carriage, or Cole Porter, trade, but I found it good fun. With the passage of the years Mr. White's style has ceased to be chic, as there is much about the costuming and the comedy which suggests the burlesque show rather than the more fashionable sort of revue. Nevertheless, there are some excellent tap dancing (notably by Sam, Ted, and Ray), several amusing songs, and a good supply of very hearty humor by Willie Howard and Bert Lahr, who may incline unduly toward the anatomical and physiological school of humor but very nearly succeed in raising it to an art. Mr. Howard's famous version of the quartette from "Rigoletto" belongs in any repertory of classic low comedy, and there is a first-rate song sung by Gracie Barrie about a girl whose natural inclination is in the direction of "trees," but who is forced by economic exigencies to "get hot." Mr. White could diminish the impression which he gives of being behind the times by removing some of the jokes about war debts and chain letters, but I found it worth my while to overlook them.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL W. WARD is a Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun.

JOSEPHINE HERBST is the author of "The Executioner Waits."

ALBERT MAYER is a New York architect.

BUDD L. MCKILLIPS is on the staff of Labor, the organ of the railroad labor organizations.

MARK VAN DOREN is well known as poet and critic.

WALTON H. HAMILTON, formerly professor of law at Yale, is now with the NRA.

LIONEL TRILLING is a member of the English Department of Columbia University.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE frequently reviews new books of poetry for The Nation.

BUNJI OMURA has edited Japanese newspapers on the Pacific Coast and in New York and has contributed articles to Asia, Current History, and other periodicals.

BEN BELITT is a fellow at the University of Virginia and has contributed verse and reviews to the Virginia Quarterly. His work also appeared in the anthology "Trial Balances."

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1936

No. 3680

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	57
EDITORIALS:
Mr. Roosevelt's Magic	60
The Supreme Court Swings the Ax	61
McDonald Speaks Out	61
Wonders Multiply	62
ISSUES AND MEN. HOW TO EXPOSE WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST. By Oswald Garrison Villard	63
CARTOON. By Fritz	64
KLIEG LIGHTS AND CRISIS. By Paul W. Ward	65
ARMS OVER EUROPE. IV. WHY MUSSOLINI WENT TO WAR. By Louis Fischer	67
PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES. II. LONDON AS A CANDIDATE. By Raymond Gram Swing	70
CORRESPONDENCE	72
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Company Unions, F. O. B. Detroit. By Anthony Luchek	74
Facts for Consumers. By Ruth Brindze	77
The Labor Index	78
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	78
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Ernest Cudlipp. By Louis Kronenberger	79
In Second Place. By R. P. Blackmur	79
"Suffer Little Children." By Harold E. Stearns	80
Saint Francesca of the Pacific Northwest. By Mary McCarthy	82
Shorter Notices	82
Drama: The Matron Queen. By Joseph Wood Krutch	83
Trudi Schoop. By Ruth Pickering	84
Films: Dickens Week. By Mark Van Doren	84

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three Years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional.

THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

WE REGRET to note that neither the Administration's neutrality proposal nor the Nye-Clark-Maverick bill is as satisfactory as the draft bill of the National Peace Conference, which was discussed in last week's Nation. All three are alike in continuing the present mandatory embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and all provide for the banning of loans and credits to belligerents. Both the Nye and the McReynolds bill would limit the export of key war materials to a quota based on the normal exports during a specified pre-war period, although the McReynolds bill would leave such action to the discretion of the President. But neither makes any provision for lifting the various restrictions—except by further Congressional action—in case a country is attacked in violation of the Pact of Paris. In this respect they are markedly inferior to the National Peace Conference proposal, which permitted the President to raise the embargo on war materials, subject to the approval of Congress, provided the majority of signatories of the pact concurred in naming the aggressor. Conflicting reports have been received regarding the effect of the Administration's bill on the possibility of oil sanctions against Italy. Some well-informed European observers feel that any move by the United States to restrict Mussolini's oil purchases would shame the League into belated action, while others, equally reliable, have asserted that an oil embargo is impossible as long as the American government lacks the power to stop petroleum exports from this country. At the moment the latter view appears to be the more plausible, and is more than merely an excuse to escape a distasteful action. The restriction of exports to a pre-war average, while better than no limitation, would still leave the United States in the unenviable position of profiting from illegal aggression. And what is more unfortunate, it would definitely range the United States against those countries which are seeking to build an effective instrument for preserving peace.

NEW YORK STATE REPUBLICANS, when they are not quarreling over who shall be state chairman or who shall be speaker of the Assembly, are similarly divided over their future Presidential candidate. Thus the Young Republicans sent a delegation on December 26 to extend to Governor Landon an invitation to attend a rally in the spring. But Melvin C. Eaton, Republican state chairman, hastened to explain that this must not be interpreted as sponsorship of the Kansas Governor's candidacy. Mr. Eaton, it seems, is heart and soul for an uninstructed delegation to the national convention. At the same time, the left wing of the party, led by none other than W. Kingsland Macy, with the ardent assistance of that other left-winger, Representative Hamilton Fish, Jr., is strongly urging the candidacy of Senator Borah. (In case anybody has forgotten exactly how left-wingish Mr. Fish is, it may be recalled that Mrs. Dilling, in her "Red Network," characterizes him as a "super-expert patriot," and credits him with assistance in the preparation of her monumental work.) In coming out for Senator Borah, in opposition to the Old Guard Republicans, Mr. Fish makes his position clear. "The policy of the Republican Party," he declares, "should be . . . to go forward on a sound and sane liberal platform of a square deal for labor, the farmer, the business man, the consumers, and for private property under the confines and compass of the Constitution." It is hard to see how this program could offend anybody except possibly the Seventh-Day Adventists, who were not mentioned. Probably if he were properly approached, President Roosevelt himself would vote for it.

WHILE THE REPUBLICANS were busying themselves with this regular pre-convention hocus-pocus, Governor Lehman, in his annual message to the New York Legislature, was offering a series of proposals which, if not startling, were at least sensible and humane. His most important points were the necessity of placing relief on a permanent, organized basis—subject, of course, to the formulation of a clearly defined federal relief program—and the need for such legislative action as would enable New York State to avail itself of the provisions of the federal social-security law. In addition the Governor urged ratification of the child-labor amendment to the Constitution, strengthening of the labor legislation passed in the last session, furtherance of the campaign to lower public-utility rates to consumers, an extension of the mortgage-moratorium law, and various other enlightened proposals. He rather hedged on the subject of milk, stating the need of "cooperative agreement" and "orderly marketing" within the industry without any specific recommendations; he was eloquent on the past performance of the mortgage commission without mentioning reduction of the home-owners' mortgage-interest burden. But in general he came pretty close to what Mr. Fish—if the Governor were a Republican and not a Democrat—would have been happy to describe as a "sound and sane liberal platform." The answer of the Republicans to the Governor's message was that he had stolen all their thunder. These, apparently, were just the proposals that they were about to make. If this is the case, it ought to make New York's legislative session the plainest of plain sailing.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE, according to an Associated Press report, after an investigation lasting a year has recommended strict legislative regulation of "fixed trusts"—the British term for investment trusts. The proposed law would require "certificates of recognition" for the trusts, and before these were granted "the fullest information regarding the composition and management of the trusts would be necessary." This serves to remind us that at the end of three years of the New Deal our own investment trusts are almost as free to rob the public as they were under the Republicans. At present the trusts, besides being subject to state regulation, are required only to file, as issuers of securities, registration statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission. These statements have disclosed that the big New York investment-banking and brokerage firms are represented in the management of the leading trusts and receive brokerage fees for transactions in securities made by the trusts. Moreover, partners of the investment-banking firms receive fees for acting as directors of the trusts. That such a set-up is possible indicates the ineffectiveness of state regulation. Revelations made before the Senate Banking Committee in 1933 add to the picture: worthless stock, especially directors' stock that could not be sold in the open market, was unloaded on the trusts by their managements; trusts were formed for ulterior purposes, such as obtaining control of companies in a special field; by the trusts' acquisition of concentrated holdings in particular industries the investor was deprived of that very safety through diversification which he sought when he put his money in a trust; trust managers granted brokers and pool operators—that is, in some cases, themselves—options on large blocks of stock.

STOCKHOLDERS and business men will look back on 1935 as an extremely good year for cornering the wary dollar. The value of all stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange rose from $34,000,000,000 at the close of 1934 to $46,000,000,000 at the end of 1935, a gain of 37 per cent. Favorable dividend changes during the year totaled 1,549 as compared with 1,447 in 1934, while unfavorable changes dropped from 377 to 245. Extra dividends were declared on more than 800 different stocks. Behind these evidences of increased profits lay an undeniable pick-up in business activity. The output of such divergent industries as steel and textiles was larger in November than in any corresponding month since 1929. The production of electric power and of shoes for 1935 was at an all-time high, as was the consumption of wool. Automobile and petroleum output was at a post-1929 peak. Car loadings and copper consumption were highest since 1931. Are we to assume from this that the extravagant predictions for 1936 are likely to be fulfilled? Conservative financial leaders profess to be somewhat dubious because of what they prefer to call "political uncertainties." The New Deal, it seems, is always threatening something dire to business. To this professional pessimism the facts and figures quoted above are a sufficient response. There has been a New Deal as far as business is concerned, and the stockholder has been the principal beneficiary. But in the process the fundamental causes of economic instability have been accentuated. Real wages of industrial workers were no higher at the close of 1935 than at the depth of the depression in 1932. Unemployment was 50 per cent greater than in 1931. Agricultural subsidies have all but destroyed our foreign markets for farm products and have thrust thousands of sharecroppers into abject destitution. Relief and public works have broken down in many parts of the country as a means of maintaining the jobless in a state of reasonable efficiency. The present abnormal boom may continue for months, but it obviously cannot serve as a basis for permanent recovery.

THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS in Philadelphia has issued a restraining order prohibiting the Securities and Exchange Commission from making public the salaries of officers of the $200,000,000 American Can Company. The company, in its petition for the injunction, told the court that publication of the salaries would "excite criticism, breed envy, and lower the morale of the operating force." These are hardly cogent reasons, and our interest in seeing what the salaries are is heightened by the phrase immediately following that just quoted—"and perhaps foment serious labor trouble." The SEC was further enjoined by the court from making public gross sales and profits and losses, on the plea of the company that such publication would result in "widespread price-cutting." But let no one conclude that the fear of price-cutting arose from the self-interest of a corporation founded on the great American system of free competition. The price reductions, America Can argued, would mean the wiping out of many small companies. Such unselfishness ought not to go unrewarded!

TWENTY-FOUR PERSONS were lynched in 1935, according to figures—and case histories—released by the International Labor Defense. Tuskegee Institute in its annual report lists only twenty but fails to include the murder of at least four sharecroppers in Tuskegee's own state of Alabama, perhaps because these killings deviated somewhat in procedure from the classic lynching formula. The class nature of lynching appears more clearly in the 1935 record—which tops 1934 by five—than ever before. The cry of rape has always hidden a class as well as a race motive. This year Tuskegee sets down activity in share-cropper organizing and "communistic activity" as the admitted causes of two lynchings; and the killings in Alabama (the figures are still incomplete because the Alabama swamps swallow up victims all too well) took place in the course of a struggle between landlords and croppers in which the landlords were all the more bitter because on the other side they saw, increasingly, white share-croppers standing with black against the common enemy. An even greater discrepancy is to be found in the two sets of figures available for deaths in connection with labor struggles. One set comes from the Labor and Socialist Press Service, the other from the I. L. D. The first gives thirty-three; the second forty-nine. The discrepancy is understandable since the facilities for gathering such statistics are necessarily limited and since the worker victims of labor battles are for the most part obscure both in life and in the manner of their dying. The figures stand like markers for the important struggles of the year: three of the victims were Southern textile workers, two were waterfront workers, two were lumber workers, seven were coal miners, and so on. And if they cannot be exact, they are nevertheless indicative of increasing tension and of a growing determination on both sides of the factory gate.

THE PICTURE of Governor Landon of Kansas that emerges from Raymond Gram Swing's two articles (the second of which appears in this issue) is strikingly unhackneyed. Here is no reactionary nonentity and no incipient fascist, but a sincere, mildish liberal who in some curious way has fallen among the Bourbons. Since Mr. Swing is writing as a reporter, his articles imply no political approval of Landon. We are glad to present the record as he found it, especially since it sharpens the issues of the coming struggle for the nomination. The Republican strategists are roaming about today like a nomadic tribe in desperate search of pasturage. Unless they are to become a permanent Opposition, they must find someone who is not too tarred with reaction to be put across on the voters. Some of them are therefore panting for Landon as Landon is undoubtedly panting for them. There is a good deal in Governor Landon's record as Mr. Swing gives it that is susceptible of a double interpretation. But of one thing we may be certain. If Governor Landon is really a liberal, it is his ill-fortune to have been adopted by some of the worst elements among Mr. Roosevelt's opponents. The process of being a candidate is, at the best, not an ennobling experience, even when it starts more auspiciously than as a companion-in-arms to Mr. Hearst. We call upon Governor Landon, if he is in earnest in his liberalism, to declare himself more explicitly on utilities, labor, relief, and civil liberties, and to shake off the corrupting hand of William Randolph Hearst.

ABATTLE IS PREPARING on the West Coast between the shipping interests and the waterfront workers which promises to exceed in violence and ruthlessness the general strike in 1934. The fireworks have already started in the Gulf ports, where a strike has been in progress for some time. The struggles in these ports—some of them have now been settled—may turn out to be the fuse leading to the major explosion in California, where the strength of the seamen's unions is greatest and where the rank and file has consistently refused to handle "hot" cargo (cargo previously handled by non-union labor) coming from the Gulf. The antagonists are the same as in 1934, but both sides are determined and prepared as never before. The employers stand ready to wipe out the unions. They are carrying on a campaign of provocation and red-baiting designed to discredit the rank and file and its leader Harry Bridges; and the "imminent shutdown" of the shipping industry predicted by its Washington representative, Elisha Hanson, may well be another drastic move to discredit the unions by proving that they are "ruining" the shipping trade. (This is the same Elisha Hanson who so boldly defended the freedom of the Hearst press against the Newspaper Guild.) According to the statements of the rank and file—and they have a ring of truth entirely missing from the laments of the owners—the Industrial Association has stopped and will stop at nothing in the way of plots, propaganda, and violence to break the unions' strength. So far the employers have not been able to interest the Department of Justice in a suit to break Bridges's hold on the West Coast locals—they would like to have him charged with violating the Sherman anti-trust laws! But they can count on the support of the conservative leaders of the A. F. of L. international marine unions. To perpetuate their own regime these officials are more than eager to smash the Maritime Federation, which was organized a year ago by Bridges and now commands the support of 35,000 workers in all marine crafts.

WE LEARN from an unimpeachable source that during the month of December two Italian regiments about to embark from a southern Italian port for East Africa mutinied and refused to go. They did not go. In view of the difficulty of obtaining authentic military information about Italy, it is quite conceivable that the action of these two regiments was not an isolated case. There may be more of which we do not know. This is not to suggest that Mussolini is about to blow up. But all the Duce's troubles are not concentrated in East Africa. While the searchlight has played on the diplomatic struggles in Paris, London, and Geneva, and on the Abyssinian battle front, it should not be forgotten that the future of Fascism must ultimately be settled at home.

AN APPEAL comes from the Anti-Nazi Federation for all possible protest to force the German government to make public the trial of Ernst Thälmann and other political prisoners now in concentration camps. The trial of Thälmann was scheduled to begin on November 15, but no information has been given out about whether or not it took place or where Thälmann is being held. According to the federation, an order issued to the German press by Minister of Propaganda Goebbels is illuminating in this connection. It seems that the Nazi government was in the habit of giving out detailed information regarding political trials, but unfortunately this information was misinterpreted.

Reports about the insolent and provoking behavior of some accused produced a different effect on the broad masses of working people than we had originally in view. It has been noticed that in several factories these reports caused considerable excitement and numerous discussions. Reports written in order to arouse public opinion against the criminals awoke feelings in favor of them.

Therefore I order that henceforth reports about political trials shall be suppressed. Only the sentences may be published in less than two phrases, but only on special command.

We suggest that the Nazis adopt the device long honored by our own Congressmen in printing their remarks in the Congressional Record. Liberal sprinklings of (Applause), (Laughter), or better still (Hisses) would teach the misguided factory workers what to think.

Mr. Roosevelt's Magic

MR. ROOSEVELT'S amazing radio message to Congress has undoubtedly strengthened his campaign fortunes, but leaves his program as unclear as ever. Politically adroit, and from the standpoint of radio oratory a magnificent achievement, it was intellectually a confused and straddling performance. Unlike most "historic" events with such an enormous publicity build-up, the thing somehow managed to come off—judging not so much by the applause of Congress and the galleries, which formed the studio audience, as by the talk of the plain men and women in their homes and on the street. The common man wanted to be let in on a dramatic occasion, and he had his wish. He wanted a fighting speech, and he got it. He was tuning in on history-in-the-making, and the President took pains to make it a good show. Even the Herald Tribune has had to admit grudgingly that this puts Mr. Roosevelt in a dominating position for the campaign. The President has again used some sort of magic to increase his stature, and by comparison every Presidential possibility on the Republican side seems puny and frustrate. They can talk only of outraged "taste"—these men whose stomachs have not been turned by their association with Hearst and all the revolting exploitation of a company universe.

But a sober rereading of the speech shows how consummately Mr. Roosevelt displayed his talent for leaving almost all the important things unsaid. Not that the speech lacked importance for what it did say. It was Mr. Roosevelt's first significant and sustained official utterance on the international situation since his ill-starred incursion into the London conference in the mad July days of 1933. It carried on two Wilsonian traditions: that of seeking to distinguish between European rulers and the desires of the people themselves, and that of reading a vigorous lecture on democracy and autocracy. It was, however, Wilson with a difference. Since Wilson's time the national and international scenes have more clearly emerged. It was possible for Mr. Roosevelt to draw a clear relationship between the fascist imperialism of Hitler, Mussolini, and the Japanese militarists and the fascism of the American plutocrats. We may of course be overestimating the clarity with which Mr. Roosevelt sees this relation. Quite conceivably his main purpose was to capitalize on the widespread anti-war and anti-fascist sentiment in the country, and to bolster his failing prestige in domestic affairs by vigorous leadership in foreign affairs.

But generously interpreted, the President's international stand is more than a clever political device. Despite its overemphasis on the personal and ideological factors and its too easy assumption that Europe needs nothing more than an inner conversion on the part of Hitler and Mussolini, it does face the overwhelming reality of today. It is a recognition of the relation between fascism abroad and at home, between fascism and war, between fascism and the economic plutocracy. If the President had meant only to repeat the well-worn distinction between democracy and dictatorship, he would not so studiously have avoided mention of Soviet Russia. That he did so avoid it is a tribute to his good sense, and proof of his intent to single out the fascist dictators as the imperialist war-makers.

In the domestic field Mr. Roosevelt's message was better as a manifesto than as a preface to legislative action. It was here that the speech became, as Paul Ward describes it elsewhere in this issue, a political rally, with the business of state being transacted under the klieg lights. It was here that the President showed himself complete master of the grammar of vituperation. Never has an American President so clearly attacked the finance-capitalists, the holding-company wizards, the corporation lawyers, and the whole resplendent array of big-business statesmanship. His attack, coming at a period of capitalistic crisis, is the most significant Presidential utterance we have had on the concentration of financial power in a capitalist state. There have been left-wing attacks on big business in abundance. But when an American President who is politically astute, realistic, sensitive to opinion, directs his Presidential message to such a sustained and considered attack, that becomes news—and history. It becomes an official recognition of the strains within our economic system, and of a basic inner cleavage of interest between those who would freeze the structure as it stands, even at the cost of destroying our culture, and those who still hope to take advantage of whatever flexibilities the system offers.

But Mr. Roosevelt must go farther. If he has not entirely shot his bolt, if he is not more adept at showmanship than at statesmanship, he must affix to the speech a real legislative program. This he reveals little intention of doing. The Supreme Court's invalidation of the AAA will force him and Congress into some sort of action on the agricultural issue. But his essential temper will still be that of a cautious administrator seeking to conserve and consolidate the gains he has already achieved, rather than of an aggressive leader pushing ahead with a program well begun.

The President's speech may be called his "standstill agreement." He has gone as far as the economic necessities of capitalist crisis coerced him into going, and as far as the outer limits of his patrician training and character have permitted him to go. By his references to taxation, the budget, and relief, by his very pointed emphasis upon the New Deal as a finished achievement rather than a fragmentary and incomplete program, he is serving notice that he will go no farther. His right foot is not to be budged a step backward, and his left foot is planted with equal firmness against any forward movement. History may find him frozen in his tracks. That is the meaning of his agile bows to both disarmament and a big navy, to a moratorium on taxes and an attack on big business, to a reduced relief budget and unctuously rhetorical questions on our duty to the unemployed. No man has ever shown greater dexterity in facing both ways than Mr. Roosevelt. Whether such a talent will be adequate either in saving the country or winning a campaign remains to be seen. Mr. Roosevelt got the jump on the Republicans; the Supreme Court has now got the jump on Mr. Roosevelt.

The Supreme Court Swings the Ax

THE nation's Lord High Executioners have again swung the ax. This time it is the Agricultural Adjustment Administration that has succumbed to the Supreme Court's kiss of death. Mr. Justice Roberts, speaking for the court in the Hoosac case, in an almost incredibly mechanical and legalistic opinion has ruled that the Administration's largely successful efforts to raise farm income are unconstitutional and must be undone. Five other justices join in this stern Catonian view of judicial duty. Three justices dissent. The Hoosac case now takes its place in the sequence of retreat to an archaic conception of a national government with cruelly limited powers in a time of crisis.

It is true that the decision might have been a good deal worse. The taxing power, the spending power, the delegation of powers, the Tenth Amendment were all urged upon the court as issues on the basis of which the AAA could be held invalid. Ostensibly Mr. Justice Roberts has rested his decision only on the last of these—the ground that Congress was trenching on the powers reserved to the states by the amendment. He argues that Congress is nowhere explicitly given power to regulate agriculture; that its attempt to do so in the Agricultural Adjustment Act is therefore unconstitutional; that any tax it may impose and any appropriation it may make as part of such a general regulatory scheme thereby become unconstitutional, regardless of what their validity might be outside such a scheme.

But such a summary does not convey the full import of the decision. After the crippling of the Congressional power over commerce through the Schechter decision, those who have wished to see the national power used for economic control have pinned all their hopes on the taxing and spending power of Congress under the "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution. The court did not dare through a frontal attack destroy this Congressional power. To do so would have been to run directly athwart the established law and usage of a century and would have constituted the most fatal decision since the Dred Scott case. Instead, the court has managed by indirection to cripple if not kill the Congressional taxing power. No use of the taxing power can henceforth be held constitutional under the general-welfare clause if it attempts Congressional regulation of agriculture or industry. And since that is the principal use to which it is now important to put the taxing power, the extent of the decision can readily be seen.

Intelligent people will fail to find any rational meaning in such an outcome. The common man, with his direct way of looking at governmental matters, will be unable to make any sense of it at all. The farmer will be dazed. The worker will know that a similar fate is in store for him. Three of the Supreme Court justices—and those not by any means the least able or enlightened—find that it not only makes no economic or governmental sense, but that it does not even make good constitutional law. In what is undoubtedly one of the most brilliant of recent dissenting opinions, Mr. Justice Stone subjects the majority reasoning to a merciless analysis in which its sophistry and confusion are completely exposed. The reader sees, if he is willing to look beyond rhetoric to reality, the naked class interest that ultimately dictated the decision. It is not so much that the court has grudged the farmers their benefits. It has been unwilling to see the method of taxation, with its attendant regulation, extended to industry and to labor relations. Mr. Justice Stone points out cogently that a power of appropriation that cannot set the conditions under which and the purposes for which the money will be spent is completely useless. With an admirable frankness he challenges the smug assumption of judicial power and judicial infallibility. He riddles Mr. Justice Roberts's protestations that the court is only interpreting the clear letter of the Constitution and is officially not cognizant of the effects of its decisions in nullifying the legislative will. He refers to "the mind accustomed to believe that it is the duty of the courts to sit in judgment on the wisdom of legislative action." "Courts," he continues, "are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern."

Even while he was delivering his message to Congress, Mr. Roosevelt was speaking in the shadow of the court's power. Now the court proves definitely that it is the last bulwark of the vested interests. They have been displaced from the Legislative and have been outwitted by the Executive; they find their last refuge in the Judiciary. It is inconceivable that the good sense of a democracy will tolerate very much longer such a use of the judicial power. If Mr. Roosevelt has courage he will make the limitation of this power in declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional a major part of his campaign. If he has a long view of statesmanship he will make it part of a long-range effort to restore the basic decisions of a democracy to the legislative will of the people.

McDonald Speaks Out

WHEN James G. McDonald resigned as High Commissioner for Refugees from Germany he resigned with a bang. And the reverberations of the bang are still sounding in every corner of the world with results that have only begun to be felt. Mr. McDonald's departure from his post may well prove to be the most effective act of his two years' service, more effective perhaps than the whole period of heart-breaking labor. The labor was indefatigable and as successful as circumstances permitted it to be; it brought aid to some 65,000 harried, destitute refugees from Hitler's Reich. The resignation and the impressive statement which accompanied and explained it dramatized to the world outside of Germany the full measure of injustice and wholesale terror that has been visited not only upon the half-million Jews but upon all the groups set apart by Hitler's government as racially or politically alien.

In very brief, Mr. McDonald said to the League and to the world: What use to attempt to find homes and work for a flood of refugees from Hitler's terror in lands which can barely support their own populations and must prove inhospitable hosts to destitute invaders? New laws in Germany reinforce and legalize the ruthless practices of earlier days. Life becomes impossible for an increasing number of persons helpless to alter their state. Therefore the flood will grow, not lessen. The task of alleviation becomes more desperate. The only hope lies in action by the League and by the civilized nations of the world to recall the German government to its senses and to its obligations to the political and racial minorities in its own territory. Such were his conclusions. They were buttressed by a series of factual surveys covering legal, political, economic, social, educational, and religious restrictions, especially those bearing on Jews and "non-Aryans" of other faiths. These surveys are a work of selection and compilation remarkable for its objectivity and sobriety—and the more explosive because of these qualities.

The time was ripe for an explosion. From the start the commission headed by Mr. McDonald was, for all its impressive sound, an international foundling. It was forced to plead its humane cause to wary or hostile governments and organizations without even the official backing of the body that brought it into being. Like many foundlings the High Commission was shunted about, politely snubbed or put off with merely formal sympathy. That so many countries accepted as many exiles as they did is commendable in the circumstances. But Mr. McDonald's thankless task was to induce already impoverished countries to take in a horde of even more impoverished alien Jews—refugees whose numbers and poverty grew greater with every month of growing terror in Germany. His mission was an honorable failure.

The victims of Nazi terror are not to be rescued like victims of flood or earthquake—by money and food and a temporary home until the waters recede or the earth settles. These things they need if they are to live. But piecemeal salvage cannot touch the fundamental factors in their fate. The refugees from Germany are merely fragmentary evidence of the continuing catastrophe of Nazi rule. The problem is primarily one not of relief but of government. Recognizing this, Mr. McDonald dropped his role of social worker and took up the task of political analysis. He exposed the realities that lie behind the objects of woe he was appointed to help. And he called upon the other governments and the League to become equally realistic; officially to face the fact of official German terror and take collective action to end it.

An admirable gesture. But we should be less than realistic ourselves if we believed that it would result in prompt or effective response on either side. The nations are likely to evade this issue as long as they can. The League has proved its unwillingness to assume full responsibility even for the mission of relief undertaken by Mr. McDonald. As for the German government, it prudently suppressed Mr. McDonald's statement and all but the bare mention of his resignation, and in a brief contemptuous reply advised the League to look after the treatment accorded minorities in the states which are members of the League before concerning itself with Germany's methods of "domestic reconstruction."

The value of Mr. McDonald's dramatic resignation lies not in its probable immediate results but in the challenge it presents to the conscience of the world. It thrusts under the noses of the nations detailed facts they might prefer to overlook. It gives official standing to authenticated charges of ruthlessness. It cannot be denied or ignored. It will stand with the Lytton report on the Japanese invasion of Manchuria as an unforgettable indictment of a nation which has abandoned even the pretense of civilized usages.

Wonders Multiply

IT is fitting that while the festival of the new year is being celebrated, our modern magicians, in the persons of our scientists, natural and otherwise, should get together and report on the progress of the past twelvemonth. In New York, St. Louis, Baltimore, Princeton, and other cities they gathered. They made speeches and read papers, and the facts or deductions they set forth were described in the press. It may be that the news stories laid undue emphasis on the sensational as opposed to the strictly scientific, but to untutored laymen like ourselves the reports were sufficiently marvelous to deserve repeating.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science, meeting at St. Louis, was told of a new "sun-trap" which seems to harness the energy of the sun so effectively that only the comparatively high cost of manufacturing it stands between us and its practical use. The same group heard Dr. Edward L. Thorndike of Columbia University present "a psychological analysis of what might be termed the American soul," through a critical study of where the American income goes. The American Chemical Society, meeting at Rochester, heard Dr. Marston T. Bogert of Columbia University read a paper on "Carotenoids" which promised that a diet plentiful in carrots and tomatoes would help one to see in the dark. The Zoological Society of America listened to a report on the results of transferring the hearts of ten embryo newts into the bodies of ten adult newts. The newts with the two hearts, it was announced, lived and functioned normally for from 100 to 165 days and then died "because they were freaks and not as healthy as their ordinary fellows." Before the same meeting Dr. Edgar Allen of Yale described a device for recording the moment of ovulation in rabbits. This last may in time be susceptible of application to human beings, making the rhythmic method of birth control less hazardous than it now seems to be. That the Dionne quintuplets may very well be the grandchildren or great-grandchildren of their parents, was the conclusion of Dr. David Clausey, of the University of Arkansas. This is the result of the multiple division of the ovum, which creates a new generation each time it divides, the father and mother having been the parents only of the first ovum fertilized.

A new electron tube which for the first time includes the infra-red and the ultra-violet rays in man's range of vision; an artificial musk which displaces the rare and costly animal which supplies musk for perfumes; a new theory of philosophy which outlaws metaphysics and classes Plato as a poet but not a philosopher; a new method of combining science and religion so that the facts of man's biological origin may be taught at the same time and not to conflict with "facts concerning man's origin and destiny as revealed by religion"—these are but a few of the other wonders which our scientists and academicians are toying with. The whole list is as long as it is incomprehensible; the news stories are—with all respect to the reporters—probably garbled. But one gathers from reading them that the wonders of the ancient world are as nothing to the wonders of this. More power to the magicians. The politicians evidently cannot save us. Perhaps the scientists can.

Issues and Men

How to Expose William Randolph Hearst

IF Dr. Edward Alsworth Ross of the faculty of the University of Wisconsin had made his speech before the fifth annual convention of the Pi Gamma Mu Society a few weeks before he actually delivered it on December 28, I should very strongly have urged him for a place on The Nation's Honor Roll for 1935. For he made a most admirable and practical suggestion of how to expose William Randolph Hearst and to stop his campaign against the supposed radicalism of our schools and colleges. He urged the formation of a committee to collect data regarding Hearst, "our chief and most pertinacious and malevolent assailant, as a man and a citizen, a property-owner and a taxpayer, newspaper owner and editor through forty years. It should show the deliberate deceits of which Hearst and his minions have been guilty." He then continued as follows:

There is not a community in the land infested by a Hearst newspaper that would not turn out in numbers for the high-school or college teacher who should announce a lecture entitled "The Truth About W. R. Hearst and the Hearst Newspapers." It would be desirable that slides be presented showing the vulgarity and viciousness of many of the cartoons which have appeared in the Hearst press through the years. Loan collections of such slides might be made available to teachers giving the lecture. . . . In this case, as often in warfare, the best defensive is an offensive.

There can be no doubt that any such organized movement would badly scare the Hearst organization; however Hearst himself may feel about the movement against him, there can be no question that the men upon whom he relies for his profits are in a very jumpy state of mind. Proof of this is a happening at Williams College last spring. The students of Williams struck against the Hearst news movies and propaganda pieces at the local theater. The royalty paid by that little concern was so small as to be trifling, but not less than four representatives of the Hearst organization turned up in alarm, one after the other, to see what had happened, and one of them went so far as to ask in obvious anxiety whether the boycott was going to be extended to the Hearst newspapers. Last summer there was formed in California a society to boycott the Hearst newspapers; the members attached stickers to all mail matter they sent out and in other ways endeavored to spread the gospel of an anti-Hearst boycott. The year 1935 also saw that magnificent denunciation of Hearst by Dr. Charles A. Beard, which Hearst will never live down and which no future biographer of the world's worst newspaper owner can possibly overlook. But such a committee as Dr. Ross suggests would really alarm the Hearst forces, for Dr. Ross does not overstate the appeal that such a movement would make.

Moreover, the campaign would be an easy one to stage since one could make the lectures extremely interesting and very deadly merely by quoting from the Hearst newspapers. Thus it would be impossible for the Hearstites to claim that it was a biased undertaking instigated by prejudice and full of inaccuracies. Certainly Hearst could not complain if it revealed his part in bringing on the war with Spain and some of the falsities of his pro-Cuba campaign from 1896 on. His relationship to the assassination of McKinley and a good many other incidents could easily be set forth by facsimile reproductions of editorials and articles. Extremely valuable would be a presentation of how and why he at one time urged war with Mexico, and then turned round a few years later and took precisely the opposite tack. Equally stimulating to thought would be a recapitulation of Hearst's changes of front on every other conceivable subject since he entered journalism as a champion of the plain people against the money-bags and the Republican bosses, who, as he then correctly pointed out innumerable times, dominated the political life of the United States. But, after all, the most damning thing would be the portrayal of the low quality of his entire newspaper product, and of the injury that it has done to American press standards, to say nothing of public taste. In this connection a reprint of a speech of the late Congressman Johnson of California, the father of the present Senator from that state, would astound people.

It would not be necessary to say anything about Hearst's private life. That would be a mistake, and Professor Ross evidently realizes it, as he made no reference to it. That, after all, is Hearst's own affair. What is essential is that his attitude toward our American institutions be clearly and unmistakably set forth, so that the public may get a complete understanding of just how baleful his influence has been. Men like Hearst thrive because of the forgetfulness of the American public. It is amazing, for instance, to hear Wall Street men now praising Hearst when they themselves, or their fathers, in 1898 and again at the outbreak of the World War were violently denouncing Hearst and having his newspapers thrown out of clubs and libraries. Hearst is entitled to free speech as much as anybody, but on the other hand true patriots are entitled to state just what they think of the man, and how they rate his contributions to American political, social, and economic life. At least the bankers and brokers who are now so eager to praise their new champion ought to be reminded of some of the things he used to say about the business men of the country, those whom his cartoonists, Oppen and Davenport, used to portray in prison stripes or with the dollar mark all over their clothes. There are few menaces as great in our American life as Hearst, especially since he has openly come out on the fascist side. In self-defense the forces of democracy have not only the right but the duty to strike back. A few mass-meetings of protest with speakers like George S. Counts, Professor Ross, and other brave men in public life would speedily put a different aspect upon matters in the Hearst offices.

Edward Garrison Villard

"The Republican National Committee welcomes contributions from the business man as heartily as from the tiller of the soil or the worker in the mill."—CHAIRMAN FLETCHER

Klieg Lights and Crisis

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, January 6

LIBERALS and radicals who for a year or more have been damning the Supreme Court and all it stands for may find cause within the next few weeks or months to give thanks that the tribunal exists. It seems certain at this date that if the session of Congress that began Friday is to contribute anything at all in furtherance of the public welfare, the Supreme Court will have to be accredited as the action's instigator. It seems certain that it will take a series of jarring decisions against the New Deal to knock a working majority of the federal legislators out of their preoccupation with the task of saving their individual skins at the polls next November and into a realization that the New Deal, contrary to the most recent philippic of their White House messiah, is not perfect; that it has, in fact, not yet begun.

What makes this all seem so certain is the spirit in which the session has opened. Because his last "state-of-the-nation" message had got a bad publicity break through having to compete with the opening of the Hauptmann trial, and because some of his recent public addresses had had to be delivered at hours when they could not monopolize public attention, the President of the United States insisted on delivering his message to this session in person and at night. In consequence, the actual opening of the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress was a rudimentary affair. The Senate remained in session only twenty minutes. The House, meeting in characteristic bedlam, dallied little longer. Its brief proceedings were given over chiefly to two things. The first of these was a bawdy scramble among its 435 members for unanimous consent to insert in the Congressional Record various articles, letters, and speeches which could then be converted into campaign pamphlets for free and dazzling circulation among their constituents. Interwoven with this was a running fight between the Republican and Democratic leaders over the arrangements for the joint session that night.

No less tawdry was the show in the House that night. The pack of Senators and Representatives jammed together in the well looked like a mixed convention of Elks and Shriners with a few Daughters of the American Revolution thrown in for good measure. The affairs of state sat lightly on these well-fed lawyers, bankers, merchants, farmers, backwoods preachers, ex-hoofers, ex-teachers, ex-cowhands, and professional office-holders who make the nation's laws. On some they rested not at all, for here and there were men in whom an excess of alcoholic content could be detected at fifty paces even without the aid of the klieg lights glaring overhead.

It was a festive gathering that owed what somberness it held to the pompous solemnity of the Cabinet members who had joined it and the doddering senility of more than a dozen of its own members. No tension gripped it such as must have gripped that last joint session of its kind in April, 1917, when President Wilson asked the Congress to declare war on Germany, and a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, in hysterical tears, led the applause. This time the Supreme Court, as well as a sense of crisis, was lacking. The court had not been invited to join the House and Senate in overhearing what the President of the United States had to say to the radio audience.

The lights quivered with the applause and cheers that shook the chamber as Roosevelt walked to the rostrum, cocked back his massive head, and beamed his famous beam upon the audience. To at least the applause the Republicans politely, even heartily, contributed. Then came silence as the President swung into his address, after drinking half a glass of water, placing his wrist watch beside his manuscript, and arranging his pince-nez. The first half of the speech, dealing with international affairs, he delivered in a low voice and with a minimum of histrionics. In it he neatly contrived to be both neutral and unneutral, to be for disarmament and for a big navy, and—even more neatly—to place himself on the side of the Nye-Clark neutrality faction in the Congress, as though he had been there from the beginning of time instead of only a month at best.

Having finished with world affairs and a profitable, if disguised, capitalization of anti-Nazi and anti-Mussolini sentiment in this country, the President of the United States put on a quick-change act. He doffed the robes of a statesman and became in a trice pure politico. His voice lifted, his pace quickened, and his head began to bob and jerk, as he went on to convert what was supposed to be a thoughtful discussion of the nation's ills and ways of treating them into a political diatribe. It was received as such by his partisans, the Democrats in well and gallery whooping, hollering, and stamping their feet as Roosevelt hurled barb after barb at the helpless Republicans present and thundered defiance at unnamed and unseen forces of darkness. Soon he had whipped his followers into that senseless ecstasy that overtakes political conventions when a leading contender has just been placed in nomination, and for such unprecedented behavior the Republicans at last retaliated in a fashion that promptly wiped the grin from Roosevelt's face and made it grim. They broke into raucous laughter at his expense when he referred to his address as "this message on the state of the union."

Passions were served, and not until the next morning did it begin to dawn on many of those who had so hoarsely cheered the President that he had said nothing about the 11,000,000 still unemployed while prices, profits, and production mount to "prosperity" levels, or about the thousands his Administration has had struck from the relief rolls and returned to the miseries of the soup kitchen and the parish poor basket, or about the soggianness of the banking structure and the fatuousness of his stock-market program, to mention only a few of the pressing issues before the country. Nor did it occur to them until then that each of his crescendo shouts against "intrenched greed" had been matched by diminuendo pleas to the interests he reviled, pleas couched in pledges to hold taxes at their present level and shape, to balance the budget, and to reduce expenditures for relief while increasing the federal dole to battleship and munitions makers.

For those of his camp followers inclined to worry over such matters the President's budget message that came today offered no balm. In it he managed to add another to the series of Rooseveltian innovations by presenting a budget that was not a budget, for it expressly omitted the biggest item of all—work relief. And in it he also managed to give the electorate concrete and unquestionable proof that his Administration goes into 1936, as it went into 1935, barren of any adequate plan for dealing with its chief problem. The President tells Congress that not until at least another two months have passed—and the works program for which it gave him carte blanche last April is at last in full operation—will he be able to suggest how much should be appropriated for relief. And he adds: "It is reasonably certain that the total appropriations for work relief during the fiscal year 1937 will be far less than during the current fiscal year."

The budget he offers, such as it is, forecasts a deficit of $1,098,000,000, exclusive of whatever outlay may be needed for relief. Proudly he contrasts it with his estimated deficit of $3,234,000,000 for the current fiscal year. It would bring his accumulated deficit up to nearly $12,000,000,000 as of July 1, 1937. The figure probably will go much higher not only because of relief outlays but also because of the $2,000,000,000 soldiers' bonus bill. Add to that the cost of substitutes for the AAA, killed by the Supreme Court, and the need appears of saddling on the budget new and gargantuan appropriations for farm doles in addition to approximately half a billion dollars' worth of benefit-payment obligations to farmers, already incurred under the AAA.

No appropriation is included for the FERA, which now is in liquidation, or for the FSRC, whose fate had been uncertain. Nor is there any room in this $6,500,000,000 budget for any new loans or grants to states and municipalities for public works. Loans of this kind must in future come out of Ickes's revolving fund—accumulated repayments on old loans. For what the President calls a permanent works program the sum of $400,000,000 is asked, all of it to be spent on such federal projects as the Upper Mississippi development and Passamaquoddy.

On the other hand, though Roosevelt himself declares there is no threat of war in the Americas and this nation is bent upon a resolute peace policy, he asks for "national defense" a total of $937,791,966, which is 26 per cent more than the 1936 appropriation and 75 per cent more than the 1935 appropriation. The navy is to get $567,872,400 as against $425,350,500 in the last budget; the army is to get $369,919,566 as against $319,489,088. Furthermore, the President explains that the appropriation proposed will not lift the army to its authorized enlisted strength of 165,000 but only to 147,000, and that as he plans to increase the outlay gradually, full strength will not be attained until 1939.

It is unlikely that he will have any material difficulty in pushing such a budget through Congress, for the only serious opposition must come from the hopelessly outnumbered Republicans, whose leaders will be busy publicly trying to cut the proposed appropriations while privately striving to pad the budget and throw it farther out of line. As for the Democrats, with their eyes on November they will be even more cooperative than they have been in the past, and that goes for the Carter Glasses, the Byrds, the Baileys, and all the others who have been sharply critical of the Administration at private sessions.

Of the bills likely to pass, only the bonus bill would seem to be anti-Administration, but Roosevelt's legislative lieutenants, including Senator Harrison of Mississippi, are on record as predicting that even it can be so drafted as to receive Roosevelt's signature, and there is none who now predicts that it will not be passed. In the Vinson-McCormack version it was one of only three major pieces of legislation introduced on the opening day. The second was the Administration's neutrality bill. The third, which may prove the most important of them all, was slipped in unobtrusively. A bill forbidding the courts to pass on the constitutionality of Congressional enactments, it was introduced by Representative Oliver H. Cross, a sixty-five-year-old Democrat and retired lawyer from Waco, Texas, who left his farm in 1929 to sit in the House. Of the three major measures mentioned, it is the only one whose chances of passage are slim. It lacked Administration support when Mr. Cross introduced it at the last session, and apparently it still lacks that support. Senator Ashurst of Arizona, who as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee handles such matters for the Administration in the upper house, expects no legislation in that vein, despite a passage in the President's message that seemed to invite such an enactment.

It is probable that one effect of the message will be to stir up a stiffer fight over the neutrality bill than the White House is prepared for. There never has been any doubt that a permanent measure would be enacted at this session; it would have been enacted at the last session had not White House and State Department opposition forced a compromise on a temporary measure. What has been in question is how far the permanent measure would go in denying discretionary authority to the President. The sentiment against executive discretion is still strong in both houses, and today there was introduced in opposition to the Administration's neutrality bill what will be called the Nye-Clark-Maverick bill. It parallels the Administration measure at several points but goes farther in making mandatory provisions for neutrality. The fight over the neutrality bill probably will be delayed until the bonus measure has been wangled to a vote.

There seems no likelihood at this time that the social-security bill will undergo any liberalizing amendments. The Wagner housing bill seems headed for the discard along with the Bankhead farm-tenancy bill. There is to be no new banking or tax legislation, and well-informed sources assert that the present smelly shipping-subsidy system is to be continued if a new subsidy bill, which merely perfumes the old one, cannot be passed without a stiff fight. Another attempt will be made to slip through the Tydings-McCormack anti-secession bill, which has the backing of the War and Navy Departments and the opposition of all civilized men. An attempt also will be made to repeal the Warren-Bailey compulsory potato-control act; four repealers were introduced in the House on opening day. But before any of these comes to a vote, the Supreme Court probably will have spared Congress the trouble by scrapping the Bankhead compulsory-cotton-control act. Such a decision actually, if not technically, would also kill the Warren-Bailey potato bill and the Kerr-Smith tobacco-control bill, all of them having been drafted to the same pattern.

Arms Over Europe

IV. Why Mussolini Went to War

By LOUIS FISCHER

Rome, December 20

MUSSOLINI believes in the ennobling power of war. Fascism, he wrote in 1932, "does not think that permanent peace is possible or desirable." Why? Because "only war raises all exhibitions of human energy to their maximum tension. It puts the stamp of dignity on nations which are able to wage it openly. No other test can take its place."

"I regard the Italian nation," he told the Chamber of Deputies on December 11, 1925, "in a permanent state of war. I have already said, and I repeat, that the next five or ten years will be decisive in the fate of our country. These years will be decisive because the international struggle has already commenced. It will grow fiercer as time goes on, and it is inadmissible that we, with our energy, should appear on the world stage too late." He added amid loud applause: "For me to live is to fight, to risk, to dare." This was Mussolini's honest warning to Europe. Naturally nobody listened.

Lest any person doubt his intentions, he repeated it on May 26, 1927. "The fundamental duty of Fascist Italy," he declared, "is the preparation of all armed forces on land, sea, and in the air. We must be able to mobilize 5,000,000 men. We must strengthen our fleet. Our air force, in which I have more confidence every day, must be so strong that the hum of its motors will drown out all other noises of the peninsula and its wings darken the heavens. Then, between 1935 and 1940, will come the tragic moment in Europe's history, and we can let our voice be heard. We will be in a position to achieve the recognition of our rights. The preparation for this will require several years." Mussolini is a great and dynamic personality. He is also Europe's frankest politician. Moreover, as the Roman daily Ottobre says in its permanent masthead, "Mussolini is always right." And now we are "between 1935 and 1940."

Mussolini's aim was foreign conquest. Personal ambitions, personal pride, a statesman's conception of his role in history play a part in shaping policies; and Mussolini saw himself as a modern Caesar. He dreamed of a new Roman Empire. Rome is the eternally beautiful city, and Mussolini has done a remarkable job in restoring its precious ruins and making it clean. Immediately upon my arrival I went to the vast Palazzo Venezia, built of stones taken from the Colosseum. Once the property of the Popes, it is now Mussolini's headquarters. From here the broad new Via dell'Imperio (Empire Avenue), with the Forum and the Column of Trajan on one side and the Forum Romanum on the other, leads to the impressive giant Colosseum. Just before one reaches it, in front of the Forum Romanum, is a brick wall which Mussolini has had decorated with four marble maps. In the first, Europe, upper Africa, and near Asia appear in pure-black shining marble, the seas are striped green stone, and the city of Rome is indicated by a small circle of cafe-au-lait marble. Rome was founded, we read in the eighth century B.C. In the second map, representing the Roman Empire as it was in 146 B.C., the cafe-au-lait spot has spread to include half of Spain, Corsica, Sardinia, Italy, the Illyrian coast—now Yugoslavia—Macedonia, Thrace, and the city of Carthage. This was after the Punic Wars. By 14 A.D., as the third marble chart shows, Rome ruled all of Spain, all of France, Germany as far as the Rhine, southern Europe up to the Danube, Constantinople and its hinterland, Asia Minor, Cilicia, Antioch, Syria, Palestine, Egypt down to the Sudan, Libya, the Carthage region, and part of Numidia. Trajan (98-117 A.D.) brought the empire to its highest flower. His legions held sway over all the cafe-au-lait stretches of the past, plus Britain, Germany as far as the Baltic, the Balkans almost to Russia, Cappadocia, Armenia all the way to the Caspian, Mesopotamia down to the Persian Gulf, and Arabia. Mussolini has certainly noticed in studying this fourth map that his Roman forbears conquered England before they tried to take Ethiopia. It appears that Il Duce wants to upset one more precedent.

Wits add that there is no room on the brick wall for another map. Nevertheless, Fascism has sought to stamp the cult of imperialism on the mind of its people. "Empires come and empires go," a vigorous Fascist said to me yesterday. "Will the British Empire go on forever?" This is heard on all sides. Five days ago I had a long interview with Signor Edmondo Rossoni, said to be the third man in Italy. "Some people think that the world stands still," he declared. "But the dynamics of history is a big thing. I believe in imperialism." Mussolini himself has expounded this doctrine on numerous occasions. In 1926 he said: "Italy demands the acknowledgment by other powers of her undoubted need of sun and earth. If they do not acknowledge it, Italy will be forced to take what she has a right to."

"Africa and the East," that is, Asia Minor, is the direction of Italian expansion as stated by Mussolini in March, 1934. Some of his followers have been more definite. They have thought of Abyssinia, of course, of Egypt, and of India. It is a fact that Italians have endeavored to win over and organize the Indian students in Europe. On October 12, 1935, nine days after war commenced in Ethiopia, the Rome Messaggero said:

Italy has gained an exceptionally favorable position in India in the economic as in the moral field. All India is united in a sentiment of hatred toward the foreign lord who now dominates it. India pays a tribute of glory to the nation which has shown that it can challenge England on the British Empire's ways of communication. . . . British attempts to arouse the colored races against us have failed. The majority of Hindus understand the benefit which Italy's move in Africa represents to the resurgence of India. . . . Enslaved India looks to us as to a last hope.

The Zionist Fascists under Jabotinsky urge an Italian mandate for Palestine. Italian authorities have given them concrete encouragement. Italians have had their eyes on Syria, and Roman attempts to gain a foothold in Yemen on the Arabian peninsula are well known. The ambitious are not modest.

The motives behind imperialism vary. The manifestations change. Indeed, of late a few scholars (see, for instance, Dr. William Langer's Critique of Imperialism in a recent issue of Foreign Affairs) have even suggested that imperialism no longer springs from economic causes. For this reason Mussolini's policy represents a marvelously interesting case study in the sources and character of Fascist imperialism—a subject which may yet give this troubled world much concern.

In Rome the apologists of Italian imperialism are numerous, vehement, and eloquent. "We are a young nation," they contend. "Fascism has renewed our vigor. But Italy is poor. We are crowded. We will not submit to permanent poverty without a struggle. Foreign countries, particularly the United States, now bar our immigrants, whose departure in former years not only relieved population pressure but also resulted in large financial remittances to the home country. Rising tariff frontiers, moreover, limit our exports; the world depression aggravated this situation. We must have an outlet for our surplus population, for our goods, and for our energy."

But why should fascism, which sometimes begins by nourishing the illusion of autarchy, invariably embrace the credo of external expansion? Are there no possibilities of expansion at home? This question was once answered by Mussolini, who occasionally relapses into the now-rejected phraseology of that early period when he sowed his Marxist oats. Addressing the Chamber of Deputies on May 26, 1927, he said:

Gentlemen, in order that Italy may become influential she must in the second half of the twentieth century count 60,000,000 inhabitants. You will say: "How will those 60,000,000 live on this territory?" But this same objection was probably made in 1815 when Italy had only 16,000,000 inhabitants. At that time, perhaps, some people believed that it would be impossible for the 40,000,000 of today to find the means of livelihood, at a much higher standard, on our present territory.

Il Duce never uttered a wiser word. This anti-Malthusian doctrine is corroborated by the experience of all nations. Just as the population of Italy, without helpful colonies, increased from 16,000,000 to 40,000,000 in 112 years, so the population of the entire world has risen sharply in consequence of the augmented productive capacity of capitalism and of better public-health conditions, which, in many respects, are a corollary of that augmented productive capacity. What has happened to prevent further progress in the same direction?

This is the problem I carried to Signor Rossoni, Italian Minister of Agriculture and, what is more important, a member of the Grand Fascist Council of Eighteen. After the interview I wrote out his words and submitted them to him; he approved and signed them. He spoke first of Italy's progress in agriculture, of her mounting wheat harvest, and of the greater yield per hectare. In principle we agreed that intensive cultivation by small farmers produces larger crops and employs more men than do most big estates. Thereupon I said to him: "You have a dictatorship. Why don't you nationalize land?" "A dictatorship," the Minister replied, "is a political matter, not an economic or social matter. We cannot take the land away from the landlords. We cannot even fix the price at which we compensate the owners. Land prices are fixed in Italy just as they are in France, America, and other countries. We will proceed in the same way as we have in the past and take over, with compensation, only those lands which are not cultivated. If a landlord wants to sell his entire estate, that is all right. If he wishes to sell part and work the rest, that is all right. The peasants who receive the land sold by the estate owners pay for it in from fifteen to twenty years. Sometimes they become share-croppers of the landlord. In this wise we can place 2,000,000 hectares under cultivation in the next five years and give occupation to 400,000 families. The Fascist government prepares homes, equipment, and animals for these new settlers. They repay in twenty years."

This method must be slow and inadequate, for it places a heavy financial burden on the state. Many landowners have grown extremely rich by selling all or part of their huge latifundia at fancy prices. Moreover, many farmers hesitate to assume such gigantic debts at the start of a new and difficult career. It is probably for this reason that "crowded" Italy has much untilled land. According to the Papal Osservatore Romano of December 7, a congress of leaders of Fascist peasant syndicates in the provinces, meeting at Rome, urged that this land be divided. I therefore persisted. "Why," I demanded of Rossoni, "instead of conquering Ethiopia, which you hope will absorb surplus Italians, do you not attempt to accommodate them at home by introducing a land reform?"

"The war," he replied, "perhaps has economic reasons. But chiefly the reasons are moral and political. France did not acquire colonies because she was overpopulated. Nor did England. Economic problems are important, but nations cannot live solely on economic considerations. Italy can make a new contribution to civilization. A new regime could certainly improve conditions in Abyssinia. Mussolini has created a new nation which has a right to contribute to civilization."

This did not satisfy me, and so I said: "You have a dictatorship. You can send people to war, maybe to their death. Why cannot you take vacant land away from the estate owners and give it to the peasants?"

Signor Rossoni, to my delight, replied with equal frankness. "That is demagoguery. Peasants must be directed. 'Give land to the peasants.' That is a phrase. There must be organization. We are Fascists, not Socialists." Rossoni, like Mussolini, used to be a Socialist and a workingman. This made our meeting particularly interesting to me. We came soon to talk about corporations and the corporative state. He said: "The Italian corporations unite capitalists, technicians, and workers. The technicians must organize and direct industry. They must not be the instruments of the capitalists. They must guide the workers. The technician is the bridge between the worker and the employer. [All this reminded me of the American technocrats.] The worker himself has no executive ability. If he is talented he soon lifts himself up to a capitalist level. I know Socialist leaders who, when they recognized their own abilities, passed over to the capitalist side. Workers must be well organized and not free to be crazy. A strike is an act of folly. I am not bourgeois. We are anti-bourgeois."

Mussolini is Minister of Corporations. His Excellency Ferruccio Lantini is Under Minister and actual chief of the ministry. He likewise spoke freely with me about the nature of corporations. "The corporation," he affirmed, "tries to find a common ground between the proprietor of a factory and the workingman. The proprietor, however, remains the proprietor and the workers remain the workers. . . . The regime of corporations is not anti-capitalist." This last statement he repeated several times in order to reassure me, and he sought to prove it.

The best commentary on the words of Signori Lantini and Rossoni was the Senate session I attended. Mussolini was there and was vociferously cheered, but I am not sure whether the Prince of Piedmont, greeted with loud cries of "Savoy!" "Savoy!" and the four royal dukes who accompanied him did not receive at least as much applause. These five gentlemen were driven to the Senate, not in their splendid limousines, but in carriages each drawn by two horses. This is an innocent custom. Yet it is a symbol too, a symbol of conservatism and especially of intimate ties with the land. The Senate includes many heads of landed aristocratic families. And as long as royalty, nobility, and a powerful estate-owning class exist, it is obvious that all the free and undercultivated soil of Italy cannot be distributed among land-hungry peasants. In the Senate, apart from representatives of science, the armed forces, and the arts, sit many industrial magnates. That is another vested interest. Mussolini, to be sure, does not seem to like this reactionary body, and he has reduced it to legislative impotence. Yet it is there to demonstrate that the totalitarian political dictatorship has not been so totalitarian in economic and social matters.

This answers the question why Mussolini launched the East African war. Fourteen years ago Italy was on the verge of a social revolution. The workers had actually seized many of the factories; with more determined leadership they might have seized the state. The peasants were in open revolt against their miserable condition. The capitalists were frightened, economically weak, disappointed by Italy's World War booty, and incapable of producing a stronger figure than the pusillanimous Signor Facta. Then came Mussolini. The country had witnessed numerous armed clashes, one of them between Mussolini's Fascists and Rossoni's Socialist-Syndicalists. Mussolini drew Rossoni and others like him into his own camp. He undermined the movement of protest and received support from defenders of the status quo. There followed the March on Rome and the formation of a Fascist Cabinet by royal decree. Mussolini suppressed the workers' organizations. He inspired the bourgeoisie with new hope and with self-faith. The need was for a social revolution in village and town which would release new productive forces. But the stifling of those who wanted such a solution and the strengthening of those who abhorred it constituted merely a political change. Under the lid on which Mussolini sat firmly the old problems continued to brew. Mussolini did what he could. He launched innumerable public works which reduced unemployment and increased the national debt. He applied strict measures of control to the bourgeoisie, for though he had taught it self-respect he did not respect it. He had saved it, he was saving it every day, and it had to submit. He probably arrested the impoverishment of the lower classes too. But he could not or would not undertake any fundamental economic or social changes.

Within the limits set by the existence and operations of landowners and a city bourgeoisie, Mussolini has done almost as much as he could for Italian economy. He realized soon enough, however, that these limits were confining and began to prepare another stimulus. The stimulus was not the economic profits of imperial expansion. Fascists themselves doubt the material advantages of the conquest of Ethiopia. "What we do in Abyssinia," Rossoni said to me, "depends on the amount of money and free land available." To exploit Abyssinia Italy will have to receive foreign loans, and if she can obtain these she can equally well use them to buy raw materials for intensified industrial production at home. All of Eritrea contained only 3,400 Italian inhabitants in 1934, most of them officials and missionaries. What proof is there that Abyssinia will yield better results?

The Fascists consequently stress other than material considerations. "Of course," Giuseppe Bottai, the Governor of Rome, admitted in an article in the Messaggero of November 14, 1935, "the real or possible wealth of Abyssinia is one of the elements of the problem . . . one of the elements, but not the decisive one." Italy has a mission; she must civilize. Italy is virile; she must find an outlet for her zeal and vigor. If Italy had vast possibilities for development within her borders, her rulers might say to the growing generation: "Prepare to become rich. Invent new machines. Build new industries and cities. Lead Italy forward toward economic greatness." Those possibilities do not exist. The regime therefore says: "War dignifies"—war for its own sake. "We have a right to an empire"; it enriches our national personality. This mystic cult becomes a necessity to a regime which has reached an economic and social impasse. Such is the force of agitation and education these days that abstract values like blood and soil or the call to carry Europe's heritage to dark Africa acquire a reality which moves hundreds of thousands to the sincerest efforts and the greatest sacrifices—although very few Italians have as yet subjected themselves to the ennobling influence of fighting in Abyssinia; they have gallantly stepped aside for their Eritrean Askaris.

Cramped by its own determination to remain a political dictatorship, Italian Fascism has tied itself into a knot which it hopes to cut with the sword. But it cuts itself when it tries to cut that knot. With or without Abyssinia Fascism must still face Italy's internal problems. The suspicion exists, therefore, that the mystic cult will have to be driven farther. It must be fed with new goals—Egypt, India? If England were to yield Abyssinia with little resistance, Italy might assume that less time and effort would be required to take the Nile lands than to convert Abyssinia into an asset.

No matter how much of Abyssinia they get, it will not be enough for the Italian Fascists. There is little balm in Ethiopia. Mussolini may know this. Several weeks ago, one hears, he told a number of foreigners that the Abyssinian war might lead him to make a social revolution. How he could do such a thing he did not say. But this is a pregnant thought. Apparently Mussolini realizes wherein he has failed.

[This is the fourth of a series of articles in which Mr. Fischer surveys the present international crisis from various European capitals. The fifth will appear in the issue of January 29.]

Presidential Possibilities

II. Landon as a Candidate

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

GOVERNOR LANDON, as a candidate, would be no barnstormer and no mesmerist. He is not an orator, nor can he hide the deficiency behind a flow of easy self-revelation or even good fun. A candidate, or a President, does not have to write his own speeches, since this is the age of universal and shameless ghosting, and a public man can cull the best thoughts and best phrases from the minds around him. Even so, Landon would not deliver them brightly. He is the sober sort of speaker, running easily into homely abstractions. He could not have become Governor of Kansas by virtue of his speeches. He did it by building up an incredibly large personal acquaintanceship. As a political technique this is impossible nationally. Something like it might work if Landon had the gift of being warm and friendly over the radio; but though I have not heard him at the microphone, I am certain this is not his line. I doubt his ability to project his personality into the homes where he would be heard. So he would be only an average campaigner, and would appear mediocre when measured against the exceptional talents of Roosevelt.

So far he has not been specific about what he wants to see done nationally. This may be strategy, but I imagine it also is his nature. The national problem has suddenly loomed before him in a new aspect. He no longer is a sideline observer, but must be prepared to state his own views responsibly. He has declined to rush in with explicit declarations. He is feeling his way, and if he became President he would feel his way at Washington. That is, he is not spectacular or didactic or given to quick judgments. Nor is he thinking of how to set the stage so as to get the utmost popular acclaim. He is not the sort to promise to sweep the New Deal dramatically away. Speaking of the Roosevelt policies he said in his Cleveland speech: "I shall not attempt to characterize them as successes or failures, as revolutionary or evolutionary. For better or worse, such laws are there. . . . The major task ahead in the main is not more laws or more programs or more experimentation but sound common-sense administration." Here is a man, picked by some of the most pathological foes of Roosevelt to beat him, who himself is no such foe. Much in the New Deal he likes. What revolts him is extravagance and waste, and uncertainty about financial stability. He will not be hostile to whatever form of farm relief emerges from the ruins of the AAA. At least he will keep the principle of aid to agriculture until agriculture is on a sound footing. He would not, I believe, scrap the TVA—if the Supreme Court reprieves it. He is no friend of the utilities and no protagonist of bigness. One of his legislative successes has been to get through a law requiring public utilities in Kansas to pay the costs of any investigation by the state supervising commission. It took two sessions to get the bill through; in the first it was defeated because the railroads were included and took the responsibility of killing it. Before the second session the Governor made a bargain with the railroads giving them some minor concessions, and so split the opposition. Now the Kansas utilities will be under a control that previously could not be financed by the state treasury.

He does not believe that the restoration of confidence is the only task of a Republican President. "Even with the return of industrial activity," he said in his Cleveland speech, "there will be major social, farm, and economic problems to meet. We must build against a return of what we have been through these past years. We must build on the realization that this economic situation did not come upon us suddenly, nor will we get out of it overnight." And he goes on to say: "We must face the fact that our economic difficulties now have basic world-wide implications, whereas previous depressions have been more completely mobilized within our domestic area."

A few sentences scrutinized like this make the Cleveland speech more meaningful than it was to his listeners, who dismissed it as not saying very much. A good many of Landon's views are hidden in it, for instance, his attitude toward relief. The budget balancers as a group speak about relief in stern tones and have awakened the suspicion that they are not deeply concerned about it. But to Landon the unemployed are victims of a system and not personally derelict. Relief "is a mutual responsibility, a common obligation created by the rapidity of our growth, the complexity of our society, and our inability to cope with situations as fast as they have arisen. Every right-thinking person sincerely desires to see the need for relief to the unemployed speedily pass away. Until that time comes it is reasonable—and nothing less than just—that the government exert all its powers to prevent suffering among the less fortunate."

An interesting sidelight on this comment is to be found in his inaugural address of January 14, 1935. "Our problems have been intensified," he said then, "by the great industrial plutocracy we have built since our last great depression of 1893. New adjustments must be made as a result of the development of machine production in the last quarter century." "The great industrial plutocracy"—these are strange words from Mr. Hearst's nominee. And the long view of the depression is out of key with the current Republican dogma, which is on the point of claiming that all was well under Coolidge and Hoover and that the shadow the New Deal cast before it actually caused the worst of the depression. Landon's belief in change is expressed in the same inaugural address: "America bids fair to join the procession of nations of the world in their march toward a new social and economic philosophy. Some say this will lead to socialism, some communism, others fascism. For myself I am convinced that the ultimate goal will be a modified form of individual rights and ownership of property out of which will come a wider spread of prosperity and opportunity for a fuller, richer life." Supplementing this thought he said in Cleveland: "Out in Kansas we try to distinguish between progress and change, to evaluate change not only in its immediate effects but in its lasting results. . . . In solving old problems we must avoid the creation of new ones. . . . An innovation may be a backward step. This has been demonstrated in foreign countries where civil liberties have been yielded in return for economic security, without gaining economic security. Such a step in this country would be disastrous to all American ideas and traditions."

Sooner or later Landon will be more specific, and then the country will know whether he is doing his own thinking or subordinating himself to the big chance of being nominated and elected. The East, of course, will want him to stress the Kansas economies. But the balanced Kansas budgets—even 8,000 of them—are not particularly good campaign material. Reducing expenditure is a terribly depressing topic to most voters, who know about it from personal experience, and the Kansas story is not without its dangers. The school teachers, who have taken up to 25 per cent cuts in salaries already none too large, the recipients of old-age pensions now getting on the average less than $9 a month, would not be eloquent supporters of the blessings of penny-pinching in Kansas. The Kansas roads are not being maintained as they should be in a progressive state, and the highway workers are paid hardly more than relief rates. The pay-as-you-go principle was no doubt justified in Kansas, for a state that had tumbled in corn production to one-third of its peak and was suffocated by the dust of its worst drought, had to bring down the speed of spending. I do not minimize the Landon achievement. I simply doubt that it will win millions of votes.

Kansas has survived, in the last analysis, not because of economies but because of federal expenditure in the state. Landon's leadership did bring a reduction in the cost of local and state government, and the figures are impressive. The per capita cost of state government fell from $15.68 in 1932 to $12.06 in 1933, $13.31 in 1934, and $13.41 in 1935. The cost of local government fell even more, from $51.67 in 1932 to $42.87 in 1933, $38.01 in 1934, and $39.13 in 1935. In these years the state and local bonded indebtedness was reduced $18,500,000. But this could not have happened without the flow of federal relief money into the state. True, the same flow went into other states, and most of them have not managed anything like so well as Kansas. But there is a defect in the logic of arguing that Landon's economies of themselves represent salvation, since they were possible only against the background of federal relief poured in by the Roosevelt Administration. If Landon were President he could only repeat the miracle on a national scale by combining federal relief with skilful administration. Moreover, the status of relief in Kansas has not been anything to boast about. Last March Kansas ranked fifteenth among the states in supplementing federal expenditure with local appropriations. The rate of relief thus paid was low according to Eastern standards and has been slightly below the national average. It has, however, been higher than in the surrounding agricultural states. The humanitarian course would have been to pay more relief and postpone debt reduction till better days. But this has not been Landon's particular problem as the money for relief in Kansas is not raised by the state but is contributed by the local communities.

I have stressed the fact that Governor Landon is not a star performer on the platform. But he is a gifted executive. He knows what he wants to get done, and his art is in handling people to that end. When he was elected governor for his first term, he had a nominal majority of two in the legislature. But some of his Republicans were followers of Dr. Brinkley, the goat-gland specialist, and couldn't be trusted. Landon saw that his problem was to rally both Democrats and Republicans behind his program, and the Landon economies, of which Republicans now seek to make the most bitter partisan use, were the result. The party caucus in the Kansas legislature became almost unknown, and the reform of Kansas finances was a non-partisan triumph. Now this is an ability for which Washington offers plenty of scope. But it is not one which Eastern Republicans are polishing up for their main sales argument in the campaign. Actually it stultifies the use to which they want to put Governor Landon. The myth they want to create is of a Republican who kept the party flag flying during the worst Democratic assault of a generation. Is he not the one Republican elected governor west of the Mississippi in the Democratic landslide of 1932, and the only Republican governor reelected two years later? This being his distinction, is he not a find for his party? But on closer examination he turns out to be a man who rode the storm by being able to forget much of the time that he was a Republican.

This is not to say that Governor Landon is not a politician, a Republican politician at that. Nor are the two statements incompatible. The job of the politician is to get into power; after he gets there it is to use the power to stay in power. Landon came into power by a narrow margin, by a majority of 6,000 the first time and, as I have said, with only a nominal majority in his legislature. But to get into power at all was a triumph, and he beat Governor Woodring, now Assistant Secretary of War, who had been a good governor. To do this he had to end a feud in the Republican Party in Kansas, and that meant playing politics shrewdly and confidently. It meant tying together the left center wing—to which he and William Allen White belong—with the right center wing, personified in John Hamilton, now national Republican committeeman from Kansas and assistant for many months to National Chairman Fletcher in Washington. To the left of them remained former Governor Clyde Reed, who had worked his way into a lone position not because he was much more radical but because he was hard to get along with. To the right was the Old Guard, headed by former Vice-President Curtis. Landon consolidated the party between the outer wings of Reed and Curtis, and this was enough to win the election in a normally Republican state. Thereupon he departed from the straight party tradition during his first term, made his non-partisan record in the legislature, and was reelected by 60,000. This was good politics even when it was non-partisan. It even follows a pattern which can be applied nationally. Landon is wise enough to get on with his opposition when that is the thing to do, and since the next Senate is sure to be Democratic, this is an essential virtue for a Republican President. But it is hardly the quality for which he is being trumpeted by Hearst and the people who believe they have found a Kansas Coolidge.

Any estimate of Landon as a candidate should include consideration of his attitude toward labor. I have already said that his experience in this intricate field is limited by the conditions of Kansas. The largest city in the state is Kansas City, Kansas, which really is a suburb of the larger city across the Missouri line. Next to it in size is Wichita, certainly no industrial melting-pot. The Governor, however, did name as labor commissioner an official of the Kansas Federation of Labor, and I was told that federation members feel he has done as much for them as any governor of recent years. He had one moment of national attention in a labor dispute when he sent the National Guard into the southeast corner of the state in June, 1934. This is one of the unhappiest industrial districts in America, a mining zone lying in three states—Kansas, Oklahoma, and Missouri. During the trouble that year the troops of Oklahoma as well as of Kansas were called out, and the Oklahoma troops, according to the memory of the miners, behaved scandalously and the Kansas troops well. In Kansas, at least, meetings of strikers were permitted. The radical union which was taking the lead at the time was badly beaten and will hold this in part against Landon. But as he sent his labor commissioner, a former union official, to the scene of trouble, and acted under his advice, he cannot be bracketed with the governors of Indiana and Oregon, who openly put their troops at the service of employers. Landon's inclination, certainly, is to be fair to labor, and in theory he believes in collective bargaining. But even in his own business he has had little experience with unions. The oil fields, where he has made his money, have not yet faced unionization. Landon has not opposed unions there; the problem has simply not come up. And his record is that he was the first operator publicly to take a stand for the eight-hour day in the oil fields. In each of his two messages to the legislature he has urged legislation to benefit labor, and he strongly recommended, and worked for, the ratification of the child-labor amendment, though without success. Kansas farmers, for all their liberalism in other directions, thought this amendment would forbid the younger members of the family to work on the farm, and therefore rejected it.

Since Hearst is Landon's discoverer and sponsor, some mention should also be made of his attitude toward civil liberties. Here, again, he is a Kansan, which is to say that he takes civil liberties for granted. I have already recalled the fact that he once introduced Norman Thomas at a meeting in Kansas. This was several years ago, and it was such a natural thing for a natural Kansan to do that it doesn't merit much attention, certainly not as an act of distinguished bravery. I can add one more detail which shows how naturally Landon responds in such matters. A somewhat radical professor from the University of Kansas went to Oklahoma to lecture, and the Governor received a letter of complaint about Kansas sending out such a "dangerous" missionary. To the complainant, who was a friend of his, Landon replied simply enough that Kansas hadn't "sent" the professor; he had been invited to come to Oklahoma. He then added: "Under the academic freedom which we practice here in Kansas we do not attempt to control the thinking of the members of the faculties of our schools."

My conclusion is that Landon the candidate is much like Landon the man in being strangely different from the use that his sponsors seek to make of him. He is no bitter partisan, and he would be no grim, reactionary crusader against the "new tendencies." He is not much, if at all, less progressive in philosophy than Franklin D. Roosevelt, and if he only could, he would improve the quality of government, which in the last analysis means to scrap the spoils system. Why Hearst and the East have selected him baffles me. I am told that Hearst sent half a dozen men to Kansas to study his record before he came out for him. I can only wonder whether Hearst is more of a liberal than he shows himself in his newspapers or I am a worse reporter than I care to believe.

[Part I of Mr. Swing's article on Governor Landon appeared last week. An analysis of Colonel Frank Knox as a Presidential candidate, also by Mr. Swing, will appear in an early issue.]

Correspondence

"Paradise Lost"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Because Joseph Wood Krutch's review of Clifford Odets's "Paradise Lost" appears in The Nation (issue of December 25) it cannot, as it should, be ignored. Your readers have a right to assume that the same standards of social responsibility are brought to your criticism of the arts as may be found in your articles dealing with political and economic subjects.

However, not by the furthest stretch of good-will could this review be dignified by the term criticism; it is not even honest reporting. On the contrary Mr. Krutch has written a hysterical polemic attacking the integrity and seriousness of one of our few important young playwrights—with a jeer or two thrown in for the most mature theater artists in America, the Group Theater.

The "St. Clifford" of the title sets the tone of Mr. Krutch's piece. It irks him considerably that Mr. Odets's previous plays, "Waiting for Lefty" and "Awake and Sing," received the admiration and acclaim which both the critics and the public accorded them. He then goes on to describe this much deeper and more complex play in terms of a mere list of the vices of some of its characters: "murder," "adultery," "embezzlement," and so on. That both "Hamlet" and "Macbeth" and Dostoevski's "Idiot" could also be so described is obvious. But that does not trouble Mr. Krutch in the least. For his purpose is to discredit, not to evaluate. Neither Shakespeare nor Dostoevski were so unfortunate as to be contemporaries of Mr. Krutch. That really is Mr. Odets's intolerable mistake.

Did not Mr. Krutch write a book, "The Modern Temper," part of whose burden was the inevitable sterility of the arts in our time? I remember that Waldo Frank's review of this book characterized it as an expression of defeatism. Frank's analysis of Mr. Krutch's primary motivation also explains this review. But now his defeatism reveals itself in its ugliest form, hysterical malice and a wanton will to destroy. To those who have seen "Paradise Lost" such a review as this can only emphasize the truthfulness and pertinence of the play. For Mr. Krutch's criticism reminds one of that hysteria which animates the character of Marcus Katz, the pocket-book manufacturer, whose arrogance toward other people, whose cruel and false accusation of sterility against his wife, are revealed as pathetic compensations for his own impotence.

New York, December 28

PAUL STRAND

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Group Theater letter by Mr. Krutch in his article entitled On Good Intentions in your issue of January 1, though sent to all the critics, was not intended as a reply to his review of Clifford Odets's play "Paradise Lost." As a group the newspaper reviewers praised many things in Mr. Odets's new play; the Group's statement was meant to point out that both praise and blame were equivocal since they had not made clear that the play, whether good or bad, was on a different level from most plays that are dubbed "entertainment." Since Mr. Krutch found practically nothing good in the play, it is obvious that our remarks could not apply to his review.

This does not signify, however, that we can accept Mr. Krutch's observations on our letter. By omitting its first two paragraphs Mr. Krutch alters its meaning. What Mr. Krutch says in effect is: The Group Theater deems it enough to assert that Clifford Odets wrote his play with honest motives; therefore the critics should have recommended it to their readers. But the Group Theater's letter bore a much clearer message—to wit, imperfect or not, in "Paradise Lost" the "level of thought, emotion, understanding is not only of a very high order but such as we find perhaps once in ten years in our theater." Mr. Krutch, we know, violently disagrees with our opinion, but no one ought to imply that we advanced the namby-pamby plea of "good intentions."

This, however, is a minor matter. More interesting are the generalizations that Mr. Krutch draws from the argument. "A pretty good tragedy," he says, "is not better than a very good farce." Perhaps Mr. Krutch is right. Yet we should like to hazard a few counter-statements of a more specific nature. Might we suggest that Chekov's immature tragedy "Ivanoff" is more important or, if you will, "better" than a very good farce like "She Loves Me Not"? Is it too much to say that Ibsen's unsuccessful tragedy "When We Dead Awaken" is "better" than a very good farce like "Seven Keys to Baldpate," or that O'Neill's weaker tragedies, like "Diff'rent" and "The Straw," are "better" than Molnar's "The Play's the Thing"?

We are not arguing at this moment the inherent superiority of tragedy to farce; we simply wish to submit that Mr. Krutch's friendly comments in this instance are questionable and a little beside the mark. The arbitrary contrast between "pretty good tragedy" and "very good farce" has hardly anything to do with "Paradise Lost," which may possibly not be a tragedy and certainly isn't a farce. Our point, we repeat, is that even with its faults "Paradise Lost" is a play of a superior order because its characters are alive, its dialogue is rich and pungent, its situations are affecting, and its feeling at least is as valid an expression of what many people feel to be the truth about the middle-class as is Mr. Krutch's flat denial.

New York, December 30

HAROLD CLURMAN, for the Group Theater

More Names for the Honor Roll

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

To your excellent honor roll for the year I should like to add the following names:

SENATOR GERALD P. NYE and INVESTIGATOR S. H. RAUSHENBUSH, for their endeavors to dig up all the facts concerning the munitions racket in the face of the bitterest opposition by reactionaries.

GENERAL SMEDLEY D. BUTLER, for his intelligent criticism of the misuse of the army, navy, and National Guard, in Common Sense.

GEORGE SELDES, for writing "Sawdust Caesar" and "Freedom of the Press," the most revealing non-fiction books of the year.

SINCLAIR LEWIS, for "It Can't Happen Here," which has shocked and instructed thousands of hundred-per-centers.

PROFESSOR ROBERT MORSS LOVETT, of the University of Chicago, for his courage in defending academic freedom of speech before a reactionary investigating committee last spring.

ISIDOR FEINSTEIN, for pursuing in the New York Post the most intelligent and independent editorial policy any big metropolitan newspaper has displayed in recent years.

NORMAN THOMAS, a perennial honor roller, for fighting a vigorous battle against oppression and tyranny everywhere.

THE EDITORS OF THE NATION AND THE NEW REPUBLIC, if their collective blushes will permit it, for the most courageous and instructive journalism of the year.

FRANCIS GORMAN, for his part in furthering the campaign for a Labor Party.

And, perhaps most important of all, with the hearty respect and admiration of a fellow-student, the members of the NATIONAL STUDENT STRIKE COMMITTEE, for their part in organizing last April's student strike against war, the greatest pacifist demonstration the United States has seen in years, and the EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE of the NATIONAL STUDENT LEAGUE and the STUDENT LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY, for their part in organizing the American Student Union.

New York, December 30

ASHER LANS

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I want to call your attention to a gross omission in your Honor Roll for 1935—the name of the great humanitarian Dr. Francis E. Townsend. How come?

Brooklyn, N. Y., December 26

GEORGE FENTRICK

The Eternal Principles

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The series of articles, Our Critics, Right or Wrong, which has recently appeared in The Nation aroused a strong desire to protest from time to time, but the sprightly style rather disarmed criticism, and I have contented myself with sheer enjoyment. My interest in literary criticism is apparently greater than my objection to somewhat unfounded strictures, however, and as a result I now feel impelled to write for information.

In the last article (issue of December 18) the Misses Marshall and McCarthy criticize Mr. Gannett for confessing to a "lamentable ignorance of the eternal principles of criticism." I too think that such a statement is open to certain comment, only mine would not quite coincide with theirs. What I most want to know—and from what the authors say I imagine they must know—is, what are these eternal principles of criticism? Where can they be found? I am slightly acquainted with the major critical dicta from Aristotle to our present critics (right or wrong), but I cannot recall ever having seen any list of such eternal principles—at least not any that any group of appreciable size would agree to for any appreciable time. Could the authors be induced to take the few moments necessary to help?

Millburn, N. J., December 28

PHILIP C. JONES

Dr. Felix Adler

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

A "Life and Letters of Dr. Felix Adler" is being prepared by his wife and daughter. Anyone having any letters in his possession is requested to send them to the undersigned, who will greatly appreciate the use of them, and will have copies made and the originals returned without delay. The address is 3902 Spuyten Duyvil Parkway, Riverdale, New York.

Riverdale, N. Y., December 20

ELEANOR H. ADLER

Labor and Industry

Company Unions, F.O.B. Detroit

By ANTHONY LUCHEK

LABOR organizations in the automobile industry were practically non-existent in January, 1933. Since then a foothold has been gained by every sort of workers' group known to organized labor, and by a few new and unique ones. There has been a lively fight for workers' allegiance among such varied groups as company unions, works councils, American Federation of Labor unions, unaffiliated unions, a rump union, a dingman's club, proportional-representation agencies created by the Automobile Labor Board, an independent union growing out of one of these agencies, a "debating society," a confederation, and finally an amalgamation of unaffiliated unions. All these have been competing for membership and the right to be recognized as the one workers' bargaining agency in the automobile plants.

THE COMPANY INSTALS A UNION

Company unions were introduced just at the time that the automobile-manufacturing code under the NRA was adopted. It was no coincidence that independent unions had already begun their organization campaigns and had attracted a nucleus of members in many plants of the industry. There was wide variation in the organization, plan, and scope of the company unions set up to meet this competition. Some were "membership organizations" in which workers enrolled voluntarily or otherwise. Others were plant-wide systems of representation in which all employees automatically participated. Some provided for joint meetings of workers' representatives and management, others for meetings of representatives only. Representatives had to be employed in the department they represented and could hold no supervisory position. Often citizenship requirements and seniority status were added to the required qualifications. All automobile manufacturing companies except the Ford Motor Company and a few independents had some form of company union. General Motors, Chrysler, Hudson, and Packard were the most active.

There were important differences in the manner of introducing plans to the workers. In one of the most successful plans the idea of a company union was suggested to a committee of workers chosen from each department. Various plans operating in other industries were described to them, and a proposed constitution was submitted for their criticism. After a discussion resulting in a few minor changes, a panel from the group was elected as a steering committee to conduct the election of representatives; the company union was then in operation. Another manufacturer drew up a plan which was submitted to the employees for approval and adopted by an overwhelming majority. However, the procedure followed in this election did not permit the freedom of choice that an election suggests. One morning in October, 1933, each employee found in his clock-card space a letter from the president of the company announcing the plan and urging him to vote for its adoption. This was the first news of a representation plan received by the workman. Shortly after he commenced work he was given a pamphlet describing the plan. Before noon of the same day he was approached by his foreman together with two "front-office" employees, one of whom carried a ballot-box and the other a ballot on which he was asked to indicate whether or not he was in favor of the proposal. He had to vote "yes" or "no" before three management representatives upon a proposal which he had not even had time to read. Of course, the vote resulted in an overwhelming majority in favor of adoption. The faith of the workers in this representation plan after it had been in operation for some time was shown when it was reconsidered in a secret-ballot election conducted by the Automobile Labor Board. Only 11 men out of more than 18,000 voted for it.

An automobile-parts plant also had its employees vote on whether or not they wanted a company union, but when the workers voted two to one against its adoption, the management did not announce the results of the election. Instead, it stated that "the results of ballots cast fully warrant carrying through the plan," and proceeded to do so!

According to the method most commonly followed in the industry, the management drew up a representation plan, submitted it to an employees' committee for discussion (if none existed, a committee was appointed), and then had the committee conduct the election. Since the vast majority of workers participated in the election, the management assumed that the workers supported the plan.

The automobile worker was anxious to try some form of collective bargaining to improve his status. He found both company unions and independent unions competing for his support. Because of the recent introduction of labor organizations the automobile worker had not developed an allegiance to any one form. He was willing to try anything, and that is what he usually did. Frequently the hopeful workman held membership in several labor organizations. The company union enjoyed special attractiveness, since it had the management's support and was free from dues, so he usually joined this too. What benefits did the company union obtain for him?

IT THICKENS THE HAM IN HAM SANDWICHES

Many petty grievances and misunderstandings which had been causes of irritation on his job were corrected. For example, an open door leading to the dock made a certain department a cold and drafty place in winter. The company union had the door closed, making the workman's job much more comfortable. Now that his representative has been able to get the windows washed on his side of the plant, he has some daylight. He can make more money on his piece-rate job now, because the company-union representative complained about the condition of the department tools at the request of his constituents and the company had them restored to first-class order. The ham in the sandwiches has been increased in thickness by the company union—it fixed a standard thickness with micrometers; the milk bottles now carry sanitary caps; the candy bars have improved in quality; the toilets are cleaner; a coat rack has been provided; and the parking-lot mud holes have been filled. The workman can also participate in group athletics with the boys from the shop, thanks to the recreation committee of the company union. And now that he is a member of the company union he can—sometimes must—take advantage of group insurance and a savings plan. His condition has been improved in minor ways, and the management has been careful to point out that the company union has been responsible for these benefits. In other words, the company union has succeeded in doing some of the work which perfectly functioning personnel and engineering departments should do.

WAGES AND HOURS ARE "PROBLEMS OF MANAGEMENT"

However, the fundamental problems of collective bargaining in the automobile industry pertain to wages, hours of work, speed of work, lay-off, and rehiring. These are not subjects with which the company union is primarily concerned. When such problems are introduced, they usually come as a complaint from a single individual or department. It is true that when wage rates within a department are obviously inequitable, adjustments are readily obtained by the company union. But when requests for general increases in wages are presented, the management usually argues that it is impossible to grant them because of the competitive nature of the industry and their effect on the price of the car.

By carefully building up a series of favorable decisions in small matters the employer hoped to establish the desirability and effectiveness of the company union in the eyes of the workers. In one instance a department organized by an outside union was asking for an increase in wages. The management refused to deal with the independent union, but told the men to refer the matter to their company-union representative. When he presented their case, the department was granted an increase. Such experiences make a strong impression on the workers. In the spring of 1934 the 10 per cent increase in wages throughout the industry was announced in some of the plants through the company union, giving the workers the impression that the company union was responsible for obtaining the higher rates. As a matter of fact, a threatened strike by an outside union had really occasioned the increase. When wage changes are granted through a company union, it is difficult to tell whether this agency is really responsible. The existence of an outside union or the threat of unionization plays an important role. Some employers definitely banned the question of wages from company-union proceedings by stating that wages and hours were problems of management and therefore could not be proper subjects for collective bargaining.

DISILLUSIONMENT SETS IN

The deliberate enhancement of the prestige of the company union was not universally practiced. An example will suggest how a careless reply by a management lost the support of the workers. When one representative complained to the management that his wages were not sufficient for him to support his family, he was told that he shouldn't have married if he wasn't able to keep a wife. Because the management frequently let cases hang fire for long periods when it did not intend to render a favorable decision, the company union often lost the confidence of the workers. Let one of the representatives tell you in his own words:

"After this man's case had dragged along far enough, the man comes to me and I start to talk to him. He says, 'Oh, Christ, don't ever talk to me. I've listened to you for four months now. You say two weeks, then thirty days.' I say, 'I can't do no more. I am working my damndest on it. The only thing I can do is if you make a statement, I will take it up again.' He says, 'No, I will forget about it.'"

One employer expressed confidence in his ability to control the company-union representatives. He has found that the representatives "are good boys and willing to listen to reason." "When the boys get out of line," he calls them in "to straighten them out." He has had trouble with only two representatives; one of these was asked to resign from the company union and the other resigned of his own accord to join an independent union.

With such experiences why did not some company unions become more militant? The answer lies in the existence of outside unions in the industry. The more aggressive representatives, becoming discouraged with the work of the council, soon left that body in disgust to join independent unions. More complacent employees were satisfied with their success in correcting minor grievances.

There are, to my knowledge, three plants in the automobile-manufacturing industry where the company union is acceptable to a substantial group of workers. In all of these, workers are actively organized in independent unions. In one of the plants almost all the employees support one group or the other, with strength about equally divided. The sincerity of the management in dealing with the company union may be due to the competition of other labor groups.

The typical worker's attitude toward company unions was expressed by the representative who said to the Automobile Labor Board, "We will be glad we won't have to serve as representatives of the company's employees' association" after the Automobile Labor Board elections. Another representative told how they "would discuss baseball, boxing, washing windows or floors for hours at a time, and the company praised us for our good taste in not mentioning wages, hours, or working conditions." The workers soon learned the place of the company union in collective bargaining.

ENTER THE AUTOMOBILE LABOR BOARD

When the Automobile Labor Board set up its system of proportional representation in the winter of 1935, the company unions were reduced to an indeterminate position. In a few plants where independent unions were relatively weak, the company union was identified in the worker's mind with the "bargaining agency" instituted by the Automobile Labor Board's election. There was a degree of truth in this impression, since many of the representatives were elected as affiliates of the company union. Some company unions dropped collective bargaining and functioned only in welfare and recreational activities. The typical situation was one in which the company union ceased functioning altogether.

In practice the Automobile Labor Board agency was essentially a continuation of the company union. Except for minor modifications the procedure of the bargaining agency and the problems discussed in the meetings followed those of the company union. There were, however, three real differences between the Automobile Labor Board's agency and the company union: (1) The voting for representatives was an unqualified free election. (2) The workers could elect anyone to represent them, whether or not he worked in their department. (3) Since the government conducted the election, the representatives secured an official position in the eyes of the workers. Here was a new agency that gave the workers fresh hope of improving their status.

THE RUN-AROUND, CONTINUED

The elected representatives soon lost interest because the Automobile Labor Board delayed unduly in determining rules for procedure, thus giving the employers an opportunity to lay down rules following company-union practice. When the Automobile Labor Board finally did establish a set of rules, they were so general in character that they did not alter the operation of the bargaining boards. The agencies continued to meet during the life of the board in spite of dwindling interest on the part of the workers.

The failure to get satisfaction on grievances presented under the company-union procedure was the real reason for the decline of interest of the workers and their representatives. In general the Automobile Labor Board agencies were more aggressive than the company unions had been. They introduced more issues dealing with the fundamental problems of collective bargaining. This aggressiveness, plus the reduced threat of unionization and the employers' half-hearted acceptance of the Automobile Labor Board agencies (since they were upsetting their existing industrial relations), brought blunt refusals from employers who would have declined more tactfully under the company union.

BATTLES FOR INDEPENDENCE

Disillusioned with their attempt to obtain collective bargaining under the Automobile Labor Board agency, one group of representatives gradually built up an independent union which has spread to other plants in the industry. Under rules of procedure laid down by the company this Automobile Labor Board agency was required to meet with an equal number of management representatives to settle grievances. The workers' delegates found that nothing could be successfully accomplished in an unwieldy body of more than a hundred men which met but once a month. The meetings usually degenerated into debates during which hours were spent on some trivial question. The telling blow was administered by the declaration of company executives that decisions of the joint council on questions of wages and hours were not binding on the management.

The men's representatives felt that by forming an executive committee of a few members who would meet with responsible management they would have a satisfactory form of collective bargaining. Upon the refusal of the management to accept this proposal, the representatives carried their case to the Automobile Labor Board with unsatisfactory results. The board argued that since the management had no voice in determining the number of representatives the workers elected, the workers did not have the right to determine how many representatives the management would appoint to meet with them. At the same hearing the board declared that the bargaining agency could discuss anything pertaining to collective bargaining—including wages and hours—but no method was provided for reaching an agreement.

The representatives, determined to secure some means for effective collective bargaining, finally decided to present a questionnaire to each employee in order to obtain his opinion on the formation of an outside union. Ninety per cent of the workmen reached cast an affirmative vote and contributed twenty-five cents to the cause. This Automobile Labor Board agency then called mass-meetings of automobile workers urging them to join any of the independent unions. In the meantime, it enrolled a majority of workers in a "neutral" organization. This group would later determine by vote with which one of the established unions it would affiliate. Upon deciding that no established union was acceptable, it formed a new independent one. Since then it has enrolled workers in about a dozen automobile plants, claiming a membership of 20,000.

Another movement toward independent unionism grew out of an association of the Automobile Labor Board agencies. These bodies had hardly begun to function when a group of representatives invited all functioning agencies to send delegates to a meeting for the purposes of exchanging experiences. Sixteen groups from Detroit, Pontiac, and Lansing were sufficiently interested to send their officers to learn what others were doing. They formed a permanent association called the Officers' Association of Automobile Employee Representatives. Its purposes were "to create a central agency for the exchange of information and individual experience, to establish more uniform practices, and to build a united front." Although it was a conglomerate group of independent unionists, company-union chiefs, and unaffiliated men, all were sincerely interested in improving the conditions of automobile workers. Dissension soon arose. Upon being overruled in their objection to the election of an independent-union official to an executive position in the association, a group of company-union men withdrew from membership. Another company-union delegation refused to participate in future meetings. By the fall of 1935 all delegates who continued to attend had joined some independent union.

REORGANIZING FOR ACTION

Realizing the ineffectiveness of the Automobile Labor Board agencies, the association decided to reorganize. All independent unions were asked to send responsible leaders to its meeting to form a cooperative association of unions. The American Federation of Labor refused to participate, but the three largest unaffiliated unions accepted. A loose association of participating unions was organized, called the Brotherhood of Allied Automobile Organizations.

In plants where there are no competing labor organizations the Labor Board agencies are continuing their company-union business. One group has split in two, the outside-union representatives no longer meeting with company-union representatives. The two groups have established separate meetings and deal with management separately. One agency has formally resigned as a body. In many instances individuals have resigned. This is especially true of union men, since some unions do not permit their members to serve as representatives on these agencies. Since no official provisions were made for such replacements, some districts are without representation. With a new production season already under way the typical attitude is one of indecision. Neither the management nor the workers know what to do with the Automobile Labor Board agencies.

This situation has given some employers, in plants where conditions permit, the opportunity to revive the company union. One plant mailed ballots to its employees with a list of persons eligible to serve as representatives. Only 15 per cent of the workers reached cast their vote. Another company union has moved off company property and plans to limit its functions to collective bargaining, leaving its welfare and recreational activities to the company. Most employers are waiting to see what will happen to the National Labor Relations Act and what independent unions will do before deciding to revive company unions.

In general, the automobile worker, recognizing the need for complete freedom of action, has turned to independent unionism. Since he also realizes the weaknesses of collective bargaining when an organization is limited to a single plant, he is participating in a definite move toward the formation of inter-plant unions. One year ago it would have been impossible to get the unaffiliated unions together even unofficially to discuss mutual problems. Today they are actually amalgamating for more effective action.

[This is the second of a series of articles on company unions in various industries. The third, on company unions in steel, will appear in an early issue.]

Facts for Consumers

THE steady growth of the consumer cooperative movement is indicated by the attention recently given it by business and advertising journals. Apparently the interpreters of business trends are becoming apprehensive, for Babson's Reports have warned subscribers that "this consumers' movement . . . has certain elements which are fundamentally sound. . . . If consumers ever get organized and go into real action, our present retailing, wholesaling, and producing systems might be blown to bits." Printer's Ink remarks: "Until the last year or so manufacturers of advertised brands have laughed off the co-op movement. . . . There hasn't been so much laughing lately."

Business, however, is ahead of the average consumer, who still has only the vaguest conception of the cooperative principles. But consumers are rapidly learning the advantages of cooperative buying. Both in number of members and volume of business the consumer cooperatives have grown prodigiously during the depression years. Although the compilation of the 1935 figures has not yet been completed, the indications are that sales for the year reached the half-billion mark. In England 50 per cent of the retail business in food and clothing is handled by the "co-ops."

A true co-op, organized in accordance with the Rochdale principles, gives each member only one vote and returns all profits directly to consumers. Buying is done on specifications, and advertising ballyhoo and advertised brand names are omitted. Although the movement in this country is negligible compared to that in Europe, our business men are worried when they see the growing sales figures.

THE Food and Drug Administration reports the seizure of the following products as "economic frauds":

Product	Shipper	Reason for Seizure
Libby's apple butter	Libby, McNeill, and Libby	Short weight
Condensed buttermilk	Center Milk Products Company	Adulterated with a foreign fat (probably coconut oil)
Near solid buttermilk		Low fat content
"Daisy" whole-milk white cheese	Sunrise Dairy Products Company
Honey malt, chocolate flavor	Silver Label Products Company	Short weight and of composition not warranting name

Pure honey	L. E. Rogers	For short weight
Wilco honey
Currant jelly; strawberry, cherry, loganberry, blackberry, pineapple, raspberry preserves	National Kream Company	Short weight, deficient in fruit, added pectin
"Nature's Own" strawberry preserves	Fresh Grown Preserve Corporation	Short weight, deficient in fruit, added pectin
"Milrey" raspberry preserves
Lemonia E-Z Squeeze	Dover Importing Corporation	Citric acid labeled ■■ lemon concentrate
Peas:	Eastern Shore Canning Company	Substandard
"Pride of the Farm" Eastern Shore brand; Esco brand
"Eyre Hall"	G. L. Webster Company	Substandard
"Green Pac"; "Vestibule"	Greencastle Packing Company	Substandard
"Ruth Brand"	Gibbs and Company	Soaked dried peas improperly labeled
Vanilla Extract "Try-Me"	Davis Manufacturing Company	Short volume

A FRENCH name and ■ Paris address add immeasurably to the sales appeal of ■ perfume. Prince Matchabelli Perfumery, manufacturers of some of the highest-priced and most extensively advertised perfumes on the market today, and Leading Perfumers and Chemists, makers of Fleur de Martin-Cartel, therefore labeled their products, manufactured in New York, in such ■ manner that they appeared to be imports. The Federal Trade Commission has now ordered both companies to discontinue these misrepresentations.

SAFEGUARD PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL

Dangerous pressure ■ exerted ■■ productive capital by growing tax burdens and recurrently inflating ground rents. Capital now stalled in banks would move into productive industry and employ more labor if taxation were transferred from agriculture, manufacture, trade, and real estate improvements and placed on ground values, improved and vacant.

Other programs aim to attack, regiment, or abolish capitalism on the illogical assumption that private ownership of "the tools and machinery of production" is oppressive to labor.

This book, by LOUIS WALLIS, is non-Georgian and non-utopian. It views Marxism as impracticable, and regards the New Deal as only a stop-gap.

Minneapolis Tribune: "A sensible suggestion at a time when big business and small business as well is crying for relief from heavy taxation. . . . Seems to fit the picture of what industry needs today."

All bookstores, 75 cents

Published by DOUBLEDAY, DORAN, Garden City, N. Y.

AMONG the expenses connected with death are cemetery plots, coffins, and gravestones. There is a natural reluctance to consider these things beforehand, and emotional distress at the time such purchases must be made permits unscrupulous undertakers to mulct the bereaved. This form of racketeering is comparatively well known. A newer and what appears to be a more profitable racket is the sale of cemetery lots as first-rate speculative investments. The cemetery salesmen are particularly active in Ohio, where they appear to be creating a little boom. Local better-business bureaus are actively campaigning against the cemetery racketeers.

Meanwhile the Federal Trade Commission has been proceeding against manufacturers of the new-style metal vaults, warranted to purchasers as water-proof, air-tight, and vermin-proof for periods ranging up to one hundred years. The findings in the case against the Maxwell Steel Vault Company of Oneida, New York, makers of the Maxwell Burial Vault and the Oneida Air Seal Vault, point out that many of each type of vault are not water-proof even at the time of interment and that the guaranties are false and misleading and serve merely as sales inducements.

The FTC will soon commence proceedings against seven other manufacturers of vaults against whom complaints of similar practices have been filed. These companies are the Galion Metallic Vault Company, the National Grave Vault Company, the Perfection Burial Vault Company, the Springfield Metallic Casket Company, the Clark Grave Vault Company, and Sissell Brothers. In October the Wyandot Company entered into a stipulation with the FTC agreeing to discontinue claims that its vaults will endure "for countless years," held to be an exaggerated and untrue statement. The FTC has also issued a complaint against Granite Arts of Omaha, Nebraska, alleging that the company's tombstones, advertised as granite, are in fact manufactured of cement; that these monuments are not permanent; and that they have not, as was advertised, the official approval of practically every cemetery in the United States.

RUTH BRINDZE

[Miss Brindze's page appears every other week in The Nation. Miss Brindze cannot answer questions regarding the merits of individual products.]

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL W. WARD is a Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun.

LOUIS FISCHER is The Nation's Moscow correspondent and the author of "Soviet Journey." At present he is traveling in Western Europe observing the political scene.

ANTHONY LUCHEK, a graduate student in the Economics Department of the University of Michigan, has spent the past two years in close contact with automobile labor organizations, attending their meetings, studying their records, and interviewing individual workers.

RUTH BRINDZE is chairman of the Westchester County Consumers' Council and author of "How to Spend Money."

LOUIS KRONENBERGER, editor of "An Anthology of Light Verse," is preparing a study of life and manners in the eighteenth century.

R. P. BLACKMUR has recently published a collection of critical essays entitled "The Double Agent."

HAROLD E. STEARNS is the author of "The Street I Know."

MARY MCCARTHY frequently reviews fiction for The Nation.

The Labor Index

DESPITE an uninterrupted rise in business activity in November, The Nation Index of Labor Welfare shows working-class living standards to have declined practically to the August level. The average weekly wage in manufacturing and non-manufacturing industries combined dropped from \$22.13 in October to \$21.88 in November, while the cost of living—as computed by the National Industrial Conference Board—rose $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent for the fourth consecutive month. Unemployment increased slightly, and the number dependent on relief or WPA emergency jobs showed little change.

THE CHART OF LABOR WELFARE
(Average 1932=100)

The task of measuring real wages is rendered extremely difficult by the growing discrepancy between the cost-of-living figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics and those prepared by the National Industrial Conference Board. The Bureau of Labor Statistics gives the increase in living costs in thirty-two of the principal cities of the United States from July 15 to October 15 as 0.4 per cent, and the rise from November 15, 1934, to October 15, 1935, as 2.2 per cent. In contrast, the NICB lists the advance between July and October at 1.6 per cent, and that from November, 1934, to November, 1935, at 4.3 per cent. On the basis of the government figures—which have been used hitherto in constructing the Labor Index—real wages for November would appear to be 0.7 per cent above the depression level of 1932. But if the NICB estimates are accepted, real wages are 1 per cent lower than they were during the depth of the depression in 1932. Since the change is at any rate an extremely small one, it is safe to say that living standards of employed workers today are no higher than in 1932 and are 18 per cent below the level of 1929. Taking into account the condition of the 11,500,000 persons who are without jobs, we still find very little change from 1932. The Nation Index of Labor Welfare for November stands at 100.4 (on the basis of the figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics)—a decline of approximately 50 per cent since 1929.

Following are the tentative figures for November, compared with the revised figures for October and for November of a year ago:

(AVERAGE 1932=100)

	Nov. 1935	Oct. 1935	Nov. 1934
Industrial Production	151*	147	120
Average Weekly Wages	107.1*	108.3†	101.4
Cost of Living	106.4*	105.9†	103.7
Real Wages	100.7*	102.4†	97.7
Unemployment	91*	90	94
Index of Labor Welfare	100.4*	102.6†	97

* Preliminary. † Revised.

Books, Drama, Films

Ernest Cudlipp

Men and Brethren. By James Gould Cozzens. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THERE are so many dismally cut-and-dried ways of writing about the clergy—their sincerity, for example, is ■ threadbare an object of satire as their hypocrisy—that Mr. Cozzens deserves almost special praise for creating ■ clergyman as real as Ernest Cudlipp. He has licked the problem of forgetting about the minister in thinking of the man, and vice versa, not merely by always seeing Cudlipp as both, but by making it hard to determine where the one leaves off and the other begins. The result is a brilliantly integrated and authentic characterization. Ernest has been sacrificed to no satiric preconceptions; Mr. Cozzens does not first size him up, and then write about him. He just lets him do the talking; gives him, as a good novelist should, rope and to spare. In consequence he never loses his hold over the man for a minute.

For my tastes, Ernest is the whole book. There are some interesting enough other people, but in the end—except as they give Ernest his opportunities—they do not count. And Ernest holds me, not because he is ■ thrilling or spectacular figure, or because anything of much consequence happens to him, but because he is real. It is enough to watch him for perhaps twenty-four hours as he follows ■ routine of parish duties in New York City; to see him involved in the lives of people who may mean something to him but cannot mean much. We watch an Episcopalian celibate getting on for forty, living pretty well and running into debt, with an attractive personality, an authoritative manner, and a quick wit rather too often substituted for a capacity to think.

Dealing with friends, parishioners, fellow-clergymen, servants, Ernest handles his job briskly and professionally. In one sense, ■ every administrator of people's lives must be, he is a worldling. He is undeceived and unsentimental, but he comes down hard—though often banteringly—where the church is concerned. It is something of ■ achievement on Mr. Cozzens's part that without making Ernest priggish or hypocritical or sanctimonious he makes him seem adjusted to his role, ■ though he had ■ vocation for it. Not, to be sure, ■ vocation in the strict spiritual sense, but rather because there is at bottom something aloof and impersonal in Ernest which keeps him unentangled and hence free to minister; and because, though he may lack the inner loftiness proper to the church, he has the perfect temperament for a churchman. It is not so much that he can resist temptation as that he is not tempted. It is again not so much that he has anything of God in him as that he can outstare the devil.

The result is a seasoned person, at once highly modern and not modern at all, neither admirable nor despicable, who half the time faces things and half the time evades them. We do not see him in the pulpit or at the altar; we see him directly in contact with the world he has half-forsworn. It is a commentary on the position of the church in contemporary life that people only come to Ernest when they need him sorely. They are, in one sense or another, near the end of their rope; and he offers to such people not high-sounding words but succinct and practical help. In other words, he has the ability to do a good job, but lacks the deep feeling to add any special, more personal touch.

As you may judge from the way I have been writing, one does not want to write ■ review of "Men and Brethren"; one wants to start ■ conversation about Ernest. He is a teasing mixture who might have just left the room and whom, with no two of our opinions quite alike, we want to discuss. There are, I suppose, two kinds of real people in books. The one kind is real as people never are in life—that is, we wholly understand them, see into every dark corner of their minds, grasp all their motives perfectly. Mr. Cozzens's Ernest Cudlipp is not of this, which may be the greater, kind. He is like somebody we know in life, a contradictory and rather insoluble figure, whom sometimes we see through only too well, and sometimes can only guess at. Perhaps he appeals to nothing deeper in us than our curiosity about human nature; at least we realize that he is not an important person, and a life so little moving and tragic as his cannot be the vehicle for ■ really important book. But by creating an indestructible human being Mr. Cozzens has proved himself not only ■ livelier but a better writer than those whose talents are forever out of breath trying to keep up with their pretensions.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

In Second Place

Prophets and Poets. By André Maurois. Translated by Hamish Miles. Harper and Brothers. $3.

T HE lectures on Kipling, Wells, Shaw, Chesterton, Conrad, Strachey, Lawrence, Huxley, and Katherine Mansfield which compose this book are light and easy, pretentious and irritating, inconsistent and revealing. Addressed to a French and popular audience they say for the most part all the easy enthusiastic things that make ■ substitute for actual reading, and they take for granted nothing but the hard things that come only with slow knowledge and intimate attention. They say, for example, that Kipling celebrates empire and action, that Wells is encyclopedic, that Shaw detests sentimentality, that Chesterton submits reason to miraculous faith and a sense of the quotidian, that Conrad found loyalty the great human virtue, that Strachey was a wilful artist in history, that Lawrence had ■ puritan bias in his sensuality, that Huxley "understands, refashions, and distrusts every system," and that "the virtue of Katherine Mansfield's stories lies not merely in their truthfulness but in their poetry." Thus these lectures serve the necessary social function which substitutes the quantitative handle for the qualitative experience; and in that capacity one need no more complain of them than of the daily paper.

But they assume also to serve ■ critical and ■ moral function, to assist in the serious evaluation of literature and the life which it reflects, which is altogether another matter and one where substitutes are not in order. Let us take as one example the first measured judgment—that on Kipling—to which M. Maurois brings himself. After stating and illustrating by quotation the conditioning limits of Kipling's talent and subject matter, the dogmatic narrowness of his ideology, and the radical incompleteness of his sensibility, he puts Kipling forward as a great moral influence, the evangel of the heroic life of action. "The things which he has described and sung are the eternal virtues which give man the faculty of leadership and give ■ race the power of survival." Earlier in his lectures M. Maurois anticipates his conclusion with a general feeling: "I have never ceased to regard Kipling as the greatest writer of our time, and one of the greatest of any time."

It is not that M. Maurois's facts are wrong, but that, as they are stated, they do not jibe with any notion of literary greatness acceptable to ■ rational mind. The facts show—those of M. Maurois and others—that Kipling is a special case of fanatic strength, not moral breadth or depth, and that the virtue of his work lies in the vividness with which his materials are recorded, the richness of his anecdote, both good from any point of view, and not in the barbarous formulas of the heroic life to which the weakness of his mind before life compelled him to fit that material. These formulas prevent Kipling from being a great representative writer and prevent his people from achieving great character, because their basis is in moral illusion which we, and even M. Maurois, can point out; whereas great writing of this and most orders has as an end a moral myth of which we can gradually and rationally absorb the meaning. That moral illusion and especially the moral illusion of heroism may seem the only endurable face of reality and become a principle to which every value and charity of the understanding must be sacrificed, Kipling shows us dramatically; it is the drama, from a point of view which we supply ourselves, which his people suffer under the application of his formulas that makes his work only short of tragic. M. Maurois, by accepting the illusions literally and at their face value, exactly as the fascists accept their illusions, belittles what he intends to glorify—the work itself.

So much for the plane of morals and prophecy. On the plane of simple reading, which ought to be as important for the literary critic, M. Maurois errs no less. In the lecture on Lawrence there is quoted a part of the poem called "She Said as Well to Me." It is quoted with verbal accuracy but in the form of prose, which is mechanically inexcusable. Worse, M. Maurois imputes to Lawrence the marvel of "having discovered, through her, his own body," whereas the whole poem declares the untouchable proud isolation of the spirit in any animal.

It was once held the chief sin of an understanding spirit to put God in second place, since in any consideration God represented ultimate reality and truth. In these lectures M. Maurois puts literature in second place, and either his translator or his printer occasionally helps. On page 215 we learn that Lytton Strachey not only had a praiseworthy erudition but was "skilled in sniffing out details." R. P. BLACKMUR

"Suffer Little Children"

A Footnote to Folly. Reminiscences of Mary Heaton Vorse. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

THIS book is a highly extrovert, objective series of pictures of the labor and the exploitation of people who work in mills and mines, on ships and trains, in the dreary factories of the steel and cotton and coal and oil "towns." Mrs. Vorse is a reporter of misery—and above all of misery when it hits women and children and those who are helpless because they lack any money except their wages, and any chance of moving or changing their essential condition in life. "This book is not a biography. It is a picture of the world as I saw it during an important moment of history. A record of what happened to the little people and their children in war time and in peace; how they fought for their children, how they lived, and how war tore their lives apart."

When she writes on page 28 of a 407-page book, "Marriage took me into an older and more serious world," there is no pretense about this, any more than on page 30, where in three lines she states how she and her husband came down to Venice and took an apartment on the corner of the San Vio and the Zatterre. And the very next sentence is, "Through our gondolier we became acquainted with the secretary of the Sanola Guild."

Now we have reached page 56, Section IV. Section III ended with, "There's an entry in my journal which says, under date of January 17, that Joe was born. He was a fine baby with blue eyes and red hair just as I had always known he would be. The next entry is twelve days later: the notice of the meeting at Cooper Union." Hardly what you might expect until you begin to realize the kind of person Mary Vorse was—and is. The main caption of Section IV reads, The Unemployed—1914. And then follow these subheads, Labor Defense—Church Raids—Headquarters at Home—Spaghetti on the Stove [mostly for other people I want to interject]—Arrest of Frank Tannenbaum—Case History—Police and the Unemployed—O'Brien's Saloon—Cracked Heads—Ludlow Massacre. Let us jump to Section IX, called Mesaba Range. Seventeen pages of almost "straight" reporting, then two and a half pages of purely personal life, but only two and a half pages! Follow Wartime, Postwar England, France and Germany, Italy, then The Second International. You begin to despair. When will this woman begin to tell us about herself? Yet you read the whole book through, fascinated, if you have in you any of the bowels of compassion. And gradually you begin to realize that in describing these things, these people, these episodes, these tragedies, these humors Mary Vorse is talking about herself all the time, even if, perhaps, without knowing it. For she is really giving us her autobiography: these things are part of her, of her blood and nerves and heart.

Then, if you piece these impressions together, you are—at least, I am, as a man—suddenly abashed by realizing that the key to this character, this fighter for decency and the good life for all, is something quite simple—love of children. Not the kind that employs the adjective "cute," but real love, the fighting, triumphant, perceptive kind. It has been a long time since I have read descriptions of children that moved me as did some in this book of Mary Vorse's. Take, for example, this short paragraph in the section called The Amalgamated Lockout:

As I looked at them they made me feel that everything is possible for humanity. Then I remembered that there was a lockout of the children's fathers. That the manufacturers were to reduce wages a third. That there was on foot a conspiracy to break the workers' organizations throughout the country so that children would grow up in industrial slavery. . . . Suddenly the full meaning of such an organization as the Amalgamated came to me. It came out flashing like a light. In fighting the rapacity of the manufacturers they were fighting for the children. These were just a few of them. There were hundreds and thousands of others just as lovely, just as beautiful. . . . Each time a child is born the race dips back into the fresh beauty of creation.

And, for my part, I think it deeply significant that the final two sentences of this book, which is really a document for all liberal Americans, should be: "There is another element on the side of an orderly society. It is the people who grow the food, and who run the machines—they and their children."

For if the anecdotal, personal, arm-chair, sometimes amusing sort of autobiographical chronicle is not here (I ought to know this kind, because I have just written one myself, and I believe it is interesting and moving, on occasion perhaps a bit more), there is a real narrative flow of a different kind—something like what I felt in John Reed's "Ten Days That Shook the World." Facts are not just piled on facts; events do not merely follow one another in sequence. There is a passion and a drive, an order of a different—and in some ways of a deeper—kind. It is the order, the unity, of love.

Yet there are plenty of incidents, plenty of action, abundant pictures of people in the labor, syndicalist, "wobbly," even fashionable and rich worlds. For example, the account of the emotion awakened by, the events leading up to, and the protests at the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti is, as we see it now with passion spent, a bit of singularly fine reporting.

It is inevitable that a "Footnote to Folly," being in essence one of the great pleas, packed with tenderness and a quiet bitterness like sugar and vinegar, for decency toward the weak and justice for the strong, should also turn out to be one of the most powerful documents against war of our time, a kind

By JAMES GOULD COZZENS

author of

"The Last Adam"

MEN AND BRETHREN

With THE LAST ADAM, James Gould Cozzens was recognized as a distinguished American novelist. That was a grand and lusty novel about a physician who was, first of all, a human being. In MEN AND BRETHREN, Mr. Cozzens portrays a modern, young, and successful clergyman who is a really likeable, intelligent, hard-working person. Shown in his study rather than in the pulpit, he is involved in the lives of a score of people, forced to a conflict between his beliefs and his own experience of men and the world. He is another superbly drawn character in a rich and masterly novel.

"The first important American novel of 1936, and it marks a brilliant beginning."—Herschel Brickell, N. Y. Post

"A novel that again illustrates Mr. Cozzens' superb power of characterization. In the clergyman, the author has a centerpiece who will not soon be forgotten. Few persons writing today have such a gift for exquisite characterization."—Boston Herald.

$2.50

By the author of "The Hell Hole of Creation"

Desolate Marches

by L. M. Nesbitt

An engineer's story of how he surveyed a large area of the Orinoco basin in Venezuela, this is a tale of arduous exploration in a land once civilized and inhabited, but now a wilderness, sparsely populated by primitive natives and a few fugitives from the island penal colonies. One of those rare tales of travel conspicuous for its brilliant color and strong personal flavor, DESOLATE MARCHES has been called by David Garnett—"It is a beautiful and noble book. Nesbitt might, if he had lived, have taken a place beside W. H. Hudson."

Illustrated, $2.50

A narrative of two great mutinies in the British navy

The Floating Republic

by G. E. Manwaring and Bonamy Dobrée

Heroic and disastrous tales of the sea have always provided fascinating reading, and this is no exception. A real addition to nautical libraries is afforded by the brilliant collaboration of two historians who, in unearthing the mysterious details of two great mutinies in the British Navy in 1797, have told an exciting tale of the extraordinary revolution in which "an attempt was made to give the ships in mutiny the name of The Floating Republic."

Illustrated, $3.00

A list of spring publications is now available, on request, from HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY, 583 Madison Ave., N.Y.

of children's "All Quiet on the Western Front"; for while men were dying sometimes spectacularly and sometimes ignominiously and wretchedly on the battle lines, little children were dying quietly, unlyrically, but inexorably behind those lines. I haven't yet seen anywhere in France or in Germany or in my own country a monument to these little children who died of semi-starvation and rickets and mournfulness while their fathers were slaughtering each other for the glory (and loot) of their respective governments. Is there anywhere in the world a monument to the Unknown Child? It is here, a bit of sculpture in prose done by Mary Vorse, and underneath it are chiseled the words "A Footnote to Folly."

HAROLD E. STEARNS

Saint Francesca of the Pacific Northwest

Marching! Marching! By Clara Weatherwax. The John Day Company. $1.90.

"MARCHING! MARCHING!" is the winner of the New Masses prize contest for a novel on an American proletarian theme. It is also the January selection of the Book Union. It should, in all fairness, further be awarded a pale green orchid as the Most Neurotic Novel of 1935. The New Masses and the Book Union have made a most peculiar choice. While Dos Passos, Conroy, Cantwell, and others have been taking man-size vigorous strides toward the creation of a proletarian hero and a proletarian epic, the revolutionary confreres of these very writers have decorated Clara Weatherwax for a pinched, unhealthy, distorted, and incidentally dull picture of American proletarian life.

As a novelist Miss Weatherwax reminds one of those tortured medieval ascetics who loved beggars not so much for saintliness as sores. In "Marching! Marching!" Miss Weatherwax licks with a good deal of relish all the excrescences of the working class. A number of left-wing writers, recognizing melodrama as an ideal propaganda form, have represented the bosses as repulsive satyrs and the workers as handsome young gods. Miss Weatherwax's bosses are not too appetizing, but her worker heroes and heroines—longshoremen, loggers, and mill workers of the Pacific Northwest—are, as she tells her readers again and again, thoroughly distasteful physical specimens. The Filipino working-class leader, about whom much of the confused story revolves, is described by a prostitute: "I remember the first time he came. With his face and all. Nobody wanted to take him on, he was such a funny looker. Those warts, and you couldn't hardly tell what he was, Japanese or Eytalian or Filipino or maybe even a Mex." Miss Weatherwax herself portrays him: "Mario built thick and short like a barrel, broad, solid with power, his hands fisted and smashing. Mario's numerous warts were blurred little mounds, the nose-holes large and black in the blunt nose." And in another place: "Mario stood looking at nothing much, the sweat still trickling down among the warts on his face like a small sea finding the way among the barnacles." A love passage between two heroic workers is summed up thus: "He . . . could hear the trembling thump thump in her, smell the Mary-smell with salty sweat in it, feel her warmth flowing to him." Here is another moment of ecstasy between the pair: "He dropped his face suddenly to the V of her dress, nuzzling, breathing deeply the warm smell coming out: womanflesh and the soursweet smell of her armpits." There is hardly one of the working-class characters who is not either maimed or deformed. The brother of one female worker is a drooling, sexually uncontrollable idiot, and this is her father, a sympathetic character: "She could see the wen on the side of his nose, like a wad of gum stuck blackened there. His unfocused eyes came to short life. . . . He took his stinking dead pipe from his mouth and peered up at her through his glasses, his movements stirring stale smells. Cheap tobacco, drink, acrid layers of man-sweat."

The mental activities of Miss Weatherwax's people, displayed now and then haphazardly in stream-of-consciousness style, are not much more commendable than their physiques. On political subjects these workers are rational, if unreal and stilted; in all other departments of life they are subhuman. This masochistic, invertedly sentimental picture of working-class life might be tolerable aesthetically, though factually false, if the novel were all of a piece. Unfortunately, it is not. Heavy with detail, with precise, uninspired observation, it occasionally breaks jerkily into melodramatic action; and the human grotesques which Miss Weatherwax has so long and so lovingly molded are incapable of filling the heroic-melodramatic roles which she assigns to them. It is to be hoped that William Randolph Hearst will not chance upon "Marching! Marching!"; slightly cut and serialized, it would make excellent anti-labor propaganda for his chain of newspapers.

MARY MCCARTHY

Shorter Notices

Correspondence of Thomas Gray. Edited by the late Paget Toynbee and Leonard Whibley. Oxford University Press. Three Volumes. $21.

In an age of great letter-writers Thomas Gray ranked very high. Not only was he in his own way as brilliant a correspondent as Horace Walpole; he was himself one of Walpole's best correspondents, and the letters between these two erudite and exquisite bachelors have long been a glory of English literature. In addition he wrote faithfully to such friends as Mason, West, and Wharton; leaving behind him altogether one of the most charming and admirable records ever left on paper by any individual. But his editors, from Mason to Gosse, have not been careful with the record; they have copied carelessly, transposed documents, and supplied in many cases the wrong dates. Tovey's edition made up for much of this, yet it has remained for the present editors to do what appears a perfect and definitive job. Few books have been more scrupulously prepared for any press—even the Oxford Press, which here continues its great series of English "Letters." It is a work for scholars primarily—or rather, considering its price, for university libraries. To anyone, however, its notes and appendices will furnish all of the information that is relevant to the text; and the text will never need going over again.

Tom. By E. E. Cummings. Arrow Editions. $3.

This scenario for a ballet version of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is written in Mr. Cummings's poetic prose, which is especially well adapted to suggesting the involutions of the dance. His directions to the choreographer are complicated but explicit: "outspurtinrushing-twittering-seizingly hands cringe," and "accompanied by rhythmic shuddering swirlings of upwhirling wildly together blacks, Haley embroiders the frontstage with crouching gloatings, with darting threats, with bloated struttings, all focusing on Shelby's cigar." As reading matter "Tom" amazes and excites by its display of linguistic virtuosity; it also leaves the impression that Mr. Cummings has imagined well in the medium for which it is intended, and that an adequate performance of it would be tremendously effective. If the directors of the American Ballet have not already discovered the piece, it is hereby recommended to them.

Drama

The Matron Queen

IMPROBABLE as it would have seemed only a few years ago, Queen Victoria in just now in the process of becoming our favorite historical character. Unless I am seriously mistaken, the audience which gathered at "Victoria Regina" (Broadhurst Theater) not only liked her enormously but came prepared to do so, and I should be willing to wager that she is, at the present moment, a far more promising subject for a popular play than even the spacious Elizabeth would be. Laurence Housman, author of the present piece, treats her much more sympathetically than Strachey did, and the fact is no accident. For a decade the poor lady was so satirized and reviled, so allegorized and so misused as the scapegoat for our sins, that the inevitable reaction has set in. No other historical character was quite so much a household word, and familiarity helped to breed affection. Once the ghost of Victorianism was laid, once we ceased to fear that we might ourselves be suspected of that deadly sin, our interest took on a kindlier cast. The whatnots came down from the attic, and it was fashionable to have them in the drawing-room—provided, of course, it was made perfectly clear that they were revivals, not survivals. And toward Victorian intangibles the permissible attitude is much the same. They are quaint, of course, and any admiration for them is necessarily tinged with condescension. But if one's own modernity and emancipation are beyond dispute, then one may find them rather more than merely ridiculous. The Victorian drawing-room was unquestionably stuffy. So was the Victorian moral atmosphere. But somehow or other certain of the gestures the Victorians managed to make were paradoxically spacious. It ought not to have been possible to rise majestically from a chair backed by an antimacassar and to strike a heroic attitude in front of a case full of stuffed birds. But somehow it was, and it is difficult not to have a certain admiration for the fact.

All this and more is somehow suggested in the long closet drama which Mr. Housman wrote, and certain scenes from which Gilbert Miller has staged beautifully, with Helen Hayes as the Queen. The acting version begins when Lord Conyngham and the Archbishop arrive in the early morning to rouse Victoria from her bed and to announce her accession. It ends with the Jubilee and thus, incidentally, affords Miss Hayes a remarkable opportunity to transform herself gradually from the slender, immature girl into the plump little widow who could make even puffing seem majestic. In between there is only a minimum of politics and a great deal of Albert, so that the emphasis is upon personality and upon the essential paradox of a woman who managed so curiously to combine ignorance and prejudice in certain fields, not only with imperiousness and dignity, but also with shrewdness and charm.

Mr. Housman writes so simply as to conceal his art. He is far less brilliant than Strachey, and his whole method is keyed much lower. In part, of course, this is because he takes for granted the paradox which Strachey was laboring to demonstrate. But he is, nevertheless, extremely effective, and so are all the acting and the staging. Perhaps there is a touch of some of Miss Hayes's former parts in the curious combination of girlish archness with wilfulness and intransigence, but it is not unconvincing as an interpretation of Victoria and it is difficult to think of a more suitable person for the part. Vincent Price, a newcomer, is also admirable as Albert, managing somehow to suggest very successfully his almost waxlike charm as well as that calm lack of personality which so well suited the near non-existence of his official position. And if George Zucco seems im-

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents
(In association with John C. Wilson)
Last Week

The Taming of the Shrew

with ALFRED LUNT AND LYNN FONTANNE

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Evs. 8:40. Matinees Thursday & Saturday, 2:40

THE THEATRE GUILD Presents

GEORGE GERSHWIN'S

PORGY and BESS

Book by DU BOSE HEYWARD

Lyrics by DU BOSE HEYWARD and IRA GERSHWIN

Directed by ROUBEN MAMOULIAN

Orchestra conducted by ALEXANDER SMALLENS

ALVIN THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Evs. 8:40. Mats. Thursday and Saturday, 2:40

"I was greatly impressed by 'PARADISE LOST', so much so that I have been thinking of it ever since. It is crowded with illuminating material. It should cause millions to think and even if it did not do that it should still be recommended as thrilling entertainment."

—Theodore Dreiser

'Paradise Lost'

By Clifford Odets

LONGACRE THEA. W. 48th St. Evs. 8:40. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

THE TEACHERS UNION

presents a symposium

"How to Meet the Challenge of Fascism"

FRIDAY, JANUARY 17th, 1936; AT 8 P. M.

Washington Irving High School, Irving Place and East 16th Street

Speakers:

Francis Gorman—Vice-President of the United Textile Workers of America

Norman Thomas—Executive Director of the League for Industrial Democracy

Robert Minor—Cartoonist and Journalist

Francis A. Henson—Executive Director of the Emergency Committee for Refugees from Nazism

Le Roy Bowman, Chairman—Director of the United Parents Association

Additional Speakers.

Also:—Anti-War sketch by Teachers Union Drama Group

Admission—25c.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says

Boy Meets Girl. Cort Theater. Rough and ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

Dead End. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. Superbly acted by a group of boys. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

First Lady. Music Box. Comedy hit about a feminine feud in Washington society. Jane Cowl and Lily Cahill puncture one another with sharp implements in the forging of which George Kaufman had a hand.

Jumbo. Hippodrome. Paul Whiteman, Jimmy Durante, and a remarkable clown named A. Robbins surrounded by acrobats and animals. Literally better than a circus.

Let Freedom Ring. Civic Repertory Theater. A second chance for this drama of a strike in a Southern mill. I found it hard going, but it has been highly praised.

Libel. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English court-room play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

Paradise Lost. Longacre Theater. Clifford Odets' complicated picture of a family composed exclusively of pathological futurists. He calls it a picture of the middle class but it strikes me as somewhat less than typical.

Porgy and Bess. Alvin Theater. The well-known play turned into an opera by George Gershwin. One of the big hits of the year but to me less effective than anything so elaborate ought to be.

Pride and Prejudice. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaption, brilliantly staged and acted. It gave me more pleasure than any other play of the season.

The Taming of the Shrew. Guild Theater. The play is gentle Shakespeare's most ungentle farce, and the players are Lunt and Fontanne. The result is exhilarating.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

probable as Lord Beaconsfield, it must be remembered that Lord Beaconsfield seemed somewhat improbable as himself, and one is only left wondering whether or not it is an actor's business to see to it that fiction should appear less strange than truth. The costumes and sets fit the mood of the piece precisely; they are, that is to say, very Victorian and yet somehow charming.

Perhaps it is also worth while to remark that Victoria was not only paradoxical herself but the cause of paradox in others. Everyone knows the common report that, despite all his popularity and all his patriotism, Kipling was never given the laureateship because his reference to the Widow of Windsor unfortunately missed the precise tone of mingled intimacy and awe which it was intended to achieve. Now the censor is compelled to refuse a license for Mr. Housman's on the whole very respectful play about twenty years after Strachey's devastating satire was a permissible best-seller. That is not merely locking the barn door after the horse has been stolen. It is more like shutting it in the face of someone trying to put the missing steed back.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Trudi Schoop

In keeping with his indefatigable interest in odd bits of art from overseas, Mr. Hurok recently introduced Trudi Schoop and her comic ballet to New York audiences. Miss Schoop herself is a fresh and charming young person, but her pantomimic ballets are slight in content and form. At best the episodes she pictures have a pleasing naivete; the gestures are timed to the tinkling of a music box. At worst the movements of her troupe are full of clichés in comic pantomime, acted, not danced, to piano tunes reminiscent of the old moving-picture-house accompaniments. In the serio-comic series of Want-Ads, the stories skid away from humor into what should be pathos, but isn't. In the second part of the program, Fridolin on the Road, Miss Schoop plays Fridolin, the young peasant meeting the bewildered of leaving home, and facing love, marriage, and infidelity; and the mood of these episodes is more consistently frivolous. I should think that Miss Schoop might bear microscopic examination by the magnates of Hollywood and musical-comedy Broadway.

RUTH PICKERING

Films

Dickens Week

HOLIDAY week brought three Dickens pictures to New York, and the best of them, "Scrooge," was so proper to the season that its existence is difficult to imagine at any later time—say, in warm weather. I should like to see it run on, however, if only to demonstrate the advantages of a certain species of material. If films are to go on being made from fiction, and from Dickens in particular, then the moral of "Scrooge's" success needs pointing out. "Scrooge" was better than "The Old Curiosity Shop" and "A Tale of Two Cities" because it had a simpler story to tell—one, indeed, which could be told completely and out of which every ounce of value could be extracted. The only trouble with the otherwise interesting "David Copperfield" of last year was that it tried to cover too much ground; it could have stopped, for instance, at Betsy Trotwood's house after David's journey from London, or it could have confined itself to one of the later episodes—Peggotty, Uriah Heep, or Dora. If it had so limited itself it would have escaped the effect of haziness which here and there reminded us how desperately the director was working against time. Haste makes waste in Hollywood as elsewhere; material which cannot be handled well should not be handled at all. So with "A Tale of Two Cities," where the excellent acting of Ronald Colman as Sydney Carton lacked the relief of such a simple setting as that which helped to make Sir Seymour Hicks stand out as Scrooge. The same thing is true in different degree of "The Old Curiosity Shop," where the Quilp of Hay Petrie suffered from the fact that our attention was divided between it and the household of lawyer Brass. The director of the film, particularly since it is an English film, must have supposed that he could under no circumstances leave out Dick Swiveller and the Marchioness. Yet they could have been left out, as anything can, and if Mr. Bentley had felt himself responsible less to Dickens than to the rules of his own art he would have proceeded to suppress them, good as they are in themselves. In "Scrooge" there was nothing to suppress. There was much, indeed, to develop; and the development resulted in the most veritable winter night I have ever lived through in a movie, as well as in a fable perfectly rendered.

Alexander Dovjenko's "Frontier" (Cameo), to turn to something bigger, is not only powerful and beautiful in itself but an indication that propaganda in the Russian studios moves through its phases. The film, released at Moscow in celebration of the eighteenth anniversary of the October Revolution, has an emphasis which I assume it would not have had ten years ago. It shows the revolution triumphant, of course, but triumphant this time over persons and classes who are so far from contemptible as to claim a full half of the audience's sympathy. The scene is the Pacific coast, where a great military city, Aerograd, is to be built over the protests of certain kulaks and "old believers" who have fled to the neighboring wilderness for sanctuary. These diehards are represented as wrong, but they are represented even more clearly as a fanatical and pitiful minority doomed to be crushed by a majority at least one member of which, Stepan Glushak, shudders at the things he must do. One of the things he must do is shoot down his oldest friend, Vasil Khudiakov, in the magnificent forest where the two have hunted together. Khudiakov's last act before he falls—turning his broad face up the mountain and shouting to hear his voice come back once more from the trees—makes Stepan out to be something of a butcher, as does the speech of the Samurai before he too is shot down. The speech of this man will convince no Communist that the revolution was a crime, and it is not intended to do so, nor need it convince anybody; but it says to any human being that great movements are also ruthless movements, and that the cost in this case is something that bears thinking about. So when the minority is annihilated and the sky grows black with aeroplanes flying from every part of Russia toward Aerograd, there is a sense that might has prevailed no less than right, and that someone has been trampled in the process. The final scene of the thousand parachutes descending to earth carries just the suggestion, consequently, of a thousand bullies dropping from another planet. I may be imputing scruples to Dovjenko which he would be horrified to have. In any case, however, I can say that "Frontier" plainly takes its place among the great Russian films.

"Annie Oakley" makes agreeable capital out of a recent American figure who has already become something of a legend. Annie Oakley's shooting eye brought multitudes of people to Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show in its heyday. Here she is with a rural origin and a romance to keep her interesting, and very interesting she is as Barbara Stanwyck plays her. The Cinderella theme can't fail. "Ah, Wilderness" (Center) is primarily a costume piece as of 1906, the delicacy of Eugene O'Neill's play being present in part but only in part—by which I mean that it is wholly absent from Wallace Beery's Sid.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1936

No. 3681

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	85
EDITORIALS:
The Farmers' Fate	88
War Profits and Personal Devils	89
News from Red China	89
Socialists to the Left	90
ISSUES AND MEN. THE PRESIDENT'S DILEMMA. By Oswald Garrison Villard	91
CARTOON. By Fritz	92
THE AAA PUTS ON FALSE WHISKERS. By Paul W. Ward	93
THE LAST WAR AND THE NEXT. I. MORGAN, MONEY, AND WAR. By Walter Millis	95
SLUMBERING FIRES IN HARLEM. By Oswald Garrison Villard	99
WHAT REMAINS OF THE LEAGUE? By Harold J. Laski	102
LOOSE CONSTRUCTION. By Heywood Brown	103
CORRESPONDENCE	104
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	104
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
The San Francisco Waterfront. By Oliver Carlson	105
An Open Letter to Rex Tugwell. By Tom Burke	106
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
Sweet Swan of Hollywood. By Joseph Wood Krutch	107
Salvemini on Seldes. By Gaetano Salvemini	108
Wilson and Neutrality. By Sidney B. Fay	109
Hokusai. By Benjamin Rowland, Jr.	110
A Dedicated Man. By Mark Van Doren	111
Drama: Necktie Party. By Joseph Wood Krutch	112

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional.

THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

THE SUPREME COURT RULINGS last Monday were less dramatic and drastic than the AAA cataclysm of the week before. All that happened was that some $200,000,000 in processing taxes that had been impounded in the lower federal courts awaiting a ruling on the AAA were ordered returned to the processors. The decision, given in the case of the rice millers, was unanimous and indeed inevitable. For after the AAA ruling even the dissenting justices in the Butler case had to treat the majority decision as binding. The court expressly avoided passing on the validity of the provision in the 1935 amended act which made tax refunds conditional upon proof that the processors had not passed the tax on to the consumers. The rice millers' case was not an instance of tax refund, since the tax had been protested and had never been legally paid. The problem of what will happen to the billion dollars, approximately, of processing taxes that has already been collected still remains to be determined. The decision raises serious revenue difficulties for the government. Money to replace the sums to be returned will have to be found somewhere. Especially will money have to be found if the government is to proceed with its plans for crop control through bounties for soil conservation.

The distressing thing is that a precedent has now been set which puts a premium upon refusal to pay federal taxes and applying for injunctive relief on the chance that the Supreme Court will finally kill them. This is already being done with the Guffey act taxes. Carried far enough it will wreck any administrative program, no matter how sound its constitutionality may eventually be proved to be. If the new agricultural-bounty bill depends at all upon processing taxes, collapse would be probable even before the court ruling was given.

SOME CONSOLATION is to be found in the refusal of the court in the Lee Moor case to pass on the Bankhead act on the ground that no actual damage had been shown by the plaintiff in the lower court. We try to extract comfort from it, not because of any inherent merit in the act itself, but because of the hope the decision offers that the suit against the constitutionality of the TVA may also be thrown out on jurisdictional grounds. The government argument in the TVA case urged that a suit in equity brought by a minority stockholder could not be entertained unless fraud was involved in the original contract. If the court shows a disposition to apply such procedural limitations rigorously, the TVA may for the present be saved. Given the present temper of the court, however, this may very likely turn out to be only wishful thinking.

CONGRESS has set aside such problems as neutrality, agricultural policy, and the budget in order to devote itself to the politically more pressing matter of passing the soldiers' bonus. On at least two previous occasions the bonus has been passed by Congress only to be killed by a Presidential veto, but this time—especially since it happens to be an election year—some measure seems almost certain to be enacted. In contrast to last year, when the veterans themselves were divided on the type of legislation desired, the bill which passed the House by 356 to 59 carried the indorsement of all three of the chief veterans' organizations. It also lacks the inflationary features of the Patman bill, which was vetoed by the President last year. Meanwhile, however, whatever argument existed a few years ago for passing the bonus on the ground of distributing purchasing power has disappeared. Recovery may be halting and unsatisfactory, but the deflationary cycle has definitely been checked, and the chief danger at the moment lies in rising living costs and the threat of inflation. Nor is there any other excuse for prepayment of the veterans' adjusted-service certificates. Many veterans are doubtless in need, but the money poured into a soldiers' bonus bill could be used to better effect for a more adequate relief program. The President's admirable veto message of last summer will probably not be repeated. He may continue to oppose immediate payment in full, and thus gain the reputation of guardian of the national treasury, but the chances are that he will sign a compromise measure that will grant the veterans only slightly less than their full demands. Getting votes to the tune of $1,000 each seems to us to be a bit extravagant—particularly when so much needed legislation is precluded on the ground of economy.

MONEY IS NEWS. Thus, although there is some doubt about the legality of publishing the names of persons paid a salary of more than $15,000, the newspapers rushed into print with several columns of such names, and it is reasonable to believe that a good many persons perused the lists with avidity. With the welfare of our readers always in mind, we have prepared a few statistics on the basis of these salaries, to guide them in their choice of future occupation. The highest-paid profession is—you never would have guessed it—journalism! Beginning with Mr. Hearst, who pays himself a modest annual stipend of $500,000, and stepping somewhat rapidly down to Mr. Arthur Brisbane, whose boss rewards him with slightly more than half his own pay, or $265,000, we discover that five jobs on the Daily News (New York) pay more than $100,000 each. By comparison, the railroad business is terrible. Daniel Willard of the Baltimore and Ohio and General Atterbury of the Pennsylvania draw a mere $60,000 a year each. Nor is the utilities business booming. Mr. Cortelyou of Consolidated Gas gets only $95,000; Mr. Thomas N. McCarter, president of the Public Service Corporation of New Jersey, has to struggle along on $75,000. The five-and-ten-cent stores, however, do nicely by their upper employees; the president of F. W. Woolworth and Company was paid $337,479. But Mae West, bless her heart and hooray for the arts, got $2,000 more than that, and the combined salaries of Constance Bennett, Charlie Chaplin, Gary Cooper, Marlene Dietrich, W. C. Fields, and Sylvia Sidney amount to the tidy sum of $869,521, unless our addition is at fault, which is more than likely. In short, the published salaries lead us to conclude that there is not much use raising your boy to be a banker (average pay something like $60,000) or the president of a life-insurance company (with a $150,000 top), but that the silver screen is gold plated and the printed word brings in the money. Even Walter Winchell was paid $1,000 a week. Could any little boy or girl do less?

MIGUEL MARINO GOMEZ has been chosen President of Cuba in the first regular election to be held since the overthrow of Machado. The fact that the polling was unusually quiet—only five persons having been killed—is ascribed to the presence of women, who were exercising the right of suffrage for the first time. To assume from these facts, however, that conditions are gradually becoming more settled in Cuba would be wholly unwarranted. The military terror of Batista prevented any of the powerful revolutionary parties from participating in the election. Choice was limited to General Menocal, a former President, and Gomez, who had previously been Mayor of Havana. The political position of the two men was almost identical. Both are extremely conservative, and both were considered “friendly” to the United States. Only a small fraction of the Cuban electorate participated in the voting. Dr. Ramon Grau San Martin, the only Cuban President in recent years to possess genuine popular support, is still in exile at Miami. More than 3,000 members of the opposition parties are in prison, and political assassinations are almost a daily occurrence. Every opposition newspaper has been forcibly suppressed, and radio stations belonging to the opposition have been seized by the army. This terror would collapse if the present military dictatorship in Cuba were not condoned by the two key men in the situation—Ambassador Caffery and ex-Ambassador Welles, who as Assistant Secretary of State is in charge of Cuban affairs at the State Department. Their continuance in their posts casts strong doubt on the sincerity of the Roosevelt Administration's intention to be a genuine “good neighbor” to Cuba.

AFTER SEVERAL DAYS of uncertainty the Japanese have decided to abandon their farcical role at the London Naval Conference. From the beginning it was obvious that the Japanese delegation's demand for a “common upper limit” was being pushed, not with any hope of success, but as a means of “gaining face” with the home population. When it became apparent that the conference would refuse to discuss the matter further, the delegation was in something of a dilemma. To consent to a consideration of such details as the voluntary submission of naval building plans, the restriction of submarine operations, or qualitative limitation in the size and armament of the various types of warships would imply a surrender on the issue of parity. This the Japanese naval leaders would not tolerate. The Tokyo government, on the other hand, did not wish to lay itself open to the charge of having wrecked the conference. A severe struggle between the naval and civilian elements appears to have ensued in which the naval group emerged victorious. The Japanese delegation is remaining in London only long enough to restate the case for parity, after which it will withdraw, possibly leaving an observer. Just why the conference will continue when there is no hope of naval restriction no one seems to know, unless it is that the delegates are afraid to face the home folks with empty hands.

THE REPORT of the Federal Trade Commission on the natural-gas industry reveals a story of avoidance by holding companies of state regulation, elimination of competition, raising of rates, and write-ups of capital assets that would make an electric-utility magnate blush. It contains also one of the most serious charges that have been leveled against big business. Coal, oil, and other utility interests, the commission charges, have conspired to choke off the supply of natural gas to New York and Philadelphia. Only 100 miles of additional pipe line would be required to complete “one remarkable loop system from which to supply natural gas to the greatest industrial and most densely populated area in the United States. Yet so far as is known, these lines have been lying practically idle for years, with only insignificant sales to a few small communities on the way and to gas utilities in Washington, D. C.” The Associated Press story of the report declares that the system belongs to the Columbia Gas and Electric Corporation and the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, and this is borne out by the pipeline map in Moody's investment manual. Ownership of the vast network that leads “into this tremendous potential market,” the commission says, “makes possible an extraordinarily reliable natural-gas service, yet no service in any way commensurate with that investment has been developed.” The report continues:

One may well question why great organizations in business for profit can be constrained from acquiring business at hand amply sufficient to load their now idle lines and utilize idle and possibly wasting gas production (through extraction by other ownership), whereby they stand a chance of earning some return on the many millions of dollars represented by these hundreds of miles of pipe lines and the many thousands of acres of gas lands held in reserve to support them. . . . Are these pipe-line facilities left idle because the other utility interests controlling distribution of manufactured gas, and possibly powerful interests concerned with the distribution of coal and oil in those areas, exert financial pressure and otherwise on the owners of the pipe lines to delay or avoid seeking business for natural gas?

We should like to know why the commission has not answered these questions itself, and why the New York Herald Tribune published only the generalized conclusions of the commission on the industry as a whole and the New York Times published nothing on the report at all.

AFTER FOUR HOURS of heated arguments the Association of the Bar of the City of New York voted, 321 to 247, to adopt a resolution opposing the appointment of Lamar Hardy as United States Attorney. The resolution declared Mr. Hardy unqualified for the position to which President Roosevelt appointed him last November, by reason of his connection with the State Title and Mortgage Company, condemned for maladministration by the Moreland Commission. The Bar Association's decision is altogether commendable, and it should have weight with the United States Senate when the Hardy appointment comes up for discussion. It will be an impressive addition to the argument that confirmation should be refused. At the lawyers' meeting, however, Mr. Hardy did not want for champions. Among those who supported him were former Governor Nathan I. Miller, Bainbridge Colby, George Gordon Battle, S. Stanwood Menken, and Frederic Coudert, Sr. Two former presidents of the Bar Association spoke in favor of the resolution and against Mr. Hardy's appointment; they were Charles S. Burlingham and Thomas D. Thacher. Samuel Seabury joined them. Despite the Bar Association's vote, however, one should not be too sanguine. A news story in the New York Herald Tribune for January 3 explained that not only were the dispensers of Democratic patronage aware of Mr. Hardy's connection with the mortgage company, but Attorney General Cummings had "made a thorough investigation" and convinced himself of Mr. Hardy's fitness.

AS SOON AS the first pressure of business is out of the way, Congress may be expected to take up the question of saving the country from the reds. The two bills most immediately on the docket are the Kramer sedition bill, reported favorably to the House by the Judiciary Committee in the last session, and the Tydings "incitement to disaffection" bill, which slipped through the Senate last June and was approved by the House Committee on Military Affairs. The Kramer bill provides for imprisonment of not more than five years or a fine of not more than $5,000, or both, for anyone who "knowingly and wilfully" advocates the overthrow of the government of the United States by force or violence; the Tydings bill imposes a fine of not more than $2,000 and imprisonment for not more than two years for anyone who "with the intent to incite disaffection" advises, counsels, urges, or solicits any member of the army or navy to disobey military laws or regulations. Both bills are dangerous and wholly unnecessary; both, if they are passed, will be susceptible of use against honest criticism and protest, particularly in labor struggles and in the activities of minority parties; both should be fought by every person who believes in free speech and a free press. So far we have no federal law on the statute books which limits American liberties in this manner. It is unlikely that Americans will now tolerate a beginning.

TWO SHOTS have been fired at the phalanx of teachers' loyalty oaths which have been marching through the state legislatures. In Massachusetts on January 11 the Council of Teachers' Unions sponsored the introduction by Representative Baker of a bill to repeal the act requiring teachers to swear loyalty to the Constitution. The bill was supported by the State Federation of Labor, among other groups. In Albany, early in the current legislative session, Assemblyman George Kaminsky of Brooklyn introduced a similar bill for repeal of the Ives loyalty-oath law. This proposal has the support of the Teachers' Union, the Teachers' Guild, and a few other teacher groups. Commendation is due to Mayor LaGuardia for his veto of the ordinance requiring that an American flag "thirty-six by forty-eight inches in area" be displayed at every meeting at which "the discussion of politics or public questions" takes place. These enactments which establish patriotism by legislative fiat would be downright silly if they were not potentially so dangerous. An important step in establishing a standing body to fight them has been taken by the Massachusetts teachers. They have organized the Massachusetts Society for Freedom in Teaching, headed by Professor Kirtley Mather of Harvard and including on its executive council men of distinction like Samuel E. Morison of Harvard, Henry R. Mussey of Wellesley, and Harold U. Faulkner of Smith. Teachers in other states would do well to follow the example thus set. The deeply rooted tradition of academic freedom in America may prove to be one of the principal elements that will distinguish our fate from that of Italy and Germany.

THE CONFERENCE of the American League Against War and Fascism, which met in Cleveland during the first week of January, represented a broader constituency and many more persons than earlier anti-war congresses. Careful estimates were offered to show that the 2,200-odd delegates could speak for nearly 2,000,000 persons. There were three or four times as many representatives of the trade unions, many of them being A. F. of L. locals; the farm representation had grown enormously; and that of cultural groups had likewise increased. In general the congress was distinguished by a real spirit of unity and a democratic attempt to formulate a program according to the wishes of all the delegates. The ten-point program adopted was strongly anti-militaristic and anti-fascist, as was to be expected, ending with an appeal "to organize mass support for every effort, national or international, which in our judgment is directed toward postponing, restricting, or shortening war." In addition it called for vigorous championship of American civil rights and opposition to "all legislation . . . denying citizens in the armed forces their constitutional right to receive printed matter . . . in behalf of this or any other program designed to secure peace, freedom, and justice." The usual opposition from the Hearst press, the American Legion, and the president of the American Federation of Labor was aroused, as was also to be expected. All in all, the meeting indicated an encouraging increase of anti-fascist feeling throughout the country.

The Farmers' Fate

AS a result of the Supreme Court's decision invalidating the AAA, the whole question of agricultural policy has once more been unceremoniously dumped into the lap of Congress. The Supreme Court does not even pretend to have been concerned with the plight of the farmer or the merits of the AAA as such. It merely asserted that the particular legal device which Congress had established to alleviate the farm crisis was unconstitutional, leaving the Administration with the responsibility for drafting new legislation to conform with the technicalities of the law. That Congress will take some action goes without saying. For political, if not for humanitarian, reasons the farmers cannot be allowed to fall back into the poverty and insecurity of the pre-New Deal era—at least not in an election year.

The fact that we can find no legal or moral justification for the Supreme Court's action does not alter the fact that the AAA—taken as a whole—was a dangerous and anti-social program. Granting that drastic steps were necessary to save the farmers from utter destitution, there were many provisions in the act which were indefensible on any grounds. The processing tax, for example, was scarcely more than a glorified sales tax which bore most heavily on those least able to carry the load. The necessities used by the poor—bread, flour, lard, pork, sugar, tobacco, and cotton goods—were arbitrarily raised in price by 10 to 30 per cent in order to pay farmers to limit their output. Although it has been argued that the contraction in acreage was rendered necessary by the decline of foreign trade, a part of the restriction, at least, has been at the expense of American living standards. Owing to the combined effects of the drought and the AAA, pork and lard consumption dropped approximately 30 per cent in 1935, while restrictive policies for milk led to a decline of 5 per cent in the use of dairy products. In order to give the population of the United States an adequate diet, it is estimated that the area of cultivated land would have to be increased at least 40,000,000 acres over that of 1933; instead, more than 30,000,000 acres were withdrawn from production!

No one will deny that the restriction of acreage has contributed, among other factors, to the increase of agricultural prices and the expansion of farm income. But instead of regaining our foreign markets, the AAA policies have intensified the drift toward economic isolation, involving a permanent loss of export opportunities. Prior to the depression the United States regularly exported approximately one-half of its cotton, one-third of its lard, and one-fifth of its wheat. The artificially high price of American farm products has resulted in the loss of practically all of this market. In the first ten months of 1935 our exports of raw cotton amounted to only 3,800,000 bales as against 8,500,000 bales in 1928; our exports of lard were 80,500,000 pounds as contrasted with 760,000,000 pounds in 1928; while shipments of wheat declined from an average of 116,000,000 bushels in 1926-30 to approximately 200,000 bushels in 1935—a drop of 99.8 per cent. Faced with the loss of foreign outlets, farmers turned to the production of supplies for the home market until, as was recently the case with potatoes, prices of these products also were driven to unprofitably low levels. Moreover, hundreds of thousands of the most underprivileged—tenants and share-croppers—have borne the brunt of the reduction program. And it could scarcely be otherwise. If foreign markets are permanently lost, our cities are faced with the choice of absorbing the surplus production of our farms or of finding some way to absorb the surplus farm population.

Secretary Wallace and other Administration leaders have recognized the legitimacy of many of these criticisms. But they insist that as long as the price of industrial products is maintained at an artificially high level through protective tariffs, there is no other means of obtaining a balanced economic structure. Some justification for this argument might exist if the processing tax under the AAA had been actually paid by the interests which profit by the tariff. Unfortunately this was not the case. Both the tariff and the tax were paid by the great masses of American consumers—factory and white-collar workers and farmers.

The agricultural-bounty plan proposed by the Administration to take the place of the invalidated AAA is discussed elsewhere in these pages by Paul Ward. It seeks to do under the form of soil conservation and reward for scientific management what the Administration has been forbidden to do under the taxing and spending power. This may be only a way of avoiding the uncomfortable constitutional problem in the present campaign and not a way of solving the farmers' problem. The farmers had been offered empty promises by the Republicans, but most of them felt that under Roosevelt they had finally found some substantial aid. Now they are to be abandoned to their fate. The Administration is willing to tide them over the campaign with promises of hand-outs through crop bounties, but it is unwilling to remove the principal obstacle in the way of a national attack on the problem—the power of the Supreme Court.

There may be a chance that the new plan will prove constitutional, although it is difficult to think so, given the present temper of the court. It is also true that a soil-conservation program has been badly needed. But a long-run program for the farmer must start with tariff reduction directed toward restoring agricultural parity. This will be difficult because no sustained effort has been made to educate the farmer and the city consumer on the amount which they pay each year as tribute to the industrialists under our outdated commercial policies. Meanwhile the agricultural worker, whether tenant, share-cropper, or owner, should be given the protection against insecurity which is planned for him in the Frazier-Lundeen workers' social-insurance bill. But basically neither tariff revision, soil conservation, nor social insurance meets the farmers' problem. That can be done only through a triple program of national control of industry bringing about a planned expansion of mass buying power, a reallocation of farm population so as to produce a balanced industrial-agrarian economy, and vigorous constitutional reform. Mr. Roosevelt may find that by abandoning the farmers to their fate he has made a political error. Nothing now stands in the way of their joining a third-party movement which will face their issues, and the issues of the workers, unflinchingly.

War Profits and Personal Devils

THE Nye committee investigation of the part played by the House of Morgan in bringing on the war continues to furnish drama for millions of breakfast readers and a paradise for the historians. We all love to go behind the scenes of politics, especially if we can watch a banker manipulating the stage machinery. Backstage with Nye has become a favorite American diversion. "An Arrow-collar man with a leathery face" (in the newspaper description) has made what happened twenty years ago not merely history but contemporary politics. He has done as much as any man in driving home to American opinion the economic pressures that dictated the abandonment of neutrality in the last war. If this is essentially a Marxian position, let us Americanize it by calling it Arrow-collar Marxism.

What do the diggings and delvings of the committee add to our picture of the American road to war? In an article in this issue Walter Millis summarizes his own researches and adds to them the committee findings in a brilliant and balanced version of the economic interpretation of neutrality and war. Professor Sidney B. Fay, in a vigorous book review on a later page, takes the opposite point of view. He contends along with Professor Seymour that it was the submarine, rather than war profits, that was "the main and final cause of our participation." The issue is sharply drawn. There can be no doubt that the men of light and learning on Wall Street and in our universities will prefer to agree with Professors Seymour and Fay. If they can lay the burden on the submarine they can take it off the profiteers and the profit system, where it rests so heavily. For ourselves, we feel that Mr. Millis's point of view is the more convincing. It is not a question of economic determinism in the narrow sense, or of finding a single cause for our entrance into war. Submarine warfare, diplomacy, and international law undoubtedly furnished the framework; but the dynamic was furnished by the quest of American business for profits. It was the danger of cutting off our profits and prosperity that made the submarine issue so explosive and hampered President Wilson in applying adequate pressures to stop the war.

The Nye committee has rendered great service in verifying and publicizing this position. But there is danger in its attempt to establish a personal complicity of the Morgans in America's entrance into war. The very fact of their unquestioned leadership in finance gives them a stability and a sense of responsibility that few other American firms have. Like a magnet they attract all the profit filings that happen to be lying around. There is less need for them to engage in skulduggery than for weaker firms to do so.

The House of Morgan played a role in the zooming curve of war profits, but it was probably a stabilizing role rather than the reverse. When in the first years of the war the Allied purchasing agents began to invade the American shores, the boom in war profits began. The first effect of war is to throw foreign trade and finance into chaos, but now prosperity seemed assured. How false and insubstantial a prosperity it was, the post-war events were to show. But it was real enough at the time, real enough to dominate the entire sequence of diplomacy, propaganda, and international law. The scramble for war profits was increased by the competitive bidding of the various Allied purchasing agents. This competitive chaos was ended by the creation of a central purchasing agency under Morgan's Stettinius. That was followed by a central agency for financing the Allied purchases. It was natural that the House of Morgan should be intrusted with both. For they were almost fanatically pro-Ally, their traditions and their banking relations were English, and as the dominant bankers of the country their interests were tied in with the war profits of the business structure.

Thus analyzed, the onus for precipitating us into war falls not on the House of Morgan but on our whole business system, caught as it was in the obscene scramble for war profits. The most important function of the House of Morgan was not to generate pressures upon the government. It was not to bolster the pound-sterling exchange, "put the heat on" industrialists to invest in British loans, send clamorous cables—although on these points the Nye committee offers evidence that cannot be ignored. To see it only thus is to see the catastrophes of history in conspiratorial terms, and therefore to see the solutions of history in equally personal terms of breaking up the conspiracies. The real function of the House of Morgan was to register the pressures being exerted by the entire business system, to which the materials of death are as fair a source of profits as the materials of life.

If we do not take this tack there is danger that we shall waste our energy in a search for a personal devil. In the history of a nation the devils are not personal. They are institutional. The revocation of the "money embargo" by President Wilson and Secretary Lansing was not only the work of the banker interests. It was the imperative of the entire business community. We are certain that the Nye committee will not limit itself to a search for direct Morgan pressures in the interest of Morgan profits. Personal guilt is too slight a thread on which to hang the movement for a strenuous and unyielding American neutrality.

News from Red China

THE frank excuses given by Japan for its recent invasion of North China have at least had the advantage of breaking the conspiracy of silence in the American press regarding the progress of the Chinese Soviet armies since their dramatic westward movement of last winter. While fragmentary information has come out from time to time indicating that the Red Army had been far from weakened by the 1,500-mile journey, the correspondent of the New York Times apparently had to visit General Tada, commandant of the Japanese garrison at Tientsin, in order to learn the full extent of the Communists' progress during recent months. According to the General, who illustrated his remarks with maps containing huge red and pink splotches, Soviet districts are now to be found covering wide areas in six of China's eighteen provinces, and the number of men under arms is estimated to be over 200,000. Japan is now bringing pressure on Nanking to obtain agreement to a joint Sino-Japanese military drive against communism, which would open virtually the whole of China to Japanese troops.

The importance of the northward drive of the Red Army has probably been exaggerated by the Japanese because of their own ambitions in the adjacent areas of Inner Mongolia. Actually a comparatively small proportion of the Communist troops appears to be involved in the drive through Kansu and Shensi. According to recent detailed information published in the Soviet Union, the main Communist base is located in the northwestern portion of the rich, remote province of Szechuan. Although parts of this province have been under Soviet control for nearly two years, other large areas were taken over this summer when the main branch of the Red Army under Chu Teh and Mao Tse-tung arrived from Kiangsi. The union of these troops with the somewhat larger Szechuan army under Hsu Hsiang-chien was dangerous to Nanking, not only because of the unprecedented size of the combined force, but because it afforded an opportunity for a reorganization of the Red Army which has greatly added to its efficiency. The Szechuan forces, though consisting of more than 100,000 men, were notoriously weak in trained personnel, while the Kiangsi army, though not so large, contained tens of thousands of men who had received a thorough political and military training at their former base.

A further indication of the strength of the Communist movement in China may be obtained from the fact that much of the area evacuated by the Red Army a year ago is still under Soviet influence. In Kiangsi and Fukien, where the Soviets held uninterrupted sway for nearly six years, local partisan groups affiliated to the Communists still hold nearly one-third the territory supposedly occupied by Chiang Kai-shek, a region containing approximately 10,000,000 persons. In addition the Soviets have strong forces in Hunan and Hupeh—halfway between their old base in Kiangsi and their present stronghold in Szechuan. Here an army of 50,000 men under Ho Lung constitutes a perennial threat to Chiang Kai-shek's lines of communication, should he launch an attack on the main Red Army in the West. Other small Soviet areas are to be found in practically all of the provinces, bringing the total number of persons under Communist rule to nearly 50,000,000—or one-tenth the population of China.

After waging costly and unsuccessful war against the Soviets for nearly seven years, Chiang Kai-shek appears to have at least temporarily abandoned his campaign. That Japan should consider this a direct challenge to its ambitions is scarcely surprising. For the past four years the Communists have made political capital out of the fact that they have been practically alone in actively opposing Japanese aggression. For millions of Chinese, communism has come to be regarded as the sole alternative to Japanese domination. Now the situation has apparently got out of hand as far as either Nanking or Tokyo is concerned. The recent student uprising, at least partially Communist inspired, has revived much of the nationalist, anti-imperialist sentiment which has lain dormant since 1927. A mass revolt against the pro-Japanese policies of Nanking is a distinct possibility, a possibility that is greatly heightened by the existence of hundreds of red districts throughout China, backed by a well-disciplined army which with trained reserves may total as much as a half-million men. The new Communist tactics, emphasizing the necessity for forming a united people's government in opposition to both Chiang Kai-shek and Japan, would appear to be a far more potent factor in Far Eastern affairs than casual reading of our newspapers would suggest.

Socialists to the Left

THE fight within the Socialist Party reached a climax on January 5 when the National Executive Committee by a vote of eight to two deposed the conservative state committee of New York headed by Louis Waldman, suspended the charter of the state organization, and set up a temporary committee of fifteen to run its affairs pending an early election of party officers under the supervision of an N. E. C. committee of three and based on the membership of February 7. This resolution was substituted for an even more drastic one, submitted earlier, which would have condemned the New York organization, lifted its charter, and transferred it to the state organization set up at the Utica convention on the assumption that that convention represented a majority in the state membership.

The Old Guard charges that the procedure was unconstitutional. It charges, moreover, that the substitute resolution was not a compromise since eleven of the original "receivership" committee of fifteen were associated with the Utica convention. Later this committee was increased to twenty-one; so far six of its appointees and five alternates (all of them right-wing) have refused to serve. The deposed state committee, needless to say, has declined to accept the action of the N. E. C. The state committee elected at Utica, also needless to say, has accepted the arrangement; and the "militants" maintain that the Old Guard has grown suddenly tender of a constitution which it has not hesitated to violate in the past, that the plea of dictatorship and execution without trial is absurd since the issue has been hotly debated for months, and that the resolution as passed guarantees full party democracy.

The most intelligent and vigorous Socialist Party members and sympathizers must necessarily be on the left in this controversy for the simple reason that the Old Guard through its actions and policies long ago forfeited the right to be called Socialist. The fact that the radical Declaration of Principles was adopted at the national convention of 1934 by a two-thirds' vote indicates, moreover, that the left-wing has a majority of the membership on its side.

It is an unfortunate fact, however, that the right wing controls many of the institutions of the party and that it is strongly enough entrenched to make a nation-wide split highly probable. Mayor McLevy of Bridgeport has already denounced the action of the N. E. C., and James H. Maurer in Reading has taken the same stand. Mayor Hoan of Milwaukee prefers to remain aloof. He absented himself from the meeting in Philadelphia because he considered the situation hopeless from the point of view of harmony.

A split was inevitable, perhaps, in any case. If so, it is better that it should come as early as possible and on a clear issue. A realistic alignment of radical sentiment in this country is highly necessary. While the present struggle within the Socialist Party may mean a cut in the Socialist showing in the coming election, it will mean also more reality in the united front on the left, to which the Thomas group will give support. And at this stage in our political and economic development a genuine united resistance to the growing offensive against civil liberties and living standards—despite "recovery"—is of primary importance.

Issues and Men

The President's Dilemma

DESPITE the President's extraordinary political agility and his ability to avoid issues, it seems to me that Franklin Roosevelt is now in a place where he must come to a definite decision and that upon that decision will depend in good measure how high he will stand in American history. Will he give the country strong and effective leadership and a campaign for the amendment of the Constitution so that Congress may act freely for the social and economic welfare of the people, or will he take the decisions of the Supreme Court lying down and do nothing about them? It is hard to see how he can straddle on this issue. In his famous interview given after the Supreme Court's decision overthrowing the NRA, he declared that that august body was returning us to the "horse-and-buggy age." Then he shut up like an oyster, and I for one have been firmly of the opinion that he would not again refer to the question of a constitutional amendment until he was safely inaugurated for the second time. But now the situation has changed. Nearly all of the New Deal program appears doomed, and so there looms before the President one of the greatest opportunities for leadership that have ever come to any Chief Executive. If one may judge by the stump speech on the "state of the Union" which he delivered to Congress, he has about shot his bolt so far as new constructive measures are concerned which might help us to recover further and get our unemployed millions back to work. Will he now come out squarely for the limitation of the powers of the Supreme Court, or will he be content to campaign for reelection without further reference to the overthrowing of his legislative achievements?

The President can, of course, fight an effective battle for reelection on the basis of accomplishments other than those which the Supreme Court will have thrown out. He can truthfully declare that he has achieved a good deal; that he manfully stepped into the breach when the country was about to collapse in March, 1932. He can properly assume that his social-security act, the reform of the stock exchanges, and, perhaps, the control of security issues will remain unharmed. He can rightly claim that some of the reforms he has instituted will continue to be effective; I cannot conceive of any party hereafter advocating that old-age pensions, the care of prospective mothers, or social insurance be dropped. In other words, he can truthfully assert that he has given a new and a progressive orientation to our public life, and that that in itself is a great achievement. But if he really wants to make a slashing and effective attack upon the forces of reaction, he can best do it by raising the great question whether the time has not come for at least one more important amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Undoubtedly, if he chooses this course, the attacks which will be directed against him will be almost unparalleled, certainly unsurpassed, in their bitterness and violence. The big-business forces which he attacked in his message to Congress feel not only that the Supreme Court is their Gibraltar but that it is their last bulwark. He must not attempt the amendment unless he is ready to risk everything upon his program. In other words, he must be as ready to face defeat as Grover Cleveland was when he told a group of his advisers that he was going to campaign for reelection in 1888 upon a demand for radical reduction of tariffs. His advisers said to him, "Then you will be defeated"; and he replied, "Then I shall be defeated." And he was.

Unfortunately Mr. Roosevelt has given very little indication that there is in his make-up much of Grover Cleveland. Such a courage would call, for one thing, for the complete abandonment of politics. Speaking recently before the American Association for Labor Legislation, Dean Howard Lee McBain, of the graduate faculties of Columbia University, said that he realized "the hopelessness of any such proposal now to amend the Constitution." But it is not hopeless to think of the Constitution's being amended cautiously and wisely, provided only there is the right leadership. It is already reported that the American Federation of Labor and the National Agricultural Conference, the latter representing 2,500,000 farmers, will throw their influence on the side of amendment, but that will be of no avail, of course, if the President fails to take a stand and to carry his party with him. Dean McBain also declared that the President "in the midst of a national crisis giving him opportunities for reform never before possessed by a President . . . has chosen for personal and party interests to play the usual game of putrid party politics." There is the rub. Dean McBain feels that we need to alter the Constitution because "the traditional American economic system clearly shows that it is no longer capable of self-operation." Will the President take hold and eschew partisanship? Will he from now on give to his enemies and his friends alike a clear-cut, concise statement of what his aims are and just how he visualizes the future United States? That he has failed to do so has been one of the weaknesses of his Administration.

The first thing that the President would have to do would be to make it clear that the amendment that is proposed would in nowise alter our structure of government or our institutions. They certainly will not suffer if the right of the Supreme Court to legislate is curbed. As Justice Stone wrote in the minority decision in the AAA case, "Courts are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern." Justice Stone also wrote that it must not be assumed that "the responsibility for the preservation of our institutions" is "the exclusive concern of any one of the three branches of government or that it alone can save them from destruction."

Well, Mr. President, which is it to be?

Isaiah Garrison Villard

The AAA Puts on False Whiskers

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, January 12

UNDER the glowering gaze of the Supreme Court majority the Roosevelt Administration is preparing to reenact the AAA. The show was put into rehearsal by our White House Ziegfeld twenty-four hours after the court's AAA decision was announced, and it will be ready for the House and Senate stage in a few days.

It is a startling performance, but it is not a courageous one. In its every scene it gives the lie to Roosevelt's Jackson Day assertion that in the coming campaign "the basic issue will be inevitably the retention of popular government." It also belies his profession of belief that "it is the sacred duty of us who are vested with the responsibility of leadership to justify the expectations of the young men and women of the United States." And it reduces to absurdity his attempt to pose as a reincarnation of Andrew Jackson, for Old Hickory defied the Supreme Court. What Roosevelt is preparing is not defiance; it is humbug.

Because it illustrates all those things and because it offers, in addition, a classic example of how laws are made, we might as well follow the show through rehearsal. We begin by noting that its theme song is "Let's Put False Whiskers on the AAA"; that the opening chorus begins, "We gotta keep the farmers in checks till November at least"; and that six big-time corporation lawyers, sitting as justices of the United States Supreme Court, helped with the libretto.

If those six who signed the prevailing opinion in the Hoosac Mills case had been compelled to be candid they would have set forth their decision in some such words as these: "You gentlemen who framed the AAA succeeded in getting around the letter of the Constitution. If we conceded victory to you, one of the barriers the Founding Fathers erected against the development of truly democratic government in this country would be destroyed. So long as we six live and sit upon this bench, that barrier—the division of authority between state and federal government—will stand and democracy will be denied. We are bound, therefore, by hook or crook, to hold your law unconstitutional, and will so hold as to any similar law."

Those, at least, are the words that many in the AAA, the Department of Justice, and especially in Congress read into the majority decision, and on Capitol Hill there were a few who wanted to accept its implicit challenge and move to amend the Constitution. Some of them, to be sure, were actuated by fear, notably cotton-state Senators and Congressmen who thought some public show of bravado an essential bulwark to their reelection chances. But there were others, such as Senator Costigan of Colorado and Representative Marcantonio of New York, who were moved by principle. Nothing of that sort moved the President of the United States. The fear that gripped him and his political sycophants was a fear that the Supreme Court had destroyed the chief factor insuring his reelection. With the AAA outlawed, the Republicans, who almost confessedly had no competitive plank with which to match it, stood on nearly a par with him in bidding for the farm vote. What denied them complete parity was the fact that they never had made good on their quadrennial promises to the farmers, whereas the Democrats, under Roosevelt, to some extent at least had given performance to their pledges. That difference—slight or great—might be offset by the facts that the farm vote in important sections is normally Republican, that the AAA had benefited directly less than half of the 6,500,000 farmers, that a large proportion of the 3,000,000 contract signers were far from satisfied with their lot and had gone along with the program only for expediency's sake, and that in some parts of the country the AAA program was holding back a boom tide in order that other parts might not suffer.

That, of course, was only another way of saying that the New Deal had failed to accomplish any fundamental changes in the agricultural situation, just as it had failed to accomplish any fundamental changes in the industrial situation; that at best it had done nothing more than to implement agriculture with the chief anti-social device of manufacturing—production control; and that, in short, the Old Deal, to which Roosevelt had said this nation would never return, was just around the corner. Perhaps it might be stated more briefly by saying that, beneficent though the AAA was touted to be, it nevertheless could not command sufficient public support to warrant Roosevelt's risking his political fortunes by carrying the issue to the country.

But if the AAA were allowed to die, a number of things equally costly at the polls might happen. First, the farmer might get the idea that his White House messiah had abandoned him. Second, with the flow of benefit-payment checks stopped, there might be an apprehensive tightening of rural pursestrings, with a drop in automobile sales and with other consequences that would reverse the rising prosperity curve so essential to half of Roosevelt's campaign slogan: "I got you out of the depression and will keep you out of the war." Third, there might be—indeed, there probably would be—huge crops in corn, cotton, and tobacco which would send farm prices tobogganing to 1932 levels on election eve.

What, then, to do? Well, the only thing that occurred to Roosevelt and his advisers was to keep the AAA alive, partly by pretending that the Supreme Court had not meant what it said and partly by contriving a new disguise for this riches-through-scarcity device. The minority opinion, which up to this time had been revered because of its consoling qualities, was set aside and the majority opinion conned for loopholes. Down at the bottom of its sixteenth page the searchers finally found a paragraph that would support their pretense that the court was only joking. Justice Roberts in damning the AAA said: "We are not here concerned with a conditional appropriation of money, nor with a provision that if certain conditions are not complied with the appropriation shall no longer be available. . . . There is an obvious difference between a statute stating the conditions upon which money shall be expended and one effective only upon assumption of a contractual obligation to submit to a regulation which otherwise could not be enforced."

Justice Stone in his dissenting opinion, with Justices Brandeis and Cardozo concurring, said that this paragraph meant: "The government may give seeds to farmers but not condition the gift upon their being planted in places where they are most needed or even planted at all. . . . It may spend its money for the suppression of the boll weevil but may not compensate the farmers for suspending the growth of cotton in the infected areas." But the Administration's legal experts said it meant quite a different thing. They said it meant that all the Administration had to do to keep the AAA alive was to do away with the AAA contracts. If Justices Stone, Cardozo, and Brandeis were right and they, the experts, were wrong, at least their mistake would not be discovered until after November, if then, for by a simple trick they had in readiness the Administration could make the new AAA immune from court attack. In Massachusetts vs. Mellon, they pointed out, the Supreme Court had held that a taxpayer could not ask the courts to invalidate a federal tax unless he could show that the tax injured him individually and specifically. If we finance the AAA out of general revenues, said the legal wizards, no man or corporation will be able to get a foothold in the courts from which to attack it and bring it to the Supreme Court's attention.

Roosevelt thought it all a good idea. So did the AAA and the Department of Justice. If there were any misgivings, they were felt only by the Treasury Department, whose chief, Budget-Balancer Morgenthau, must have shuddered at the expense involved.

There now arose the question of a disguise, for the White House did not dare appear publicly to be thumbing its nose at the august Six-and-Three. One was ready at hand. For several months a committee of experts in the Department of Agriculture had been working up a series of disguises in anticipation of an adverse decision from the Supreme Court. Secretary Wallace picked out a relatively honest one—a simple domino, let us say. But Administrator Davis went out for one with whiskers, cowl, and a floor-sweeping robe, and Roosevelt backed him in that choice. Wallace, whose conscience has been bruised every time he allowed himself to look at the realities of agriculture à la New Deal, wanted to institute a program of scientific farming under which farmers would be bribed to be good farmers. Davis, however, knew that the farmers to whom the AAA caters do not want to be bribed to be good farmers; they want to be bribed to be rich farmers. Roosevelt could understand that, too.

As a result, there was hastily and secretly drafted a bill which perpetuates all the old objectives of the AAA, with only contracts omitted. What were "benefit payments" under the old AAA become "conditional payments" under the new. What was "crop control" becomes "soil conservation." And the old program was given a further verbal twist. Farmers who had been paid for "doing nothing," as the Liberty League would have it, were now to be paid for "doing something," as the Administration would have it. The planter with a hundred acres in cotton, who under the old AAA would have been paid benefits for retiring forty of those acres, would be paid a bounty under the new AAA not for retiring those forty acres but for turning them into pasture, woodland, or fertility-restoring legumes. The result, of course, would be essentially the same—less cotton and a higher price for it. The result also would be the same with respect to the long-suffering share-croppers, except that there would be no contracts with 'cropper-protection clauses to embarrass the Administration.

As soon as the plan had begun to jell, Wallace sent out a call for all the national farm leaders to assemble in Washington. They came rushing, a hundred strong and aptly described by an observant farm journalist who said, "A 'farm leader' is a man who has no followers." I was assured by men of long intimacy with them that to describe them as the Matt Wolls of organized agriculture would be more than flattering. Like most of the high priests of the A. F. of L., these gentry who assembled Friday morning in Wallace's office were all small business men, drawing down fat salaries from the organizations they head and from the affiliated banks, real estate, and insurance companies. At least one of the farm organizations represented has been shown by Congressional investigations to have made itself the well-paid tool at one time or another of all the major financial or industrial rackets in the country. The American Farm Bureau Federation, into whose leaders' hands the Administration maneuvered the reins of the conference, has been the servant of the power trust, the ship-subsidy grabbers, and a host of industrial tariff lobbies.

It was to help them maintain that pose and, by helping them, to secure their support for the disguised AAA that the Administration called this motley gang to Washington. The Administration was afraid that these men, unless coddled, would return to their old tricks, sell out to the highest bidder, and go roaring about the country demanding currency inflation, higher tariffs, export subsidies, the McNary-Haugen bill, or any one of half a dozen of agriculture's other traditional panaceas.

So the Administration's bill was kept in hiding, and for two days an elaborate pretext was kept up of "consulting the nation's farm leaders" and letting them shape the Administration's program. Adroit guidance of committee selections—including the selection of William H. Settle, Indianapolis head of a Farm Credit Administration adjunct, as chairman of the conference, and the appointment of Earl Smith, Administrator Davis's old pal from the Illinois Agricultural Association, to the "legislative-committee" chairmanship—insured promulgation of a set of recommendations fitting the Administration's program. To make doubly sure of organization support, the recommendations were loosely drawn so that those organization leaders whose followers demand currency inflation, or higher tariffs, or export subsidies could claim to have forced an opening for their eventual inclusion when Congress gets the bill.

It was in precisely this fashion that the original Adjustment Act was drawn, and it too included all the assorted farm panaceas, the Administration forces in Congress having managed their acceptance on a discretionary rather than mandatory basis. It is probable that the new bill will follow the same course in Congress, with the Republican minority hiding behind the old McNary-Haugen bill while they inveigh against the Administration measure, only to vote for it in the end. All that remains is to find a way to make the thing work without compulsion or contracts, and to finance its probable cost of half a billion dollars.

The Last War and the Next

I. Morgan, Money, and War

By WALTER MILLIS

FOR the first time in the fifteen years since the ending of the World War the United States is facing with some seriousness the problem of how to keep out of another one. In the debate over this intricate subject a certain amount of new material bearing upon the strictly economic aspects of our entanglement is coming to light, and a good many persons have been stressing what would seem to be the obvious importance of economic factors in any attempt to control such another situation. This emphasis has brought an unexpected response. Mr. Thomas Lamont has descended upon the public prints in a flood of letters disposing of "the myth that it was chiefly American commercial interests, and not Germany, that drew America into the war"; Mr. J. P. Morgan has told the Nye committee that although from the first he considered the defeat of Germany to be vital and did all he could to encompass it, yet Germany alone "drove us into the war," and his own activities had nothing to do with that essential step in defeating the Germans; Professor Seymour of Yale has published a book of essays to demonstrate that the German resumption of unrestricted submarine war was the only relevant factor in our abandonment of neutrality; while the New York Times has summarily dismissed "all the fables to the contrary" as either "misunderstandings" or "malicious inventions."

But in thus abolishing some of the mythological ideas now current as to the economic influences behind the American declaration of war, these authorities seem to be in danger of manufacturing an equally misleading myth of their own. If it was really the German submarine decision of January 9, 1917, which alone and automatically determined the issue between neutrality and a full-scale participation in the world's greatest war, we should have to throw up our hands and grant at once that the lives and fortunes of the American people are perpetually at the mercy of outside circumstances which we have no possibility of controlling. Fortunately, it is unnecessary to accept any such hopelessly fatalistic conclusion. One must still ask how it was that the United States came to raise the submarine war into an automatic casus belli; and here one is immediately in the presence of many factors more susceptible to our own prevision and control than the possible military exigencies of foreign powers locked in a life-and-death struggle. The economic factor is by no means the only one of these. But it is certainly of more than negligible importance.

The European war was not a month old before at least one Congressman had foreseen that to supply vast quantities of food, clothing, and commercial raw materials, to say nothing of munitions, to one side while the other was debarred from our markets was directly to aid the favored party and so to "invite our own entanglement." It was not a fortnight old before J. P. Morgan and Company had raised the question of floating belligerent loans in the United States, leading Mr. Bryan to the prophetic conclusion that "money is the worst of all contrabands because it commands everything else," and that such loans would "make it all the more difficult for us to maintain neutrality." Even Mr. Lansing agreed at that time that the government should "discourage the money of this country from taking part in foreign wars," just as it discouraged its citizens from enlisting in them. Thus, in the first breaking of the great storm the importance of economic influences upon our own neutrality was quite apparent to those who paused to think about it. And almost from the beginning, great sections of American industry and finance, led by the Morgan firm with all its commanding influence, devoted themselves to establishing the economic complex which tended constantly thereafter to thrust the nation more and more deeply into an economic alliance with the Entente and consequently nearer and nearer to war against Germany.

It is as unnecessary as it is confusing to embroil the subject with allegations as to motive. Whether the leaders of American finance and industry used their great powers as they did because of a vulgar greed for profit, because they thought they were acting in the best interests of the country, or because, as Mr. Lamont once said, they "didn't know how to be neutral," is beside the point.

In what actually happened, as a matter of fact, the motives were clearly mixed beyond any possibility of scientific disentanglement. The outbreak of war in 1914, it must always be remembered, came as a tremendous economic shock to the United States. It thus presented an initial problem—no less urgent for the patriot than for the profit-maker—of salvaging a disaster rather than of exploiting a gold mine. Broadly, there were three possible ways of meeting the economic crisis presented by the sudden dislocation of our great foreign markets. We could let them go and learn to live by ourselves—a course which under the ideas of the time would certainly have seemed too fantastically difficult for consideration had anyone seriously proposed it. We could attempt more or less to restore the pre-war position by insisting upon neutral rights which seemed to guarantee our freedom to carry on our normal peace-time trade with the civil populations of all belligerents. Or we could find substitutes for the lost German and Austro-Hungarian markets by supplying the war needs of the Allies. We were urged into the third course alike by sympathy with the Entente, by the fact that it was practically much the easiest, and by the fact that it was by far the most profitable. The third course was adopted. The motives may have been mixed; the results soon began to appear.

By the end of 1914, with the wheat market sustained on the war demand, with business men already flocking into the rich pastures of Allied war contracts, with the Morgans setting up their purchasing agency to organize American industry in the service of the Allied war effort, the foundations of the economic alliance with the Entente had been firmly laid. The process thus initiated tended rapidly to accelerate of its own motion. The pressure of American business interests, seeking the valuable trade which the Entente had to bestow, provided the Entente statesmen with one of their more effective means for undermining the State Department's continued efforts to reopen the trade with the Central Powers. Presently the Morgan purchasing bureau was calling into existence the great munitions industry which we had lacked at the outbreak of the war, thus establishing a new and very direct interest in the Allied war effort. The effects have been shown in the Nye committee's hearings on the ramifications of the rifle contracts, which reached a point at which an attempt to cancel them in 1916 left the Morgans frantically cabling that it was "unthinkable," that "important and influential interests, financially and commercially, are concerned in all these companies," and that banks were "committed . . . far beyond their expectations and even in some cases beyond their legal limits."

The question of payment early arose. In October, 1914, the National City Bank urged upon Mr. Lansing the economic importance of the war-supply business as a reason for permitting the Allies to use bank credits. Dutifully Mr. Lansing perceived that our money must take part in the war after all; transcribing the bank's words as his own, he obtained Mr. Wilson's assent to this first breach in the barrier against loans. The war business was thus encouraged to expand. By the middle of 1915 it was reaching the point where the Allies could no longer carry it on a cash and short-term credit basis; but by that time it was too important to our own prosperity to be simply lopped off, as the non-lending policy would have demanded.

As soon as this embarrassing situation began to appear, the British Ambassador, Sir Cecil Spring Rice, reported that "many secret forces began to act" in favor of a long-term Entente loan. The Nye committee has now revealed these forces earnestly in action. It has shown the Morgans, the commercial banks, the violently pro-Ally McAdoo and equally pro-Ally Lansing, all applying the pressure for long-term loans in order "to maintain our prosperity" and avoid a stoppage of war orders "that would be disastrous"; it has shown the British government apparently adding a little additional "leverage" by unpegging the pound; it has shown Warburg's protests that loans would "violate the spirit of neutrality" swept contemptuously aside, and Wilson tersely acquiescing in the reversal of the position taken a year before. The flotation of the $500,000,000 Anglo-French loan which followed opened the way for this country not only to sell to the Allies but to finance them as well.

Another year passed; the American war-supply business and the consequent dependence of our prosperity upon the Allies continued to grow. Only in the autumn of 1916 did the Allies come as really heavy borrowers into the American money market; from this time on their loans were in general fully secured by the deposit of American and neutral securities, and no doubt the bulk of the Allied borrowing prior to our entry into the war could have been liquidated without great loss in the event of a German victory. The loans themselves thus established more an emotional than an immediate economic interest in Allied victory. But by the spring of 1917 it began to appear that the Allies were running out of collateral. What confronted our bankers and business men, wage-earners and farmers, alike was not the loss of relatively small-scale investments in Allied bonds; it was the loss of the whole rushing trade upon which the national economy was largely being sustained. Our excess of commodity exports in 1916 passed three billion dollars—as against a pre-war average of about half a billion—and was mounting through the first three months of 1917 at a rate which would have produced an export balance of about $3,700,000,000 for the year. This excess of exports—the trade, that is to say, which had to be sustained by cash or by credit—was on the order of one-tenth the total income of the American people. Its abrupt excision from the national economy clearly would have spelled something very like a first-rate disaster.

Probably only J. P. Morgan and Company appreciated the imminence of the peril, alike to themselves and to the rest of the country. But here was a tremendous potential economic pressure toward American entry into the war, for when the Allied collateral came to an end the United States government would be the only remaining source of credit on the necessary scale, and a government cannot loan money to a belligerent without itself ceasing to be neutral. No doubt it is true that Walter Hines Page's celebrated cable of March, 1917, stressing this situation as an argument for an American declaration of war, was in itself of little significance. The submarine crisis had already reached its last stages by that time, and Mr. Page had long since forfeited the President's confidence. But Mr. Page was certainly not the only one to whom the thought had occurred. McKenna, the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, had realized months before that an American entry into the war would solve his pressing financial difficulties; the Morgans, throughout so anxious to do all in their power to aid the Allied cause, must have recognized the fact; and it will be interesting to learn whether the Nye committee has uncovered any additional instances of this argument entering into the submarine crisis.

Even more interesting, though of course unanswerable, is the question whether the imminent collapse of the war market in the summer of 1917 might not have drawn us into the struggle even without the specific issue of the submarine. It is admittedly difficult to imagine Mr. Wilson asking Congress to declare war on a purely economic calculation; but there was never any lack of loftier grounds for action, and with many other factors urging us on, it does not seem impossible that economic interest might have tipped the scales against neutrality in any event.

Yet these are purely hypothetical realms; events were actually shaped in a different pattern, and it was the primarily political issue of the submarine rather than a failure of war orders which in fact precipitated us into the struggle. This would doubtless raise no difficulty for the thoroughgoing economic determinist. He would point simply to the obvious economic reason for the intransigence of our stand on the submarine and assume that it was the controlling one. Largely because of economic influences we had permitted the Allies to destroy our trade with the Central Powers and had been led step by step into a feverish prosperity resting upon our trade with the Entente. To authorize the U-boat to destroy this latter trade in turn would be to invite a complete and irreparable disaster. So apparent is this that it is difficult to believe that the thought was not behind the vigor of the periods in which the President denounced the immorality of the U-boat. Spring Rice, the professional diplomat, took it as a matter of course. There was an "important difference," he noted on the morrow of the declaration of unrestricted submarine war, between the crisis which it produced and that created two years before by the sinking of the Lusitania. The effect of the unrestricted war "has been to cause a very severe loss in values, especially in cotton and wheat. This is a very serious matter. If the Germans are able to make good their menace to any extent, a practical blockade of American ports is carried out, as three-fifths of the trade is with the Allies." Yet in the actual development of the Wilson submarine policy it is extraordinary how scant are the tangible evidences of the influence of such mundane calculations.

The material may be illusory, for statesmen and their memorialists alike show a notable reluctance about committing their more severely materialistic cogitations to history. It is apparent, however, from the way in which the submarine issue actually arose that it was not originally an economic controversy. The President rashly committed himself to hold the Germans to "strict accountability"—thus giving a hostage to fate which he could not afterward recover—in the winter of 1915, when few in this country supposed that the submarine could ever seriously interfere with British trade, much less that it might prove to be almost the decisive weapon of the war. His attitude was hardened in the Lusitania crisis by the influence primarily of emotional and political factors; and, as the quotation from Spring Rice suggests, the true economic importance of the submarine to ourselves was not apparent until after the President had taken a stand in regard to it from which retreat must in any case have been difficult.

But if the direct effect of economic interest on the submarine controversy is obscure, the indirect effects are reasonably apparent. It is not only that when millions, both great and small, found their profits or their prosperity bound up with the Allied side, the fact must have lent added passion to the arguments they discovered for urging the government onward upon a course that could only benefit the Entente and hamstring the Germans. When Senator Lodge took the flamingly moral stand that "the body of an innocent child floating upon the water is to me a more poignant and a more tragic spectacle than an unsold bale of cotton," we may guess, even if we cannot know, that the interest of the Senator's constituents in the exports protected by the presence of the innocent children may have had something to do with it. We do know the countless other instances in which those who were concerned with the Entente war business brought every sort of pressure to bear to strengthen our intransigence toward the Germans. Mr. Warburg, indeed, interpreted the 1916 election returns as showing a majority still convinced that the war was "none of our affair" with only the "war-business and prosperity-first" Northeast hurrying the nation into it.

We know, for example, that Mr. H. P. Davison and Mr. Paul Cravath were at one time "anxious to form a committee which should educate American opinion regarding the democratic principles for which Great Britain and France were fighting"; we also know that Mr. Dwight Morrow properly—and no less astutely—vetoed this proposal for a secret propaganda against our neutrality. But we find Mr. Morrow himself writing "with great subtlety"—as Mr. Harold Nicolson justly puts it—to Mr. Lansing, urging the Secretary of State to influence the President to exert a greater "leadership" as against Mr. Bryan; and this at the moment when Bryan had resigned because of the President's too reckless leadership in the Lusitania crisis. It can never have occurred to Mr. Morrow that there was anything improper in thus secretly utilizing the great influence of his firm to push the country onward in a bellicose policy that accorded with his own economic interest. But, again, the purity of the motive does not affect the results of the influence, and such details suggest with what caution one must accept Mr. Lamont's recent statement that "nothing could be farther from the truth" than the impression that "this firm or any of its partners carried on propaganda in favor of our going to war . . . or attempted to influence Washington in favor of war." In the rather narrow sense in which Mr. Lamont evidently uses these words, they are of only secondary relevance to the question.

Economic influences must have played their part in building up the submarine controversy to the explosive tension which sufficed to precipitate us, not merely into military action in defense of our nationals against U-boats, but into a great national crusade for the total defeat of Germany, leading us to pour out billions of money for the rescue of the Entente, to raise 5,000,000 men and ship 2,000,000 of them to the Entente battlefields, to sacrifice a hundred times as many lives as were taken by the submarine, and to prepare for the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands more. But though this positive effect can, in the nature of things, be only vaguely estimated, economic considerations also had a negative effect on the handling of the submarine controversy, and here the evidence is more precise. At the time of the Lusitania crisis, and even before, Mr. Bryan very correctly analyzed the course to which the President was committing himself. Since Mr. Wilson possessed no threat adequate to strike the submarine weapon from the hands of a desperate Germany without actually going to war, war was the logically inevitable consequence of the Wilson policy. Unless we were in effect to withdraw the policy—by warning Americans off ships going into the war zones and reserving the legal question for post-war settlement—there were but two general methods open to practical statesmanship for escaping this consequence. One was to make it worth Germany's while to abandon the U-boat by insisting upon American sea rights that were quite as valuable to Germany as to the United States. The other was to terminate the war by forcing both sides to peace negotiations.

In fact, the President was to experiment for a time with the first device and ultimately to make a determined effort with the second. Again, one must cite other than purely economic factors to explain the total failure of each; but in both cases the President was seriously handicapped by the economic alliance with the Entente which had been allowed to develop. For both devices necessitated putting severe pressure on the Entente, and this we were unable to do because of our dependence on the Entente war orders. As Professor Seymour has put it: "If Wilson had destroyed the basis of our prosperity in order to compel immediate acceptance of the American interpretation of international law, he would have provoked something like a revolt against his Administration."

The efforts to compromise the sea war continued intermittently from the sinking of the Lusitania until the spring of 1916; but at no time did the United States give any real indication of insisting upon the rights which our formidable-sounding notes asserted against the Allied blockade measures. We know now that Mr. Lansing, who was no less impressed by the necessity of maintaining the war-supply business than by the necessity of defeating Germany, deliberately spun out the controversy with Great Britain and enmeshed it in fine legalisms in order to prevent its ever coming to a head. But unless it came to a head there was no hope of regularizing the submarine question; and the attempt ended in April, 1916, when Colonel House told Count Bernstorff, the German Ambassador, that "it would be easier to bring about peace than to cause England to abandon the blockade. . . . A prohibition of exports as a weapon against the blockade is not possible, as the prevailing prosperity would suffer by it." Professor Seymour suspects that this was much more Bernstorff's argument than House's, but however that may be, the fact is that Wilson's efforts were thereafter to be concentrated on the alternative means of escape from the war danger—that of forcing peace in Europe.

Yet for this it was still necessary to bring pressure upon the Allies as well as upon Germany, and it was essential to regain a more nearly impartial position ourselves. The way was apparently made easier by the President's deepening irritation with the Allies in the summer and fall of 1916, and by the resentment aroused by the "black lists" and other measures tightening the Entente control over American commerce. By the latter part of July the President was telling House that his patience was at an end and that he was considering asking Congress for authority to prohibit further Allied loans and embargo exports. It was the beginning of a wholly new movement which might profoundly have altered our relationship to the struggle and at last have cut us free from the war complex into which we were sinking. But Spring Rice, while recognizing that the British would have to step cautiously in meeting it, was not seriously worried. "The reason," he reported in August, "why there has been no embargo on arms and ammunition is . . . the sense that the prosperity of the country, on which the Administration depends for its existence, would be imperiled by such a measure. . . . At present I don't see any chance of it."

There was none. In September Congress did enact legislation authorizing the President to retaliate upon the Allies. But in August and September J. P. Morgan and Company floated $350,000,000 worth of French and British bonds with more soon to come. The retaliatory legislation said nothing whatever about loans. Our war exports continued to boom. The act said nothing about an embargo on exports; its largest club was an authorization to embargo imports from the Allies. When even this weak threat was submitted to Mr. Redfield, the Secretary of Commerce, for study as to how it might be utilized in a way that "would be effective and, at the same time, least injurious to this country," his experts replied with the conclusion that "immediate reprisals as authorized by recent laws afford no assurance of success and threaten even the present basis of neutral commerce." The reprisals were never applied.

The President was to make a last attempt on his own account to break the economic strait-jacket in which he was caught. At the end of November the Federal Reserve Board issued a warning to the banks against investing in British treasury bills, a method of short-term financing to which the British were about to resort on a large scale. The purpose was apparently to shake the Allied credit and thereby to check the war-supply business in the United States, and, as Spring Rice put it, "to exercise pressure" on the Allies "in order to accelerate peace." The Morgans, at any rate, were seriously alarmed, and the British seem to have tried the exercise of a little counter-pressure by putting out the rumor that they would take their trade to Canada or Australia. The whole passage is another upon which one hopes the Nye committee may shed further light. The British threat was, of course, as unreal as the American, and the warning was not at that time withdrawn. But the British Treasury bestirred itself to find other means for meeting the immediate problem, while the Morgans, addressing themselves to the task of floating another long-term British loan, helped to repair whatever damage was done to British credit in general, thus averting the danger to the country's export trade and nullifying the Presidential pressure to "accelerate peace."

It must be granted that the President's chances of forcing a peace in Europe at the end of 1916 were slim at best; and it would certainly be too much to say that economic pressure was solely responsible for his failure. Economic pressure did, however, forbid his resort to the one instrument which might have given some hope, at least, of success; and in so far as it was responsible for closing the last door through which he might conceivably have escaped from the situation which had been allowed to develop, it must in still another way be regarded as a significant factor in determining the final outcome.

It is along some such lines as these that one must trace the strictly economic influences entering into the complex which converted us from the correct neutrality of 1914 to the passionate hostility against Germany of the summer of 1917. They do not reveal any significant conspiracy of profiteers, intriguing to compel the President and Congress into a declaration of war for the direct and vulgar advantage of their own pocket-books. But so concrete a demonstration as that is rarely achieved even by the most rigid economic determinists; nor is it necessary to the view that economic influences and the great economic powers wielded by our leading bankers and industrialists were important factors in our experience last time, and offer no less important possibilities for the better control of such another situation in the future. One must agree wholly with Mr. Newton Baker that "America's security from future wars cannot be secured by muzzling bankers or disabling munitions makers." Unhappily, there is no method whereby this or any other country can be finally guaranteed against a future war; economic motives are only a part of the problem of reducing the chances of war, and even these motives—although our available techniques for dealing with them are rather better than our techniques for dealing with the emotional or instinctive facets of human nature—are difficult to control. But it does not follow that nothing can be done in that direction.

[Mr. Millis's second article on The Last War and the Next will appear next week.]

Slumbering Fires in Harlem

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

LLOYD HOBBS, sixteen, and his brother Russell, both colored, were New York high-school students of excellent standing and character. On the evening of March 19, 1935, these boys came out of a moving picture house and noticed a small crowd standing before a shop near the corner of 128th Street and Seventh Avenue. Eager to see what was happening they joined the crowd, only to behold an amazing spectacle. The windows of the shop had been broken, and colored people inside were passing out to others the contents of the store. Soon afterward a police car drove up to the curb, and one of its two occupants alighted, brandishing a pistol. At once everybody ran. Patrolman John F. McInerny picked out Lloyd Hobbs as his quarry. He swears that he called on Lloyd to halt; other witnesses swear that he did not. Without stopping to fire a shot in the air, this guardian of the peace brought down Lloyd as he was running across 128th Street by a bullet which passed through his body and into his wrist. Lloyd died in the Harlem Hospital a few days later. McInerny has neither been indicted nor tried by the Police Department.

This was in many ways the most tragic and certainly the most unnecessary event of the riots which kept the center of Harlem in turmoil for the entire evening and night of March 19-20. The deaths were few, the injuries and arrests numerous; the damage to plate glass alone ran up to $150,000. It was a passionate but an undirected outbreak. It was not engineered by Communists or anti-Semites, nor was it a racial riot in the sense of white and colored being aligned against each other. The stores that were raided were owned by Jews, white Gentiles, and Negroes. The affair had its origin in a wholly unfounded rumor that a boy caught stealing a pen-knife in Kresge's store on 125th Street had been beaten and murdered by employees in the store basement.

The rumor spread like wildfire. The boy was in fact caught in his theft at 2:30 p.m. and released unharmed. But within an hour crowds began to form and refused to believe statements by store employees and some of the police. By 5:30 it was necessary to close the store. At 6:30 a window of the store was smashed, and the disturbance then grew rapidly. At 7:30 the Young Liberators, a radical colored group bent on protecting the rights of the Negroes, issued a false leaflet that a boy had been maltreated in the Kresge store and was near death, and the Young Communist League also spread the statement in a broadside. Neither organization took the trouble to ascertain the facts. There are still Negroes in Harlem who believe to this day that the boy was killed, despite the fact that he was photographed with a colored police lieutenant on the night of the riot and that he has twice appeared at public hearings and sworn that he was the guilty lad.

Never did a serious public disorder arise with less immediate provocation. Why, then, did this outburst take place? The answer has been fully established by Mayor LaGuardia's Commission on Conditions in Harlem, headed by Dr. C. H. Roberts, a leading colored dentist, appointed to look into the entire situation. The rumor was simply the match to touch off a magazine which had been years preparing. The nerves of a considerable portion of a community of 200,000 people snapped because of five and a half years of depression, with an unemployment average of no less than 70 per cent in certain areas, because of economic and social discrimination and prejudice, because of rank misgovernment greatly accentuated by certain specific grievances. Thus the riot was preceded by a determined movement among the colored residents of Harlem to obtain employment for some of their number in the many stores which owe their very existence to Negro patronage. The Kresge store was one of these; it had only two or three Negroes in its employ when the storm broke.

But this was only one grievance. Other wrongs were persistent: grievous mishandlings by the police in violation of the Bill of Rights, seriously inadequate school accommodations, discrimination in the administration of relief to destitute unemployed, inadequate hospitalization and institutional care, bad housing and worse overcrowding in the tenements, indefensibly high rentals, inadequate playgrounds and recreation centers, the closing of one avenue after another to economic advancement—these were some of the conditions which caused the sudden outburst. The wonder is that the emotions of the Negroes did not get out of hand before, and the danger is that there will be other outbreaks if the depression continues and the situation in other respects remains unchanged.

INADEQUATE SCHOOL ACCOMMODATIONS

Take the question of the schools. The keen interest of colored parents in school conditions in Harlem astonished the Mayor's Commission. Not only the various Parents' Associations but every intelligent person in Harlem knows that that section has been gravely discriminated against by the Board of Education, over which the Mayor of New York has only slight control. Actually there have been only nine schools built in Harlem since 1900, and not one elementary school since 1924, yet this period covers the tremendous influx of Negroes from the South as a result of the World War. Moreover, since many Negro schools have been closed in the South during the depression, parents have recklessly shipped their children to friends or relatives or even speaking acquaintances in the North in the hope that they would be taken in and educated. It has been extremely difficult to fit these children into classes, since most of the Harlem schools are compelled to hold two, and in some cases three, sessions from 8 a.m. until 5 p.m., with a strain upon teachers and pupils and the educational plant which needs no belaboring. There are between forty and fifty pupils to a class in fully half of the elementary schools. The problem would be difficult enough if all these children were well nourished and adequately clad, but they are not. Johnny A., whose case lies before me, is unfortunately not exceptional. His teacher discovered that he was half-fainting from hunger and had not had sufficient food for three days. School lunches are furnished, and teachers make every effort to discover such cases and to aid them, but there are only a few visiting teachers to act as liaison officers between school and family.

If Johnny A. came from a home which was normal and intact and merely hungry, he was lucky. The principal of one school testified that out of 1,600 families 700 were "broken." In fully 90 per cent of these the father was missing, and the mother was trying not only to do all the housework and cooking for her children but to go out to work besides. After school the children are adrift upon the streets or at home alone or in bad company. Often male and female solicitors are in evidence when the girls' schools empty their pupils into the streets in the early afternoon, so much so that several principals testified that they had had to demand a police guard. The police themselves seem to be unable to drive away the evil resorts of every kind that infest numerous neighborhoods.

The commission also found that the school plant was "old, shabby, and far from modern," in many instances neither sanitary nor well kept nor free from serious fire hazards. Four of the schools are without auditoriums; one tries to serve luncheons to 1,000 children when there are seats for only 175. There is no special school for over-age boys and girls, and there is complete lack of coordination between the home, the school, and public-welfare agencies. Worst of all, there is no school or institution to which a delinquent child may be sent. There are such for white Protestants, Catholics, and Jews, but not one for Negroes. There is no nursery school. The teachers are so terrorized by superior authority that many of them would not testify before the commission except with a guaranty of protection and the suppression of their names in the records. The only pleasant aspect of the whole situation is that there was proof of complete and cordial cooperation between white and colored teachers.

DISCRIMINATION IN RELIEF

As for the relief situation, it is not easy to say just how much conscious discrimination exists, but there has certainly been a lot of it. Take the case of Mrs. F. W., who told the principal of a school that her three children were unable to go to school because they were so hungry. This woman was trying to keep herself and her children alive on two cans of milk and two of beef issued every two weeks, the relief bureau being out of other articles listed on her supplementary-relief card. Investigation showed that she had been sent to the Bureau for Mothers' Pensions and to the Home Relief Bureau, but had received nothing because she had got some insurance after the death of her husband, a veteran, for whose funeral expenses the government had made a cash grant. The undertaker had received this money and more besides. What was left had been taken from her by a brother-in-law, but the city authorities insisted that they could not aid her because she had had this money, and they held to this position long after the time during which the $200 or $300 would have sufficed to maintain her and her three children. Similar things have doubtless happened elsewhere in the city, but the colored people are convinced that it happens more often in their case.

An especial hardship for the Negroes has been the requirement that all applicants asking for relief give up all insurance policies above $500. Often these small policies represent the entire life savings of the holder. More than that, these sums are counted on to assure a worthy funeral—funerals bulk very large in Negro life and the thought of a pauper's grave is a dreadful one. At the beginning of the relief work in New York City there was a marked tendency to discriminate against the Negro and to assign every Negro applicant to one of those menial jobs which in the public mind are associated with Negroes, no matter if the applicant had been a white-collar or professional worker all his life. It is also true that at the outset no Negro of standing was given a position of authority in the relief organizations. After the riots three were appointed administrators in precinct offices. Today the work has been much more standardized, and there are no longer charges of discrimination in the matter of food issued, but people in charge of public-work projects are in general unable to find opportunities for high-grade Negro workers. Fortunately the new Works Progress Administrator, Victor Ridder, has set his face rigidly against any racial discrimination.

POLICE VIOLENCE

Harlem is never an easy police problem. That under existing conditions it presents a more difficult one than ever must be plain. If that entitles the police of the city of New York to sympathy, it does not put an end to criticism. The hearings before the Mayor's Commission on the riots and what caused them were as exciting and dramatic as anything ever put upon the stage, and the revelations of intense bitterness and antagonism toward the police were a shock to all who heard. Arthur Garfield Hays, who presided admirably as chairman of the subcommittee on the riots, allowed the fullest latitude to witnesses, to lawyers, to Communists, and even to casual spectators; all the hearings of the commission served a most useful purpose as safety valves. Most surprising of all was the fact that the colored people were as bitter against colored men in uniform as against white officers. The hostility was justified in many cases; the police respect the rights of the individual citizen no more in Harlem than elsewhere. Several police officials, when asked by Mr. Hays to state what their right to arrest was, showed ignorance of the law requiring warrants. They admitted that the police are constantly going into homes and taking out people without due process of law. It appeared also that men are being arrested on the streets at the will of the police without even having given ground for suspicion.

One of the few amusing moments was afforded by the testimony of a reporter for a Communist newspaper who said that he had been arrested and taken to the police station for walking on the street with a colored woman. He was detained for some time, in fact, until he was able to prove that he was a Negro. Such detentions and arrests are frequent and are defended by the police on the ground that they contribute to the breaking up of prostitution in Harlem. But the fact is that there is an enormous amount of prostitution, that hundreds of white men invade this district every night, that investigators for the commission report one tenement house after another as infested with prostitutes and representatives of every form of vice, and that the police make no efficient effort to remedy these conditions. It is of course obvious that even if this procedure of arresting white men for walking with colored women were a remedial police measure, it would still be contrary to law. But annoyances like these are insignificant, aside from the principle involved, in comparison with many cases of brutal violence.

One policeman who appeared before the commission admitted having killed two Negroes within a year. One was a sixteen-year-old boy charged with burglary whom he shot as the boy was running off. The other was a mildly intoxicated man whom the officer was called by another Negro to arrest. The drunken man having lightly hit the policeman on the shoulder, the latter hauled off and hit the man with such violence that he knocked him down and fractured his skull. The man died just as he was carried into a hospital. In neither case, so far as appears, was the act of the officer investigated by a high official, nor was the man placed on trial to defend the propriety of his acts. Even worse was the case of Thomas Aiken, who six days before the riot was standing at the end of one line of relief seekers in the armory of the colored regiment. Another line was behind him with a space between for people to pass through. Some men came in and filled the vacant space; two policemen ordered them away and Aiken also. When he protested, they not only beat him unmercifully but actually gouged out one eye. No allegation was made that Aiken was armed or that he in any way attacked the officers. The incident occurred in broad daylight in a public building and can only be described as an act of sadistic cruelty and complete abuse of official authority. But here again the grand jury refused to indict and the Police Commissioner to punish.

Like many of his predecessors, the present Police Commissioner seems to run the department on the theory that the police are to be upheld at any cost. The commission made the suggestion that a policeman who uses his revolver with fatal results should be put on trial and, if acquitted, commended and the commendation communicated to the entire force. If, on the other hand, the verdict went the other way, he should be punished by the loss of his position and by a trial and conviction in a criminal court. The commission's appeal to the Mayor and the Police Commissioner has as yet been ineffective. The Commissioner has shown no desire to cooperate with the commission or to remedy conditions, with the result that the commission is now considering a mass-meeting at which it might lay the facts and what it is trying to accomplish before the public. To the commission's suggestion that there be formed a joint committee of whites and Negroes to which anyone could go with complaints about police conduct, which committee would promote intelligent cooperation with the Police Department, the Commissioner replied that he could not consent to that as the Police Department does not recognize any color line!

HOSPITALS AND HEALTH

With respect to hospitals and other public institutions, there are countless reasons for public unrest in West Harlem. The only municipal hospital in this area is the Harlem Hospital, for years past a storm center because of shocking overcrowding. With a bed capacity of 325 it is not an unusual occurrence for the hospital to house as many as 450. The average daily attendance for 1934 was 393. Men and women are turned out just as soon as they can be moved. Some are sent to other institutions in the city only to be returned, in one case no less than three times. The regulations of the College of Surgeons as to the amount of air space each patient should have are constantly violated. There are cots in the hallways; even stretchers are used as beds, and so are chairs. In the wards the beds are side by side so that there is practically no privacy. There are constant charges of lack of discipline and of inefficiency, but it is of course impossible for any staff of physicians, surgeons, and nurses to do good work under such conditions.

The central fact remains that Harlem has been served by only one public hospital—325 beds for a population of over 200,000. How great is the need appears from the fact that in four Harlem health areas, in which Negroes constituted between 95 and 100 per cent of the population in 1929-33, the infant-mortality rate ranged from 94 to 120 per thousand of live births as contrasted with 55 for the city as a whole in 1931; and the tuberculosis mortality rate ranged from 251 to 319 per 100,000 population, the rate for the United States being 64.6 in 1930. The tuberculosis figures are for the very area in which the Harlem Hospital is situated. These figures are in striking contrast to the health situation in the East Harlem district, where only 10 per cent of the population is Negro. It remains to be added that there is not a single convalescent home to which Negroes can be sent. What makes the situation worse from the Negro point of view is the constant discrimination against colored members of the medical staff of the Harlem Hospital. It took years to get Negro physicians and nurses assigned to this hospital, and they still have to contend against racial prejudice.

Thus far the Mayor's Commission has published three reports, one on the housing situation, one on the police, and one on the schools, with a fourth on hospitals coming. The first, for which a subcommittee headed by Morris L. Ernst was responsible, resulted, thanks largely to Mr. Ernst's energy and the cooperation of the city officials, in bringing about some improvement in the housing laws as affecting Harlem. The police and school reports lay for weeks unpublished in the office of the overworked Mayor, and other scheduled reports are still lagging. This is disappointing, and so is the fact that no one in the city administration has been assigned to the task of starting a long-range reform program. The Mayor has practically no control over the school board, which persistently overlooks the Harlem schools when called upon to set up a large building program. The Mayor is eager to do what is right and is well aware of the need, but where the millions necessary for the reconstruction of Harlem or for furnishing even the necessary institutional care can be found no one knows.

It is a question whether the Mayor's Commission should not be succeeded by a volunteer body to keep after the city until at least a beginning in the job of ameliorating existing conditions has been made. Only one important result of the commission's work is so far in sight: an elaborate report on the Harlem situation is being drafted by Dr. E. Franklin Frazier, a professor in Howard University, who was given a leave of absence for the purpose of conducting this survey, for which federal aid was obtained. One housing project is under way with the aid of money from Washington and with the full approval of Secretary Ickes, but this has its discouraging side in that it is using for housing the best tract available in Harlem for recreation and playground purposes. And it is only a beginning. Unlimited sums are needed to wipe out the slums and to supply the additional recreation grounds and parks and the institutions which must be built if Harlem is to be brought up to the standard of other portions of the city.

What Remains of the League?

By HAROLD J. LASKI

[Mr. Laski's article was delayed on its way from England. Written and mailed the day after Sir Samuel Hoare's resignation, it arrived just in time for inclusion in this issue of The Nation. Omitting his exposition of the events leading up to the government crisis, by this time generally known, we present herewith Mr. Laski's analysis and conclusions, both of which are still of interest.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

London, December 19

SIR SAMUEL HOARE'S explanation of the crisis which led to his resignation is that when he went to Paris he found a dangerous situation which might easily lead to war. Either there must be conciliation or oil sanctions must be applied. Mussolini would regard the latter as a military sanction and might attack the British fleet. The French, though pledged to assist, were not ready for mobilization; and no other power in the League had taken any precautions for defense. In the circumstances he thought it right to agree to an offer which might avert a European catastrophe. He was, he said, prepared to justify the terms outlined on the basis of a reasonable settlement. Mr. Baldwin, explaining in the House of Commons the position of the government, added that Sir Samuel Hoare had reshaped these terms without the authority of the Cabinet, which subsequently indorsed them because, though they went too far (in what way he did not say), it could not repudiate an absent colleague and so compel his resignation.

All this is wholly unsatisfactory. Mr. Peterson of the Foreign Office had been negotiating with M. Saint Quentin of the Quai d'Orsay for some weeks. The Hoare-Laval proposals were the outcome of these discussions. Their character must, therefore, have been known for some time (a) to Sir Samuel Hoare, (b) to the Prime Minister, and (c) presumably to the Cabinet; and Sir Robert Vansittart, the Permanent Secretary of the Foreign Office, was associated with the last stages of the Paris discussions. It seems to follow that something like these proposals were known to the Cabinet before Sir Samuel Hoare agreed to them. What were Mr. Peterson's instructions? Did the Cabinet think that anything like what has emerged satisfied either the Covenant of the League or the government's election protestations of loyalty to the League? And is Sir Robert Vansittart fit to be the head of the Foreign Office if, whether on procedural or on substantial grounds, he does not prevent his minister from making such a grievous and criminal blunder?

Nor is this all. Mr. Baldwin sacrifices Sir Samuel Hoare to the fury of public opinion. But the Cabinet—including that League enthusiast, Mr. Eden—indorsed proposals they now aver they disliked. Had they not been published by indiscretion, the British public would almost certainly have known nothing about them until Mussolini had accepted them, and Abyssinia, and probably the League, had rejected them. It looks as though, in that event, the British and French governments would have been prepared to call off sanctions against Italy. That, on what appears the most likely interpretation of his position, was the policy M. Laval was aiming at, and in that policy—a clear outrage against the League—the British government would have been particeps criminis.

What, further, are we to assume of a judgment which argues, as Sir Samuel Hoare argued, that a possible threat by Mussolini should be followed by a panic on the part of the British government? What was their authority for dismembering Abyssinia to placate a growingly unsuccessful Mussolini? If it was the fear of war, what better method could they have adopted for encouraging aggressor states all over the world? If it was the fear of war, what steps had they taken to define to themselves the meaning of that collective security to which, from September until the other day, they gave such eager lip-service? Or is the explanation the much more simple one that they do not desire the fall of Mussolini, which would certainly follow on his defeat? From any angle, the mere resignation of Sir Samuel Hoare does not end the issue. The country has only just missed the gravest betrayal of modern times. The men who were prepared to sanction that betrayal are still in office. What credit can we attach to their professions of faith in the next critical months? Mr. Baldwin has still to deal with the issues created by these grim facts.

For, on any showing, the following consequences emerge from the situation this crisis created:

1. There is a grave disparity between the country's conception of collective security and that of the Baldwin government.
2. No one can now trust this government's loyalty to the League.
3. No one can now trust it—the greatest power in the League—to act as an "honest broker" between Italy and Abyssinia.
4. All the prestige won by Sir Samuel Hoare for the League ideal by his September speech has been thrown away. With it goes Great Britain's leadership in the League.
5. What future, if any, have sanctions? Are we now to infer that collective security breaks down once it implies the possibility of war? If so, what value has the League except as a statistical organization?
6. Will not the repercussion of this incident be the encouragement of fascist aggression all over Europe and the Far East?
7. Is not the foreign policy of the Baldwin government now in ruins? When are we to have a considered account of the principles upon which it will act in the future? And what proofs shall we be offered that it is, in fact, loyal to its professions?

Two other things it is, I think, necessary to say. It is impossible to accept Mr. Baldwin's account of the crisis as satisfactory. He says that the Cabinet acted as it did in order not to repudiate an absent colleague. But he does not explain why, when public indignation against that colleague rose high, he then accepted the resignation of the colleague whose action the Cabinet had indorsed. The true inference, if there is any serious meaning in the idea of collective Cabinet responsibility, would have been the resignation, not merely of Sir Samuel Hoare, but of all those who, ex post facto, made his policy their own. You cannot conduct cabinet government in a parliamentary system, as Sir Stafford Cripps said in the debate, on the principle of collective security with individual sacrifices.

Not less fundamental is the wider issue. Is the policy of the League of Nations compatible with an imperialist system? To me, at least, this last incident is only one more proof that the answer to this question is definitely in the negative. Not only does Japanese aggression in the Far East continue unchecked; not only does rearmament proceed upon an unexampled scale; not only is there now reason to suspect the bona fides of both France and Great Britain in relation to the League. Public opinion, as in this instance, may cause the fall of a particular minister; it may even bring down the Laval government in the next weeks. But, effectively, the contradictions between imperialist purposes and the League ideal remain; in a society of capitalist states they appear incapable of resolution. I doubt whether anything can now resuscitate the League save a resounding victory in the Italo-Abyssinian crisis. It is not easy to believe, in the light of the Hoare incident, that the main members of the League are prepared to pay the price that victory may involve.

Loose Construction

By HEYWOOD BROWN

I HEARD a Communist say once that the Russian Revolution was brought about by a group of not more than 20,000 persons. "A rather larger number would probably be required in America," he added. Recent developments would seem to prove his supposition incorrect. At the moment a nucleus of only nine appears to be doing profoundly effective work to make the overthrow of government in this country possible.

THERE is no denying that the examination of the bankers by the Munitions Committee brought out information which should be useful to us in attempts to preserve neutrality. Senator Nye and the men associated with him have done a good job, but on the basis of two sessions it seemed to me that the examination might have been more pointed and more searching.

I am thinking wholly of technique and not of intent. Of the banking group Mr. J. P. Morgan was easily the most expansive. He rather enjoyed having an opportunity to talk. Perhaps he is somewhat suppressed in his own office. Sound strategy should have suggested constant pressure against the back hand of Mr. Morgan. To some extent this was done, but Thomas Lamont was quick to poach upon his associate's territory. At such times as Mr. Morgan fumbled or seemed to be inclined to talk too freely Lamont leaped in with a sort of I-think-Mr.-Morgan-means-to-say attitude. And it would have been distinctly in the province of any examiner to say, "One at a time, boys. Tom, don't you talk while John is speaking." I think the Senate ought to be more scrupulous in protecting the rights of the head of the House of Morgan.

IN New Orleans, where the law schools met in convention, a story went about concerning Professor Thomas Reed Powell, who is famous as the most indiscreet member of the Harvard faculty. One of the students in a course on constitutional law was markedly slow in his utterance. In discussing a Supreme Court case he began, "Professor Powell, do you believe Justice Sutherland thought —?"

"No," said Reed Powell. "Are there any other questions?"

* * *

THE man by the window in the smoking compartment wanted everybody to know that he was a Californian. "I heard one of you gentlemen say something about the American Federation of Labor," he began, "but you people in the South and the East don't know anything about labor troubles. I don't know whether it's generally known or not, but we almost had violence in San Francisco in the general strike. I suppose we've got the finest cops you could find anywhere out in San Francisco. They know their stuff and they know their people. I don't mean, of course, that there isn't a little petty grafting about stolen automobiles and things like that, but our cops are kind and they are considerate.

"They had to shoot two of the strikers after the reds came in. It was the reds that caused it. And would you believe it, they had a funeral parade for those dead strikers. It stretched for blocks and blocks. You might have thought it was Armistice Day or some other patriotic holiday. It was just ignorance of course. Those people parading didn't know how the two men got shot. They didn't even know what it was all about. I remember I asked a taxi driver just before the general-strike call came whether he was going out, and he said he was. When I asked him why, all he could say was that he was on the side of the workers. Just ignorant you see. It's the leaders that fool 'em.

"Well, believe you me, when they began to tell respectable citizens what restaurants and grocery stores and cafes they couldn't use, that was a little too much. When a man's baby is hungry, you can't stop him by telling him that something is illegal. A bunch of five thousand of the finest fellows in San Francisco got together. In confidence, one of them is the president of the club I belong to. Another was the vice-president of the very bank where I have my account. Make no mistake about it, these were solid citizens, patriotic Americans. I suppose everybody knows where they got their forty-fives, and in addition they told the police the precise time they'd arrive at each of the red strongholds. They promised the police that they wouldn't shoot unless any of the yellow agitating dogs put up a fight. We even had national guardsmen in that crowd. Of course they didn't wear their uniforms. That might have given a bad impression. They raced through the city that night and just tore everything loose from its moorings in all the red headquarters—typewriters, presses, tables, chairs—everything they could lay their hands on. And of course the cops always came half an hour late and reported that they couldn't possibly find out who'd been around.

"That's patriotism for you all the way up and down the line. The vice-president of a bank and an Irish cop both standing shoulder to shoulder for the good old United States. With loyalty like that nothing can lick us, but let me tell you that if that crowd of five thousand patriots hadn't come together, there would have been violence in San Francisco."

Correspondence

"Squaring the Circle"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Your comment on "Squaring the Circle" in the issue of December 25, in your "Joseph Wood Krutch Says" column, says that "after some revision" it is now approved by the New Masses.

In this you are following the say-so of the New Masses and the New Theater as well. The alleged "revision" took place only in the minds of the editors of those magazines and amounts to a puerile device on their part to save face for Mike Gold. The implication is that the play has now been duly purged under pressure from the orthodox left and that Mr. Gold's fit of Hearsterics was justified.

As a matter of simple fact, there has been no revision. One of the actors, a midget, has been sensibly replaced by a real child, as I had begged the producers to do from the beginning. The sound effects have been improved and maybe one or two other minor matters in staging have been straightened out. But in not a single essential has there been the revision implied by the New Masses and the New Theater and accepted, in all innocence, by yourself.

The supposed revision is one of the most bald-faced lies ever devised to placate a tender-skinned revolutionary writer.

New York, December 20

EUGENE LYONS

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Herbert Kline, editor of New Theater, was the left-wing critic who most warmly defended "Squaring the Circle" against my own attack on the play. Here is an extract from an editorial in New Theater (December, 1935): "The producers and directors [of the play] met with those [left-wing] critics who saw that certain changes would make the production a clearly sympathetic one, and some of these changes were made."

Since Herbert Kline was one of these critics, I would say it is he and the director and producer, and not I, that Lyons is calling a "bald-faced liar." I was not in on the revision, nor have I seen the play since. But I know that Herbert Kline is not given to lying. Nor would he have a motive in this case, since nobody, including myself, has ever thought I needed to have my face saved. I am still glad that I pointed out the vulgar gags and anti-Soviet slant that had been inserted in Katayev's comedy. If other left-wing critics differed with me, that surely is only a sign that nobody imposes our opinions on us from some mysterious "headquarters" that exists in the imagination of Eugene Lyons. Incidentally, many of us have followed his anti-Soviet articles for the past few years, and think he is not a bald-faced but a most subtle liar.

New York, December 29

MICHAEL GOLD

Black Lists and Bedding

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your issue of December 4 is an article by Ruth Brindze, in which she states that the Chicago Better Business Bureau has a list of manufacturers of bedding whose products are blacklisted. We beg to advise you that we have no black list of firms in any industry. Our reports carry names of firms which have committed infractions of what we believe to be good business practices.

We have received a large number of inquiries from members of the public who apparently have read this article, and we are advising them that we do not have any black list of the nature described in your publication. Further, it probably would be of little advantage to these inquirers to have the names of those manufacturers whose products have been found to contain what we believe to be second-hand material inasmuch as most of these products are retailed in this immediate trading area, whereas the inquiries are from many points throughout the United States.

A. B. JOHNSON, Merchandise Manager,
Chicago, December 15 Chicago Better Business Bureau

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Certainly the list of firms where dirty and mislabeled bedding was found is not an honor role and popularly would be called a black list. These lists have appeared in the reports of the Chicago Better Business Bureau, and since I received them in mimeographed form, which appeared to be that of a press release, I assumed that the same information would also be readily available to the buying public.

The statement that the lists would be of little value to consumers is questionable, first, because the bureau said in its November 14 release, "This obligation [to use only new materials] covers not only products for local consumption but prevails in connection with all such articles produced, regardless of their point of destination," and, second, because Chicago readers of The Nation have been refused lists of the firms which have infringed what the bureau believes to be good business practice.

The bureau appears to be doing a worth-while job, but its work would be more valuable if all its findings were made public.

New York, December 29

RUTH BRINDZE

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL W. WARD will contribute a weekly letter on developments in Washington. He is a regular Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun.

WALTER MILLIS is the author of "The Road to War" and "The Martial Spirit."

HAROLD J. LASKI is professor of political science at the University of London and active in the British Labor Party. He is the author of "Democracy in Crisis" and "The State in Theory and Practice."

HEYWOOD BROWN, columnist and president of the American Newspaper Guild, has recently returned from New Orleans, where he attended the annual convention of American law schools.

TOM BURKE is assistant secretary of the Share-Croppers' Union in Alabama.

GAETANO SALVEMINI, formerly professor of modern history at the University of Florence, was compelled to leave Italy in 1925 because of his opposition to the Fascist dictatorship. He is now at Harvard. He is the author of "The Fascist Dictatorship in Italy" and of other books.

SIDNEY B. FAY, professor of history at Harvard, is the author of "The Origins of the World War."

BENJAMIN ROWLAND, JR., is a member of the Oriental Department of the Fogg Museum at Cambridge, Massachusetts.

MARK VAN DOREN is the author of "A Winter Diary." He is The Nation's film critic.

Labor and Industry

The San Francisco Waterfront

By OLIVER CARLSON

San Francisco, January 11

“WE’VE got to go along with the young fellows, ’cause they’re the ones that run the union now. Lots of us old stiffs would be glad to work for almost anything—to sign up under almost any kind of an agreement. But damn it all, it’s the young pups what runs the I. L. A. around here. Look at ’em—young fellows of twenty-five or thereabouts—with lots o’ fight and mighty well educated. Say, you’d be surprised at the number of college boys who are longshoring nowadays. They tell us to let them run the union and they’ll get us better conditions than we ever had before.”

What the grayheaded old stevedore told me on the San Francisco waterfront a few weeks ago was undoubtedly true. I’ve been down to the docks at Oakland and San Francisco and I’ve covered the waterfront at San Pedro and Terminal Island. The stevedores—and the sailors too—are young men. Not only are they young, but many of them are well educated. They are part of that generation whose potential professional careers as teachers, lawyers, doctors, chemists, or engineers were cut short by the depression. In their desperation to do something, to get a job no matter how lowly, many of these ambitious youngsters turned to the ships and the waterfront.

The shipping companies and the stevedoring concerns were glad to get young, ambitious fellows. College boys had been used successfully in the past to break strikes among the longshoremen and sailors; why couldn’t the same thing be done again? So reasoned the bosses, as they tightened down on their men from 1930 to 1932. The immediate effect of this policy was undoubtedly profitable to the waterfront employers. The ex-football players looked upon their jobs as temporary. They had little in common with the semi-literate workers. In fact, there was plenty of bad blood between the two groups. The youngsters knew little—and cared less—about the unions.

But the depression didn’t end. More and more college and high-school boys applied for jobs. The employers tightened the screws upon those who had work. Wages dropped. Hours lengthened. Speed-up was in the air.

Within the past two years most of these young men have come to the conclusion that unionization is a good thing. The early days of the NRA saw them pouring into the waterfront organizations. The program of the progressive and left-wing groups within the unions sounded much more sensible to them than did the windy orations of the old-time business agents and officials. So they turned to the left, gave the left wing numerical support, financial support, oral support. Harry Bridges is merely the official spokesman for an enthusiastic army of young, literate, and vocal elements out to establish newer and higher standards for the workers on the waterfront than they have ever had before.

California shipping interests are in a frenzy. They cannot understand what has happened. Almost overnight, so it seems, their ships are organized from bridge to forecastle. The Master-Mates’ and Pilots’ Union takes care of the officers. The radio men, so essential to modern shipping, are nearly 100 per cent organized. The crews belong to the International Seamen’s Union. At the piers are to be found the men in the International Longshoremen’s Association, as well as those who carry their cards in the Teamsters’ Union. And these unions are developing an unusual degree of cooperation. Ships are tied up at a moment’s notice by the unions when they find the owners are trying to break the rules laid down or the contracts entered into. The longshoremen refuse to load or unload ships whose cargo has once been handled by non-union labor or strike-breakers, or whose crew is non-union.

No stone is being left unturned by the anti-labor forces on the Pacific Coast to break the maritime unions. They have already established a huge war chest. During the fall and summer of 1935 they tried to precipitate a strike which they knew would wreck the unions. The good old ladies of San Francisco are being worked into a frenzy of hatred for the “reds on the waterfront who want to destroy our fair city.” Harry Bridges is pictured as a sinister figure, incredibly vile.

Speeches made in Moscow last summer at the sessions of the Communist International by Sam Darcy and Earl Browder telling of the amount of Communist influence in the maritime unions and of the great labor struggles soon to develop were given front-page spreads by the California press and emphasized by long and violent editorials calling upon all good citizens to join in stamping out this Communist menace. Such tactics on the part of representatives of the Communist Party have played into the hands of the reactionaries, and have added to the many problems which the militant leadership of the Maritime Federation must face.

William J. Lewis, district president of the I. L. A., and A. H. Peterson, district organizer, are devoting all their time to fighting Bridges and his lieutenants. There is no question in my mind that they have been working hand in hand with the Waterfront Employers’ Association. Between them they are prepared to rule or ruin the I. L. A. At this point it may be of interest to report that the Waterfront Employers’ Association boasts that it has four men in the San Francisco headquarters of the I. L. A. and another four in the sailors’ union. Whether this be so or not, it is a fact that copies of all wires sent to either of these local organizations are delivered to the Waterfront Employers’ Association. Time and again the association has announced to the press the contents of confidential union telegrams.

The “news” that the San Francisco papers publish about the waterfront situation is so colored that the Associated Press has had to establish its own service; and it checks carefully every story it gets from the Chronicle, the Examiner, the Call-Bulletin, or the News. Waterfront “news,” I am told, is at least 50 per cent fake. It is part of the build-up made use of by a hostile press to turn the rest of the population against the waterfront employees.

Meanwhile, a new "labor" paper has appeared on the streets of the Bay cities. It is called the California Federationist and is the personal property of one or more of the conservative labor leaders. The Federationist is as bitter as the daily press in its attacks upon the radicals in the waterfront unions. Rumor has it that the money for this paper was put up by none other than William Randolph Hearst. At any rate, Allen T. Baum—who is not a member of the San Francisco chapter of the Newspaper Guild—is editing the sheet. Baum is the former labor editor of Hearst's San Francisco Examiner.

Some time ago a streamer headline across a page of the San Francisco Bulletin announced, "Vigilante Dead Line Nears!" A two-column boxed editorial on the front page let it be known that vigilante efforts would be resorted to unless peace could be established on the waterfront. "Peace," of course, meant a complete knuckling under by the unions.

An Open Letter to Rex Tugwell

[The Rural Resettlement Division of the Resettlement Administration, of which Rexford Tugwell is administrator, is engaged in rehabilitating some 290,000 farm families taken from the relief rolls in the spring and summer of 1934. The program is designed to help these families become self-sustaining. The Resettlement Administration makes small loans directly to the "rehabilitant," who purchases his goods, however, according to a budget made for him by the local representative. The following letter, which we urge upon the attention of Mr. Tugwell, relates the experience of one of these families in Alabama. Mr. Burke is assistant secretary of the Share-Croppers' Union.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Birmingham, Alabama

DEAR Mr. Tugwell: I have just visited Mrs. Pierce White, who lives on a rehabilitation farm near Lafayette in Chambers County. Mrs. White and her four little girls had a very unhappy Christmas this year, not because they were starving on the farm—they were hardened to that—but because Mr. White had been sent to jail. I promised Mrs. White that the Share-Croppers' Union would do everything it could for her husband and family, and that is why I am writing this letter.

The local representative of the Resettlement Administration in Chambers County is Vernon Jennings, a small landowner. He is known as the field foreman. You have perhaps read about him in your special investigator's report on Chambers County.

You remember that the Rehabilitation Administration stopped advancing money for food last August and many of the people got in a pretty bad fix. Mr. White took a couple of hundred pounds of his seed cotton and sold it in order to buy food for his family. Mr. Jennings found out about it and had Mr. White arrested. When Mr. White's brother, Walton, tried to get signers for a bail bond for Pierce, he found that Mr. Jennings was going around telling everyone not to sign the bond. Of course, only the landlords are eligible to sign a bail bond and they are friends of Mr. Jennings. To cut it short, Mr. White was held in jail until his trial and then was convicted and sent to jail for six months. Pierce White's brother Walton was arrested, too, because he had hauled the cotton. However, he appealed his case and he will be free until the spring-term court.

Pierce White has been in jail for two and a half months now, just for selling about 200 pounds of his own seed cotton. But this isn't all. After Pierce went to jail Mr. Jennings came out and took the steer (the work animal), the fertilizer distributor, the plow stock and tools, the scooter, the scrapes, and the mow boards and gear. Then Mr. Jennings took the three bales of cotton they had made and their AAA rental and parity checks; the Whites didn't get a penny out of this. A little later Mr. Jennings came and asked Mrs. White if she would need the syrup, corn, and sweet potatoes. She said she would because she had nothing else for the winter except a cow that only gave half a gallon of milk a day.

To tell you the truth, Mr. Tugwell, Mrs. White doesn't understand just how she stands because she has not received any accounting of what they were given by the government, what they owed the government, or how the government was to get it back. Mr. White must have figured that the cotton was his; so he sold a little (I haven't talked to him about it). Also the Whites believe that they had paid for the things that Mr. Jennings took away from them. You see, the cotton Mr. Jennings collected must have brought at least $150; this with the rental and parity checks would surely have paid almost all of their debt to the government. Now, Mr. Jennings has not given them any account of what they owe or any receipts for what they paid. He may have given an accounting to the Resettlement administration, but as far as the Whites are concerned, the book-keeping system is just like the landlord's system. Mr. Jennings just takes everything and says it is for "indebtedness."

Mrs. White only got six gallons of syrup, about ten bushels of sweet potatoes, and about fifty bushels of corn, and that is all she has for the winter, along with a little milk. It is a pretty terrible diet for her little girls—the oldest is five and the youngest is four months old.

When I last saw Mrs. White she was very worried about something else, too. Mr. Paul Martin, the federal land agent, had ordered her to move. Mr. White signed the rehabilitation contract for three years, and it seems as if Mr. Jennings should be looking out for a place for the family, but he isn't.

I remember Mr. R. K. Greene, the Alabama Rehabilitation Director, saying that they could not let these rehabilitated farmers get a better living than the share-croppers because all the croppers would want to be rehabilitation farmers. Well, Mr. Greene did a 100 per cent job, and there is not a rehabilitation farmer in these parts who is getting along as well as the share-croppers.

And much as Mrs. White needs help, all the other rehabilitation farmers are in almost as bad a fix. Mr. Jennings has collected almost everything they raised and intercepted the rental and parity checks and cut off the food advances; so you can see that they are in a terrible fix. Many of the rehabilitation farmers are being told to move, and Mr. Jennings isn't paying any attention to it and is letting the landlords run them off the land.

Mrs. White lives on Route 1 out of Lafayette, in case you want to get in touch with her.

TOM BURKE

Books and Drama

Sweet Swan of Hollywood

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

ACCORDING to the New Yorker, which quotes a San Francisco paper, one Charles Kenyon has been asking himself whether or not Shakespeare could break into the movies if he were alive and unknown today. It seems that Mr. Kenyon made the scenario for "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (recently presented with considerable éclat to the Dramatic Museum of Columbia University by Max Reinhardt), and it seems, further, that he can answer his own question without equivocation. "Kenyon believes that the Bard's uncanny insight into human nature, his genius for putting words together, and, most of all, his infinite and daring imagination would win him immediate entrance into filmdom."

Whether this is intended as a tribute to Hollywood or, as seems more probable, a graceful compliment to Shakespeare is not quite clear. In either event, however, it seems almost too complete for further comment. The mind is immediately filled with the pleasing picture of the "Bard" clearing at one bound the chasm between deer-stealing and a contract in this best of all possible Californias. Mr. Goldwyn hands him a golden pen. The camera rolls forward on a "dolly" until it reveals in close-up Mr. Shakespeare's hand signing his name in one of the seventeen recorded spellings. Thanks to the invention of the optical printer, the nine Muses are seen superimposed in wraith-like form, casting significant glances at one another. Fade.

Unfortunately, however, Shakespeare is not alive and unknown today. Hollywood, being deprived of the opportunity to recognize him first, is fain to content itself with tributes like those of Mr. Kenyon and with the production of cinematographic versions of works which the author would himself have composed somewhat differently if he had had the camera in mind. According to an interesting article published in the Yale Review by Richard Watts, sapient commentator on the movies for the Herald Tribune, the magnates are only waiting to see how "A Midsummer Night's Dream" turns out before deciding to raid the collected works, and accordingly the fate of Shakespeare is even now hanging in the balance—of the box-office books.

Like most of the more restrained commentators, Mr. Watts is far from believing "A Midsummer Night's Dream" wholly successful from the artistic standpoint. Several of the more important actors were easier on the eye than on the ear and seemed little at home with a certain aspect of the Shakespearean drama which has hitherto been considered of considerable importance, namely, its words. Mr. Watts believes, however, that there is nothing inevitable or incorrigible about the deficiencies in this most elaborate of all attempts to adapt Shakespeare to the screen, and professes to believe that the plays are, as a matter of fact, peculiarly adapted to the movies.

The shifting backgrounds and the numerous scenes in the Shakespearean dramas, as well as the very nature of the tales, make them admirable cinema material. Always the screen, at its best, has had a curiously Elizabethan, if not Shakespearean, quality about it. . . . At the same time, there is no denying that numerous objections have been and will be raised against the filming of Shakespeare. . . . For example, a number of people have objected to the current version of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," not because of any lack of imagination in the camera work and production—a quite possible cause for complaint—but because the camera did its work too well. The theory was that since the words of Shakespeare created a vision of fairyland that approached perfection, any endeavor to recreate that moonstruck world by mechanical artifice was an intrusion and a sacrilege. Since Shakespeare wrote . . . for the stage, and the stage, even in its simplest forms, cannot escape its visual elements, it seems to me that any such objection should go the whole way and resent the presence of actors as well as of camera work.

Mr. Watts's arguments are interesting, and on paper they look well, but there lies in the second of his points a difficulty which, so it seems to me, he has tended to overlook. Is Shakespeare really better when produced with all possible elaboration and supplemented by the physical recreation of the scenes which he suggests? Undoubtedly the plays do suggest elaborate pictures. Moreover, the evidence seems to indicate that Shakespeare himself tended to use to the full all the resources of the Elizabethan stage for the production of spectacular effects. If that stage had been mechanically more resourceful, he would probably have depended upon spectacle much more than he did, and in view of that fact it might seem that Hollywood could advantageously confer upon him the benefits of its technical resources—just as stage producers of the Irving-Tree tradition conferred (unfortunately with disastrous results) the supposed benefits of the Victorian picture stage. The fact remains, however, that Shakespeare did not have a theater capable of elaborate spectacle, and that its limitations had results which one may well hesitate to regret. They threw him back upon the necessity of creating the illusion with words; he was compelled to suggest or to describe what he could not present; and the consensus of opinion is that he managed to make out very well indeed.

Of course one may attempt to realize by visual means also what he realized through imagination, but to suppose that the addition of this secondary appeal to the eye obviously increases the richness of the whole is to misconceive the whole nature of artistic effectiveness. Art works within limitations and reveals itself, in part at least, through its success in achieving its results in their despite. To make much out of little, to make the part seem more vivid and more real than the whole, to suggest more vividly than it can present, is an important part of its secret. And the lack of limitations, the ability to do everything and show everything, is one of the reasons why the movies have never found it necessary to develop a real artistic method. There is no need to be subtle when you can actually present.

Consider a familiar passage from Shakespeare, the speech of Banquo before the gate of Macbeth's castle:

This guest of summer

The temple-haunting martlet, does approve
By his lov'd masonry that the heaven's breath
Smells wooingly here; no jetty, friez,
Buttress, nor coign of vantage, but this bird
Hath made his pendent bed and procreant cradle.

Obviously the speech would never have been written if Shakespeare had actually envisaged performance before a completely realized castle with "temple-haunting" martlets flitting about like the gigantic moth which Harpo Marx raises from the whiskers of the sleeping aviator. As a matter of fact, it is one of those directly descriptive passages which are not wholly effective from the dramatic standpoint because they are so obviously put there to supply a deficiency which the spectator is reminded of. But that is not the point. The point is that if we are to have that speech we do not want representation also. If the pendent beds and procreant cradles were actually there, the effect of the speech would not be greater but less, because we should be divided in our attention and trying to appreciate the same picture twice. Art does not love duplication of effort. It does not do in one way what it has already done in another, for, if it does, the result is to deprive it of that suggestion of power which comes from achieving an effect with the utmost economy of means. To say this is not to put oneself in the position of being logically compelled to "go the whole way and resent the presence of actors, as well as of camera work." Shakespeare wrote in a manner which presupposed the effects contributed by the actors, but he did not write as he would have done had he also presupposed the aid of "camera work." In the planned economy of his dramatic microcosms actors had a place because actors would be at work during that ultimate realization upon the stage which was always in his mind. If they had not had such a place, he would have been—as he certainly was not—a mere closet dramatist. But at the same time he was equally careful to supply in the text the deficiencies which existed in available methods of staging. If you are going to build Macbeth's castle complete (with practical martlets), you had better leave Banquo's speech out.

That brings us to the real point, which is that a genuinely successful translation of Shakespeare to the screen implies far more drastic transmogrification than "A Midsummer Night's Dream" attempts. Unfortunately, of course, it is not all so simple as the omission of a descriptive passage which one has decided to realize pictorially. It would involve also, at every point in the play, an attempt to determine which of the effects realizable in picture or action make necessary the modification of text or order of events. Nothing is gained by simply adding spectacle or supplementary scenes to Shakespeare's text. The problem is to create in terms of the cinema something equivalent to that which he created in terms of the Elizabethan theater. Whether or not that would be worth doing at all is a separate question. Perhaps it would be only to discover that even the cinema is less flexible and less magical than the English language. But to do it as well as it might be done would require a more ruthless irreverence toward a sacred text than Hollywood, torn between its arrogance and its sense of inferiority, can summon at the present moment. Granted the boldness to commit the necessary sacrilege, there would still, of course, be required the necessary skill. But perhaps the courage to profane, not timidly but recklessly, will have to come first.

Salvemini on Seldes

Sawdust Caesar. By George Seldes. Harper and Brothers. $3.

NO other man in power has ever succeeded to the same extent as Mussolini in controlling not only the press of his own country but numerous foreign papers as well. The correspondents of the foreign papers living in Rome are not channels of independent information but merely zealous mouthpieces of Fascist propaganda. There are few newspapers outside Italy which do not have on their editorial staff an "expert" on Italian affairs who concocts Italian news items according to Fascist interpretation, puts them on the front page when they do honor to Mussolini, suppresses them or buries them where nobody will find them when they might make a bad impression, adorns them with appropriate headlines which may even say just the opposite of the news item itself, annuls the effect of one piece of information with another, in short, puts at the service of Fascism all those manipulations of news, words, and phrases with which newspapers slowly educate their public to repeat certain slogans as truths above discussion.

In 1928 the Italian government established in Italy a "Committee for Propaganda Abroad." "This committee," announced the editors of Industrial and Labor Information, of the International Labor Office (July 23, 1928, p. 23), "will furnish persons abroad with learned and popular publications on the development of the movement." In March, 1929, there was begun the publication of a bulletin in French, English, German, and Spanish bearing the title, in French, Feuilles d'Information Corporatives, for the use of foreign students. In 1933, 100,000 copies of this publication were circulated all over the world. The learning of many "experts" who write about Italy without knowing anything about it is derived from that bulletin. All the experts have to do is to garnish the "dope" handed out by the bulletin with their own fancies.

If foreign writers want to come to Italy to "get the atmosphere," and have no money or do not like to spend their money, the Italian government pays their expenses. When the books which result from such visits are deemed suitable, the government has them translated into many languages and buys thousands of copies for distribution among "experts." In this way, the "unbiased" author is assured large royalties.

Thus an army of writers, both male and female, of every conceivable caliber, floods the world with books, articles, lectures, interviews, open letters, and what not, on the subject of Fascism. Everywhere the public mind is the victim of misinformation. The enthusiasm of the gullible foreigner is substituted for the opinion of the muzzled Italian subject. The Fascist experiment is falsified. The material and moral sufferings of the Italian people do not serve to enlighten other peoples.

The danger of this mystification is far greater for other countries than is generally believed. Very few suspect that by swallowing and spreading false information about Italian Fascism they are helping to discredit free institutions in their own countries. When you have convinced your fellows that Mussolini has made Italy happy—Italy which was so unhappy under the pre-Fascist regime—what will prevent them from thinking that the same medicine which has accomplished miracles in Italy deserves to be tried in your country too?

This book of George Seldes's will be an efficacious antidote for the poison of this propaganda. It is the best comprehensive work on Fascist Italy which thus far has been published in the English language. It is to be hoped that it will be widely read and meditated upon.

In gathering his material and in writing his book Seldes has had before his eyes those newspapermen and experts who for the last ten years have been flooding the English-speaking world with lies. In many instances he gives not only the correct version on the basis of the most reliable evidence, but also the false version which was circulated. The book, therefore, is doubly useful in that it gives at the same time the account of the facts and the account of the lies. The contrast is often revolting.

Having had experience in this kind of work and knowing the enormous difficulties which it presents, I do not wonder at the inaccuracies which I have come on here and there. They are especially numerous when Seldes recounts Mussolini's pre-Fascist life. The official biography of the Duce written by Signora Sarfatti has accumulated veritable mountains of lies. To demolish them it would be necessary to do a more prodigious deed than that which Hercules performed when he swept the Augean stables. I know a young American of Italian extraction, Dr. Megaro, who has applied himself for years to this work with surprising results, and I hope that he will sometime publish the results of his researches. If Seldes had had to do a similar amount of work for all the parts of his subject, a century of life would not have been enough for him.

On one point only I preserve a grudge against Seldes. I wish that he had cited his sources with greater care. Often in reading this well-informed book I have come across precious bits of news which were unknown to me and which have all the marks of authenticity, but their source is not indicated.

GAETANO SALVEMINI

Wilson and Neutrality

American Neutrality, 1914-1917. By Charles Seymour. Yale University Press. $2.

Woodrow Wilson: Life and Letters. Volume V. Neutrality, 1914-1915. By Ray Stannard Baker. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $4.

WHY did the United States abandon neutrality? C. H. Grattan, Walter Millis, and Senator Nye give the impression that it was the selfish influence of Wall Street bankers, munitions makers, Allied propaganda, Sir Edward Grey's cunning, and so forth. Professor Seymour in his new volume reiterates that it was the German submarine campaign. Mr. Baker cannot be called as a final witness, because his volume goes only to the end of 1915, when Wilson was still keeping us out of war.

In the reviewer's opinion, although all these factors had an influence, Professor Seymour is much nearer the truth in his view; he may emphasize too exclusively the submarine, nevertheless it was the main and final cause of our participation. The other group seem to assume that the factors which they emphasize—and which were very influential with Lansing, McAdoo, Page, and public opinion generally—determined the policy of the United States. But Mr. Baker, and still more Professor Seymour, makes it clear that the person who really determined American policy was President Wilson himself; that he was a singularly strong and self-reliant leader; that when his advisers or pro-Ally partisans tried to urge materialistic motives and persuade him to join the Allies, their efforts had exactly the opposite effect. Lansing's "Memoirs" are significant on this point—and he had reason to know. All through his book he stresses Wilson's independence, his tendency "to oppose any action urged by the press or by partisans. . . . The idea of being induced to act under the pressure of public demand was always distasteful to the President and aroused in him a spirit of resistance." One of the chief results of Page's pro-English arguments, according to Lansing, was "to

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN

Literary Fellowships

FOR 1936

Two Literary Fellowships of $1,000 each (exclusive of subsequent royalties) are offered to writers of promise who need financial aid to complete some literary work.

These fellowships will be given to the writers who submit, before April 1st, the most meritorious projects for books (either fiction or non-fiction) that they wish to write. For details and application blanks, address Houghton Mifflin Company, 2 Park St., Boston.

A Book You Should Read

The GLANDS OF LIFE

By HERMAN H. RUBIN, M.D.

How the Ductless Glands regulate our Mental, Physical and Sexual Health, Personality and Behavior. The vital role they play in our daily life and their contribution to successful living.

Vitality, Sexual Virility, Senility, Rejuvenation and many other important subjects are presented in clear, direct, non-technical language.

Packed with authoritative information, yet as readable as a novel.

Price $1.50

Postage 15c extra

B. B. BELLAIRE, PUBLISHER
499 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. Department N

Soviet News STRAIGHT from the Source!

Subscribe to

SOVIET PERIODICALS

In Russian, English, French, German, and other languages.

Sole importers from U. S. S. R. of new books, rare books, dictionaries, grammars, maps, art publications, reproductions, etc.

Catalogs and information furnished on request.

BOOKNIGA CORP.

Dept. N22

255 Fifth Ave.

New York City

make the President more than ever irritated against the British. . . . If he had read aright the character of the President, Mr. Page would have avoided taking such a course because it was the one way of arousing Mr. Wilson's spirit of obstinacy." The fact that President Wilson occasionally changed his mind in accordance with arguments pressed upon him, as when he consented to loans to the Allies in October, 1915, after discountenancing them for fourteen months, does not invalidate the substantial truth of the fact that he was independent of pressure groups, that he determined American policy with the two aims of keeping out of war and of mediating peace, and that it was the German submarine which eventually thwarted these aims. It may well be argued that, in the future, under a weaker President who would be more subject to pressure, materialistic influences might easily involve us. But the facts of 1914-17 should not be misinterpreted in order to support the argument.

Professor Seymour also examines carefully the German side of the evidence. The sale of American munitions to the Allies, of which we have been made so conscious lately by Senator Nye, and which was greatly resented by Germany, was not, however, the main thing aimed at in the submarine campaign; the primary purpose was the destruction of English shipping and cargo space, which was expected to bring England to her knees by cutting off her food, raw materials, and revenue from foreign trade. The Germans were perfectly aware that unrestricted submarine warfare would be the decisive factor which would certainly bring the United States into the war, but the military authorities reckoned that the quick crushing of England was more important.

Turning to Mr. Baker's meticulous account of President Wilson during the first year and a half of the war, one finds less that is new than one had hoped. But one is deeply impressed with the terrible weight of the burdens he had to bear. Grief-stricken by the death of his wife just at the moment the European conflagration began, hampered in carrying forward his cherished program of domestic reconstruction but determined not to let it be disrupted by the European war, he was assailed by ever-increasing difficulties caused by the disregard of American rights by both the Allies and the Germans. After describing to a friend the multifarious duties of a typical day, the President ended saying, "I fall into bed so tired I cannot think." Nevertheless, by daily golf and long restful drives about Washington he kept himself cheerful, fit, and full of high courage.

Bryan is put in a much more favorable light by Mr. Baker than by most earlier writers. Bryan's proposals for bringing the belligerents together to discuss peace terms was "a broad, sound thought—with constructive ideas which Wilson was afterward to profit by." If they had been tried in the summer of 1915, before the United States capitulated to England in regard to the Declaration of London and when it still possessed the power of an embargo on munitions as a diplomatic weapon, "something might possibly have been accomplished." But knowing as we do now the temper of the Germans at this time, we can be certain that they would never have conceded terms which the Allies would have been willing to accept. Even Mr. Baker seems to have realized this, for he says later of Wilson's refusal to adopt the plan so urgently advocated by his Secretary of State, "Probably everything would have failed, but not everything was tried." In championing Bryan, Mr. Baker takes more than a score of sarcastic digs at Colonel House, which are hardly justified.

As to the future, Mr. Baker says "we are still involved [1935] in world economic and financial relationships which make political isolation an unreal concept, and which will prevent the United States from keeping out of any important conflict in the future." He feels this so strongly that he repeats it in substance in three other passages, adding, however, in one, "with Great Britain or any other belligerent in control of the sea," and in another, "unless we are prepared for the self-discipline and the economic losses resulting from embargoes and other restrictions." Professor Seymour, with a wise caveat against placing too much confidence in alleged historical analogies, agrees that it is going to be terribly difficult for us to stay out of another major war, but is doubtful about the wisdom of automatic isolationist measures for mandatory embargoes announced beforehand. The best hope of staying out of war is to take steps in cooperation with other states to prevent war from breaking out. Both books are obviously of the highest importance to anyone who wants to clarify his mind about the present Congressional neutrality proposals and their historical background.

SIDNEY B. FAY

Hokusai

Hokusai. By Gustav Eckstein. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THROUGH an intimate study of the prints and drawings by his hero and through even closer observation of the Japanese themselves, Dr. Eckstein, in his dramatized life of Hokusai, has caught the full nostalgic savor of the era before the Western penetration of Japan. As a result of that Westernization we today are witnesses to the spectacle of Japan dying in the embrace of industrialism. Japan sends out her soul in ill-starred international adventure and cannot call it back. Riding through Tokyo in the stabbing glare of the Neon signs on the Ginza, we are scarcely conscious that there ever was on this spot such a town as Yedo—a name that survives only in the musty index of the British Museum Reading Room. In his "Hokusai," Dr. Eckstein gives us the personality of the great print-maker and, more than that, the personality of Yedo in the time in which he lived. The master of Ukiyo-ye is outlined against the very background from which his drawings took form—during that little space in time when Japan drew apart from change. The characters that move in the play are the same that have their places in Hokusai's prints: the vendors of tofu and soba, the actors and samurai, the wan beauties of the geisha house, even the professional story-teller, who survives today as the explainer of foreign talkies in the cinema palaces of Tokyo.

The author has chosen the episodic form for his presentation. In the fourteen scenes of the play we follow Hokusai from the time he was an ecstatic adolescent at a performance of the forty-seventh Ronin until his death against a background of the cone of Fuji. Dramatically the play does not work up to any climax, nor does its tempo vary notably throughout the scenes from Hokusai's life. Its success depends on the sheer effectiveness of the individual scenes—as laconic and exquisite in arrangement as the master's prints themselves. One remembers particularly the magnificent tongue-in-cheek bravado of Hokusai's virtuoso performance before the Shogun. In this episode the Shogun speaks what might well be an epitaph for the whole Tokugawa dictatorship: "Nothing in a Shogun's reign is more important than what his artists leave behind them." The loveliest scene of all is perhaps that of the old artist staring out into the rain, alone in the green darkness; the lines have all the melancholy, evocative quality of haiku.

Dr. Eckstein's penetration under the surface of Japanese life is always astonishing. Not only is his portrait of Hokusai himself a striking piece of work, but all the little niceties of observation—the subservient and exquisite entrances of the women, the etiquette of greeting, marrying, and dying, and of drinking tea—arouse the enthusiasm of a reviewer who shares the author's feeling for Japan. Through the episodes of the play we follow the unfolding of Hokusai's artistic personality, and it is to Dr. Eckstein's credit that we are never once led to think of Hokusai as a self-conscious subjective artist in the Western sense but rather as a gifted master of his craft. A craftsman just as much as his foster-father, the maker of mirrors, it was Hokusai's trade to record the sights and marvels within bow-shot of the River Sumida, to capture Fuji's moods, and rival Utamaro in portraying the darlings of the Yoshiwara. Perhaps the explanation lies in that, in a life devoted to picturing the "floating world," Hokusai realized that "at bottom reality is nothing and nothing is reality." Hokusai understood this, and so does Dr. Eckstein, another honest craftsman.

BENJAMIN ROWLAND, JR.

A Dedicated Man

Letters to Harriet. By William Vaughn Moody. Edited, with Introduction and Conclusion, by Percy MacKaye. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

AS editor of these letters Mr. MacKaye makes them tell a story which they were not written to tell, and which, in so far as they do tell it, is a less interesting story than Mr. MacKaye believes. It is the story of several persons who during the first decade of the present century set out self-consciously to produce an American poetic drama—to arrive at "Stratford and Weimar by route of Medicine Hat and Kalamazoo." They were in the habit of referring to themselves as "our little group," to their activity as a "crusade," and to their organization as a "phalanx." One of them wrote to Mr. MacKaye in 1905 begging him to "tell me of things dramatic and poetic, and what you are doing, and what I ought to be doing, and what hope—or fear—there is for all of us who are growing pale and thin watching for signs of American drama." And Moody himself wrote to Mr. MacKaye in 1904: "I am heart and soul dedicated to the conviction that modern life can be presented on the stage in the poetic mediums, and adequately presented only in that way." The failure of the story to be interesting now is not at all because we have ceased to consider the possibilities of poetic drama; indeed, such possibilities are the theme of a lively criticism at the moment, both in England and in America. Rather it is because these people worked in a hopelessly literary way—"dedicating" themselves in phrases and attitudes that could never have had anything to do with a living theater, and hating commercialism with the kind of holy air which results in the composition not of better plays but merely of different ones.

At any rate the story gets told in the voluminous introduction, conclusion, and notes to this book; and Mr. MacKaye does contrive to leave on record a good deal of information which literary historians will enjoy concerning the dramatic careers of Moody and himself, Edwin Arlington Robinson, Josephine Preston Peabody, and Ridgely Torrence. Nor is the story entirely irrelevant to one theme which Moody pursues throughout his letters to the woman, Mrs. Harriet Brainard, who became his wife a year before he died in 1910. This is the theme of his dedication to the poetic art. For he thought of himself first and last as a poetic artist, and his letters to his best friend are full of reports on the progress he is making, on the state of his mind and imagination at given moments, and on the processes which he discovers taking place inside his heart and soul. These reports, made by an extremely intelligent, attractive, and honest man, are nevertheless unconvincing. I fancy that if we had only them to go by we should know that Moody had not been a first-rate poet, as in fact he was not. His poems say so no less clearly than these introspective passages wherein he somehow never quite strikes a plausible

THEATRES

"I was greatly impressed by 'PARADISE LOST', so much so that I have been thinking of it ever since. It is crowded with illuminating material. It should cause millions to think and even if it did not do that it should still be recommended as thrilling entertainment."
—Theodore Dreiser

'Paradise Lost'

By Clifford Odets

LONGACRE THEA. W. 48th St. Evs. 8:40. Mats. Wed. Sat. 2:40

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says

At Home Abroad. Winter Garden. Beatrice Lillie, Ethel Waters, and others, in one of the two best musical shows of the year. No plot but good fun.

Boy Meets Girl. Cort Theater. Rough and ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

Dead End. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. Superbly acted by a group of boys. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

First Lady. Music Box. Comedy hit about a feminine feud in Washington society. Jane Cowl and Lily Cahill puncture one another with sharp implements in the forging of which George Kaufman had a hand.

Jubilee. Imperial Theater. Competes with "At Home Abroad" for first place among the musical shows. Remarkable for its décor, which is not only splendid but in unusually good taste.

Jumbo. Hippodrome. Paul Whiteman, Jimmy Durante, and a remarkable clown named A. Robbins surrounded by acrobats and animals. Literally better than a circus.

Let Freedom Ring. Civic Repertory Theater. A second chance for this drama of a strike in a Southern mill. I found it hard going, but it has been highly praised.

Libel. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English court-room play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

Mid-West. Booth Theater. Reviewed this week.

Paradise Lost. Longacre Theater. Clifford Odets' complicated picture of a family composed exclusively of pathological futilitarians. He calls it a picture of the middle class but it strikes me as somewhat less than typical.

Pride and Prejudice. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaption, brilliantly staged and acted. It gave me more pleasure than any other play of the season.

Victoria Regina. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama, stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Winterset. Martin Beck Theater. Maxwell Anderson's surprisingly successful attempt to write a poetic play on a modern theme. Bold, original, and engrossing.

The Nation and Readers Digest

for only $6 Value $8

Subscriptions may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Payment may be made within thirty days—but order at once.

1-22-36

The Nation 20 Vesey Street New York City

Send The Nation and Reader's Digest as indicated below.

☐ I enclose my check for $6.00 OR ☐ I will pay in thirty days.

Name _____

Address _____

balance between self-consciousness and its opposite. He knows both too little and too much about the mind of the poet; too little, or he could say more, and too much, or he would say less. He manages in the same breath to be modest and embarrassing, and to be tragic without realizing it. For it is surely tragic that intelligence, integrity, and a great personal decency should not be enough to make a poet out of a man who wants very badly to be one. God knows what is needed in addition, but whatever it is Moody did not have it.

In his poems, that is. He has it in these letters, which are not only his best work but among the best things of their kind in American literature. The truth comes out clearly enough in a comparison between the following lines of prose, written to Mrs. Brainard from Crete in 1902, and the poem called "The Second Coming," written in New York two years later:

The sailors were lying about asleep in the fierce sun—except one, who had heaved his boat on her side and was calking her. By him stood a man dressed in a long dark robe of coarse stuff, bareheaded, talking earnestly to the stooping sailor. I took him for a Greek priest, by reason of his long hair and spiritual profile. There was something in the spare frame of the man, the slight stoop of the shoulders, and the calm intensity of the attitude, which made my heart stop beating. Presently he turned to look at me, and it was indeed He. This has happened to me twice now—once before at Sorrento seven years ago.

Moody seems not to have understood that this was the poem, and that the 120 lines which he lavished on the incident were doomed to mediocrity for the simple reason that the incident had been closed—both in his mind and in the words which already so perfectly contained it. But no such comparison is needed to establish our point. The genius which is lacking in the poems is abundantly present in the letters, where a high and holy seriousness lies down naturally with the most charming, the most unsubduable wit; where a magnificent rhetoric, suitable for the landscapes of Greece and Arizona, is always correcting itself with warm-hearted humor and an eye to human detail; and where a sustained note of worship—literally worship—for Mrs. Brainard is never marred by failure to remember that she too is capable of comedy—that she is, indeed, "my gay and disquieting and ever incalculable companion, upon whose shifting moods I have learned to build from hour to hour my house of life." As a collection of letters the book is brilliant and beautiful; as a love story it brings home to us one of the most heroic and honorable and amusing of American men.

MARK VAN DOREN

Drama

Necktie Party

A FEW years ago James Hagan wrote the sentimental and elegiac comedy "One Sunday Afternoon." Now he has brought what is obviously the same temperament and attitude to bear upon the somewhat less suitable material of a contemporary tragedy called "Mid-West," which has been set and acted with considerable skill at the Booth Theater. Mr. Hagan's admiration for the simple virtues, his sympathetic understanding of plain, uncomplicated people, and his tinge of cracker-box philosophy serve him well when he deals with the ordinary perplexities of ordinary people, but they seem hardly adequate to deal with some of the grimmer and uglier aspects of the story he has now undertaken to tell. They were sufficient to illuminate with a soft and pleasing light a tale of quiet affections in a placid village; they are not sufficient to enable him to see very deeply into an acute social problem or to comment very significantly upon a series of incidents which reach their climax in a lynching.

The action of the piece takes place before a Grant Wooden house set somewhere in the midst of the drought-stricken farm lands. The house is inhabited by a sturdy farmer and his wife whose patience, piety, and fortitude are of the hearty Mid-western, rather than of the ascetic New England, variety; and the play is at its best when it is representing such people with a slightly softened realism. But their troubles are not confined to the ordinary hardships of the farm plus the withering blight of the drought. A son whom they have sacrificed themselves to educate returns home a very callow Communist, plays into the hands of two wandering agitators, works up a strike among the farm hands, and is finally lynched for his pains by a party of irate neighbors. Though the parents have no sympathy for his convictions and have themselves suffered from his activities, they voluntarily isolate themselves from the community which has stained itself with such a crime, and the curtain falls upon the beginning of a rain—in itself enough to inspire in them that modest hopefulness which is sufficient for people like them to go on.

As long as the author confines himself to the representation of events from the point of view of his characters he is often both moving and convincing. In their quieter moments the people are real, and the play has many of the elements of a successful genre study. But though Mr. Hagan has obviously made some effort to do so, he cannot refrain from a recurrent impulse to editorialize, and when he yields he not only reveals very clearly the painful inadequacy of his philosophy to deal with the ugly situation involved, but at the same time loses his grip on verisimilitude. His group of striking farm hands intrude upon the realistic scene like some creatures out of a Hearst cartoon, and at the same time the farmer is surprisingly transmogrified into a St. George in overalls. Thus Mr. Hagan's infantile rightism has much the same effect as the—well, over-simple—leftism of some of the Fourteenth Street playwrights. Life goes out of the window when the all-too-final and comprehensive moral comes in from the wings. The verisimilitude of drama is sacrificed to the didacticism of the fable, and not all the very skilful acting (especially of Jean Adair as the farm wife and of Curtis Cooksey as the husband) can save it.

As the curtain descended upon the first act of the performance I saw, a fist fight broke out between a gentleman who applauded from the front row and a gentleman who hissed from the row just behind. Several persons to whom I mentioned the incident all replied in almost the same words: "That's fine. We need more of that in the American theater." There is, I am afraid, hardly space to discuss the question here, but I am a bit surprised that the attitude should be taken so much for granted. I assume that art should be moving. I assume even that at its best it is very likely to arouse strong differences of opinion, sometimes over aesthetic and sometimes over moral or social questions. But I am not sure that the kind of effect which, at its best, it strives to produce is the kind which reveals itself in fisticuffs. At the Abbey Theater, I know, there was long a tendency to measure the worth of a play by the number of bloody noses which could be counted in the audience after the curtain had gone down. But I had supposed that at least a considerable number of people assumed that art operated upon a somewhat different plane of emotions, and that the tension it generated was to be released in some more complex way. Aristotle said it was to be purged through pity and terror, and though I have never been sure exactly what that means, it doesn't mean through a "punch on the nose."

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1936

No. 3682

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	113
EDITORIALS:
The Uses of Woodrow Wilson	116
The League Falters	117
Remove the Rat	117
Infancy of an Art	118
ISSUES AND MEN. A MEASURE OF AMERICA'S BETRAYAL.
By Oswald Garrison Villard	119
CARTOON. By Fritz	120
THE RIDDLE OF THE SUPREME COURT. I. THE DIVINE
RIGHT OF JUDGES. By Max Lerner	121
ARMS OVER EUROPE. V. MUSSOLINI OUTBLUFFS ENG-
LAND. By Louis Fischer	123
THE LAST WAR AND THE NEXT. II. WHAT DOES NEU-
TRALITY MEAN? By Walter Millis	125
WASHINGTON WEEKLY. By Paul W. Ward	128
LOOSE CONSTRUCTION. By Heywood Brown	129
CORRESPONDENCE	130
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
How to Break a Labor Union. By Ray L. Kringer	131
Facts for Consumers. By Ruth Brindze	132
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Revisitation. By Siegfried Sassoon	134
A New Poet. By Philip Blair Rice	134
Order Versus Chaos. By Maxwell S. Stewart	134
Gustav Stresemann. By Ludwig Lore	135
The Romantic Personality. By Frederick Dupee	136
Shorter Notices	136
Drama: The Trappings of Romance. By Joseph Wood Krutch	138
Films. René Clair Goes West. By Mark Van Doren	138
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	140

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8;
Three years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN:
$1 a year additional.

THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS
THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S
ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1935, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Gruening, Circulation
Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

ONE OF THE FEW remaining monarchs of a first-rate power, King George V bore with dignity and seemliness the burden of providing the world with the pomp and circumstance of kingship. Whether the plain people in America and all over the world really mourned him is difficult to say. We feel certain that the King's death scarcely warranted the eight pages which the New York Times devoted to it on Tuesday morning, or the eleven pages with which the Herald Tribune outdid its contemporary. To a political observer the striking thing about the King's passing was the smoothness with which the succession of power took place. The expense of the royal establishment is probably warranted by the function which the kingship so beautifully serves—that of stabilizing the political system, much as the American Constitution does. But the British kingship does its job with far less rigid consequences for the whole social structure. During George's reign the British Empire became the British Commonwealth of Nations—a vaster change than any contemplated at present by the adherents of a constitutional amendment in America, and carried through with less intensity of feeling than we are likely to have. The King himself, although unassuming personally, was by no means inactive in affairs of state. There is considerable evidence that he intervened unconstitutionally in the establishment of a Cabinet of national concentration to save the financial structure of England from a possibly radical Labor government. Economically England, despite its derelict areas that are like scars on the face of the country, has survived the depression better than most countries and has better social legislation than America. For England, at least, monarchy seems to be more than an archaic survival. It has visible effects in social cohesion.

BY THE TIME these lines are read the Senate's "baby-bond" bonus bill will presumably have been accepted by the House and forwarded to the President. That it can be passed over Mr. Roosevelt's veto is a foregone conclusion, judging by the tremendous majority which it obtained in both branches of Congress. We are not so much concerned that this may be the entering wedge for a new period of unrestricted government spending as that it may be taken as a pretext for refusing money for socially desirable purposes. Despite all the current talk of governmental extravagance, it is evident that the amount of money that Congress can appropriate is strictly limited. If the bonus bill is enacted, there is certain to be increased pressure for the curtailment of needed expenditures for relief, housing, and social security. An illustration of this pressure may be seen in the unscrupulous exploitation of Secretary Morgenthau's statement that new Treasury financing would total $11,500,000,000 in the next year and a half. Actually more than half of this amount, or $5,800,000,000, is accounted for by routine re-financing to meet maturities of short-term notes, which with $2,000,000,000 for the bonus leaves a deficit of $3,700,000,000 attributable to the Administration's recovery program. The zest with which the Republicans have supported the bonus is sufficient evidence regarding the sincerity of their constant prattle about economy. Their satisfaction has doubtless been enhanced by the knowledge that they were not only getting votes for themselves but effectively sabotaging the Administration's social program.

DEVELOPMENTS on the farmers' front are none too encouraging. Mr. Roosevelt has resurrected the Soil Conservation Act of 1935 and turned it into a substitute for the invalidated AAA. Mr. Hoover has delivered himself of a farm plan of his own to serve as a plank in the Republican platform. The Soil Conservation Act was designed to preserve fertility by the withdrawal from cultivation of land which threatens to become exhausted by over-use. Farmers whose land has thus been withdrawn are to be reimbursed by the government. When pressed by reporters to distinguish between limitation of land use for purposes of soil conservation and limitation for purposes of crop control, Mr. Roosevelt refused to comment. On the other side is Mr. Hoover, who introduced his plan with a denunciation of the AAA in these words: "The farmer has less to sell and pays more for what he buys. Labor pays for it in increased cost of living. By this device we get the economic dog running around in circles chasing its own tail." But Mr. Hoover is still running around in circles, too. He agrees with the Supreme Court that national efforts to relieve the farm situation are a "flagrant flouting of the Constitution," but he produces a farm program of his own which is at heart much less different from the Democratic program than he pretends. He carries over from the AAA federal intervention in agriculture, retirement of submarginal lands, and subsidies financed by some such levy as a manufacturers' sale tax instead of the processing tax. Whether Mr. Hoover's proposal is any less unconstitutional than Mr. Roosevelt's is a matter for the G. O. P. and the Democrats to fight over among themselves; meanwhile, the farmer, whose votes both are trying to win, stands to gain very little.

THE AMENDMENT to the Administration's neutrality bill reaffirming America's traditional insistence on the freedom of the seas seriously undermines the value of that measure as a means of avoiding international friction. Throughout its history, insistence on this right has been a constant source of trouble for the United States. The experience of the World War showed that there can be no real freedom for neutral shippers in any war in which the British Empire with its naval power is involved. Even more serious difficulties would be created if the League should attempt to enforce an embargo against an aggressor and the United States should insist on maintaining "normal exports" to the offender. In fact, the application of normal trade quotas to belligerents, as provided by the bill, would clearly work to the advantage of such countries as Germany or Italy if they launched a war of aggression. With the possibility of averting a general world conflict dependent very largely on the outcome of the present efforts to strengthen the League, the least that the United States can do is to avoid legislation which will obstruct the development of a system of international sanctions.

JAPAN'S WITHDRAWAL from the London Naval Conference, though provoked by the military-fascist clique, may lead to a distinct setback in Tokyo's imperialistic ambitions. With finances already strained to the breaking-point by war preparations, Japan will find a general race in naval armaments—such as now seems inevitable—far more burdensome than will either of its chief rivals. And the burden will be increased by the fact that the abrogation of the Washington agreement leaves the United States and Great Britain free to construct new naval bases in the western Pacific. Already there are intimations that the British are planning to modernize the fortifications at Hongkong, which would serve as a base for the defense of British interests at Shanghai. The creation of strong American bases at Guam and in the Philippines would add considerably to Tokyo's worries, particularly if the Japanese intransigence at London should bring about closer Anglo-American co-operation in the defense of the Western stake in China. Japan has gone too far in North China and Mongolia to turn back without a serious loss of face, and there is little chance that its militarists can be stopped short of war except by drastic international pressure. The framework for such international action already exists in the Far Eastern Advisory Committee of twenty-two nations established by the League in 1933 to enforce its findings in the Manchurian controversy. Collective action of some sort, whether through this agency or a new Pacific security pact, now appears to be the only alternative to rearmament and war.

LANDLORDS HAVE LAUNCHED a new offensive on the embattled share-croppers of Arkansas. More than a hundred persons, including twenty-eight children under six, have been evicted; members of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union have been blacklisted by the planters; and two share-croppers have been shot. The suddenness and violence of the attack are easily explained. The S. T. F. U. has just held at Little Rock a highly successful convention which was attended by white and Negro share-croppers from six states. The S. T. F. U., which started with only a few members in 1934, now has more than 20,000 members in 200 locals. It has moreover aligned itself with American labor as a whole. The A. F. of L. pledged its strong support of the organization at its convention in October, and one of the speakers at Little Rock was David Fowler of the United Mine Workers, who brought greetings from John L. Lewis. The present attack of the landlords is a direct answer to the militance and enthusiasm of the Little Rock meeting. The landlords and the officials, who are usually landlords also, have determined to wipe out the union before it gets any stronger than it is. The two share-croppers who were shot were both hit in the back—they were undoubtedly "trying to escape"—and later advices tell of threats of lynching and "massacre" if "the damn union" is not dissolved. The share-croppers cannot expect any support from the fact that they are citizens of the United States. The only hope is to arouse public opinion throughout the country and force action from Washington. Wire Secretary Wallace.

FIVE RADICAL EDITORS were subpoenaed to appear on January 17 before District Attorney Dodge of New York for "questioning." Clarence Hathaway, editor of the Daily Worker, accompanied by his counsel, Louis I. Brodsky, was the only one to appear. Assistant District Attorney James T. Neary, who asked the questions, was a little vague as to the occasion for them, although he implied that a violation of the criminal-anarchy section of the New York penal code was the point at issue. No representatives of the press were present, and when Mr. Neary refused to name the persons in whose behalf the complaint was made, Mr. Hathaway, on advice of his lawyer, refused to answer. He made it clear, however, that he would be perfectly willing to answer all questions put to him in an open hearing. When the session ended, Mr. Neary proposed a gentleman's agreement to refrain from publicity until he had had time to submit to District Attorney Dodge a transcript of the record—a copy being also submitted to Mr. Hathaway. Mr. Brodsky refused this request also and hastened to tell the story to the newspapermen waiting just outside the door, whereupon Mr. Neary, considerably annoyed, gave out a statement which declared that the attempt to question Mr. Hathaway was part of a six months' secret investigation into the activities of Communist newspapers. It will be recalled that the criminal-anarchy statute referred to was invoked successfully in the Gitlow case in 1919, that it was several times upheld on appeal, and that it was declared constitutional by the United States Supreme Court five years later. In other words, if this law is employed to silence the Communist newspapers there will be, to our shame, ample precedent for it. But not even Mr. Hearst or Mr. Ralph Easley, either or both of whom may be responsible for the complaint, may be prepared for the violent protest which will ensue.

CHARLEY JONES of Gamoca, West Virginia, last week told a labor subcommittee of the House of Representatives how he contracted the lung disease, silicosis, from which his three sons have died in the past three years and to which he is now slowly succumbing. About 2,000 men worked in a tunnel near Gauley Bridge, West Virginia, which was being constructed by the contracting firm of Rinehart and Dennis. It is alleged that a large proportion of this number have contracted silicosis, that hundreds have died, and that hundreds of others are doomed because the company, to save money and time, has dispensed with the safety devices which protect workers from the fatal silica dust. The company, it is further charged, has resorted to all possible methods to hush up the story and defeat the suits brought by silicosis victims and their relatives. P. H. Faulconer, head of the contracting firm, maintains that men brought suits who had never been inside the tunnel. We do not see that this answer, even if true, proves the company's charge that the whole affair is a racket for collecting damages. It is quite possible that a few unscrupulous individuals might try to collect money dishonestly even though it entailed a day in court. It is entirely unlikely that 2,000 workers would unite in such a racket; and the fact remains that a large number of workers employed in the tunnel have died. A thorough inquiry is certainly in order.

THE RFC has been successful in the second skirmish of its campaign to drive down the interest rates charged by private bankers in their loans to the railways. Spurred by what it considered to be an unjustifiably high charge in a projected refunding for the Great Northern Railway, the RFC entered the arena by offering to assume the loan at 4 per cent. The bankers withdrew, and it looked as if the government might take over a further large portion of the banking field. The apparent trend toward government financing was quickly checked, however, on January 15, when it was announced that Kidder, Peabody and Company would supersede the RFC in a loan which had already been arranged for the Maine Central Railway. According to the agreement the bankers will buy 4 per cent bonds from the railroad at 98½, leaving them 1½ per cent for underwriting and expenses, and the railway will use $2,424,663 of the proceeds to repay previous advances by the RFC. Shifting the burden of financing back to the private banks is in line with the government's recently launched drive to reduce the excess reserves of member banks from their recent unprecedentedly high mark of $3,310,000,000. As a safeguard against uncontrolled credit inflation, the Treasury has recently withdrawn $125,000,000 of its funds on deposit with the commercial banks, apparently with the view of maintaining increased balances with the Federal Reserve banks. If the Maine Central case can be taken as an indication that the banks have at last seen the necessity of lowering long-term interest rates, it is possible that a part of the huge idle reserves may yet be put to productive use.

But it is difficult to see how this surplus can be completely absorbed without either a resumption of foreign lending or a sharp increase in the incidence of social taxation.

HARLEE BRANCH, second assistant postmaster general, has disclosed further results of the speed tests of subsidized ships which he has been conducting. Under the mail-contract system the amount of bounty is determined by the speed of the ship, and evidence that the Hoover Administration certified speeds that the ships were not capable of making prompted the tests. Of twenty-seven vessels—fifteen of them being the best that the American merchant marine has to offer, including nine Dollar, four Munson, and two United States liners—only four qualified in the tests, and not one of the fifteen was among these. Moreover, of the four, two are old Hog Island freighters whose owners ingeniously fitted them with special propellers which raised their speeds and gave them a subsidy classification intended for ships of an all-round better grade. This practice, the investigation of the Black committee revealed, has been engaged in by other owners; the disclosure emphasizes anew how subsidies have failed to improve the merchant marine. Mr. Branch estimates that the reclassification of the nineteen vessels will save the government about $5,000,000 of the $146,800,000 that is still to be handed over to the shipping barons. Mr. Farley's refusal to knuckle under to the International Mercantile Marine deserves praise. In a test of the I. M. M.'s President Harding, his department, in order to be fair, adopted a formula for the determination of "normal" speed which was less severe than that in long use by the navy and the Shipping Board. The vessel failed to make its required eighteen knots even under this formula. That was in October; since then, in contrast with other shipping companies which conceded the results of the tests, officials of the I. M. M. have lodged a series of personal protests with Farley and Branch. Farley has held firm, and his decision will cost the I. M. M. $187,000 a year.

IT MAY BE that here and there in certain government projects a little questionable boondoggling creeps in; but judging by a report in the January 20 issue of Uncle Sam's Diary, a weekly published in Washington, D. C., some federal employees are doing pretty useful work. Under a heading New Facts—From Official Sources, the Diary prints the following:

Work habits of field mice have been clocked by federal scientists: 6 a.m., reveille; breakfast hunting, until after 7:30 a.m.; rest period until 11 a.m.; lunch, 1 p.m.; general nosing about until 2 p.m.; dinner, 4:30 p.m.; half hour for napping, and then to bed at 5 p.m.

And a very good schedule it is—one which the federal scientists themselves, not to mention plain citizens and magazine editors, ought to follow. The lunch hour, to be sure, seems a little short, because one would not wish to cut down too much on the nosing-about period; and the nap just before going to bed might be thought a trifle excessive, although we should be willing to try it for a couple of weeks. But what worries us is this: How do the federal scientists know that the field mice sleep from 5 p.m. to 6 a.m.? Might not a couple of mice, bent on a little night life, get up without being observed by a single federal scientist? If this is to be a really valuable experiment, we should have all the facts.

The Uses of Woodrow Wilson

HISTORIC figures seem to have not only their past careers but their present uses as well. Woodrow Wilson has now ceased to be merely our war-time President and a reputed figure in the history of American idealism. He has become a practical weapon with which rival groups are today seeking to bludgeon each other.

The picture of Mr. Wilson that has been emerging day by day from the record of the Nye committee hearings has been tragic and arresting. On January 9 the nation learned of his extraordinary letter to the Secretary of State, in effect permitting the great flood of war loans to begin. On January 17 the Nye testimony contained Lansing's letter to Edward N. Smith, in which the President was revealed—in the very act of campaigning for reelection on a peace platform—as waiting for the right moment in which to introduce a resolution bringing this country into war. Finally came the revelation—which, as Mr. Villard writes on another page, was merely further proof of what had long been known by many—that Mr. Wilson had known more about the secret European treaties than he cared to reveal when he testified before a Senate committee in 1919. Not content with spreading the story upon the record, where it was unmistakably clear, Senator Nye made the mistake of dotting the i's and crossing the t's. He was moved to make an explicit accusation that Wilson had lied.

This was when the storm broke. Nothing in the entire range of the Nye committee evidence—not even the activities of the munitions makers as revealed last year or those of the House of Morgan as revealed a few weeks ago—created as much stir in the Senate as the accusation against Wilson. Perhaps it was that a taboo had been violated: just as in the English law the king could do no wrong, so in American Senatorial mores it is understood that a President can tell no lies. It is possible that more than lèse majesté was involved, that there is in all of us a primal instinct that leads us to rush gallantly to the defense of a dead man since he cannot answer his accusers. However that be, the nation was treated to some excellent oratory. Senator Tom Connally of Texas outdid himself in defending his former leader. Senator Carter Glass of Virginia, a Cabinet member under Wilson, in a speech which has not been surpassed for vitriol since the days when Huey Long and his opponents were enriching the American vocabulary, thundered away as if Senator Nye were Catiline, and pounded his desk with his fist until it bled and had to be taped up. He was treated by his associates with the double honors that go to martyrdom as well as victory.

But we may ask whether it was something more than reverence for a former leader that led to all this blood and thunder. The fact is that this whole Wilson incident represents a strategic blunder on the part of Senator Nye and masterly tactics on the part of the opponents of the investigation. We will grant that an adequate job of educating the nation on the causes of the last war involves publicizing and dramatizing the role of the principal figures in the play. But in the process Senator Nye has provided ammunition for the committee's enemies. As long as the committee confined itself to revealing the part which the profits of industrialists and bankers had played in bringing on the war, Senators might gnash their teeth and wail in silence; they could not openly come to the defense of the victims. Senator Glass could not very well bleed publicly in defense of Mr. Morgan. Those who feared stringent neutrality legislation because it might hamper the flow of American profits during future foreign hostilities could not admit their motives. They waited their time and it looked for a while as if they might get no chance to burke the committee's efforts. But Mr. Nye's attack on Wilson gave them an opening. The pent-up energy of the anti-committee and the anti-neutrality forces was released.

It may be hazarded that the men who were really being defended in Senator Glass's speech were the bankers who had already been called before the committee and the industrialists who were about to be called; and that the real direction of the speech was revealed when the Senator stated that he would not pay out another penny to continue the investigation, and that he felt ashamed of ever having voted any appropriation at all. It may well be that as a result of this blunder in the Nye strategy much of the admirable work which has been done toward achieving strict neutrality will be undone. At least, the hand of any Administration forces for which the Nye committee drive for neutrality has been too zealous will now be strengthened.

Wilson's personality is far more complex than anything that either of the Senators has said and will defy their biographical attempts. It is indeed ironic that, of all the Presidents we have had, it should be Mr. Wilson whose honesty is questioned. His reputed idealism was extremely useful as a halo with which to invest American policy at the Peace Conference. The halo is now completely dissipated. But for us today the thing that stands out most clearly about Wilson is his indecisiveness. He was like the protagonist of a Greek drama, with fate and the gods implacably set against him, and his own purposes too uncertain to prevent the catastrophe. He let the tide of war carry him where it would. He could never quite make up his mind. He sincerely wanted peace—everybody wanted peace—but at the same time he got entangled in the pro-Ally feeling and became a prisoner of the whole set of circumstances that were rushing us into war. The most disturbing thing about the Nye testimony with respect to Wilson is his apparent failure to grasp the terrifying, the irresistible momentum of the forces which, once allowed a start, lead any country on to the doom of war.

The one thing we must do is to keep the Wilson-Nye-Glass incident in perspective. Adequate neutrality legislation must not be compromised by the problem of how unsullied Mr. Wilson's character was, and the same applies (as we pointed out last week) to the problem of Mr. Morgan's personal complicity in the coming of the war. The Nye investigation must proceed on a broadened base of investigation—but it must proceed. If the Senators carry out Senator Glass's threat of cutting off the funds of the committee they will show that they are motivated more by fear of disclosures than by reverence for the dead.

The League Falters

IT is now a foregone conclusion that the League Council will take no action, for the time being at least, to strengthen its sanctions against Italy. The excuse given for failing to add oil, coal, and steel to the list of embargoed commodities is that existing sanctions have already weakened Italy and that further action might drive Mussolini into a mad attack on the League powers. Such an explanation can scarcely be taken seriously. While Il Duce has encountered unforeseen obstacles both at home and abroad, he is by no means beaten. The Italian armies have been checked on the northern front in Ethiopia, but this setback has been partially counterbalanced by a brilliant victory along the Somaliland border. The effectiveness of the sanctions now in force cannot even be tested for many months to come. Meanwhile, the danger of a war of retaliation has become progressively more remote. If sanctions are crippling Mussolini's drive in Ethiopia, it is evident that he dare not think of war against a first-rank power.

But all this merely makes the League's failure to extend its embargo the more perplexing. From the standpoint of collective security, it is important not only that Italy be defeated but that the League, once and for all, prove its ability and determination to stop an aggressor. After a brave beginning, however, the League appears to have lapsed into complete ineffectiveness. Nor can this shocking retreat be explained by any single development in the past few months. Most of the League members are as determined as they were in October that the aggressor shall not be rewarded. With the overthrow of Laval now apparently only a matter of hours, France may be expected to be far more favorably inclined toward sanctions. Uncertainty regarding the role of the United States in case of an oil embargo may have contributed to the League's delay, but the chance of action by the United States is now much greater than it was last fall.

Obviously the primary responsibility for the new solicitude toward Mussolini must be placed on Britain's shoulders. Captain Eden's weakness at Geneva is convincing evidence that the late Hoare-Laval plan was not, as Mr. Baldwin claimed, wholly the result of his failure to keep informed of developments at Paris. On the contrary, Sir Samuel appears to have been made the scapegoat for what is essentially the present policy of the Conservative government. His imminent return to the Cabinet in some other post after having been associated with one of the gravest diplomatic blunders in modern history merely reinforces this interpretation. But why should Britain, either because of its avowed desire to uphold collective security or for purely imperialistic reasons, suddenly decide to throw in its lot with Italy? From the standpoint of the Baldwin government there have been only two significant changes in the situation since sanctions were initiated. The first was the result of the British elections. It is no longer possible to doubt that the Conservatives deliberately capitalized the pro-League sentiment revealed by the peace poll in order to be returned for five more years, and then just as deliberately repudiated all their campaign promises. The other development, scarcely anticipated, was the setback which Mussolini has encountered in northern Ethiopia. If Baldwin had really desired to strengthen the League, he would have seized upon this strategic occasion for bringing greater pressure upon Italy. The fact that he did not indicates that imperial considerations have been paramount. Whether this implies that a deal has definitely been arranged or merely that England is loath to see Fascism overturned in Italy is impossible to say, though the latter is the more plausible interpretation. The threat to the white man's prestige in case of an Ethiopian victory has apparently transcended any fear that Italy might threaten the British Empire.

Does this mean that we must despair of achieving anything approximating collective security as long as imperialist rivalries exist? This is the instinctive reaction of most American isolationists, and in view of the events of the past few weeks, no one can definitely assert that they are wrong. It is not enough to say that if it were not for the weakness of Hoare and Baldwin, Italy would today be faced with inevitable defeat. The forces which drove two such dissimilar men as Sir Samuel Hoare and Captain Eden to repudiate the principles upon which they were elected cannot be explained merely in psychological terms. But the alternative to collective security, as the British indicate by action if not by word, is the desperate one of rearmament and a return to the pre-war system of alliances. Unless a collective organization can be established before German Nazism reaches the stage in which Italian Fascism found itself this fall, nothing can head off a world conflict. Fortunately, the outlook is not as completely dark as it appears at the moment. We must not forget that the League has shown that it can act—and act with swiftness and decisiveness. A preposterous plan for rewarding the aggressor has been stopped by enraged public opinion. There is still hope that public opinion will once more assert itself in time to preserve the League from the dry rot of compromise and procrastination.

Remove the Rat

THE president of the World Association of Detectives at its last annual convention stated that "the seeds of unrest . . . particularly the inroads made in organized labor, constitute a major problem with which the members of the association are in daily touch." He went on to say with the pious solemnity of a Rotarian who has just eaten a radical high-school teacher that the private detective performs in this connection "one of the most important services to society."

An excellent example of this service to society is outlined in an article in this issue. Ray L. Kringer reports on page 131 the testimony of a labor spy at a hearing before the Regional Labor Board in St. Louis. The activities of A. A. Ahner, "labor-relations counselor" for the Brown Shoe Company, in destroying union locals from within conform to the usual pattern of labor espionage. The case is of special interest, however, because it shows how the labor spy works hand in glove both with local officials and with the "citizens' committee" which stands ready in all its outrage and sawed-off shotguns to protect the fair name of practically every village and town in the United States—particularly in those rural areas to which industry continues to flee, hoping to escape from organized labor. The Brown Company case is also significant because it puts the labor spy and his works into the government records—thereby bolstering the demand now being put forward by various groups for a thorough investigation of what is probably the most loathsome of all professions.

Public opinion, with the help of various agencies, has of late been closing in on the labor spy. This has been due in part to a series of books and articles exposing his methods of dealing with "faults and abuses, such as radicalism, discontent, dishonesty, inefficiency" among workers—we quote from the sales talk of the Pinkertons' National Detective Agency, which has offices in every large city. Edward Levinson, author of "I Break Strikes," and the New York Post, which he serves as labor editor, have done admirable work in exposing the private detective as social worker. And there can be no doubt that the trial of Pearl Bergoff, Strike-Breaker Number One, made a deep impression on the public and gave impetus to a campaign to remove the rat from labor's house, which is pretty flimsy at best. Mr. Bergoff's exposure was precipitated when some of his social workers sued him for non-payment for a little trip to Georgia in connection with a textile strike. When the strike-breakers arrived in Georgia, Governor Talmadge, with great éclat but for reasons having nothing to do with pro-labor sympathies, shipped them out again. It made a pretty story in court.

Representative William P. Connery, chairman of the House Labor Committee, is ready to introduce a bill to prevent the use of hired thugs and push through its passage unless the National Labor Relations Board, on the basis of testimony it has collected, can find ways of stopping the practice of espionage.

We do not mean to imply, of course, that the mere passage of such a bill would solve the problem. That would be to overlook the highly respectable gentlemen in steel, automobiles, shoes, and every other industry who by their generous patronage have fostered the noble trade of spying until, according to Mr. Levinson, 55 of the 187 licensed private-detective agencies in New York City now solicit business in supplying spies, professional strike-breakers, or guards, armed and unarmed. Almost any industrial magnate, it seems, would rather share his profits with Pearl Bergoff and his band of "finks" than with the workers who help to pile up dividends.

It would be interesting to know just how many millions have been spent in the last fifty years to keep the worker from getting a fair wage. There is little doubt that steel would lead all the rest. And for this reason it is significant that the office of Charles W. Tuttle in Rooms 1007-1010 of the Carnegie Building in Pittsburgh has quietly folded up. Charles W. Tuttle is known to labor as the chief of the Carnegie spy system which was installed in 1892 by Henry Clay Frick and has been attending to "discontented" workers ever since. Mr. Tuttle, we are told, is "ill." The real explanation seems to be that unfavorable publicity in regard to its espionage service has hurt the Carnegie Corporation.

But even if industry is in process of giving up espionage as a crude and outmoded way of defeating organization, the pressure for a Senate investigation should not be relaxed. The worker has suffered for years from the black list. Let a Senate committee compile a black list to end black lists—a complete record of labor spies, their procurers, and the gentlemen higher up who pay for their services.

Infancy of an Art

THE Museum of Modern Art has recently exhibited to members and to the press the first selection from its newly collected library of motion pictures. By summer it expects to have prepared five programs illustrating the development of the movies from the earliest beginnings to the present, and to offer them on a rental basis to educational institutions for presentation to the public.

Starting with a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, the Film Library, under the direction of Iris Barry, instituted an active search for early movies, and though many of them survived only by chance, this first showing seems to indicate that the search was remarkably successful. The program begins with "The Execution of Mary Queen of Scots" (1893-94), which lasts only a few seconds and which was originally made for the peepshow kinoscope but was transferred to film shortly after the first projection machine was devised. It is succeeded by "Wash Day Troubles" (1895), also a mere fleeting incident, and then by "A Trip to the Moon," made in France in 1902 by George Méliès, one of the first persons to establish a reputation as a director. This film is of extraordinary interest both because it represents a successful early effort to use the new medium for fantasy and because it was so widely shown in this country that many persons middle-aged or older can remember it. It is followed by the American "The Great Train Robbery" (1903), commonly cited as the first successful effort to work out a specifically cinematographic technique for the presentation of a realistic narrative, and by "Faust" (1905), one of the early Pathé pictures partly colored by hand. The program concludes with the tiresome "Queen Elizabeth" made in France by Sarah Bernhardt and released in America as the first of the Famous Players pictures. In the next program we are promised some of the early Biograph pictures which dominated the American screen up to about 1911.

As the bulletin of the Film Library points out, the moving picture is the only art which it is possible for us to study from the very beginning. It is also true that if collections had not been made now it would soon have become impossible to make them at all. Films may be copied, as these have been, but their physical basis is not permanent even under proper care, and all the old ones are even now disintegrating. This is particularly true of those not being preserved by companies having a continuous existence, and many have probably vanished completely. We are informed, for example, that the Italian "Caberia," one of the earliest, most elaborate, and most successful of the spectacles (if our memory serves, D'Annunzio wrote the scenario) has so far eluded all search.

These early pictures have a curious interest for even the casual spectator, especially if he happens to be old enough to remember them from the time when they were first shown. But this is not all. There is a real and highly interesting evolution of technique which only they can adequately illustrate. So far, only a small group of persons has been able to see the films, but we hope that they will be shown to the general public. Even this, however, would not be enough. The entire collection should be catalogued and made as easily available to investigators as old books are.

Issues and Men

A Measure of America's Betrayal

TESTIFYING before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Professor Edwin M. Borchard, of the Law School of Yale University, declared that the chief responsibility for this country's entering the World War rested on the President and the Cabinet because of their utter incompetence in handling the international situation. This he placed above all the other numerous causes for our participating in the struggle. To many who still worship at the shrine of Woodrow Wilson this will seem sacrilege. It is not the worst indictment, however, that can be brought against him. The documents exposed by the Nye committee have now proved the insincerity of some of his Cabinet, in addition to the already attested insincerity of Colonel House and Robert Lansing and the belligerency of Walter H. Page. Of him Mr. Lansing wrote to President Wilson on January 27, 1916: "I must say that I am very considerably disturbed as to Mr. Page's attitude on all subjects which in any way affect the policies of Great Britain. He certainly is influenced very strongly by the atmosphere in which he is, and I frequently doubt whether he urges the cases involving American rights with the force and vigor which he should as American Ambassador." We have also finally obtained indisputable proof of what has long been known—that Mr. Wilson lied in regard to his ignorance of the secret treaties.

I have always had a special interest in this question, for it was I who first received copies of the treaties and printed them in January, 1918, in the New York Evening Post, of which I was the managing owner. Copies of these treaties I personally sent to Mr. Tumulty. Colonel House, who now appears as having obtained knowledge of these treaties only from the President during Balfour's visit, received several copies, as did every Senator and Congressman. I syndicated the treaties in eight or nine dailies, and reprints of them in pamphlet form were placed on sale on the newsstands of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Washington, and other cities. A friend of mine has stated to me that he has in his possession a letter from Colonel House acknowledging receipt of two copies of the pamphlet and declaring that they are "going to the White House tonight in the private mail bag of which the President alone has the key." Yet Woodrow Wilson, when the Senate committee called upon him on August 19, 1919, specifically denied having heard of the secret treaties before he reached Paris.

Arthur Krock, Washington correspondent of the New York Times, joining his employers' effort to discredit the Nye committee, declares that "maybe he [the President] did lie." "There are," he declares, "lies forced upon statesmen by patriotic duty which are writ in letters of gold in the books of the Recording Angel." As I have not seen the Angel's books, I cannot be sure that Mr. Krock is correct in his statement. But I can and do challenge his assertion that any such lie was "forced upon" Wilson "by patriotic duty." What was that "patriotic duty"? The war was finished; the fight then on was over the League and the ratification of the peace treaty. All the President desired to achieve by his words was to hide from the Senators the fact that, before his trip to Paris, he had knowledge of those abominable secret treaties which prove today, as in 1918 and 1919, that the supposedly noble and altruistic aims of the Allies were all bunk. Of course, Wilson would have been denounced had he told the truth; he would have been accused of withholding vital facts from the Congress and the people—facts at the basis of the Versailles treaty, which has so nearly wrecked the world. Does the Recording Angel glorify a statesman's lie told simply for the patriotic purpose of saving his own skin?

But this is only one phase of the appalling picture now for the first time revealed in full by the Nye committee; for which alone Senator Nye—and Senator Clark, too—well deserves the award of the Cardinal Newman gold medal, to be bestowed upon him by the Newman Foundation for the most outstanding and distinguished service rendered to our country and to humanity during the past year. Professor Borchard was right. The incompetence is all there. It is exceeded only by the utter callousness of the Wilson crowd with respect to the price in human lives and suffering to be paid by the youth of America for governmental cowardice and blundering—130,128 men killed, or dead of wounds or sickness. I do not recall any Cabinet speeches against our going into the war for prosperity's sake—no one knew then that the price might not be 500,000 or even 1,000,000 American lives. So the incompetent Wilson enmeshed himself and the country by being insincere in his neutrality and then unneutral, by going back on his original ban against loans and the sale of Allied bonds, by permitting the growth of the huge war business until he was its captive and unable to oppose the British in their violation of international law lest he destroy our unhealthy war-boom prosperity. The Nye committee has now reconstructed the whole thing, made past history live news, and laid before us just how we were led by cheating and blundering into the struggle.

Well, how about a balance sheet? Had we stayed out of the war we should have lost our war business, experienced a depression and considerable unemployment, and failed to make a lot of millionaires. Instead, we got 130,128 dead and 192,369 wounded, a war expense of at least fifty billions with more billions to come for bonuses, pensions, and so forth, the loss of our loans to our Allies, our share of the present depression with its horrible toll in money and manhood, and, finally, national insecurity with our republican institutions actually menaced. This is the true measure of America's betrayal by the incompetence, the insincerity, and the devotion to "prosperity" of Page, Lansing, McAdoo, House, and Wilson!

Swally Garrison Villard

The Riddle of the Supreme Court

I. The Divine Right of Judges

By MAX LERNER

A LONG view of the power of the Supreme Court is difficult to achieve in the midst of immediate issues and angry passions. But it would start with the fact that what the court is doing now, in smashing the best legislative efforts of the community, is no novelty, just as the attacks on the court are no novelty. It would try to get at the nature, the psychological roots, and the economic consequences of the power of judicial review—presumably America's most beautiful and original gift to the art of government.

Judicial review is a political device by which the court passes on the constitutional validity of legislative and executive acts. It enables the judges to apportion powers between the states and the national government, and between the legislative, executive, and judicial branches. This is a power nowhere to be found expressly granted in the Constitution itself. But it has by this time written itself into the Constitution by court interpretation, and although only a custom it has become as commonly accepted as if it were clearly granted in the document.

There are two opposing theories as to how the power grew up. One is the usurpation theory. It goes back to Jefferson and is repeated afresh in every period of constitutional crisis. It holds that judicial review is sheer usurpation and that the Supreme Court has deliberately filched powers belonging to other departments. This point of view is generally highlighted with charges of tyranny that transport us back into the pages of Plutarch. The other is the Federalist view that the judicial power flows inherently from the nature of our federal system, and that without it our government would be unworkable and our democracy unthinkable.

I shall confess I cannot subscribe to either of these theories, although they both offer fragments of the final answer. It is true that there have been some men on our court with a will to power. And it is true, on the other side, that given our federal-state governmental system, when both the states and the nation try to ride the same horse someone must finally decide who shall ride in front. But a clearer answer than either would be that the court's power is a natural outcome of the necessity for maintaining capitalist dominance under democratic forms; that judicial review has proved to be a very convenient channel through which the driving forces of American economic life have found expression and achieved victory. Such a view could be documented by reference to the history of the judicial power since Marshall first established it in 1803 by his decision in Marbury vs. Madison. The high points in the story would be Marshall's use of the judicial power to give enlarged scope to the expansion of business enterprise, the development of the doctrine of due process of law after the Civil War, and the reading of a laissez faire social philosophy into the Constitution in the decades around the turn of the century.

Today the court is reenacting the role it has always played whenever a resurgence of popular feeling has threatened to sweep away some of the established power of business enterprise. Nor has there been in all this any consistency of judicial doctrine or political theory. When the people have gained control of the state legislatures, as happened in Marshall's day and in the decades of agrarian revolt, the court has denied power to the states and concentrated it in the federal government. But when, as is true now, the people have captured the federal offices, then the court denies power to the federal government and reserves it where it must be ineffective in the task of business regulation—with the state governments. The Republicans now find themselves amazingly the devoted adherents of states' rights, and the Democrats (shades of the Jeffersonian tradition!) are earnestly seeking to increase the national power.

There are several rather striking misconceptions today about the court's power and function. One is that judges decide as they do because they can do no other—that they follow an inflexible path of constitutional doctrine. Only a little less far from the truth is the second and opposite misconception—that the judges are untrammelled in the expression of their own social attitudes and that they can play ducks and drakes with judicial precedent. What are actually the limits within which the Supreme Court has to work? It can decide only specific cases and not abstract questions—the case of the Schechter brothers, for example, and how they sell their chickens—and out of those specific judgments the body of constitutional law grows up. Once a case is settled, however, a rule of law is established for future decisions, and every judge must abide by it (stare decisis) regardless of his previous views. The court works, moreover, within a difficult technical tradition, under a limited jurisdiction, and with severe procedural regulations. Finally, its role with respect to legislation is negative and passive. It can initiate nothing of itself. But after you have said all that, the fact remains that the judge retains a great latitude of decision. On the same set of facts in the Hoosac case, after hearing the same arguments and reading the same briefs, with the same body of precedent to draw on, possessed of the same degree of integrity and patriotism, Mr. Justice Roberts comes to one constitutional conclusion and Mr. Justice Stone to exactly the opposite one. What can explain this? Only the hypothesis that the judge works within limits and with material flexible enough to allow for personal choice. The determining factor becomes not some rigorous rule but the judge's own social philosophy. This in turn is shaped by his class roots, his education, his experience, and the elements in the contemporary climate of opinion to which he is responsive.

There is another misconception. We tend to believe that the court shows its power only when it declares an act of Congress unconstitutional. Actually the court has exercised this judicial veto only on some sixty occasions, many of them of slight moment. The judicial veto represents the outer limits of the court's power. It shows how far that power can go. But usually the court influences the shaping of an act even before it is passed, for the knowledge that the act will have to run the gauntlet of judicial review is a sovereign acid for eating away features that the court will predictably disallow. Once the act is passed it may be whittled into ineffectiveness (as happened with the anti-trust legislation) without any actual declaration of unconstitutionality, or the agency set up (like the Federal Trade Commission) may be crippled by court interpretation without being destroyed outright. Thus the court's power is broader and more continuous than the exercise of its veto. Even when it upholds legislation it is directing our economic life. The entire landscape of life as it is lived today by the common man is ultimately at the mercy of the court's action or sufferance.

The essence of the court's position in our system is that it takes problems that are primarily economic and clashes of interest that are economic, and translates them into terms of legal doctrine. It thus becomes the bottle-neck of economic policy. I believe that is the one overwhelming fact that we must face today. As long as economic issues are fought out frankly as such, their solution lies with the people and with their representatives in the legislature. But when economic issues are translated into legalistic terms, when the question of the fate of the farmers and workers and housewives and working children becomes a matter of hosts of none-too-angelic lawyers dancing on the needle of due process of law, then the big electoral battalions are left helpless. If we face it clearly, looking beyond the tangle of our traditional usages, the question of what we shall do with our farms and our factories is not ultimately a question for lawyers or judges to settle. It is a question of economic and social policy. To allow our economic policy to be shaped by the judges is wrong whichever way you look at it. If they decide, as is often claimed, on purely legal grounds, then those are the wrong grounds on which to decide questions of economic policy. If they decide, as is sometimes admitted, on economic and social grounds, then they are the wrong people to be intrusted with decisions on these grounds, for they are judicial and not economic technicians.

In passing thus on economic policy the Supreme Court has throughout our history functioned as the last bulwark of the possessing classes. It has always been a final line of defense for them, a sort of Hindenburg line that would stand fast when all else crumbled. Beaten at the polls, in danger of having the economic institutions of a plutocracy leveled by the political forces of a democracy, the defeated group has always turned to the court for shelter and has found it in the safe haven of constitutional law. Jefferson discovered this fact when he and his party of small farmers and mechanics turned the Federalist propertied interests out of Congress and the Presidency in 1800, only to find them dug in again behind the earthworks of the court. Jackson discovered it in the 1830's, Lincoln in the 1850's, the agrarian leaders in the eighties and nineties, the Progressives such as La Follette and Theodore Roosevelt as the century ended. And now Mr. Roosevelt is discovering it afresh. It seems to be the fate of American reformers to conduct their education in public.

Each of these men sought to attack the court. In no case has the court's power been successfully limited. What accounts for this extraordinary toughness and viability of the court? The defenders of the court answer that its survival indicates the hollowness of the attacks on it. What is involved is evidently a medieval ordeal by fire, proving innocence. But the successive crises of the judicial power can no more be exorcised by this sort of mumbo-jumbo than can the crises of the economic system. Each attack on the judicial power in America has not been merely an unaccountable bit of behavior of the democratic mass. It has been the expression, in constitutional terms, of the inability of our state to adjust its own power-relations and resolve its own contradictions. And for that reason each successive crisis of the judicial power has taken its color, its substance, its tension from the contemporary stage of the struggle of economic groups and classes.

That is happening today too. And today, as in the past, the court will survive the attack on it, not because of any inherent rightness in the judicial power, but because the larger number of our people still have a sense of the sanctity of the court. What used to be the divine right of kings has now been replaced by the divine right of judges.

There are several elements in this pattern of divine right as it exists in the popular mind. One is the fact that we have been encouraged for over a century to make a fetish of the Constitution. Every people needs some form of anchorage, some link with the invariant. The Rock of Ages is as essential to political as it is to religious life. In fact, the habits of mind begotten by an authoritarian Bible carry over to an authoritarian Constitution; and a country like ours, in which our early tradition had prohibited a state church, ends by getting a state church after all. To be sure, not all who make a fetish of the Constitution believe in it. There are many newspaper and political groups which appeal to the sanctity of the Constitution with their eyes fixed on the immensities and their hands reaching out for their own special interests. And yet with the larger number of our people the belief that the Constitution is sacred beyond change is a genuine belief, and must be reckoned with.

The second psychological element in the tradition of the divine right of judges is the belief that the Supreme Court is the special guardian of the Constitution—and a better guardian than Congress or the President. Part of John Marshall's genius lay in his skill in pushing into the background the power that the court was gaining over economic policy, and thrusting into the foreground its role of guardianship. This the later judges have encouraged by their continued utterances, and it has become the official theory of the court's power. The judges have thus been associated in our minds with the function of protection rather than with the struggle for power.

The third element has been the tradition of judicial neutrality. We have somehow placed the judges above the battle. Despite every proof to the contrary the common man attributes to them the objectivity and infallibility that are ultimately attributes only of godhead. The tradition persists that they belong to no economic group or class; that they are not touched by economic interests; that their decisions proceed through some inspired way of arriving at the truth; that they sit in their robes like haughty gods, unaffected by the prejudices that move common men.

How long a myth built of such baseless fabric can continue is another matter. It is undoubtedly weakening and may be expected in the end to crumble. Meanwhile, however, its force and its hold on the popular mind are enough to daunt Mr. Roosevelt and keep him from making an open attack on the court's power. In the end it will not be the Roosevelts who will restore to the popular will the power of deciding on economic issues. The Supreme Court may be expected to be its own bitterest enemy. Even the myth of the divine right of judges will not survive many more decisions like Mr. Justice Roberts's masterly essay in obfuscation in the Hoosac case.

Arms Over Europe

V. Mussolini Outbluffs England

By LOUIS FISCHER

Rome, January 3

ALL Rome is divided into three parts: the servants of the Pope and God, who wear cassocks and do not mix in politics; the servants of the King and Mussolini, who wear military uniforms and are paid to obey orders; and the civil servants of the dictatorship. Somewhere in every French political discussion one person will say: "Ah, but Paris is not France." Nor is Rome Italy. It is more prosperous-looking, more politically-minded, and more pro-Fascist than the rest of the country. And it is filled with designated and voluntary propagandists for the regime whose charm and eloquence put foreigners under tremendous, often irresistible intellectual pressure.

With this reservation, one must recognize in Rome that the League of Nations sanctions have for the moment consolidated Mussolini's domestic support. When active war preparations commenced, the nation opened its mouth for the first time in thirteen years and complained and criticized. The Ethiopian war was not and is not popular in Italy. Soldiers have failed to report at the time of embarkation for Africa. Many citizens in the north have crossed into foreign territory, and numbers have endeavored to prove foreign citizenship. In the presence of His Excellency Crollanza, a high Fascist dignitary, who was showing me the fine work of reclaiming the Pontine Marshes, I asked a Fascist official why he was not in East Africa, and he replied, "One war was enough for me." There was opposition to the war in government bureaus, from the general public, among workers—Genoa saw some strikes—and in the army. In 1932 Mussolini instructed the General Staff to draft a plan for an Ethiopian war. The military warned that such a campaign would require at least three years of intense fighting and much expensive preparation. It would, moreover, weaken Italy in Europe. This was the narrow view of experts; Mussolini knew the political and social reasons for a war. In the beginning, therefore, many army leaders sulked. The King too was disaffected. When Mussolini's picture flashed across cinema screens scarcely a hand applauded. No longer did crowds gather in the Piazza Venezia to demand that Il Duce appear on the balcony.

Sanctions were a windfall. Mussolini is a consummate politician. Anti-British feeling was fanned by the press. Though not at all menaced, the British Embassy was surrounded by troops when sanctions were imposed. They served to point out the enemy to the populace. The opposition beat a retreat. Thereafter the regime stressed the hostility of foreign powers to Italy instead of Italy's hostility to Ethiopia. A special cookbook appeared with the title "Economical Meals for Sanctions' Time," not war time. This is typical of Mussolini's shrewd strategy. The whole world has combined against Italy; Fascism played on the nationalistic chord. Inveterate anti-Fascists at home and abroad placed themselves at the disposal of the regime. Even the royal family fell into line.

In Rome I asked every Fascist and every foreign military attaché I met why Mussolini had decided to make war with a huge army instead of taking a page out of the Japanese book and provoking a plausible incident which would warrant intervention or bribing some chiefs to declare themselves autonomous and beg Italy for assistance. Some Italians replied that such methods were not worthy of a proud nation. Signor Edmondo Rossoni, member of the Grand Fascist Council, said they feared a second Adowa. But a force of 50,000 men equipped with tanks, cannon, and aeroplanes could prevent a repetition of the 1896 disaster. Actually the size of the Italian army in Ethiopia is encumbering its progress. In explaining the lull on all fronts Marshal Badoglio declared, "Soldiers must be fed"; and the more there are of them the slower becomes the advance. Moreover, we know that Italy did buy tribal leaders before the war started. Baron Franchetti purchased the submission of Ras Gugsa and several other chiefs prior to the opening of hostilities; and it was because the British disliked Franchetti's activities, Italians privately assert, that the aeroplane in which this Venetian Jewish nobleman was returning to Rome met with a mysterious and fatal accident fifteen minutes after it left the Cairo aerodrome. Be that as it may, the question remains why Franchetti's approved tactic was not applied more widely.

When Anthony Eden visited Rome in June, 1935, he offered Mussolini Ogaden north to the eighth parallel and west to the forty-second meridian. But Mussolini demanded all non-Amharic territory, plus control over the Negus such as the French exercise in Morocco over the Sultan. Knowing he could not get this with British consent he suggested that if he made war he would take the entire country, and he moved his hand around and around above the map of Abyssinia which lay in front of them. In Paris, in August, Italy was offered more territory than Eden had been ready to grant, and also special advantages which might, in time, have enabled it to absorb other large parts of the land. Such a scheme would not have antagonized Britain and the League or taxed Italy's limited financial resources. Mussolini spurned it.

Everything points to the same conclusion: the Italian regime thought that at home and abroad there was more to gain from fighting than from negotiating, from battles than from bribes to princes. This also must be considered: Italy had a peace-time army of 250,000 to 300,000 men. Mussolini's principle, the moment troop shipments started, was to replace every soldier who went to Eritrea with another for duty in Italy. Since the East Africa army today numbers approximately 250,000 (plus 35,000 laborers), one would expect the home army to consist of between 200,000 and 300,000 men. But its actual strength is 900,000, perhaps 1,000,000. Did Mussolini wish to be prepared for a war in Europe; did he expect a world-wide conflagration? Or was he dealing with another problem, the problem of unemployment and domestic unrest? Despite the fact that a million men joined the army in 1935 and that many more found work in munitions plants, there were 628,000 Italian unemployed in September, 1935. There may have been almost two million, then, before the war started—a large number in a poor country of 44,000,000 inhabitants. After circumstances had convinced the government of the advisability of a war, this factor could hasten the final decision and give the war its large-scale, grandiose character. It has already militated against an early peace.

When I asked seasoned observers what would happen in Italy if, a month or two from now, peace were re-established, they all agreed that "things would be pretty bad." "The majority of Italian soldiers in Abyssinia," Rossoni had said to me, "will naturally return home, for many of them are city people with roots in Italy." There would be more unemployment. The war had so far solved nothing. What Italy may get in Ethiopia now or in the near future cannot yield quick fruit. On the other hand, every day of war costs the Italian nation, it is stated, 30,000,000 lire which it can hardly afford. Sanctions are taking their toll; hoarding, speculative buying, a few price increases, and general economic dislocation have begun. On October 16 Mussolini disclosed his terms to Laval for the first time since the trouble commenced. He wanted all non-Amharic territory, with League control, through foreign advisers, over the rest of Abyssinia. This was less than the British and French foreign ministers proposed. On the whole, therefore, the Laval-Hoare proposition presented him with a difficult choice.

Before Mussolini made up his mind he sought to analyze the minds of Laval and Hoare. The case of Laval presented little difficulty. Laval had blessed Italy's invasion of Ethiopia, by implication at least, on January 7, 1935. He had been dragooned into sanctions by the British. He disliked making an enemy of Italy because of some African waste lands. But what of Hoare? Were not the British bent on being firm? Had they not mobilized half the world for their struggle with Mussolini? Why the volte-face? Britain indubitably wished to reassert her might but soon discovered that this involved a strain and a risk. The crisis came over oil sanctions. Laval had caused them to be postponed once, but the League Committee of Eighteen was scheduled to meet on December 12 to decide for or against applying them. I spent the nine days preceding that date in Rome, and Rome talked of nothing else. Italy, I was told, possessed several months' reserves of petroleum, but oil sanctions must ultimately paralyze her military and industrial activities, and Mussolini, Italians added—sometimes a bit hysterically—would not allow himself to be trapped and destroyed in this base manner. He would fight. He would fight the whole world. "This will be a romantic form of suicide," I suggested. "Yes," came the reply more than once, "but it is better to go down in a blaze of glory than to die inch by inch under foreign pressure." Then military experts and Fascists went to the ubiquitous map of the Mediterranean. "You see this island?" they would say. "It is called Pantelleria. It lies just between Sicily and Tunis, forty-five miles from Sicily. Italian submarines and aeroplanes could close that gate and lock out the British fleet in the western Mediterranean. Italy could then fight in the eastern part for a long time. Italy has more bombers than you think. The Italian airmen are intrepid and expert. Recall Balbo's formation flight to America. Italo Balbo is in Libya. Look at this map. You see this circle? It represents the range of Italy's bombers in Libya. You notice that the circle includes Alexandria. From the Dodecanese Islands Italy can bomb Cyprus. In the British House of Lords it has been admitted that Malta is already worthless. Italy can do a lot of damage." A particularly frantic Italian contributed these ideas: "If all hope is lost, we will smash everything within our range. Is it better to lose India than Ethiopia? England will regret all this. We will all go down together. We will become a nation of brigands. I will become a brigand." At the moment he was the elegantly dressed director of a big commercial establishment. Was all this merely talk? It impressed diplomats in Rome. It impressed Laval and Hoare as well.

Other facts fill out the picture of the Laval-Hoare proposal. The terms were sent to Mussolini on December 10. On December 12 the constitution of 1923 was returned to Egypt. Sir Samuel Hoare had asserted at the Guildhall banquet in November that the constitution had been dropped. Riots followed on the Nile. Few realize how serious the situation might have become if Mussolini, as part of a "smash-all" decision, had marched a small army from Libya into a disaffected Egypt. It would have been difficult but possible. Egypt is part of the Mediterranean front, but it is really a front in itself, and it has played a large role in the formulation of British policy toward Ethiopia. Moreover, what might a desperate Mussolini do on another British front, on the German front? There were rumors of a rapprochement between Mussolini and Hitler. Just before sanctions were applied, Mussolini had warned Laval that he might, if pressed, alter his policy with respect to Germany's position in Austria.

Difficulties in Egypt, dangers to the Mediterranean fleet, possibilities in Germany, and, as Baldwin said in the House, "it is no easy matter to stop oil going to Italy," particularly when the United States failed to apply an embargo. London consequently faltered. The upshot of it all is this: Mussolini, with a very bad hand, played such wonderful poker that he succeeded, for one moment at least, in bluffing John Bull, whose cards were much better but who was afraid of going in for excessive stakes. In fact, the stakes are not big; Mussolini could not hold out very long against England and France. But if Mussolini is pushed to the wall, Europe and Italy will become even more interesting and exciting than they are today.

[A sixth article by Mr. Fischer on international relations in Europe will appear in the issue of February 12.]

The Last War and the Next

II. What Does Neutrality Mean?

By WALTER MILLIS

THE problem of neutrality, as it has now at last been posed before the nation, is a problem in applying the uncertain lessons of a complex past to the control of policy in an unforeseeable future. Its difficulties should be obvious. Yet the first and most fundamental lesson of our experience in 1914-17 is still the reasonably simple one that in order to maintain American neutrality America must be neutral. It is useless to discuss the question of keeping the country out of another foreign war except upon the assumption that the war will be one which the country will believe that it should keep out of. The nation—which is to say, those influential and vocal elements that so largely determine the current attitudes and momentary expedients of government—must at least begin with a conviction that the foreign conflict is not our conflict and, what is more important, that its outcome is a matter of no overwhelming importance to the United States.

The folly of the President's attempt to found a policy of neutrality upon the assumption that 90 per cent of the world is peace-loving by nature and that any foreign war must spring from an immoral aggression on the part of the dangerously wicked 10 per cent is surely too plain for discussion. It was precisely that attitude which was the deepest single "cause" of our entanglement last time. If in another crisis it is adopted by our powerful captains of industry and our greatest financial magnates, by the corporation lawyers who normally staff the higher reaches of the Administration and its foreign services, by our press lords and the rabble of college presidents, professional interviewees, and other lay preachers who follow in their train, and by the professional politicians who sway to the winds of such influences, then the United States will not be neutral. In spite of whatever Presidential proclamations of neutrality may be issued, there will soon appear again a tremendous combination of pressures blocking every attempt to free the country from the war complex and strengthening every force tending to establish it; it is unlikely that any abstract legislation adopted in peace time would withstand the tide, and again, as before, the issue of an actual military participation in the conflict would doubtless depend before long upon external circumstances which we should be powerless to control.

No neutrality legislation can guarantee in advance that the country will be neutral when the actual crisis appears. One may even go farther and say that if the country were genuinely neutral, the old-established laws and precedents would largely suffice, and it would be a relatively simple matter to secure any new powers from Congress as the need for them arose. Even in 1915 President Wilson could readily have got an arms embargo from Congress had he wished to do so; while as late as 1916 he had to exert all his influence to prevent the passage of the Gore-McLemore resolutions, which would have withdrawn protection from citizens traveling in the maritime war zones, as the present neutrality measures propose to do. There is, indeed, a certain danger in writing too drastic neutrality laws upon the books beforehand; for there is always the possibility that political or economic pressures, or simply some concatenation of events unforeseen when the laws were drafted, may force their repeal, and the neutral state is certainly far more directly compromised by the repeal of legislation already in force than by a simple failure to enact such legislation.

Yet this by no means demonstrates the futility of such legislation. Rather, it serves to define more precisely the real ends which a neutrality act can hope to accomplish and the basic objectives at which, in consequence, it should be directed. Two things such an act can, perhaps, achieve. The first is to set up in time of peace large, plainly lettered, and inescapable warning signs, informing the populace and in particular its bankers and business men, editors and politicians, that if in another foreign crisis they set out to drive the nation recklessly and at top speed down the road to war, then war is the place where they are most likely to end.

This function of a neutrality act is admittedly more educational than immediately practical; but it is not for that reason an unimportant one. It is to be suspected, indeed, that it is by far the most important function which a peacetime act can perform. Mr. J. P. Morgan has just informed the Nye committee that the fact that the Allies "found us useful" in mobilizing in their behalf the financial and economic power of the American people in a major struggle in which the American people supposed themselves to be neutral is still "the fact of which I am most proud in all my business life of forty-five years." A mandatory embargo on loans to belligerent governments—which there are various possible means of evading—might not prevent Mr. Morgan from again rendering so great a service to a foreign power. It might, however, lead him very seriously to consider what he was doing before a second time devoting himself to such a cause; and it should certainly impress upon him a far livelier sense of the public responsibility attaching to his private actions than he now seems willing to admit.

Similarly, restrictions on commodity exports might easily break down in practice, but their existence should nevertheless force the ordinary manufacturer and farmer, the politician and the newspaper reader, to face this basic question of neutrality at the beginning. Indeed, the mere debate over such measures is already doing so. In a new book Mr. Allen W. Dulles and Mr. Hamilton Fish Armstrong have discovered that an American export embargo might work to promote a conquest of China by Japan or "weight the world against the kind of government to which the United States is dedicated" by facilitating a victory of the German and Italian dictatorships over Franco-British democracy. For this reason they are, perhaps rightly, skeptical of commercial embargoes. But far from demonstrating the futility of such embargoes as a neutrality measure, this only demonstrates that in the given cases Messrs. Dulles and Armstrong would not wish to be neutral. In this way, the presence of a strong embargo act upon the books might compel the country as a whole to decide, at the outset, whether its primary purpose was to maintain neutrality or to maintain the territorial integrity of China or the military security of France and Britain in Europe. If the decision is in the latter sense, then neutrality of course becomes a dead issue, and the only problem is the practical, though somewhat ignoble, one of seeing to it that as far as possible other nations do our actual fighting for us. But the neutrality act will have helped to insure that the decision is recognized for what it is, made clearly and consciously, and based upon some more rational concept of genuine national interest than the emotional reactions to the first waves of war hysteria.

This is the first possible function of peace-time neutrality legislation. Assuming that the country does meet the foreign-war crisis with a conscious policy of genuine neutrality, there remains the second function which such legislation can be expected to perform. Not the least significant lesson of our last experience is its demonstration that the outbreak of any modern great war must be an instant and violent shock to our own economy, indeed, to our whole established complex of "national interests." On July 24, 1914, the United States, though suffering from a business recession, was moving comfortably enough through a world which seemed to present no issues graver than the pasteboard problems of party politics; by August 4 we were facing financial collapse and economic disaster while we were swamped under a deluge of lesser difficulties any one of which would have been a major sensation by itself in normal times. So another great war is certain to create, at its outbreak and during its further progress, a complex of problems which American statesmanship will be called upon to solve. The second possible function of peace-time neutrality legislation is to prepare as well as may be solutions which will not include the final confession of diplomatic bankruptcy represented by a resort to war.

Here the first obstacle to be recognized is the difficulty of anticipating the exact conditions which will be presented. If the foreign war is such a minor one as that between Italy and Ethiopia, it will present no problem; but if the legislation is designed only to meet such a major war as one between the League powers and an Italo-German combination, then it may be perverted, as the neutrality act of 1935 was perverted, to entangle the country in the minor conflict which it was not intended to cover. Legislation providing against another major European war—which would almost necessarily repeat the 1914 situation, with one side overwhelmingly predominant at sea—would hardly apply to a Russo-Japanese conflict, in which each belligerent could doubtless keep its back door open to American imports; while a world war in which Japan joined the Central Powers and perhaps Italy against Great Britain, France, and Russia would present complexities not easy to analyze in advance.

In other ways the problem would be quite different from what it was in 1914. For technical reasons it is doubtful whether the submarine can ever again play as nearly dominant a role as it did in the spring of 1917. On the other hand, the aeroplane, in conjunction with the submarine and mine, has put the old-fashioned "close" blockade out of the question, and so rendered inapplicable the great body of international law and precedent on that subject. Maritime war zones—the new concept which we so sternly rejected in 1915—would seem to have become a military necessity, though a legal apparatus for regularizing them scarcely exists at present. In the economic no less than in the military field significant differences may be anticipated. For one thing, we possess a much stronger munitions industry than we had in 1914, which will of course be thirsting for profits; and that extremely important branch of it which manufactures aeroplanes and aeroplane engines commands an extraordinary popular sympathy and support never accorded the makers of the more pedestrian instruments of slaughter. We now have a considerable merchant marine under our own flag; its existence will make it more difficult for a foreign sea power to control our commerce, as the Allies did from 1914 on, but will at the same time increase the risk of explosive incidents. On the other hand, the trend toward national self-sufficiency leaves the whole future position of international trade and its importance to our domestic economy in some doubt; while other powers lack the cash and collateral resources available to them in 1914 for mobilizing American industry in their behalf.

With so many unknown variables present, it is impossible to solve the equation in advance. Particularly is it futile to attempt to search out every point at which a controversy with one or the other of the belligerents might arise, and provide against each by a specific waiver of neutral "rights" or a specific commitment to observe more exacting neutral "duties." The provisions of the Pittman bill, authorizing the President to withdraw protection from nationals trading with or traveling to belligerent countries, might under certain circumstances prevent the development of some kinds of controversy, but there are many possible kinds of controversy which they do not cover, and circumstances could easily arise under which an unwise use of the power would invite trouble. Their real value is simply as an instrument for impressing upon the country the fact that all neutral "rights" are more or less shadowy substances with no final sanctity attaching to them, and that it is always within the discretion of any government to grant or withhold protection to its citizens abroad, not in accordance with the desires of the citizens but in accordance with the broad ends of national policy and interest. With such a statute on the books the Executive faced with another Lusitania crisis—or with the threat of it—would have a means which President Wilson lacked for controlling the tremendous emotional forces involved. It seems unlikely that legislation can, in this field, do more; and the Pittman bill doubtless does this well enough.

But the fact that last time we acquiesced in many Entente violations of our claimed "rights" which we probably would not have tolerated for a moment from the Germans seems sufficient proof that the controversies themselves are of minor importance. It is not to the elimination of the inevitable surface frictions that one must look for the real safeguard, but to preventing the development of deeper explosive forces which these frictions might ignite. Here is the most significant, and obviously the most difficult, task before the author of any neutrality legislation. What he must prepare for is a sudden and violent dislocation, in quite unforeseeable directions, of the whole established political and economic framework. The first impact upon the United States might, as last time, cause a severe economic depression; it might come in the form of a sudden and unhealthy prosperity. The emotional impact would certainly be a powerful one and probably of first importance in the development of later events; and one cannot help asking whether peace-time legislation, by considering questions of propaganda, communications, and so on, could not usefully give more attention to this phase of the subject. But so far Washington has concentrated its efforts primarily upon the economic aspects. How can present legislation discourage the reappearance of a great "vested interest" in the success of one side in the struggle, tying our own economy in with that of one belligerent, inciting the other to attack us and exacerbating the emotional force of every controversy with him, tending to bind the hands of the government in its efforts to control the situation, and perhaps forcing us at last to come to the rescue of the favored side in order to save our own economic skins?

Clearly, the broad answer seems to be by preserving as nearly as possible our normal peace-time economic relationships. Today, as throughout the long history of neutrality, the ideal solution is to secure the maintenance of our normal trade relationships with both belligerents; and because even now certain quite possible war situations might present a balance of forces that would enable us to maintain them, one must look with suspicion on too hasty and complete a surrender of the older concepts of neutral rights. For this reason, if for no other, mandatory embargoes on the primary commercial exports seem to be ruled out, for however they might work in practice they would necessarily destroy at the outset the normal economic system. If the outbreak of the war struck us first, as it did last time, through a loss of foreign trade, mandatory embargoes would merely intensify the suffering and heighten the pressure for relief through an abandonment of neutrality. Permissive authority to embargo commercial exports, however, would be a powerful weapon in the hands of a skilful and determinedly neutral President for defending our commerce against belligerent interference and so maintaining more or less the status quo ante. The trouble is that one cannot count on a President who would be both skilful and neutral, and if he failed in either respect the result might be disaster.

Though in the case of, say, a Russo-Japanese war we might be able to maintain our normal commerce with both belligerents, it seems unlikely that the most skilful President, with the widest authority, could do so in the case of another general European war. The problem becomes therefore one of providing the means for adjustment to a situation not exactly foreseeable and probably of a rapidly changing character. Again the mandatory commercial embargo is ruled out, for it is impossible to make adjustments with a rigid instrument. The mandatory embargo on loans to belligerent governments, which places a kind of extreme upper limit upon any adjustment through an abnormal expansion of war exports, is doubtless valuable. It must be recognized, however, that the possibility of evading it or of breaking it down—as happened last time—through resort to the mechanisms of commercial credit, triangular or private loans, cannot easily be guarded against except at the cost of destroying the financing of ordinary trade. And if it sets an upper limit upon the development of an unhealthy war trade, it provides no lower limit to check a war depression.

Aside from the mandatory embargo on actual munitions —a question which seems to be of relatively minor consequence—about the only other device in the present bill for controlling our economic relationship to the war is the permissive embargo on commercial exports. Except as a threat, however, this power seems at once too feeble and too sweeping to be of great practical use. On the one hand, it is difficult to prevent its evasion by the routing of exports through some other neutral country; on the other hand, if it could be made effective it would in a great war be too dangerous to our own export trade to be put into operation. While it cuts off excessive exports to one side, again it offers no means of recouping the loss of exports to the other. Some more subtle instrument seems necessary, and it has been searched for in a rationing or quota system. It has been suggested that legislation, either permissive or mandatory, should confine commercial exports to belligerents to the pre-war average. Yet in this simple form it is still open to most of the same objections. There is still the problem of exports by way of neutrals; if this were met by extending the quotas to all countries, the gap left in our export trade by the cutting off of certain belligerents would remain. When great foreign trading nations, moreover, find their energies absorbed by war, their former customers must apply elsewhere. For a neutral United States this would offer a legitimate increase in exports, and one from which it would be very difficult to withhold our own producers.

What seems to be wanted is some flexible instrument for the control of our foreign trade in war time which, while maintaining an upper limit on our total exports to all nations somewhere near the pre-war level, will permit of a wide range of readjustment within this limit as between both neutral and belligerent powers. To construct such an instrument is not easy. The experience of the European countries with quota controls during the depression may suggest means of going about it; the enactment of a simple permissive embargo law now may provide a foundation upon which the necessary refinements can be erected. But at all events, it will take much more time and thought than are available in a hurried session at the beginning of a Presidential year to build real machinery for the control even of the economic factors in a war crisis. Perhaps the real point of the whole present neutrality debate is simply its indication of the complexity of the subject, and our immense lack of concepts, public instruments, and popular understanding necessary to begin to deal adequately with it.

But there is one other lesson to be derived from the argument. And that is that while permissive powers seem unavoidable in any attempt to deal with an unpredictable future, any permissive power carries with it as great a danger of misuse as a hope of successful application to the end intended. If the President is to have power to deal with such violent situations as are here anticipated, they must be real powers, and that means that they must be as powerful for ill as for good. It is to be suspected that the ancillary as well as the possible direct advantages of neutrality legislation outweigh the dangers; but the dangers are there, and the only final safeguard against them lies in the American people's ability to understand its own objectives and control its own governmental agencies for their attainment.

[This is the last of two articles by Mr. Millis on The Last War and the Next.]

Washington Weekly

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, January 19

THE Supreme Court's cardinal function, beating the living with the bones of the dead, has just been taken over for a few hours by the United States Senate, with results threatening an abrupt end to the munitions investigation and defeat to the exponents of a more rigorous neutrality bill than the Administration desires.

Ostensibly, all this has come about because the blundering Nye wounded the feelings of Tom Connally, Carter Glass, and other Wilson idolators by impugning the honesty of Harding's predecessor. Actually, many other forces contributed to the Senate flare-up that followed. There is a nasty story going around Washington to the effect that the Nye committee was about to present certain evidence—a matter of recent aeroplane salesmanship in relation to a foreign power—that would strike close to the present occupant of the White House.

It is known that the committee has in its secret files certain data that, if disclosed, would be embarrassing to Mr. Roosevelt. But it is far from certain that this circumstance had anything to do with starting the current effort to end the munitions probe by refusing Nye's committee the $5,000 to $10,000 needed to complete its job. On the other hand, it is clear that something more than worship for Wilson's memory moved some of those who supported the outraged Connally and Glass in their absurdly vituperative attack on Nye and his work. There is no doubt, for example, that malign advantage was taken of the situation by a number of Senators who are opposed to any form of neutrality legislation that would put restrictions on cotton, oil, or metals shipments to belligerents beyond the reach of political manipulation.

Nor can there be any doubt that others welcomed the opportunity provided to yield—under cover of an assumed love for Wilson's shade—to pressure from their Italian-American constituents in respect to neutrality legislation. Members of Congress, especially those from New York and New Jersey, have been subjected to heavy pressure of that kind in the last week. Delegations from Italian sections of the East have descended on the Capitol bearing promises of reelection for Congressmen who see to it that any neutrality legislation enacted at this session exempts the Italo-Ethiopian situation. To do otherwise, they argue, would be what the diplomats call an "unfriendly act." Persons closely following the progress of the neutrality legislation in committee report that this newest of Washington lobbies already has made some progress. Though the artichoke and tomato kings who make up this pro-Duce lobby will probably not succeed in their basic effort, they may achieve their secondary aim, which is to see that there is no stringent provision with respect to embargoes on raw materials in the bill that Congress passes. Nye's blunder will have helped them there.

IRONICALLY, the storm of invective that blunder loosed in the Senate held up action on the bill to indemnify the Americans who physically paid the price of making the world safe for democracy. When the storm broke, the Senate galleries were jammed with representatives of all the veterans' organizations, come to see their two-billion-dollar bonus bill rushed through the Senate for the next to the last time. They confidently expect Roosevelt to veto the bill and have even sent word to him that such an act will not be held against him by their followers at the polls in November. They expect, just as confidently, to pass the bill over his veto. His legislative field marshals, including Speaker Byrns, who in the past has always voted against the bonus, are all hurrying to get their names down as supporters of the current bill, after failing in their efforts to obtain from the White House instructions as to what position the Administration wants them to take.

Morgenthau, who as Secretary of the Treasury is at least nominally in charge of the federal government's purse, also was barren of instructions when he appeared before the Senate Finance Committee a few days ago to discuss the budgetary situation. Thanks to Senator Couzens, who holds to an old-fashioned belief that the government belongs to the people and that they have a right, therefore, to know what it is doing, we now know that even in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury the federal credit is approaching a perilously strained condition that must be checked either by reductions in spending or by an increase in taxation. Roosevelt still thinks he cannot afford the latter. The nation cannot afford the former. And under typical Rooseveltian management the nation will get neither in any substantial degree.

* * * *

WHILE on the subject of finance, I should like to direct attention to one phase of the New Deal in banking that has just been completed. When the nation's banking structure came tumbling down in 1933, one of the edifices that crashed with an especially loud roar was the huge First National Bank of Detroit. Later a Senate investigation was to show that the structure ought to have been razed months, if not years, earlier if its depositors and countless investors were to be protected from the results of the financial manipulations practiced by the banking group's operators. They had dealt lavishly with themselves in loans to finance their speculations in the bank's shares and in real estate, and then had resorted to every trick their lawyers and accountants could devise to hide the bank's condition and keep the dollars of depositors rolling in and their own loans from being called.

In the end, of course, those tricks were of no avail, and the institution was thrown into receivership. Out of the resulting liquidation it has been possible to pay the depositors amounts totaling no more than 70 per cent, and long ago it became necessary to turn to the directors for collection of their statutory liability, amounting to $29,000,000. Since the bank's directorate of 110 members included all the leading industrialists of Detroit and dummies representing virtually all the big automobile corporations, since these interests, according to their latest statements, have again grown rich and fat about the exchequer, since some of the men involved are millionaires many times over, and since under the law they were individually as well as collectively liable for the whole $29,000,000—you naturally would assume that Mr. J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, would insist upon payment of the entire amount. But you would be wrong. Mr. O'Connor has just settled for thirteen cents on the dollar, or a total of $3,800,000.

What is more, the compromise settlement was made the occasion of a sort of public jubilation in the federal courtroom at Detroit, to which it had to be taken for formal approval by Judge Edward J. Moinet. All the parties to the compact, including the Treasury's lawyers, the directors' lawyers, and Judge Moinet, joined in praising one another. After sealing away from "gossips" the documents that would show how the compromise was reached, who paid what and who paid nothing, Judge Moinet, a Coolidge appointee, topped off the proceedings with a windy speech in which he eulogized the men responsible for the bank's crash and assured all within sound of his voice that no more honest men ever trod the earth. Neither he nor the Detroit press, whose headlines screamed "Banking Group Gets Clean Bill" and "Bankers Vindicated by Court," even mentioned the fact that a number of directors in question have been under criminal indictment since June, 1934, for multiple violations of the National Banking Act.

* * * *

IT is probable that only a nasty, suspicious mind would perceive any parallel between these happenings at Detroit and certain phenomena exhibited at the Jackson Day dinner here and the meeting of the Democratic National Committee that followed it. In a place of honor close by the President and immediately next to the Vice-President of the United States at the dinner sat J. Bruce Kremer, who back in 1933 patriotically had yielded to the Roosevelt edict that no New Dealer should attempt to cash in on membership in the Democratic National Committee. Mr. Kremer yielded by giving up his committee post and setting up a luxurious law shop here directly across the hall from a similar establishment opened by Arthur F. Mullen, another committeeman who agreed with Mr. Roosevelt.

How right they were, at least from the standpoint of usefulness, has been proved several times over. Mr. Kremer, freed of the responsibilities of representing Montana on the committee, was able last summer to render $5,000 worth of services to one of the power consortiums fighting the Administration's holding-company bill. And it has just been disclosed that he was successful last summer in persuading the Department of Justice, under his old pal, Cummings, to approve a $250,000 payment to the claimants in settlement of the fifteen-year-old Niowa-Shipping Board case. In two earlier Administrations the department had refused to honor the claim.

While Mr. Kremer has been busy with such matters, Mr. Mullen has been similarly occupied. Mr. Mullen, who represented Nebraska on the committee and was a Roosevelt floor leader at the 1932 convention, collected $25,000 from power interests for aiding them in their fight against the Administration's holding-company bill. A few months ago it was revealed that he was seeking a fee in the neighborhood of $175,000 from two Nebraska public authorities for services rendered in connection with the establishment of two PWA-financed power projects in that state.

The best part of it all is that Messrs. Kremer and Mullen have found a way of eating their cake and keeping it too. Both these men, whose resignations from the national committee contributed so mightily to the Roosevelt Administration's early reputation for moral and political probity, took an active part in the committee's deliberations the day after the dinner. Kremer attended on a proxy from Alaska. Mullen was there on a proxy from Puerto Rico. Robert Jackson, of New Hampshire, another who preferred the role of political lawyer to a committee post, also was in attendance. His son-in-law, W. Forbes Morgan, had succeeded him as committee secretary. Frank Hague, the New Jersey saint, was there, too, along with Horatio J. Abbott, whom Secretary Morgenthau forced to resign as Collector of Internal Revenue at Detroit under charges that his collectors were gathering campaign funds instead of taxes. Near them sat William A. Julian, who somehow never heard Mr. Roosevelt's call for all public office-holders to get off the committee. Mr. Julian occupies an even more obscure role than that of the Vice-President. He is Treasurer of the United States.

Loose Construction

By HEYWOOD BROWN

THE broadcast entitled "Liberty at the Crossroads" which the two big chains refused was a most interesting radio revelation of Republican psychology. It contained a mother-in-law joke which was undoubtedly inserted to show that the G. O. P. is faithful to the ancient traditions of this country, and there was also a mildly off-color anecdote to preserve the Lincolnian approach.

But chiefly I was interested in Chairman Fletcher's estimate of the intelligence of the average voter. In one of the sketches, if they may be dignified by such a name, two characters, John and Mary, are introduced as "typical young Americans." John's recurrent phrase is "Huh? Sure." He describes an expected wedding gift as "a bedroom soot." The existence of such a thing as a national debt comes to him as a complete surprise. He is utterly amazed when he is told that he himself is a part of the government. As a matter of fact, he can hardly be blamed for that after some recent Supreme Court decisions.

But all in all John Albert Smith is presented as a complete moron and his fiancée, Mary Phoebe Jones, as a young lady who has not yet quite made that grade. This in the eyes of the Republican National Committee is a typical American couple. The sincerity of Dr. Fletcher's belief in this state of affairs is illustrated by the fact that John is solemnly advised that the farmers of America will be completely ruined if they receive high prices for their products. Mr. Fletcher has a touching faith that the average American is all set to say "Huh? Sure" to any economic hand-me-down the G. O. P. has to offer. But isn't there at least a chance that the line may be revised to read, "Huh? Not on your life."

* * *

I THINK there may be some passing interest, too, in the identity of the author who wrote "Liberty at the Crossroads" entire, jokes, economic theories, and everything but the music. He was born in Iowa and his name is Henry Fisk Carlton. Mr. Carlton was an instructor at the University of Missouri and after service in the war took Professor Baker's English 47 at Harvard. He wrote a play which was produced on Broadway, and in 1925 became an instructor in English at New York University.

But at this point one cannot help making the inquiry: "Why, I thought the Republican Party was all against the professor in politics. Haven't I read somewhere that we are being led to our doom by the crackbrained theories of Ph.D.'s from Columbia and Harvard?"

On closer examination I find that Mr. Fletcher could easily make an adequate reply. Henry Fisk Carlton is only an M. A. and an instructor. He has all the book learning the Republican Party can afford to use and even at that he has to stoop a little.

WALTER LIPPMANN, plutocracy's favorite Pippa, finds that all's well with the world now that the Supreme Court's in its heaven and the Triple A has been killed. "The court has cleared the way for a far better agricultural problem," he writes. Mr. Lippmann has just discovered the problem of erosion, and he thinks we should have more scientific farming with the cultivation of legumes to hold the soil. He does not deal with the point that this will involve the constitutionality of the TVA and the even further question of whether the court would ever conceivably allow the government to manufacture low-priced phosphate fertilizer at Muscle Shoals and sell it directly to the farmer. There will be precious few legumes unless this is done.

Mr. Lippmann thinks the Supreme Court would certainly approve any law to promote really scientific farming "under the general-welfare clause." He asks naively, "What can be more truly a national interest than to preserve an agricultural population capable of feeding and clothing the American people and of conserving the land upon which the whole future depends?"

What, indeed! But I trust that Mr. Lippmann, in this Pippa phase of his political economy, will not continue to leap so blithely across the deep grave dug by the six stalwarts of the High Bench. If he had taken the trouble to turn the page he would have found the Herald Tribune in its leading editorial pointing with pride to the discomfiting words of Mr. Justice Roberts, "It [the Agricultural Adjustment Act] remains a means for effectuating the regulation of agricultural production, a matter not within the powers of Congress."

Of course Mr. Lippmann may argue, and argue very eloquently, that words may mean anything you want them to mean; indeed, that they mean two utterly divergent things if that happens to suit your convenience. But I would refer him to the words of Senator Norris, a man not unfamiliar with the ways of Congress or the courts. Before the Senate Agricultural Committee Senator Norris said, "I don't believe that if the Supreme Court decision stands we can pass any law to regulate agriculture."

That is certainly what the court said. I trust that Mr. Lippmann is not going to join its critics and detractors by subtly suggesting that it was only playing politics and that it has one ruling for a Democratic Administration and another for a Republican.

Correspondence

Cats, Dogs, and Children

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In your issue of January 8 you furnish us with an arresting editorial stating that a contributor of the Englewood News (December 12, 1935) reports that about one hundred starving families of that wealthy suburb are gleaning scraps of food along with the homeless dogs and cats.

Just to add to the grim humor of the affair, I will report that a number of my friends, seated around a bridge table some two weeks after the incident referred to, heard one of Englewood's affluent first ladies confess that she was organizing a local branch of the Association for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals to look after homeless dogs and cats.

Would it be pushing inference beyond its legitimate office if we presumed that the light of publicity had stung Englewood's best people awake to a sense of social obligation to dogs and cats? That hungry dogs and cats should have to contend with children on the garbage heap for scraps of food should overwhelm our best citizens with a sense of shame.

New York, January 3

BEN HOWE

"Let Not Farmers and Planters Rise"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Apropos of your comment in the January 15 issue of The Nation on the Supreme Court AAA decision, we wish to call to your attention a poem written by a Jeffersonian critic of Federalist policy in 1798. Had the writer been a prophet as well as a poet, he might have dedicated it to Mr. Justice Roberts.

Let us always the poor beat down
And raise the rich to high renown
Lord if to this you don't agree,
We shall all on a level be—
And none will reverence the high blood,
Which do forbid we pray dear Lord.
Let not farmers and planters rise
To rank amongst the great and wise.

This was reprinted in "Essays in Honor of William E. Dodd," edited by Avery Craven, in the essay by Maude Howlett Woodfin on Contemporary Opinion in the Virginia of Thomas Jefferson.

BENJAMIN B. KENDRICK

MARY CATHERINE PROCTOR

Greensboro, N. C., January 13

"Help Build Palestine"

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Your editorial on McDonald in the issue of January 15 studiously omits his profound appreciation of Palestine as the one positive hope for German Jewry and the spiritual emancipation of world Jewry. Liberals who do not cooperate with the Zionist cause subtly betray their liberalism and stamp their philo-Semitism as a selfish gesture. Keep your compassion; help build Palestine.

Burlington, Vt., January 9

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Labor and Industry

How to Break a Labor Union

By RAY L. KRINGER

St. Louis, January 17

THE story of how the Brown Shoe Company smashed the unions in its plants in small towns of Illinois, Indiana, Tennessee, and Missouri was told by the present writer in The Nation of November 13. In that article the president of the International Boot and Shoe Workers' Union was quoted as follows: "It seems as though some hidden hand was able to bring about a situation which resulted in the return to our general office of the charters sent to locals." The "hidden hand" has now been fully disclosed in a hearing before the Regional Labor Board in St. Louis, which has issued a complaint charging the company with discrimination in firing four union employees in its Salem, Illinois, plant and with "inducing a Citizens' Committee to coerce, intimidate, and interfere with the employees in the exercise of the right" to organize and bargain collectively. Twenty-one days were required to take the testimony; and the 3,600-page transcript tells a sordid story.

John A. Bush, president of the Brown Company, testified that when he hired A. A. Ahner as "labor-relations counselor" he did not know Ahner was the head of a strike-breaking agency. The manufacturer explained that Ahner was employed in the spring of 1934 to relieve company officials of details incident to meeting with employees under Section 7-a of the National Industrial Recovery Act; he was not hired to break unions.

Termination of Ahner's connection with the shoe company happened to coincide with the dissolution of most of the locals of the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union in Brown plants. The locals in the Sullivan, Illinois, and the Charleston, Illinois, plants gave up their charters in August, 1935; the Mattoon local was dissolved the following month and the Salem local was disintegrating. Ahner's thirteen months' employment by the Brown Company at $200 a month ended in September, 1935.

Ahner was engaged by President Bush of the Brown Company following a conference at which the "private detective" impressed the manufacturer as a "square-shooter." Bush declined to reveal who recommended Ahner. Compared with his nationally known competitors, Ahner is small fry—but judged by the growing list of his clients in the St. Louis area he is winning recognition. Ahner testified at the Labor Board hearing that he is sole owner of the A. A. Ahner Detective Agency and of Industrial Investigators and Engineers. He admitted that he received his training in the employ of the Railway Audit and Inspection Company, rated in the class of the Bergoff strike-breaking agency. Ahner went into business for himself about seven years ago. "It's worth lots of money to me," he testified.

Although Ahner's men were described by a former employee of his agency as a "slugging outfit," finesse rather than violence was employed for the most part to discourage membership of Brown Company workers in the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union. M. L. Norris, a union organizer in Salem, bore the brunt of the violence which occurred. On one occasion Norris was lured from his home at night by a fake telephone call and slugged by unidentified assailants who ran their car against his and started an altercation. Norris "missed being killed by an inch," a physician testified. Several weeks later Norris was besieged in his home by a mob and threatened with a "one-way ride."

During the siege of the Norris home Police Commissioner George James of Salem called and requested the union organizer to turn in the charter of the shoe workers' local so that the Brown Company would not close the factory, as it had threatened to do. James was a member of the Citizens' Committee which took a leading part in the effort to kill the union movement. The Citizens' Committee also included Mayor Omer McMackin and leading merchants.

Mayor McMackin's testimony was one of the high lights of the hearing. On October 14, during a strike at the Salem factory, the Mayor assembled a group of special deputies and gave them orders to "stop that picketing by 11:30 a.m." McMackin acted after a telephone conversation with President Bush of the Brown Company in St. Louis. Several pickets were clubbed and kicked.

"Were your instructions to stop picketing in conformity with the laws of Illinois?" asked David Shaw, attorney for the Labor Board.

"Yes," replied the Mayor, and went on to explain that the law he had in mind was "one that says two or three persons, in an emergency, may be construed as a mob."

"Do you realize," pursued Attorney Shaw, "that there is a provision in the Constitution giving the right of freedom of assembly to citizens of this country?"

"When it comes to the courts that law doesn't stand in Illinois," was the answer of Mayor McMackin.

When asked to elaborate on his theory that "two or three may be a mob," Mayor McMackin explained that he wouldn't consider people gathered for an ice-cream social a mob, nor would he consider as such the gathering of members of the Citizens' Committee at the country club.

Among other witnesses for the shoe company was T. H. Lawyer, former president of the disbanded Sullivan local. After Lawyer's testimony that he was "always in hot water" with company officials, a rebuttal witness told of overhearing a long-distance telephone conversation between Lawyer and Walter Ekins, general superintendent for the Brown Company, on the night the Sullivan local burned its charter. Lawyer's part of the conversation was reported as follows: "Hello, Ekins. Yes, I did the job. I did what I told you I would do—burned the charter. About 200 voted in favor of it. I will never let them organize in this factory again. No, there is not much you can do for me." A few weeks later Lawyer moved to St. Louis and was given a job as salesman for the Brown Shoe Company. Ekins admitted that the company kept a paid spy in the Salem factory.

Clarence J. Gullion, president of the Joint Council of the Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, testified that Ahner once told him that the Brown Company "would give $250

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

000 to be rid of the union." The witness said that he took the remark as a "gentle hint that someone could sell the union to Ahner for that much."

Evidence brought out at the hearing showed that the Citizens' Committee kept up a constant barrage of petitions, statements, and threats to discourage membership in the union. In one instance a chain-store manager fired the father-in-law of the Salem union chairman because, it was testified, the store "wished to remain neutral in the trouble at the shoe factory." The breach of neutrality on the part of the store employee apparently occurred when he extended the hospitality of his home to a union organizer. The store manager, however, admitted that he himself attended meetings of the Citizens' Committee.

Salem union employees swore that factory foremen warned them that "they are going to do you exactly as they did the people in the other plants. The Brown Shoe Company does not intend to have unions in its plants." Citizens' committees functioned in Sullivan, Charleston, and Mattoon. They became most active after Ahner was hired by the shoe company as "labor-relations counselor." A member of Ahner's staff, Harry Widman, was placed in charge of labor at the Sullivan and Charleston plants. Widman worked in Sullivan with the Citizens' Committee, which hand-picked employees for the factory when it reopened after a brief shut-down in August, 1935. Factory shut-downs in Mattoon and Charleston because of "lack of orders" afforded merchant members of the citizens' committees opportunities to apply their greatest pressure upon union workers, by withdrawal of credit. It was after such lay-offs that unions in these two towns voted to turn in their charters.

Government Attorney Shaw requested at the close of the hearing that the voluminous transcript in the case be sent to Washington to allow the entire National Labor Relations Board to issue a ruling.

Facts for Consumers

THE financial statements of the big packers make particularly interesting reading this year because of the packers' frequent protestations that high meat prices are bad business for them as well as for consumers. Wilson and Company had one of the most successful years in its history, with sales aggregating $223,000,000 against $100,000,000 for 1934. The reduction in live stock caused by the drought and the AAA resulted in only a 5 per cent decrease in the total volume of meat handled. Armour and Company also fared well. Sales increased from $564,000,000 in 1934 to $683,000,000 in 1935, or approximately 21 per cent, although the tonnage handled was 3 per cent less than the year before. If the $9,791,172 reserved for the now void processing taxes is added to the company's net profit of $9,377,849, it will be seen that Armour had indeed a gala year. It was the consumer who footed the bill for the drought.

* * *

FINAL argument in the now famous complaint of the Federal Trade Commission against the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company was heard last week. The commission contends that All-State tires made by Goodyear for Sears, Roebuck and All-Weather tires distributed under the Goodyear name are "entirely comparable," although the former sells for less. Goodyear, of course, denies this, and in its argument makes several points which consumers will find interesting.

The president of the company acknowledged that "there is no such thing as a first-line tire." A satisfactory standard of value, as far as the ultimate buyer is concerned, would be determined by mileage in actual performance, but such a standard is now admitted to be an impossibility. One of the engineers testified that despite careful control of specifications 300 per cent variability in performance was possible. Why, then, should the consumer pay attention to anything but price when buying a tire? As the Consumer suggests, "A tire is a tire, and differences between hundreds of makes are becoming less significant."

Goodyear inferentially conceded this when it argued that it was entitled to charge more for All-Weather tires because it had spent a fortune in advertising the Goodyear name. "We believe," said one of the company's lawyers, "that the showing of the total amount expended in respect of advertising for the full history of the company is relevant in giving some measure of that value which is given to Goodyear dealers in the sale of Goodyear tires and not to Sears, Roebuck in the sale of a tire to Sears, Roebuck." This "value," which obviously bears no relation to quality, amounted to some $72,000,000. It appears, then, that the price charged the consumer is determined not by comparative value but by how extensively—and expensively—a tire is advertised.

The Goodyear matter is a test case for the Federal Trade Commission. In its decision the commission and eventually the courts will pass on the legality of selling identical merchandise at one price when it is nationally advertised and at a lower price when it is distributed under a private brand name through a chain store. Whether a decision against Goodyear will actually benefit consumers by price reductions is questionable.

8th Printing!

SEX HABITS

A VITAL FACTOR IN WELL-BEING

By A. Buschke, M.D. and
F. Jacobsohn, M.D.
Specializing Physicians to the Great
Continental Rudolf-Virchow
Hospital

Foreword by
Gerard L. Moench, M.D.
Associate Professor of Gynecology,
New York Post-graduate Hospital,
Columbia University

11 Full Pages of Photographs

SUBJECTS EMBRACED

THE SEX ORGANS (Male, Female)
SEX INTERCOURSE (Analysis, Nature,
Methods, Frequency)
SEX DIFFICULTIES (Adjustment, Technique)
MARRIAGE (Sex Aspects, Instruction)
VALUE OF REGULAR SEX INTER-
COURSE
SEX HYGIENE (Precautions, Directions)
THE SEX IMPULSE (Contrasted: In Men, In Women)
SEX VARIATION (Physical, Psychological)
VARYING SEX PRACTICES
SEXUAL SHORTCOMINGS (Impotence,
Frigidity, Sterility, etc.)
SEX DANGERS (Colitis Interruptus, Reservatus, etc.)
SEX ABNORMALITIES (Perversion,
Sadism, Masochism, Fetishism, Ex-
hibitionism, Homosexuality, Her-
maphroditism, etc.)
REPRODUCTION, FERTILIZATION,
PERIODICITY, HYGIENE

THIRTY ILLUSTRATIONS

THE SEX ORGANS OF MEN (4
plates, * 15 illustrations)
THE SEX ORGANS OF WOMEN (3
plates, * 6 illustrations)
THE PROCESS OF REPRODUCTION
(1 plate, * 8 illustrations)
FERTILIZATION AND DEVELOP-
MENT (1 plate, * 2 illustrations)
DEVELOPMENT BEFORE BIRTH (2 plates, * 4 illustrations)

* Full-page.

PRESS COMMENTS

"Most individuals will profit immensely by reading every word in this book, because it is based on a thorough understanding of the sex life of both men and women." — Journal of the American Medical Assn.

"This work on the sex life, a collaboration by two outstanding specialists, gives admirably and simply the facts necessary for a practical understanding of the sex impulse, the sex organs and the sex act. It contains a valuable and beautiful collection of photographs." — Private Hospitals.

"... The sanest and most practical views of sexology and sexual hygiene that can be found. A clear conception of the male and female reproductive organs can be obtained. The description is accompanied by a set of beautiful photographs of the various organs. A finer set could not be found in any anatomy book..." — Glasgow University Publication.

"... gives those facts essential to a correct understanding of sex and a very accurate and scientific account... and has the added advantage of being illustrated." — Medical Times (London).

* The membership of the A. M. A. consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

Price $2.50 (postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS (Dept. 323-N) 333 SIXTH AVE., N. Y. C.

In commenting on the case the Consumer points out that a 25 per cent price differential between "first-line" Sears, Roebuck tires and Goodyear tires was suddenly decreased to 10 per cent. "One store," it says, "attributes the change in differential to a suggestion made by the Chase National Bank, connected with both Sears and Goodyear."

If the adverse publicity given Goodyear by government agencies continues, the rubber company can soon be expected to cry that it is being persecuted. A few days before the FTC hearing, Secretary of Labor Perkins made public the report of a fact-finding board which held that the company was wholly unjustified in attempting to extend the six-hour working day to eight hours, that it did not fairly enter into negotiations with its employees, and that the reduction in the cost of tires would be at the expense of the workers and would be negligible as far as the consumer was concerned.

Radio and newspaper puffing of another tire manufacturer, the General Tire and Rubber Company, makers of the "new general dual balloon tire," is deflated by a complaint issued by the FTC. Claims that the new tire is "blowout-proof" are alleged to be untrue.

* * *

IN its annual report the Federal Trade Commission makes two recommendations which, if carried out, would greatly increase its ability to protect consumers. Both are the outgrowth of experience in particular cases. The Marmola case of five years ago, in which the United States Supreme Court ruled that the commission had no authority to interfere with the sale of an admittedly harmful drug because no unfair competition had been proved, undoubtedly prompted the present suggestion for an amendment to Section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act to prohibit "unfair or deceptive acts and practices in commerce" as well as unfair methods of competition. Section 2 of the Clayton Act, under which action was brought against Goodyear, should be clarified, the commission suggests, so as clearly to "define the discrimination in price intended to be forbidden." The section now expressly permits variations in price which are the result of "differences in the . . . quantity of the commodity sold."

* * *

THE distributor of Bab-O, the B. T. Babbitt Company, has agreed by stipulation with the FTC "to stop asserting that Bab-O banishes dull film, water lines, or the most stubborn dirt instantly, that its use ends all scouring and scrubbing, that it will not harm nail polish and will soften hands, that Bab-O was discovered by scientists or is a new discovery."

* * *

THE Consumers' Division has again been transferred, this time to the Department of Labor. The record of play now stands—NEC to NRA to Secretary Perkins's DOL. According to Walton Hamilton, who continues as director, the transfer does not in any way affect the work or policies of the Consumers' Division. Long-time plans which cannot be completed for several years are being made by the division, indicating that the consumers' representatives in Washington now have a feeling of greater permanence. One of the first projects is to be a study of housing and house-furnishings, with the development of standard specifications. Projected also is a plan for the compilation of all available specifications for consumer goods, and their publication in conveniently sized booklets. Under Dr. Hamilton the division has shown a commendable independence, but it has not yet tested its strength against powerful commercial interests.

RUTH BRINDZE

[Facts for Consumers appears every other week in The Nation. Miss Brindze cannot answer questions in regard to the merits of individual products.]

OYEZ! OYEZ!

Current interest in the Supreme Court and its decisions is so high that we have reduced from $4.50 to $3.00 the price of the volumes described below.

Does Congress or the Supreme Court control our welfare? Do you know what effect the Supreme Court has had on the development of this country? For an intelligent understanding of this vital issue of the day, read "the most fascinating book this month has produced." (John Chamberlain in THE NEW YORK TIMES).

HISTORIC OPINIONS of the UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

Edited, with Introductory Notes
BY AMBROSE DOSKOW

This volume contains, in full, in convenient form, the epoch-making decisions of the United States Supreme Court from the days of John Marshall to the decisions in the "Gold Clause" and N.R.A. cases—pronouncements which have shaped our government and have influenced the life of every American. Further, this work presents an epitomized history of the country as revealed in the judgments of the supreme tribunal of the nation. In the introductory notes, which precede each opinion, is given not only the general background of the controversy, both political and economic, but also the significance of the decision at the time it was rendered and its effect on us today.

OVER 550 PAGES

DISSENTING OPINIONS OF MR. JUSTICE HOLMES

"Only lawyers and litigants usually care to read what judges write, but this book is literature"—Zechariah Chafee, Jr., in THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

REPRESENTATIVE OPINIONS OF MR. JUSTICE HOLMES

"The reader who wishes to understand fully the working of Justice Holmes' mind will find it indispensable"

—THE NATION.

SOCIAL and ECONOMIC VIEWS of MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS

"Here is contained much more than law, namely, a philosophy of civilization."—L. M. Page in THE ANNALS of The American Academy of Political and Social Science.

These volumes are on sale at all bookstores at the new low price of $3 each. The four volumes, boxed, are $10.

THE VANGUARD PRESS

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to:

THE VANGUARD PRESS,
100 Fifth Avenue, New York City

Send me the volumes checked below:

.....HISTORIC OPINIONS OF THE U. S. SUPREME COURT	$3.00
.....DISSENTING OPINIONS OF MR. JUSTICE HOLMES	$3.00
.....REPRESENTATIVE OPINIONS OF MR. JUSTICE HOLMES	$3.00
.....THE SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC VIEWS OF MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS	$3.00
.....The four volumes, boxed	$10.00

☐ I enclose check or money order ☐ Send C.O.D.

Signed _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Books, Drama, Films

Revisitation

By SIEGFRIED SASOON

What voice revisits me this night, what face
To my heart's room returns?
From that perpetual silence where the grace
Of human sainthood burns
Hastes he once more to harmonize and heal?
I know not. Only I feel
His influence undiminished,
And his life's work in me and many, unfinished.

O fathering friend and scientist of good,
Who in solitude, one bygone summer's day,
And in throes of bodily anguish, passed away
From dream and conflict and research-lit lands
Of ethnologic learning—even as you stood
Selfless and ardent, resolute and gay,
So in this hour, in strange survival stands
Your ghost, whom I am powerless to repay.

A New Poet

Theory of Flight. By Muriel Rukeyser. With a Foreword by Stephen Vincent Benét. Yale University Press. $2.

"THEORY OF FLIGHT" is one of those rare first volumes which impress by their achievement more than by their promise. It is remarkable poetry to have been written by a girl of twenty-one, and would do credit to most of her elders. Miss Rukeyser has assimilated many of the best things in the modernist tradition, without aping any particular writer or school of writers, and also without seeking technical innovation as an end in itself. Her originality consists in making something new and making it well with the tools at hand, rather than in devising new instruments for others to use.

Unlike most very young poets, Miss Rukeyser is not primarily a lyricist, although her lines sing when there is occasion. Her poems not only present and celebrate experience but evaluate it. Here is a well-stored, vigorous mind attempting to bring its world into some kind of imaginative and human order.

The earlier poems are concerned with the writer's status as a young person. They make articulate the child's reactions to school, her parents, death, love, and the war, adding comments from a later wisdom:

Allies Advance, we see,
Six Miles South to Soissons. And we beat the drums.
Watchsprings snap in the mind, uncoil, relax,
the leafy years all somber with foreign war.
How could we know what exposed guts resembled?

Elsewhere she seeks to define her relation not to her personal history but as a twentieth-century American to her cultural heritage. She is able to justify the blood, to establish "continuance" with the American dream, but only by turning against its traditional forms, in a way that to her forbears would have seemed like treason:

Oh, we are afflicted by these present evils,
they press between the mirror and our eyes, obscuring your loaned mouths and borrowed hair.

The poems in which she develops this thesis are among the most moving in the book, and were evidently conceived in some anguish of spirit. In place of the sophomoric rebellion that might have been expected from one of her age, there is the formulation of a revolutionary attitude that is carefully reasoned and deeply felt.

The sequence of poems from which the volume takes its title uses an airplane flight as the symbol of a voyage of the mind. The airplane symbol is elucidated at various levels of meaning: it appears, naively regarded, as the realization of the Icarus myth and of Leonardo's mathematical fantasies; its place in the pattern of the individual lives which it has created, the lives of the designer and the pilot, is explored; it becomes an expression of the centrifugal impulse of post-Renaissance man; for the average contemporary it is a vehicle of escape and the giver of illusive mastery. The flight is interrupted to focus on details of the scene over which the ship is flying: we are shown the committee room, the idle mine, the lynchings, the squalid streets of the chaotic world over which soars this miracle of coordination. The contrast between mechanical order and human disarray is driven home by the depiction of an air raid on New York—"Icarus' passion, Da Vinci's skill, corrupt, all rotted into war"—and the poet lands on an earth that is to be refashioned.

Miss Rukeyser's poems are among the few so far written in behalf of the revolutionary cause which combine craftsmanship, restraint, and intellectual honesty. She does not boast of proletarian calluses which, having been to Vassar, she does not possess; nor is she one of those poets who learn about the social scene from tabloids in a Greenwich Village basement. Her sketches of the mines and of strikes indicate that she has seen some of them at first hand, and the foreword states that she attended the Roosevelt School of the Air in order to gather material for her aeronautical passages. The use she has made of her experiences is well described by S. V. Benét's remark that she speaks her politics "like a poet, not like a slightly worn phonograph record."

This volume suggests that Miss Rukeyser writes with facility, and that she has so many things to say that she does not always express them with the care that they deserve. While many of the metaphors are, to use her own phrase, "chromium clear," others are blurred with thought that has not been reduced to sensuous terms. Her rhythms often limp; and the poems lack formal unity. One hopes for more strophes as perfectly realized as these:

The latchpieces of consciousness unfasten.
We are stroked out of dream and night and myth, and turning slowly to awareness, listen to the soft bronchial whisperings of death.

Never forget in legendary darkness
the ways of the hands' turning and the mouth's ways, wander in the fields of change and not remember
a voice and many voices and the evening's burning.

These lines convey thought; they are also "pure poetry," about as pure and as poetical as any lines that are being written today.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Order Versus Chaos

Economic Planning. By G. D. H. Cole. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

FROM Mr. Cole's standpoint it is perhaps unfortunate that his discussion of economic planning should have come out after the frenzy of interest in the subject has somewhat subsided. But planning as a fad and planning as a solution of our present-day economic dilemma have very little in common. A year or two ago the average business man was intrigued by the idea of a plan because it seemed to offer the only possibility of restoring profits. The type of planning which he envisioned, however, almost invariably involved price control and limitation of production. Business enterprises welcomed such restrictions in the depth of the depression, but with the return of better conditions they have tended once more to become intolerant of restraint of any kind.

Theoretically, a planned economy could be initiated either by a government seeking to make capitalism work more smoothly or by a socialist state seeking to satisfy the fundamental needs of its population. Certainly some degree of conscious control over economic forces is becoming increasingly necessary, irrespective of the political party in power. But Mr. Cole is convinced that genuine planning is impossible under capitalism as long as parliamentary government exists. Any attempt by such a government to organize capitalist industry for use and not for profit would strike at the very fundamentals of the system. On the other hand, business interests fear to allow the government to set up a mechanism for controlling the economic system in the interest of profits lest demagogues utilize its existence to urge the capture of the machinery of state on a "planning for use" platform. The most that can be expected, then, under capitalism is the rationalization of particular industries with no coordination from above. Yet without such coordination it will be impossible to escape the restrictive tendencies which have hitherto been characteristic of all attempts to introduce foresight and control into the profit system. Under fascism the political obstacles to planning are removed, but the tendency to restrictive and anti-social control remains.

Socialism, on the contrary, necessitates some form of centralized coordination. A socialist government might be committed, as is the British Labor Party, to a program of gradualism and reform. But before many years had passed, and Mr. Cole believes the period would be much shorter than is commonly realized, such a government would find itself forced either to drop the reform program in order to maintain "prosperity" or to speed up its socialistic policies in order to wrest control from the profit-makers. If it took the latter course it would find that it was necessary to adopt a comprehensive plan in order to keep the economic machine in operation.

Owing to the limitations of space it is impossible to examine in any detail the machinery which the author would set up for the control of planning in a technically advanced country such as the United States. The basic principles, however, are worthy of consideration. The first objective of planning, as contrasted with laissez faire, is the utilization of all the resources of society. No indictment of our present planlessness is more telling than the vast discrepancy which exists between our productive possibilities and our actual output. But it is also important that our production be used to the best possible purpose, that it be distributed in such a manner as to stimulate further economic activity and yield the maximum amount of utility to the entire population. Mr. Cole believes that this can best be achieved by distributing to all members of the community a social dividend, and supplementing this by smaller payments to all the working members of the community on a scale sufficient to afford such incentives as may be needed to obtain efficient work. In the United States, for example, he points out that it would be possible to issue a universal social dividend of $10 a week for adults, $6 for persons between sixteen and twenty years of age, and $3 for those under sixteen, and still leave—on the basis of the 1929 income—approximately $36,000,000,000 for all other payments. Although most critics will doubtless dismiss this proposal as utopian and impractical, it is wholly in line with the drift of present-day popular demand. The Alberta Social Creditites, the Townsendites, and the millions of individuals demanding social insurance are all groping in this direction. And why not? It would guarantee that every individual would receive the necessities of life, and would automatically result in the diversion of production into useful channels. Yet it would allow a sufficient supplementary income for efficient workers to provide ordinary comforts and minor luxuries.

The author does not ignore the obstacles which prevent the attainment of his planned society. But he points out that at bottom the difficulties are political rather than economic. And he holds out hope that the progressive decay of capitalism will cause men to demand an ordered economy. If an understanding of the basic problems discussed in this book were more widespread, there might be some justification for this hope.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Gustav Stresemann

Gustav Stresemann: His Diaries, Letters, and Papers. Edited and Translated by Eric Sutton. The Macmillan Company. Volume I. $5.

GUSTAV STRESEMANN (1878-1929) was one of that group of German statesmen who went into the World War as chauvinistic nationalists and came out sobered and wiser for that harrowing experience. When he was made Reich Chancellor in August, 1923, it was as the acknowledged representative of the heavy industries. Three months later he was retired to make room for the Centrist Dr. Marx, and for the next five years he functioned as Foreign Minister in the Cabinets of Marx and Luther, where he often showed greater sanity and more social understanding than any of his colleagues.

Stresemann left no memoirs. This volume—the second and third are to follow in due course—shows the man as he is reflected in speeches, articles, letters, and occasional notes and records. The collection presents nothing new or sensational—no revelations or diplomatic secrets. It does throw a bright light on one of the most important periods of the Weimar epoch, and for that reason is vital to the student of political developments in post-war Germany.

As a personality Gustav Stresemann was neither unique nor outstanding. He was typical of the stratum to which he belonged. Like Bassermann, whom he succeeded as leader of the National Liberal Party, he occasionally indulged in liberal adventures but always returned to the more conservative nationalist fold. In theory he favored greater influence for the Reichstag, though essentially he sympathized with the monarchist militarism and the imperialism of the ruling class. Such ideals as he had were vague and unformed and never hotly defended—a constitutional empire symbolizing the oneness of the ruler and his people. "Stresemann," says Eric Sutton in his preface, "had always held a constitutional monarchy to be the type of government best suited to the German people. . . . For the Crown Prince he had a positively sentimental regard. . . . Lord d'Abernon records that in Stresemann's opinion the Crown Prince's partiality for horses and women was hardly blameworthy in a prince. It was by Stresemann's instrumentality that the Cabinet was induced to agree to the Crown Prince's return to Germany, in the teeth of the most violent opposition abroad."

Up to the day when he became Chancellor, Stresemann ran true to form. He supported the war. He backed up Ludendorff's Durchhalten policy. He voted against the Weimar constitution. He was against the signing of the peace treaty and he condemned Rathenau's Erfüllungspolitik. He condoned the fight in the Ruhr and the sabotage policies of the inefficient Cuno, but unlike his colleagues he was too rational to fight lost causes, and when he became Chancellor he put an end to this hopeless struggle. He lacked the vision, however, that finds new paths. He was satisfied to muddle along with a coalition of conservatives and middle parties—die Grosse Koalition; indeed, he saw in it the realization of his old dream of a harmonious German people. When the Socialists and Communists united in Saxony and Thuringia to establish a coalition labor government in 1923, it seemed to Stresemann the most natural thing in the world to order out the Reichswehr against these "rebels." For clerical-conservative separatism in Bavaria, a movement really dangerous to the existence of the republic, he showed a sympathetic tolerance.

He completely failed to understand the implications of the international situation in the first period of his governmental activity. Lord Curzon he called an embittered Francophile whose activities would culminate in a Franco-British war. He asked Count Brockdorff Rantzau, German Ambassador in Moscow, to act with greater dignity in his intercourse with the Bolshevik leaders. "I hope," he wrote, "that you will never be anything but the German count to these Soviet people."

But when Ramsay MacDonald became Prime Minister in Great Britain and Edouard Herriot was made Premier of France, Stresemann, now Foreign Minister of Germany, began to see the world in a new light. Unable to speak any language but German, he had gone to London to attend the negotiations which led to the adoption of the Dawes plan with the feeling that he was entering the enemy's camp. To his amazement he found his adversaries friendly and eager to negotiate. When Herriot finally opened the way for an understanding, the old Korps student perforce had to admit that there were honest men on the other side of the Rhine and that more might be accomplished by mutual good-will than by threats and gunfire. The effect of this realization on Stresemann's foreign policy was marked. It lost its narrow Prussian provincialism and earned for Stresemann a reputation which extended far beyond Germany's own national borders and beyond his own time.

The first volume of Stresemann's "Diaries, Letters, and Papers" takes the reader up to the Dawes conference and deals only with the beginnings of Germany's relationship to the League of Nations. In 1924 Germany's part in international affairs was still uncertain. Rathenau's policy of rapprochement with England and France was as yet untried, and Stresemann himself was skeptical and unconverted. The reader will look in vain in this volume for the greatness with which contemporary history has surrounded his name. Stresemann was not a great man. He had no political theory, no vision of the future. His fame must rest on the fact that he had what Germany needed in that painful period of capitalist recovery—the intelligence and good sense to learn from experience and the courage to steer his course in accordance with facts as he found them.

LUDWIG LORE

The Romantic Personality

The Romantic Rebels. By Frances Winwar. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

Byron: The Years of Fame. By Peter Quennell. Viking Press. $3.50.

WITH many readers the reputation of the romantic poets—except Wordsworth and the later Byron—is now at its nadir. Yet Miss Winwar, in her joint biography of Keats, Shelley, and Byron, stands pat on all the old evaluations, seldom venturing from the torrent of personal history into such criticism, literary or social, as might have justified that torrent. Keats is "one of the first poets of the world," and Shelley is presumably not far behind. Her sympathies are mainly with these two, and like many another of their partisans she heaps much irony on Byron and Wordsworth for failing to understand their worth. Wordsworth figures only as "background," like Napoleon and the Prince Regent, and he is treated as a dry and dour reactionary who makes "arid" criticisms of Keats, presumably from selfish motives. That his disapproval might have been founded on better reasons Miss Winwar does not bother to consider. Nor does she go very deeply into the motives for Byron's coolness toward Keats and Shelley. Indeed, Byron's humanity is played up as gross to serve as a foil to their purity.

A book on the lives of a group of poets whose lives seldom crossed would seem to offer as its sole hope for unity a study of the finer shades in their reactions to one another and to their age. But of course such analysis is harder to do than pure narrative. And it is less exciting to dwell on the subtler aspects of contemporaneity than it is to report the coincidence of one writer's passing another in the night. So under Miss Winwar's rather raw, if vigorous, treatment, those elopements, betrayals, broken hearts, suicides, and dead babies emerge in a grisly caricature.

Mr. Quennell, on the other hand, limits himself to but one poet and but five years of his life—the years of Byron's residence in London, so fertile in love affairs, fame, and disgrace and so unproductive of good poetry. Admitting that that poetry had value only to its age, Mr. Quennell considers two aspects of Byron which are lively issues in any age—his personality, and his importance as a force in the disrupting of old traditions and the forming of new ones. The scene, the contradictions in Byron's character, the people in his life are all described with a finesse and justice rare enough in Byron's biographers. And the discussions of romanticism give the book a meaning which I do not find in Miss Winwar's literal narrative. But good as Mr. Quennell's study is, readable, sensitive, it is not a work of very high vitality, and there is no doubt of its being colored throughout by Mr. Quennell's theory, here and there insinuated, that Byron was homosexual, the divisions in his nature springing from this basic ambiguity. This highly unconventional notion is not impossible but is still far from proved.

FREDERICK DUPEE

Shorter Notices

War. No Profit, No Glory, No Need. By Norman Thomas. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.50.

Surely there is no lack of anti-war books. Like an avalanche the indictment of war has been growing. First there were the horror and futility novels and poems, then came the picture books and cartoon collections, and then there were pamphlets on the cost of war, the causes of war, the character of the next war, and the cure of war. Mr. Thomas's book is an epitome of much of this literature approached from a Socialist point of view. The real enemy of peace to him is capitalist nationalism, and until that has been eliminated there is little hope for peace. Meanwhile the general strike and the Oxford oath are useful peace weapons, and disarmament, embargoes, wiping out the R. O. T. C., the ending of imperialism and of the Japanese exclusion act, and international cooperation with all that makes for peace are desirable goals for peace workers. All this is to the good, but there ought to be more. The indictment of war has been so successful that the Mussolinis and Banes are looked upon as madmen. The time has come for another type of literature—on the strategy of peace. This would end the pitiful floundering of the peace movement while military expenditures rise to the empyrean, while war threatens, and while war is actually in process. It would indicate the different approaches to peace according to political faiths and pave the way for the united front in peace action. Much of this is a job in organization, but there is a crying need of critical analysis and constructive planning on paper before the anti-war movement is made a vital national power through a realistic strategy. Perhaps Mr. Thomas will follow through with another pamphlet on this urgent subject.

Fortune. By Robert Reynolds. William Morrow and Company. $2.50.

Out of a good romantic tale that takes in both sides of the railroad tracks in a small Pennsylvania city, the author of the Harper prize novel for 1931 has fashioned a social novel of America from post-war prosperity to the New Deal. Mr. Reynolds draws his class lines with sharp sobriety, but his emotions, not unlike those of his friend Thomas Wolfe, to whom he dedicates "Fortune," move in the verbose idealistic world of a bewildered, democratic middle class. On the left the reader will meet, chiefly, the plodding proletarian Parks family, who come to Two Rivers, Pennsylvania, in the vain hope of bettering their fortune. On the right are the good rich people and the bad rich people. The former consist, first of all, of queenly Margaret Preston, née Douglas (cement, railroad equipment), princely Ted Robinson (cautious investments), and delicate Mary Larkin, on whom the author forgot to bestow hemophilia. The evil right forces include the McAvoy brothers, Ned and Lou, who invest in speakeasies and brothels, and Harry Preston, Margaret's somewhat oafish husband, who comes from a family that had run a shoestore back in Michigan and whose wild speculations just before the 1929 crash lead him to ruin and disaster. Out of the turmoil of our present-day social and economic chaos, young Ralph Parks of the proletarian Parks family finally emerges with a little boy begot of the tragic, blue-blooded Mary Larkin. Ralph is still flat broke and jobless, and his aging mother and young sister are laundresses and scrubwomen in Margaret's and Ted's home. But why worry about that? For is he not filled with the desire to "nurture his high thoughts and bid them soar"?

The Fortunes of the Pasquiers. By Georges Duhamel. Translated by Samuel Putnam. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

The Frenchman's logic landlocks his sentiment in little isolated pools of feeling, disturbing at times to the foreigner but making, to his point of view, the only fitting psychological landscape in which to live. So in this book the Pasquier family receives its identity through the close inspection visited upon it by its most loving member, Laurent, the youngest son. Mother's gentle self-sacrifice, Father's braggadocio and philandering, Cécile's bold genius are adored, despised, worshiped as they affect the well-being of the family unit. An adolescent devotion, shame, and pride make bitter struggle with idealism; the love is encircled by the thought. The family is set off as a link with the past; the present and the future are apart; even Mother, still lovable, settles into place among the lesser saints. Laurent's éducation sentimentale, as like the American variety as "Our Gang" is to "La Maternelle," contains within its rich concentration its own reward. One of a series, the book resolves one problem fully. The story, told with acute perception, tender care, and clear, bright humor, will interest and satisfy anyone who reads.

Rebirth: A Book of Modern Jewish Thought. Selected and Edited by Ludwig Lewisohn. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

The importance of this book does not derive from the messianic zeal of the editor or from the prominence of the twenty-five contributors, but from the aggravated immediacy of the problem to which it is dedicated. This problem is the present plight of the Jews. There is no denying that the drive

SAFEGUARD PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL

Dangerous pressure is exerted on productive capital by growing tax burdens and recurrently inflating ground rents. Capital now stalled in banks would move into productive industry and employ more labor if taxation were transferred from agriculture, manufacture, trade, and real estate improvements and placed on ground values, improved and vacant.

Other programs aim to attack, regiment, or abolish capitalism on the illogical assumption that private ownership of "the tools and machinery of production" is oppressive to labor.

This book, by LOUIS WALLIS, is non-Georgian and non-utopian. It views Marxism as impracticable, and regards the New Deal as only a stop-gap.

Minneapolis Tribune: "A sensible suggestion at a time when big business and small business as well as crying for relief from heavy taxation. . . . Seems to fit the picture of what industry needs today."

All bookstores, 75 cents

Published by DOUBLEDAY, DORAN, Garden City, N. Y.

Can Mussolini "hog-tie" Anthony Eden?

READ

SAWDUST CAESAR

By George Seldes

"It is the best, most comprehensive work on Fascist Italy which thus far has been published in the English language. It is to be hoped that it will be widely read and meditated upon. It is doubly useful in that it gives at the same time the account of the facts and the account of the lies."—GAETANO SALVEMINI, in The Nation. $3. HARPER'S

Soviet News STRAIGHT from the Source!

Subscribe to

SOVIET PERIODICALS

in Russian, English, French, German, and other languages.

Sole importers from U.S.S.R. of new books, rare books, dictionaries, grammars, maps, art publications, reproductions, etc.

Catalogs and information furnished on request.

BOOKNIGA CORP.

Dept. N29 255 Fifth Ave. New York City

toward emancipation initiated by Moses Mendelssohn has, after a century and a half of diligent pursuit, ended in the Nürnberg decrees. Anti-Semitism is now relatively more rampant and more ubiquitous than at any other time in Jewish history. Even the doors of baptism and assimilation, formerly leading to official sanctuaries, have been closed with a bang. The individual Jew may still "pass" here and there; the mass must live at the questionable mercy of their Gentile neighbors. What, then, is to become of the fifteen million Jews inhabiting the countries of Europe and America? For Mr. Lewisohn and for the contributors to this book—from Theodor Herzl to Maurice Samuel—there is only one answer: Zionism. For all their divergent views, they are agreed that the Jews must denounce the pitfalls of emancipation, embrace the traditional culture of their fathers, build up a homeland in Palestine, and make of themselves a nation like other nations. Without bringing up the usual objections to Zionism, one cannot help asking what is to become of the large majority of Jews who must perform remain outside of Palestine? How can these millions be expected to emulate their fathers in displaying the yellow badge? And what of those who prefer the teachings of Marx to those of Herzl? "Rebirth" states the dire Jewish problem with passionate perspicacity; only Zionists, however, will approve of the solution offered.

Drama

The Trappings of Romance

CLEMENCE DANE'S romantic tragedy "Granite," now to be seen at the Vanderbilt Theater, was first produced here nearly a decade ago by a semi-professional company at the American Laboratory Theater. Nine years of aging have not improved its quality, and a glance at the files of The Nation confirms my impression that I thought about it then what I think about it now. "The scene," I said, "is laid upon a lonely island off the English coast, the characters are a set of strange, wild people, and the action is rather childishly weird and violent."

Miss Dane is a literary dramatist of considerable reputation. She writes like a writer, and some of her more successful plays have always seemed to me rather overpraised for the simple reason that they were so obviously literate when they were not as much more as they were said to be. But in the case of "Granite" there can hardly be two opinions. Despite the fact that it was first published after both "Will Shakespeare" and "A Bill of Divorcement," it seems like prentice work, and might, indeed, have been written by some very bright schoolgirl well versed in romantic literature. There is hardly a situation, a character, or a speech which is not a familiar cliché: the lonely island, the tyrannical husband, the romantic stranger, and the guilty love. Moreover, all the trappings are equally familiar: the howling wind, the innocent maidservant with nightgown and candle who sings snatches of folk ballads, and the evil genius cast up mysteriously from the sea. For all I know, the author may have been in the grip of a perfectly genuine emotion. She may have had something to say which had never been said before. But if so, she was the victim of her familiarity with a style which has been exploited so thoroughly that it cannot suggest anything but an echo. Ten years ago the play was staged by Richard Boleslavsky, who superimposed upon it a certain Russian morbidity that was not exactly suitable but constantly teased one with the suspicion that there might just possibly be some meaning in the thing after all. At the Vanderbilt it is acted in a straightforward "Mysteries of Udolpho" fashion which conceals nothing. Between the two methods one may take one's choice, but there is actually not much to choose.

"I Want a Policeman" (Lyceum Theater) is a detective play at least equally routine. I will not pretend that even after all these years I remain wholly unmoved when the fiend with a pistol at the back of the lovely heroine forces her to declare that all is well at the very moment she needs so desperately to call for the help which is near at hand. But not even a detective play need keep quite so close to the formula as this one does, with its beautiful young wife unjustly suspected of the murder of her aging husband, its two detectives—one comic, one romantic—and its blundering amateur who takes everything down in a notebook. I am not a good guesser; accordingly, when I spotted the criminal in the first scene of the second act I concluded that the mystery was not as well concocted as it might have been. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films

René Clair Goes West

THE progress of René Clair from Paris to Hollywood has halted long enough for him to make a picture in London, and this picture, "The Ghost Goes West" (Rivoli), should be remembered by those who will soon be saying that Hollywood has been his ruination. There is of course no telling what Hollywood will do for him; and for my part I have little sympathy with certain European directors whom it is said to have silenced. Hollywood is a citadel to be conquered, and if it conquers instead I find it difficult to believe that the weakness was out there rather than in the victim. At any rate, here is Clair's latest picture; it was made before he reached California; and it is a failure.

It is only relatively a failure. "The Ghost Goes West" is more amusing and more imaginative than the average film of whatever provenance, and indeed the audience of which I was a part laughed loud and long. But that is perhaps the point. It laughed too loud and long, and laughed in the wrong places—provided there is any meaning in the reference one naturally makes to Clair's earlier work, where the finest kind of balance was maintained between the ridiculous and the delicate, between the false and the true, between exaggeration and exquisiteness. "Sous les Toits de Paris" maintained those balances so skilfully that it came as near to perfection as any conceivable film of its kind—and there has actually never been another of its kind, as there has never been a director like Clair at his best. At his best he played upon his audiences with a wonderfully sound and subtle touch, producing upon the human instrument a comic music not unlike that which Shakespeare produced through the older medium of words. But he has lost that touch, and he was losing it even before he left Paris, as "The Last Millionaire" made depressingly plain. Traces of it survive in "The Ghost Goes West"; the picture, as I have said, is better than the average, and for all I know it will be a success in the United States. But the vulgarity which once was Clair's most beautiful asset is now beyond his control, and therefore has lost its beauty. The touch is not positive any more.

The story is of a Scottish ghost, an eighteenth-century Glourie who in the twentieth century haunts the castle of his ancestors hoping that he may undo the disgrace of his cowardice in some old battle. The prologue shows us that battle; the body of the film shows us the castle being sold to an American who will remove it, ghost and all, to Florida in is preferred for excellent location, splendid modern cuisine and efficient clientele.

RESORTS

The LAKE VIEW

Moderate Rates

11 Madison Avenue,
Lakewood, N. J.

ANNA HAYTHIE
Tel. Lakewood MT-211

Rebecca Silver Invites You to

FORESTHOUSE

At Interlaken

Miles of Lake, Hills and Dales—America's Switzerland—Excellent Cuisine—All Outdoor Sports—Indoors, conviviality. Rates Moderate. Auto or N. Y. Central—50 miles—Open all year—of course.

LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y. Mahopac 977, 688

ZINDOREST PARK

Brooklyn, N. Y. Phone 7755

CLOSED NOW
WILL RE-OPEN
MARCH 20TH

RED OAKS

Atlantic Highlands, N. J.

ANNOUNCEMENT

Red Oaks is taking a vacation. Will be closed to guests from January 6th until February 19th. Will open for the Washington's Birthday week end. Make reservations now by either mail or telephone.

Atlantic Highlands, 264.

Hillcrest Lodge among the Watchung Mts. 25 minutes by train, 50 by car. Golf, tennis, handball; riding nearby. Plainfield, N. J. Millington 364. City address, 114 Fenimore St., Brooklyn, 3E.

"THE DELIGHTFUL HIDEAWAY in the mountains" has been closed for alterations since January 1st. Will reopen February 20th.

CHESTERS' ZUNBARG
Woodbourne, N. Y. Fallsburg F 22

A Cozy Retreat in the Pines
MILLARD'S

Offers Choice Accommodations, Delicious Meals. "Dietary Laws." Moderate Rates. 801 CLIFTON AVE. LAKEWOOD, N. J.
Phone: Lakewood 216-W

BLUE MOUNTAIN LODGE

will reopen

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1936
for the Washington's Birthday Weekend
Make reservations now. Write or phone
Peekskill, N. Y. Phone 1403

APARTMENT TO SHARE

DESIRE third person of intellect, age about 25, to share comfortable bachelor apartment in superior Brooklyn neighborhood. Total contribution $20. monthly. Box 697, % The Nation.

ORANGES FOR SALE

SWEET, juicy, sun-ripened on trees. Delivered Express prepaid. $3.50 bushel. Grapefruit $3.50. No sprays used. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Florida.

LANGUAGES

23 LANGUAGES

SPEAK ANY MODERN LANGUAGE
IN 3 MONTHS BY LINGUAPHONE

UNIQUE METHOD BRINGS VOICES OF NATIVE MASTERS INTO YOUR OWN HOME.. SEND FOR FREE BOOK

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 Rockefeller Center - New York

FINANCIAL

U. S. S. R.

7% GOLD BONDS, 1943

At Market—To Yield about 6%

State Bank of U. S. S. R. repurchases bonds at par, on demand.

Soviet American Securities Corp.

30 Broad St., N. Y. HANover 2-5330

ART MART

ORIGINALS

Oils—Water Colors—Graphics
Framed and Unframed

Large Selection of Etchings at $5.00

THE ART MART

505 Eighth Ave., at 85th Street, N. Y.
Mezzanine Floor
Sachs Quality Furniture, Inc.

PIANO WANTED

WILL store baby grand or good upright piano in return for use. Excellent care. Write Box 691, % The Nation.

DO YOU WANT

A POSITION?

SOMEONE FOR A POSITION?

for the response of employers and intelligent applicants for employment, read THE NATION.

Rates: .62 a line of 6 words

Minimum 3 lines

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street New York City

Tel. COrtlandt 7-3330

LECTURES

COOPER UNION

Department of Social Philosophy

(Formerly The People's Institute)

IN THE GREAT HALL

8th Street and Astor Place—at 11 o'clock
Admission Free

Friday, January 31st

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN

Thesis 9: "From the Psychological Point of View Communism, Fascism, and Nazism are More Alike Than Different."

Sunday, February 2nd

NATHANIEL PEPPER

"What Do We Mean by Decadence of Culture?"

Tuesday, February 4th

PROF. EDWARD G. SPAULDING

"The Philosopher and the Struggle for Freedom."

TRAVEL

The Compass
Travel Bureau

Takes pleasure in announcing a

Summer Travel Seminar

to the

SOVIET UNION

under the leadership of

Dr. MARK GRAUBARD, Geneticist
Author of "Genetics and the Social Order"

Sailing in the beginning of July; returning the first days of September

For full information and descriptive pamphlet write or call

COMPASS TRAVEL BUREAU

11 West 42nd St., New York City
LONGacre 5-3070

SYMPOSIUM

FORUM EXTRAORDINARY

and Banquet of Common Sense

Gen. Smedley D. Butler, A. F. Whitney, Roger Baldwin, Carleton Beals, Stuart Chase, John Chamberlain, Archibald MacLeish, Benjamin Stol-berg and others WILL DISCUSS: What I Would Do If I Were President.

Seats: $1.50, Tables of 8: $12. Reserve Now!
Common Sense, 315 4th Ave., N. Y. ST. 9-0516

HELP WANTED

NEWLY established Cooperative publication in the metropolitan area needs an energetic organizer to complete a share-selling campaign that has already netted $20,000 under volunteer direction. The right man has social vision, knowledge of the labor or cooperative movement (preferably contacts also), and some ability as a straightforward speaker. He must know how to overcome many handicaps through merited confidence in the project. Salary and commissions to fit the man; permanent position possible for one who is familiar with publishing. Write frankly. Box 698, % The Nation.

PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

J. G. EDMONDS, LITERARY AGENT
Marketing on commission. No advance charged.
5639 Rippey St., Pittsburgh, Pa.
(or 108 W. 85th St., N. Y.)

☐ THEATERS ☐ MEETING ☐

"I am greatly impressed by 'PARADISE LOST', so much so that I have been thinking of it ever since. It is crowded with illuminating material. It should cause millions to think and even if it did not do that it should still be recommended as thrilling entertainment."
—Theodore Dreiser

'Paradise Lost'

By Clifford Odets

LONGACRE THEA. W. 48th St. Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed. ■ Sat. 2:40

Honor the Martyred Heroes of Nazi Germany!

Let your voice be heard by the League of Nations in support of the proposals made by

THE HONORABLE JAMES G. McDONALD
AT

A MEMORIAL MEETING

to the

2,000 Killed

100,000 in Concentration Camps

Sacrificed in the struggle for Freedom, Peace and Justice

ST. NICHOLAS PALACE

66TH STREET AND COLUMBUS AVENUE

WED. JAN. 29th, 1936 8:00 P. M.

Chairman: CLARK M. EICHELBERGER

Executive Secretary of the League of Nations Association

Speakers: OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

DR. HENRY SMITH LEIPER

GEN. SMEDLEY D. BUTLER

DR. ISRAEL GOLDSTEIN

JONATHAN EDDY

Tickets 25c. (Reserved sections for tickets purchased in advance)

WORKERS BOOKSHOP—50 East 13th Street

AUSPICES: ANTI-NAZI FEDERATION

168 West 23rd Street

CH. 2-3759

☐ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says ☐

Boy Meets Girl. Cort Theater. Rough and ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

Dead End. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. Superbly acted by a group of boys. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

Jumbo. Hippodrome. Paul Whiteman, Jimmy Durante, and a remarkable clown named A. Robbins surrounded by acrobats and animals. Literally better than a circus.

Let Freedom Ring. Civic Repertory Theater. A second chance for this drama of a strike in a Southern mill. I found it hard going, but it has been highly praised.

Libel. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English court-room play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

Mid-West. Booth Theater. Homely and slightly sentimental picture of the joys and more particularly the sorrows of the farmer. Best when it isn't editorializing.

Paradise Lost. Longacre Theater. Clifford Odets' complicated picture of a family composed exclusively of pathological futilitarians. He calls it a picture of the middle class but it strikes me as somewhat less than typical.

Pride and Prejudice. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaption, brilliantly staged and acted. It gave me more pleasure than any other play of the season.

Victoria Regina. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Winterset. Martin Beck Theater. Maxwell Anderson's surprisingly successful attempt to write a poetic play on a modern theme. Bold, original, and engrossing.

order that the current Glourie may pay his debts; and the conclusion shows us how on a foreign strand the disgrace is suddenly blotted out—and how the current Glourie marries the millionaire's daughter among drawbridges and limousines, among portcullises and palm trees, while a radio plays in every room of the castle and floodlights sweep the sky above Miami. This is very well. The story is obviously a rich one for Clair's purposes, since it provides him ample opportunity for that careful prance along the wall between sentiment and satire which he has always delighted to take as his artist's risk. But he constantly slips. The battle is neither funny nor heroic, and if it tries to be both at the same time, as it probably does, it fails, becoming as it proceeds a rather embarrassing mess. The chorus of creditors in the castle is feeble and artificial. And the Florida business is handled with a barren vulgarity of which Hollywood comedy has rarely achieved the match. I am not referring, of course, to the vulgarity which Clair satirizes; I am referring to the vulgarity of his satire, which is mechanical and desperately uninspired. There is no lack of nice things here and there along the way, and there is always the reminder that this man once held a precious secret in his hands. But he has lost it, and I cannot believe that anything outside of himself is to blame. As to Hollywood being his ultimate destination, I should explain that there is merely a current rumor to this effect.

The best foreign films I saw during the fortnight were two German ones at the Bijou Theater, "The Making of a King" and "The Private Life of Louis XIV." The first was distinguished by the superb acting of Emil Jannings as Friedrich Wilhelm I of Prussia, represented here in a very difficult and dramatic relationship to his son, who is to be Frederick the Great. The second made interesting capital out of a German princess's life at Versailles, the contrast between luxurious France and plain-dealing Hanover supplying the materials for a superior costume piece. "A Man's Children" (Cinéma de Paris), a Swedish comedy based on Edward Childs Carpenter's play "The Bachelor Father," was apparently uproarious to those who could understand the dialogue. Even without that advantage I found it so spirited and delightful that I went a second time.

MARK VAN DOREN

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's Moscow correspondent, is the author of "Soviet Journey" and other books on Russia. At present he is traveling in Western Europe observing the political scene.

WALTER MILLIS is the author of "The Road to War" and "The Martial Spirit."

PAUL W. WARD, a regular Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, is contributing a weekly letter to The Nation on developments in the capital.

RAY L. KRINGER is state editor of the Decatur Herald-Review.

RUTH BRINDZE is chairman of the Westchester County Consumers' Council and the author of "How to Spend Money."

PHILIP BLAIR RICE contributes reviews and critical articles to various periodicals.

LUDWIG LORE was formerly editor of the New York Volkszeitung. He now conducts a column, "Behind the Cables," in the New York Post.

FREDERICK DUPEE, formerly an editor of the Miscellany and a contributor to the Symposium and the Bookman, has spent the last two years in Mexico. He is now at work on a book of sketches of Mexican life.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1936

No. 3683

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	141
EDITORIALS.
Al Smith's Ghost	144
Newspapers, Dare to Be True!	145
Houses for Whom?	145
The Education of the Odd Man	146
ISSUES AND MEN. THE COLUMNIST IN JOURNALISM. By
Oswald Garrison Villard	147
CARTOON. By Armstrong	148
THE SCOTTSBORO PUPPET SHOW. By Carleton Beals	149
I WAS AN EDITOR IN GERMANY. By Franz Höllering	151
WASHINGTON WEEKLY. By Paul W. Ward	153
WHERE THE GERMAN GHETTO LEADS. By William Zukerman	154
THE SPREAD OF HITLERISM. By M. W. Fodor	156
LOOSE CONSTRUCTION. By Heywood Brown	157
CORRESPONDENCE	158
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Steel Robots That Came Alive. By Rose M. Stein	160
Silicosis Village	162
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	162
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
Made in Japan. By Mark Van Doren	163
Cross-Currents in Psychology. By Grace Adams	163
The Poet in Politics. By Jacques Barzun	164
Junket. By Ben Belitt	166
Shorter Notices	166
Drama: "Ethan Frome." By Joseph Wood Krutch	167

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional.

THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1936, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Gruening, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

NEARLY A MONTH has passed since Congress reconvened, and very little progress has been made on the pending neutrality legislation. Changes in the Administration bill have all served to weaken an already unsatisfactory measure. The House committee voted reservations excepting all American republics in conflict with a European or Asiatic foe and providing that no embargo could be imposed in violation of existing commercial treaties. In the case of Italy, this would prevent an embargo on oil for at least a year. In addition to reaffirming America's insistence on the freedom of the seas, commented on last week, the Senate committee has eliminated the clause empowering the President to embargo shipments of raw materials if refraining from such action "would contribute to the prolongation or expansion of the war." While the latter change is of little practical importance, since the President would still have the right to declare an embargo "to promote the security and preserve the neutrality of the United States," it is illustrative of the strength of isolationist sentiment in Congress. Stirred by the Nye committee revelations of the manner in which commercial and financial interests drew us into the last war under the guise of idealistic purposes, certain influential groups in the country not only oppose active cooperation with the League but are distrustful of any collective effort in the interest of peace. Despite the strength of this feeling, there is a growing disposition among peace groups to challenge the assumption that the United States can remain out of a world war once it has developed. The experiences of the past six years should be enough to show that we cannot ignore our responsibility as a member of the community of nations without paying a heavy price.

THE LATEST Administration plan for farm relief seems to be to use the amended Soil Conservation Act as a stop-gap until 1938, when it is hoped a program of state aid will be ready. There are still some uneasy doubts about constitutionality in the minds of most of the amateur as well as the professional constitutional lawyers in Washington. But it is hoped that payment to farmers for withdrawing land from production for the purposes of soil conservation will be held by the court to contain less of coercion than payment to the same farmers for withdrawing their land for the purposes of crop restriction. This time the government cannot make use of processing taxes to provide the necessary financial support. Presumably funds for the SCA will come from a Treasury appropriation, but the problem of first getting the funds into the Treasury has not yet been solved, nor has any information been given by the Administration of how it will be solved. When the new state-aid plan comes into operation in 1938, the states will presumably have enacted legislation providing for state agencies which will take over from the federal government the direction of the farm program. The federal government, according to preliminary reports, still reserves to itself, however, the authority to designate what agency in each state shall administer the act. Should such an agency fail to conform with federal ideas on land retirement and crop conversion, the government might easily choose another agency. A measure of centralized control is thus retained in Washington. Whether this fact promises a very hopeful future for the forty-eight state plans depends on the fate of the social-security law. For the proposed state-aid farm plan is built on the same lines as the social-security plan now in operation. Both will stand or fall together when the Supreme Court sits in judgment over them.

THE SCOTTSBORO DRAMA, lurid enough already, has developed a new surprise. The seventy-five-year sentence imposed on Heywood Patterson and the postponement of the trial of Clarence Norris because of the inability of the defense and prosecution to agree on the admission of testimony were only preludes to the big scene. As the Negroes were being returned to jail at Birmingham, Ozie Powell was shot in the head by Sheriff J. Street Sandlin after Powell had cut the throat of Deputy Edgar Blalock with a penknife. The deputy, with twelve stitches in his neck, is expected to make a good recovery; Powell, more seriously wounded, is in the hospital at Jefferson County jail. Several versions of the two attacks have been offered, the first being an official story that the knifing was part of an attempt to escape. The comment of Defense Attorney Leibowitz is worth quoting.

Does the sheriff of Morgan County claim that three Negroes shackled together in the rear seat of a rapidly moving automobile, with only two doors leading to the front compartment, with two men in that automobile armed to the teeth, this car preceded . . . by an automobile carrying two other armed officers . . . and followed by still another car with armed guards and with state highway patrolmen as an escort, did attempt to escape by using a penknife?

Clarence Norris was in the middle of the handcuffed trio, with Powell on one side and Roy Wright, the youngest of the defendants, on the other. Wright's story is that the officers promised the Negroes "a light sentence, not more than ten years," if they would get rid of their Northern lawyers. This proposal the Negroes refused. Powell said, "Damn, what they're talking about?" For this impudence Deputy Blalock slapped his face, and Powell reached over with a knife in his free hand and cut the deputy's neck. When the car was brought to a stop, Sheriff Sandlin got out and, while the Negroes held their hands above their heads, fired into the back seat, striking Powell on the forehead.

WHAT ALL THIS will lead to is not hard to predict. The only crime in the South which compares to the rape of a white woman by a Negro is an attack by the same Negro on the majesty of the law. The state suggests that Powell, and possibly Norris and Wright, are to be indicted for assault with intent to murder. If this happens it may result in very neatly disposing of three of the troublesome nine. The refusal of the Patterson jury to find for the death sentence, together with the postponement of the Norris trial, hinted at a break in the Alabama united front against the Negroes. Now every resource which the defense can command will be necessary to prevent the implication of Norris and Wright in the attack on Blalock, and to insist that all eight of the remaining defendants be tried solely on the original charge and not for some fantastically invented plot.

IT TOOK the House of Representatives forty-five minutes to whoop the bonus through over the President's veto. It is possible that Mr. Roosevelt returned the bill without his disapproval on Friday, January 24, because he wished an opportunity over the week-end for pressure to be brought on recalcitrant party members. If this was so, it was without avail, for on Monday the Senate by a vote of seventy-six to nineteen, overrode the veto also. The bonus bill, therefore, becomes a law. There were publicists in 1917 who opposed a conscription law because it would, among other things, provide men in greater numbers than would voluntary enlistments to demand the traditional post-war rewards and force their demands through the Congress. They may now call themselves good prophets. Eventually, of course, the taxpayers will foot the bonus bill. Those veterans who cash their adjusted-service certificates before maturity will by direct and indirect taxation pay at least part of their government check back into the coffers of the national treasury. Taxpayers who are not veterans will pay without the initial stipend to console them. If this sounds like Alice in Wonderland, it is merely another course in the Mad Tea Party at which the veterans' lobby has been host for some years.

THE SARRAUT CABINET in France is not expected to make any drastic changes in policy, except possibly in foreign affairs. Although few of the ministers of the old government were carried over, the new Cabinet represents a coalition of virtually the same parliamentary forces—the Radical Socialists and the center parties. While the left parties comprising the "Popular Front" could have easily obtained a majority in the Chamber, they have deliberately refused to assume power prior to the elections which are now expected to occur in March. Meanwhile the appointment of Marcel Regnier as Minister of Finance assures at least a temporary continuation of the previous conservative fiscal and monetary policies. Devaluation of the franc, while inevitable, will not be undertaken by this Cabinet. Similarly, the selection of Pierre-Etienne Flandin as Foreign Minister is a guaranty that foreign affairs will be conducted in a conservative manner, though Flandin will doubtless be somewhat more friendly to Britain than was Laval. As a result, the recent French promise of military and naval assistance to Great Britain—made in conjunction with similar pledges by Greece, Turkey, and Yugoslavia—will probably be taken literally in case of an Italian attack. While this commitment is implicit in Article XVI of the Covenant, its restatement at this time indicates some genuine vitality in the League.

DESPITE THE CELEBRATION of the Chinese New Year, usually marked by a complete cessation of all activities, commercial, political, and military, Chinese students are once more up in arms in protest against Japanese encroachment in North China. The fact that the latest riots occurred in the International Settlement at Shanghai, where brutal suppression by the police was certain to follow, indicates the depth of student feeling against Japan. That the students have been successful in delaying if not actually preventing Japanese annexation of North China is evident from the wails of dissatisfaction which have been going up in Japanese quarters. Sung Cheh-yuan, who was chosen chairman of the North China Political Council for his supposed subservience to Japan, has apparently responded to student pressure sufficiently to become persona non grata with Tokyo. While Nanking has officially given no intimation of abandoning its policy of collaboration with Japan, the return of Hu Nan-min, former leader of the Cantonese faction, makes this position even more difficult to maintain against public pressure. Events in China usually move slowly, but a final showdown can scarcely be delayed more than a few weeks.

AT ITS RECENT MEETING the executive council of the A. F. of L. lived down to its reputation with singular zest. The council agreed to back the thirty-hour bill. It almost decided to advocate an amendment to the Constitution designed to prevent invalidation of labor laws, but at this writing even that question has been put off. On the issue of industrial unionism the council was at least positive in its negative position. To the demand of the radio workers for an industrial form of organization, the council said no—and handed over this vigorous young union, with dues, to the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. (The radio union has not yet consented to be turned over.) The National Union of Automobile Workers was granted autonomy but was instructed to refrain from taking in craft workers. The union had written an industrial-union clause into its constitution. But the council reserved its loudest "no" for John L. Lewis and his committee for industrial organization, denouncing it as "a challenge to the supremacy" of the A. F. of L. and demanding its dissolution. John L. Lewis remains unimpressed with the threats of the craft unionists, although he obviously would prefer to see industrial organization carried on inside the framework of the A. F. of L. The convention of Mr. Lewis's United Mine Workers, now in session, may be expected to provide an eloquent answer to Green and his snug bureaucracy.

MAGISTRATE CHARLES R. SOLOMON'S recent opinion in the May's Department Store picketing case has an importance far beyond New York City and the particular strike involved. Thirty-six members of the Artists' Union were arrested for picketing May's Department Store in Brooklyn in support of a strike conducted by Local 1250 of the Department Store Employees' Union. Magistrate Solomon's decision points the way to a sensible handling of picketing cases everywhere. The higher courts have ruled that picketing per se is not illegal, that a picket has the right to tell pedestrians and prospective customers of the facts involved in the dispute, and that the failure of a picket to move on when ordered to do so by the police is not necessarily disorderly conduct. But the absence of a clear decision on mass picketing has left room for arbitrary action on the part of police. Magistrate Solomon's decision is unequivocal.

There is no law [he says] that so-called mass-picketing is unlawful. . . . One picket may behave in an unlawful manner, fifty pickets may behave in a lawful manner. The mere fact that there were fifty pickets does not mean the picketing is unlawful. . . . Even if a crowd did collect to observe . . . that would not make the mass-picketing lawless.

SEVERAL VIGOROUS United States district attorneys and their assistants, as well as the jury that returned a verdict of guilty, are to be congratulated on the successful outcome of the Morro Castle prosecution. Two officers of the vessel—advertised as "the safest ship afloat"—and, what is infinitely more important, an executive of the operating company have been convicted of criminal negligence. This is the first time in America that a company official has been so convicted, and the decision is particularly valuable in establishing a precedent whereby steamship-company executives can be held directly responsible for their part in a maritime disaster. Government counsel were confronted with an immensely difficult task in proving actual negligence, as distinguished from incompetence or error of judgment, on the part of the officers, as well as contributory negligence on the part of the line official. Blame was fixed on Mr. Cabaud, the company's vice-president, after long and persistent questioning of line officials, in the course of which it was revealed that Cabaud was the executive responsible for the operation of the line's ships. Furthermore, he admitted having made four trips on the Morro Castle, during all of which the crew's fire drills had been of the same fragmentary nature as the drill on the ship's last tragic voyage. Cabaud could thus be charged with foreknowledge of the criminal neglect which led to the disaster. Unfortunately Judge Hulbert saw fit to sentence the two ship's officers to jail terms, while he let Cabaud off with a fine. Perhaps the Judge's distinction between "officers on land and officers on the vessel" was actually a distinction between employees and privileged executives.

NEW SCHEMES to rescue and repatriate German Jews are being advanced by the Nazis almost weekly. One scheme would have permitted Jews to exchange their fortunes for German goods. The latest plan would allow wealthy German Jews to dispose of their properties at 65 per cent of their value, the proceeds to be paid to them through the agency of foreign trustees in instalments, with 4 per cent accrued interest, over a period of thirteen years, no payment to be made until three years after they had left Germany. Meanwhile Sir Herbert Samuel, Viscount Bearsted, head of the Shell Oil interests, and Simon Marks, British chain-store owner, are meeting with American Jewish philanthropists in St. Louis to discuss less ingenious plans for repatriation. It is proposed that from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 be raised the first year, in addition to sums already sought, to finance the emigration of the younger generation of German Jews and as many of the older generation as funds can be found for. This plan carries with it no stoppage of the boycott against German goods and no payment to the Reich for the release of German Jews. It is obvious that any large-scale repatriation would require enormous sums of money. Even if this were forthcoming, and it is not impossible, one may still ask where the exiles would go. Every country except Russia has its own problem of an unemployed population. Biro-Bidjan, the autonomous Jewish region in the Soviet East, needs relatively little financing for farm settlement, but to the deeply middle-class minds of the German Jews it looks stark and uninviting. It is hardly credible that Palestine could absorb upwards of another quarter of a million immigrants within a short period of time.

IN A WORLD in which kings are dying, millions are without enough to eat, and the temperature is waltzing around the zero mark, the news of greatest moment to the man in the street is the prospect of getting teeth filled without pain. The torture of the dentists' drill has been one of those things that had to be joked about in order to be borne at all. Strong men have quailed before it. In answer to the prayers of millions, therefore, comes the discovery, announced by Dr. LeRoy L. Hartman of Columbia University, of a formula which, if applied to the dentin of the tooth, will render it insensible to pain for from twenty minutes to half an hour, or presumably while the cavity is being prepared for a filling. Dr. Hartman followed the best tradition of medical and dental research in making the formula available to anyone without charge. Columbia University has taken out a patent, but will permit an unrestricted sale. Members of the New York dental societies, to whom the formula was presented on January 21, describe it as a medical discovery comparable in importance to the discovery of the anaesthetic property of nitrous oxide in 1844 by Dr. Horace Wells, and the first successful use of sulphuric ether as an anaesthetic by Dr. W. T. G. Morton in 1846. Since Dr. Wells and Dr. Morton were also dentists, our debt to dentistry is plain. Only one thing remains for the dentists to do: Let them get a new set of magazines in their waiting-rooms and they will be acclaimed the heroes of mankind.

Al Smith's Ghost

THE Al Smith all of us knew died in 1928. It was his ghost that stood up last Saturday night at the Liberty League dinner in Washington and sought to revive the accents, the mannerisms, the authentic fire of a dead man. Twenty-five hundred boiled shirts in the country's highest income brackets cheered wildly at every thrust of Al's. Twelve du Ponts did him homage. It was not the audience of old, nor was the speaker the same. The shell was there—direct, ungrammatical, vigorous, plebeian. But the inside of the shell, where ideas and sincerity should have been, seemed to have rotted away. The vigor of the common man was in the voice and gestures. But the interests of the common man had no place among those resplendent diners at the Mayflower Hotel.

Now that Mr. Smith has finally had his say, the atmosphere is clearer. We have known for some time that the Republicans would set in motion a vicious anti-red campaign and hope thereby to sideswipe Roosevelt. We have known that Moscow and the red flag and the Internationale would be dragged in to divert attention from the pressing issues of unemployment and farm control and the judicial blocking of legislation. What we had not known was that the high point in this red-baiting and flag-waving would be a speech by Al Smith, and that he would warm up the intellectual chef-d'oeuvres of a Republican ward leader and in his phrasing make a bid for the dignity of a Hearst editorial writer.

What did the speech actually add to the discussion of issues? It fell roughly into three parts. The part relating to the betrayal of the Democratic platform was essentially a distortion. A platform is at best a loose and vague affair. The task of Mr. Roosevelt was not to give it an undying allegiance but to make it adequate for the severest economic crisis in our history. What he should be criticized for is that he failed to push this process to anything like its outermost practicable limits.

The second part accused Mr. Roosevelt of surrounding himself with a vast bureaucracy, making himself an autocrat, and seeking to govern unconstitutionally. Here the temper of the speech shifted from the gubernatorial stump to the copy-book English and Irish orators who never arose except to save the liberties of their countries. But the autocracy that Mr. Smith kept talking of is almost wholly to be found in the armed deputies and company unions and labor spies of the industrialists who applauded him at the Mayflower. The worst bureaucracies in America are in the giant corporations. The greater danger to the Constitution comes not from Mr. Roosevelt's attempts to find some path toward an adequate federal power but from a Supreme Court which blocks that path, and from the deliberate and continued sabotaging of legislation by the lawyers of the public-utility holding companies. What we have suffered from in Washington is not bureaucracy (every government today must govern through one) but administrative incompetence, not a planned tyranny but a blundering planlessness.

Finally, Mr. Smith became a theorist of the class war. He attacked Mr. Roosevelt for arraying class against class, insisted that the gateway of opportunity for the poor led through the prosperity of the rich, and ended in a hysterical appeal to the future to choose between America's free atmosphere and the "foul breath of communistic Russia," between the Stars and Stripes and "the flag of the godless Union of the Soviets." If Mr. Smith's implication is that one or the other must be destroyed, we can find in it only ignorance or despair or a vicious provocation to violence and war.

Two questions will be asked: What is the meaning of Mr. Smith's speech? What effect will it have on the election?

The thing that stands out most clearly is the tragic case of the disintegration of Al Smith. There was a time when it seemed that the American experience had again fashioned a great statesman out of a man of the people. What has happened since then is the story of a seemingly invincible warrior who could not survive the bitterness of defeat and the blandishment of the vested interests. It is more than a personal tragedy. It is the tragedy of a whole class whose potential leaders, left rootless by inadequate organization, have to surrender finally to the possessing groups. In another culture Al Smith might have become a working-class leader instead of a Tammany brave and finally the spearhead of reaction.

For the speech reveals and strengthens the tie-up between the vested interests in both parties. It reveals that big ownership is determined to extirpate every trace of liberalism on the American landscape. Whether he knows it or not, Mr. Smith speaks for a fascist reaction. There have long been signs that if America is to get fascism, it will be its own Bourbon brand, and it is likely to come not so much from a new party or a new movement as from within the existing parties.

The effect of the speech on the political fortunes of Mr. Roosevelt, despite all the ballyhoo, is not likely to be catastrophic. If we ask whom Mr. Smith is speaking for that the Liberty League is not already adequate to speak for, the answer finally limits itself to certain middle- and working-class groups in the urban and metropolitan Eastern centers. But these groups will be more influenced by adverse court decisions on the labor and security laws than by all the allusions to the sanctity of the Supreme Court and the foul breath of Moscow. The most direct and least calculable influence of the speech will undoubtedly be upon the Catholic vote. Mr. Smith has tied up the reform attempts of Mr. Roosevelt with the stigma of communism, and communism with godlessness. The natural conclusion is that if Mr. Roosevelt is reelected we are likely to have in this country a repetition of the Mexican anti-Catholic measures. To have said so outright would have been a boomerang; to imply it by the sequence of logic is considered smart politics. It would be no casual hazard that among the people who applauded Mr. Smith were many of those who once boycotted him for the Presidency on the narrowest grounds of religious intolerance and social snobbery. They are the same people who, if he were running now for the Presidency on a liberal platform, would—using the technique of his own Moscow allusions—charge him with aiming to hand the country over to the Vatican.

Newspapers, Dare to Be Free!

THREE years ago on January 30 the smothering hand of Adolf Hitler closed down over the German republic. The most powerful supporters of that republic had failed to save their precious rights and liberties, partly because they could not believe that a fanatic could attain absolute power over the enlightened democracy that was Germany, but mainly because fear and cowardice paralyzed the very elements to which democracy is life itself—the great middle-class independent press and the trade-union and left groups. In particular the press had flourished for so long a period in its own conception of freedom that it felt itself immune from interference. Yet it was “coordinated” only less quickly than the working-class press.

In our own country the violation of democratic rights is increasing year by year. Whether it is a new fascism or an old reaction is an important question but one that may be left to a later discussion. On this anniversary we could wish that every American might examine the state of democracy in his own bailiwick against the fact of Hitler's triumph and consider how civil liberties may be preserved.

An article by Franz Höllering elsewhere in this issue brings up sharply the role of the press in defending those liberties. In this country we also have a press which prides itself on being free. We know of course that our press is not free in any absolute sense. It is, ultimately, subject to the control of the same economic forces which dominate the country's resources and government. From day to day the press indicates its economic allegiance; and when it does pay tribute to the ideal of a free press, such a display is possible because it can have no adverse effect on fundamental economic ties. Yet it would be a great mistake, in fact and in strategy, to assume that the press is big business and dismiss it as a potential force for preserving democracy. For the tradition of a free press as one part of our democratic tradition has attained a life of its own. The democratic idea, fed by early American individualism, regionalism, and all the freshets of our frontier past, has cut a deep and wide channel through the American conscience. The pride of the New York Times, for example, in printing all the news, however short it may fall of achieving that ideal, is a real pride and not merely a façade to hide a conscious distortion of news. The phrase “All the News That's Fit to Print,” which has its counterpart in the “I'll print what I damn please” of the small-time independent editor, is the expression of a sense of responsibility toward the idea of a free press.

In these days it is difficult to overestimate the weight of that responsibility or the importance of holding the editor to the principles he professes. To say that the Times—using it as a symbol of the democratic press—could save democracy is to belittle the strength of the reaction that threatens it. But it is undeniable that a press determined and organized to uphold the tradition of democracy commands a key position. Only by fighting for that tradition tooth and nail can it save itself. It may, to be sure, continue to exist as a piece of printed matter, but a “coordinated” newspaper is no longer a newspaper.

In recent days the Times has turned its powerful searchlight upon a courtroom in Alabama. Mr. Daniell, in his daily dispatches, brought out with extraordinary force the race hatred with which the trial was conducted. Such publicity as this must have an effect on the final outcome of the case. Suppose that the same searchlight could be played on the docks and fields of California. Is it not at least possible that the press, backed by the genuine love of liberty which actuates the majority of Americans, could stem the growth of what is so far our most vigorous crop of reaction?

The cynical answer, the easy dogmatic answer, is that since the press is ultimately controlled by the very forces which are seeking to repress liberty in California, it will not be persuaded to defend dockworkers and farm hands. But the lesson of the German experience is that if the great press does not defend the simple liberties of small men it must eventually lose its own liberty to print even the news it considers “fit.” Franz Höllering, formerly an editor for the Ullstein press in Germany, shows all too vividly how that powerful organization by shirking its responsibilities in small ways helped to clear the path for a reaction which finally engulfed the proud freedom of the Ullstein papers as surely as it wiped out the radical press with which the House of Ullstein had before then had nothing in common. At the moment in New York City the Daily Worker, a Communist organ, is in danger of being suppressed. It is not fantastic to say that in so far as the New York Times fails to defend the Daily Worker—and to date it has failed—it prepares the way for its own ultimate suppression.

Houses for Whom?

REPORTS from Washington indicate an imminent showdown on the much-discussed but little-acted-upon question of housing. In opposing a suggestion that the Federal Housing Administration take the lead in forming a national mortgage association to provide low-cost housing, financed chiefly by private funds, Secretary Ickes has come out vigorously for a slum-clearance program supported by direct government subsidy. The fact that the two housing groups within the government have been at odds over fundamental policy has been largely responsible for the virtual collapse of the Administration's building program. Despite nearly three years of ballyhoo, only 1,106 persons were employed on PWA housing projects by December 28.

Failure of the Administration to launch a large-scale housing program with government funds has given the bankers an opportunity to stage a counter-offensive. The point of view of those who oppose government-financed housing has recently been summarized in a memorandum submitted to the President by the Committee for Economic Recovery which estimates that there will be an “effective demand” for 750,000 homes annually for the next ten years. The committee points out accurately that the majority of these houses should not cost more than \$4,000, and it believes that a very large proportion should be of the “cottage type,” a type of dwelling which they refer to as “the major protection of democracy.” And it insists that private enterprise should be responsible for providing homes for all families having an income in excess of \$1,000, leaving not more than 15 per cent of the total for the government. To facilitate construction and reduce costs, it suggests that interest charges be reduced to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

A few figures will reveal the lack of realism of those who believe, despite years of experience to the contrary, that private enterprise can somehow meet the housing needs of the American people. The Real Property Inventory in 1933 showed that two-thirds of the tenant families in American cities of over 100,000 could not afford to pay more than $6.25 a room per month, while for millions of families the rent cannot be more than $5 a room. Private initiative has not provided new dwellings which meet the minimum standards of health and decency for less than $12 a room. Even in so-called limited-dividend corporations the lowest rents in new buildings are about $11. Careful computation of the costs of construction and maintenance indicates that suitable housing cannot be built to rent at $6 a room unless interest rates can be reduced to approximately 0.9 per cent. Since market rates for money are substantially higher, this is equivalent to saying that adequate housing cannot be provided by private enterprise unless all profit is foregone. To leave the construction of homes for our population to private business is, under present conditions, to consign more than half our urban population to dwellings that are seriously lacking in sanitation, safety, and comfort.

Talk of meeting the housing problems of present-day slum dwellers by cottages on the outskirts of the city tends to ignore psychological factors. Quite apart from the fact that transportation costs would eat up any savings obtained from lower land value, the average urban worker will not go so far from his place of employment and recreation. A recent investigation into the preferences of several hundred families living on Henry Street and East Broadway on New York's lower East Side revealed the fact that 56 per cent of the families would not leave the neighborhood to go to garden apartments in outlying sections of the city even if transportation and rents were within their means.

There are two practicable means of financing the construction of houses for the vast majority of city dwellers. The first is for the whole amount to be advanced by the government at 0.9 per cent interest, which is in effect a subsidy, since the government must pay a higher rate of interest to obtain the money. The second is by the use of private financing at approximately 3 per cent, supplemented by government grants to bring down the average cost of money. If the latter course is adopted, as in the Queensbridge project of the New York Housing Authority, approximately half the working capital would have to be advanced as an outright grant. There is little to choose between these alternatives either with respect to ultimate cost to the government or their effect on the capital market, although the direct outlay has the advantage of simplicity. To those who object to the government giving "charity" to two-thirds of the population, it might be pointed out that at present it subsidizes such everyday necessities as schools, highways, bridges, and police protection. Is it any more incongruous that it should aid in the provision of adequate and healthful housing facilities when private enterprise has so abysmally failed? There are few other steps that would contribute more to the revival and stabilization of American economic life during the next ten years.

The Education of the Odd Man

FRANCE'S political vocabulary includes the phrase la cuisine de la Chambre. It means the gossip and rumors that circulate in the corridors of the Chamber of Deputies and the informed guesses of men who have observed the deputies at work. Since its opinion on the Agricultural Adjustment Act the cuisine of the Supreme Court of the United States has been hospitable to the belief that one justice was responsible for the decision's being adverse by six to three, instead of being favorable by a five-to-four majority. This arithmetical, but not judicial, paradox is because of Justice Roberts. Had he agreed with Justices Stone, Brandeis, and Cardozo in wanting to uphold the statute, the Chief Justice would have joined them. Since Justice Roberts allied himself with the four conservative judges, the Chief Justice joined that majority in order to avoid a five-to-four decision declaring the measure unconstitutional. Hence the problem is that of educating the odd man, or, if the cuisine be wrong, the odd men.

The time that the court allows for such education is severely limited. The cuisine of the Supreme Court intimates that only one or two of the justices make a practice of examining the records and reading the briefs before the cases come on for oral argument. There were less than six hours of argument on the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Bankhead (cotton) act. Congressional consideration was much more careful. The hearings before the Congressional committees, the reports of the committees, debates on the floor, the deliberations of the Conference Committee, and the running fire of comment from the press and interested parties permitted members of Congress, inefficient though its procedure may be, to secure a far more comprehensive knowledge of what they were doing than the proceedings before the Supreme Court permitted the nine judges. Is it to be wondered at that in the Schechter case Chief Justice Hughes excluded from consideration "the economic advantages or disadvantages" flowing from the law that he declared invalid? In effect, he admitted that he was deciding the economic question without considering it; but the briefs and the oral argument had failed to give him the data on which intelligent consideration could be based.

A century ago, when statutes were much simpler, Supreme Court judges did not venture important opinions without seeking real light and learning. McCulloch vs. Maryland, for example, which is appealed to by both Justice Roberts and Justice Stone, was argued for nine days by six of the greatest lawyers then living. Justice Roberts's reasoning might have been better if he had had to listen at some length while "cobwebs of sophistry and metaphysics about states' rights and state sovereignty" were "brushed away with a mighty besom," as Story said they had been by Pinkney in the argument in McCulloch vs. Maryland.

Actually the problem of educating the judges reaches into their backgrounds and their careers and their social roots. The problem is one of the education of the odd men only if it be thought that the three liberal judges need no education and that the four diehards would be impervious to it.

Issues and Men

The Columnist in Journalism

FRANK H. SIMONDS, whose untimely death has just occurred in Washington, was outstanding in the group of journalists who have made their names widely known not because of their connection with any one newspaper but because their signed opinions and interpretations were widely syndicated throughout the country. Mr. Simonds was an excellent Albany correspondent for the New York Evening Post during my management of that daily, and then an able editorial writer on the Sun and the editor of the Evening Sun. But not until the World War did his opportunity come for acquiring a national reputation. Then he suddenly stood forth as a military critic. None of us who had been closely associated with him had been aware that his mind was stacked with information on many campaigns; that study of the great military leaders of history was one of his hobbies. Very soon he became the leading American commentator on Europe's catastrophe, an authoritative interpreter of the course of events.

Not without making errors, of course. No one could seek to interpret the events of a conflict which speedily became an unprecedented war of position without going astray at times, as Mr. Simonds did by accepting, for example, the reports that great Russian forces were being transferred to the French front by way of Archangel and Scotland. It would be the height of unkindness after all these years to subject to critical analysis the writings of any of us who sought to deal with that overwhelming Armageddon. That Frank Simonds was tremendously pro-Ally from the start, too much so to be wholly detached, was true. It was true also that he succumbed somewhat to the temptation to be pontifical where there were few, if any, to challenge the correctness of either his past or his passing history. But he wrote with freshness and unusual clarity, with earnestness and sincerity, and therefore did much to educate the American public on some of the phases of the military conflict. After that struggle was ended, his interpretations of current European affairs became more and more valuable. I often did not agree with them, for mine was a different point of view and I was not quite so hopeless, or so fearful of another great struggle, as he. But the longer I knew him the more I came to like and respect and admire him. He was the best of polemical antagonists, courteous, friendly, and frank; so that it was a joy to differ with him.

Mr. Simonds's career emphasizes anew what seems to me the gross error of what may be called the Ochs school of journalism, which would hide the personality of owners or editors behind the newspaper itself. Mr. Ochs lived up to his own doctrines and refused to let himself be advertised by his own newspapers. He never permitted the personality of the successive editors-in-chief of the New York Times to stand out. Yet there never has been a period in our journalism when the public has craved more to know who are the authors of what they read. The Times itself had to yield at last to the demand that telegraph correspondents and reporters receive the coveted "by-line." Its pages are now covered with articles headed by the name of the writer. One of the greatest foreign correspondents of the day, Walter Duranty, has made his reputation because the Times informed the public who wrote those wise and illuminating dispatches from Moscow.

Even in the field of sports it is the reporter with individuality who is sought. No business office or managing editor or owner ventures to edit the "stuff" of a man who, like Grantland Rice, draws $232,000 a year. The columnist who draws $1,000 a week is also a man to be reckoned with; he can write his own terms. He earns them not merely because of his knowledge of music, the drama, prize fights, or all sorts and conditions of men and women, or because of his humor, but because his personality shines through his work so that the public knows him or thinks that it knows him. He cannot be at his best every week or every day, but he fits a section of the public like an old shoe; and if he is Walter Lippmann he has his day in drawing a huge income and being the pet of the first and second vice-presidents of all the railroads and great banks and the favorite of the People Who Count in This World.

All of which to my mind is wholly to the good. Let them be fatuously optimistic or increasingly cynical, like Frank Simonds, but let them be themselves and let the public know just who they are. Indeed, when editorial pages the country over are becoming more and more commercialized, more and more owner-dominated, and therefore more and more narrowly capitalistic and cowardly, I count it a singularly fortunate thing that these free-lance individuals have come to the front. They give something of the flavor of the days when dailies were known as Dana's Sun and Godkin's Post and Henry Watterson's Courier-Journal, and the other owners were perfectly willing to take the back seats—and the profits—and let the famous editors have the prestige and the editorial responsibility. It is a loss and not a gain that the high-salaried writers with great personal followings are only in the news or "opposite-editorial" pages, that the editorial writers do not have the opportunity to influence public opinion by their personal qualities as well as by the facts they marshal and the arguments they present. Whether one agrees or totally disagrees with them, the more men like Frank Simonds and Heywood Broun and Walter Lippmann appear in the press openly in their own right, the better for the profession. Such as they form, perhaps, a last bulwark in journalism behind which free opinion can intrench itself. When their names begin to disappear from our newspapers we shall know that we are in for a new and probably a worse era—if not headed for concentration camps set up to imprison and destroy men who think and speak for themselves.

Bruce Garrison Villard

"In these three years I have restored honor and freedom to the German people!"

The Scottsboro Puppet Show

By CARLETON BEALS

Decatur, Alabama, January 27

THE Scottsboro trial is a puppet show. The principals are jerked through their ordained parts with such fidelity to class and racial and regional traditions, their motives and emotions so faithfully obeying established patterns, that it is difficult, even on the scene, face to face with reality, to realize that these are human beings, or that nine Negro boys, after five years of incarceration, are still fighting for their lives. The vulgar tragi-comedy of the plot being enacted here in the little cotton and mill town of Decatur in the northern red-hill district of Alabama, the pettiness of the judge, the trickery and the demagogic ambitions of the prosecution, and the hatred of the poor-white-trash spectators, relieved only by the gleam of starved lust when they listen to salacious testimony or their amens of approval when the judge squashes the argument of the defense, make it difficult to appreciate that here is being decided a case which may well mark the beginning of a new chapter in the history of the South and of the nation.

It would be easy, too, to forget these things for the quaintness of the scene and the types. An unshaved jury commissioner in a frayed collar and greasy suit that hangs in folds tells you at length in an almost unintelligible dialect how he has been reducing. A ruddy deputy sheriff with a big paunch and gold lodge pin tells you of the cars he saw piled up in the blizzard while he was bringing the nine Negro prisoners from Birmingham to the courtroom. "The damn' niggers," he tells you with comfortable joviality, "ain't wo'th all this heah trouble." A court clerk spends all his recess periods examining the chaw twists of tobacco of the courtroom folk—scarcely a man is unable to produce one, and the court proceedings are punctuated constantly by the spurt of tobacco juice on the floor and wall. The whole courthouse from basement to attic, despite the most amazing collection of spittoons I have ever seen under one roof, is stained with brown juice.

An old man with a mop of uncut and never-combed white hair hanging about a gossipy, womanish face hops in on a home-made crutch, with one shriveled foot wrapped in dirty cloths sticking out sideways. He leans over the rail and wisecracks at the defense attorneys, then hops from person to person in the courtroom urging vengeance.

Prosecutor Thomas E. Knight, Jr., who has played sharp politics with this case and has ridden on the backs of these Negro boys into the lieutenant governorship and expects soon to ride into the governorship, peers from unexpected places in the courtroom with glazed blue eyes. His smile of victory and smug contempt draws back frog-like across his narrow face like a stretched rubber band. During a recess he foregathers with some of the correspondents. With two armed deputies on either side, the Negro defendant Haywood Patterson sits over against the wall.

Knight has been very successful with this case. He knows the temper of local juries and how to appeal to them. He never misses an opportunity to show contempt for that foreign country "New Yawk" and by implication to cast contempt on the defense attorney, Samuel S. Leibowitz, who after Clarence Darrow is probably the most brilliant criminal lawyer in the country. Furthermore Knight's own father sits on the Supreme Court bench of the state of Alabama and helps write the confirmations of the verdicts rendered by the local farmer juries. But during this last trial Knight has been rather subdued. The defense opened with a plea that he retire from the case because the Alabama constitution prohibits a public official from holding two public posts, and because if Ku Klux Klan Governor Bibb Graves should die or leave the state, Knight, as acting governor, would have to pass on any plea for clemency from the boys he helped to condemn. Throughout the trial the defense ironically referred to him only as "Governor."

A jury venireman approached me in the corridor during recess to tell me he did not believe anything he read in the newspapers. A lean, red-headed fellow with steel "specs," he moved his quid of tobacco to one side of his mouth to tell me of the origin of the "nigger" race—he had just solemnly sworn to the court he had no racial prejudices. Cain, it seemed, after killing Abel, went off to the land of Nod where he "knew a woman." "Now mos' folk don't go on and think things out. The Bible never says sexual intercourse, it jus' says a man knows a woman. But the Bible tells that there couldn't be no human folk at that time in the land of Nod. Now jus' put two and two together. Cain had offspring in the land of Nod, so he had him a female baboon or chimpanzee or somethin' like that. An' that's how the nigger race started."

After the geniality of the first day the courtroom setting became grim and harsh as it filled up with a rougher, though orderly crowd. Judge William Washington Callahan drove through the proceedings with relentless speed, making no concessions for delay of witnesses or anything else. Judge Callahan is a man over seventy whose son was recently acquitted of murder through a temporary-insanity plea. The Judge has a lashing tongue and indulges in salty dialect witticisms that usually fall viciously at the wrong moment. With his wispy white hair, his choleric rumblings, his easy mouthing of legal and constitutional formulas, he is, as one writer said, a Hollywood version of a Southern judge.

A climax in the trial was reached on the second day, after seven wearying hours in the foul-aired courtroom, when the two defense attorneys called for a mistrial, accusing the Judge of impatience, irascibility, continued ridiculing of the physical and other evidence of the defense, and repeated remarks made to prejudice the jury. Judge Callahan declared that if he had made any improper remarks he was willing to apologize, and in a tone of cold fury denied the motion. He then charged the jury not to heed the remarks of the defense, nor were the jurors to be prejudiced against the defense because of their motion. Subsequently the defense made five other mistrial motions which were denied.

At the outset Judge Callahan ruled out as evidence the defense model of the fatal freight train that ran between Stevenson and Paint Rock five years ago with its human cargo of young derelicts and two mill trollops, Victoria Price and Ruby Bates. "That train is a useless waste of time," snapped the Judge. "It would take half a day longer and is no help to anybody." Actually, without the model train no proper reconstruction of the details is possible. When the defense insisted, the Judge roared out, "I cain't waste time this way. How will you get it set up as it was?"

The model was identical with that admitted by Judge Callahan at the previous trial, but he now demanded that the defense produce evidence. As the defense was not expecting to be asked for witnesses until late afternoon, the train conductor was not available, and most of the witnesses were required to go through long-winded unintelligible explanations which could have been settled at once by the model. In a previous trial Judge Callahan sarcastically remarked about the train, "Go ahead and set it up before Santa Claus gets it."

Late in the afternoon, after two-thirds of the evidence was in, the defense was able to call Conductor R. S. Turner to identify the model train again. Callahan again objected, "All I see it does, it takes up a lot of time"; and throughout the trial he seemed to take the attitude that the loss of five minutes was more important than the lives of the nine Negro boys. As the conductor started to testify, the Judge bellowed at him to ask him the total number of box cars on the train, and before the conductor could make his calculations rushed to another question in such a way as to imply lack of credibility in the witness. Frequently throughout the trial, whenever any witness seemed likely to make a statement that threw light on the facts, the Judge would roar over the bench at him, interrupting and confusing the evidence.

As in all previous trials the star witness of the state, since Ruby Bates recanted her testimony, was Victoria Price. She entered the courtroom well dressed in blue wool and brown velvet coat, and was not, as before, chewing snuff. In an earlier trial she had testified that one of the Negro boys had held her mouth so she couldn't take a spit. On this occasion she altered her testimony in a few key matters, declaring, for instance, that the gravel car was filled up only to two and a half feet from the top as compared to a foot and a half in her previous statements. But when the defense attempted to bring out the contradictions of Victoria Price's testimony with her statements in previous trials the Judge promptly sustained the objections made by the prosecution. The court ruled out all evidence bearing upon the past conduct of Victoria Price—her jail convictions, her various marriages, her actual relations with Jack Tiller, a married man, her profligacy with two different men on the two nights preceding the supposed rape. But in his charge to the jury Judge Callahan declared that the credibility of Victoria Price was not in question, because the defense had not produced evidence showing bad character or untruthfulness.

She sat with her back half turned to the defense except during cross-examination. She spit out her words venomously at the defense with a hard crease in her thin mouth, and this time in her evidence increased the number of scratches on her body, but denied the disfigurements on her face to which she had previously testified and which had been denied by half a dozen witnesses. In this trial she put the supposed blow on her scalp instead of on her forehead over one eye. When no signal for a given reply was forthcoming from the prosecution, toward which she constantly glanced, she would answer sullenly, "I cain't remember." Several times during interruptions she sat smiling at Prosecutor Knight from behind a blue handkerchief.

The local prosecuting attorney and Sunday School teacher, Malvin Hutson, opened the jury pleading. Spitting his cud of tobacco into a spittoon and dropping his legs over the table, he combed his hair, smoothed his tiny black bow tie, and talked for a few seconds to the jury in an intimate low tone. His plump boyish face gradually flushed, and suddenly he sobbed out in a tone that shook the windows, "Save the pure womanhood of Alabama!" From then on he alternately roared and sobbed about the courtroom in a voice that would have filled the Metropolitan Opera House, giving a cross between a sermon and a stump speech and devoting only a few brief moments to actual summing up of the evidence. "Women, red, white, black, or green, depend upon this jury for protection," he insisted. He pictured the long fight of the pitiful Victoria Price for vindication, without which the jurors would have to "hang their heads." Whether "in overalls or in furs" a woman was protected by the law of Alabama against the vilest crime of the human species, that of rape, a crime which put any man lower "than the birds of the air, the fish of the sea, or the beasts of the fields." Even dogs choose their mates. The law reached "from the mountain tops to the swamps and caves" to protect "the sacred secret parts of the female," and now almost in tears, he assured the jurors that "Victoria Price is a human of the female species." Unless the jury upheld the law, women "might have to buckle six-shooters about their middles." The penalty for rape in Alabama is death, a penalty prescribed in accordance "with the wisdom of the ages."

One prospective juror remarked that Hutson was a "very good" Sunday School teacher. He is such a good Sunday School teacher that Haywood Patterson is to spend seventy-five years in prison.

The knife and gun fracas between a deputy sheriff and Ozie Powell, one of the Scottsboro defendants, which took place on the top of Lacon Mountain on the road from Decatur to Birmingham, helps to obscure the complicated case. The original trial in Scottsboro, with a hurried conviction without proper defense and with a mill band playing "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight" under the courthouse windows, was a form of legal violence that barely stopped short of a major tragedy. The fact is that since then, during the five years of the case, seven of the defendants have never even been brought to trial. It would be strange indeed if stronger minds than those of these black derelicts were not preyed upon by fear, despair, and hate; and for five years the boys, who have grown into young manhood, have known only the companionship of criminals and riff-raff. Ozie Powell, who by his desperate act further endangered himself and his companions, has been brooding about these things. Jail madness seems the most likely explanation. Unfortunately more than ever the case is restored to the basis of passion, and the racial, social, and legal principles are further obscured. The boys will lose sympathy here and elsewhere, but, just as much as ever, justice as well as the boys will remain on trial.

I Was an Editor in Germany

By FRANZ HOLLERING

THE Berliner Zeitung am Mittag—commonly known as the B.Z.—was one of the most successful newspapers of the Ullstein Publishing Company, which was owned by the five Ullstein brothers. (I speak of the House of Ullstein in the past tense, for today its old Jewish name is only one of Josef Goebbels's many pseudonyms.) The Ullstein Publishing Company enjoyed a prestige similar to that of the New York Times, but its range of activity and influence was much wider, since it issued daily, weekly, and monthly journals, published books, employed thousands of people, and had a world-wide news service. The two other leading papers of the Ullstein press were the lower-middle-class, pseudo-socialist Berliner Morgenpost, which had the largest circulation of any newspaper in the country, and the Vossische Zeitung—conservative, semi-highbrow—commonly referred to as Tante Voss (Auntie Voss).

On September 13, 1930, the B.Z. made a sensational prediction about the outcome of the Reichstag election scheduled for the following day. The Nazis, said the B.Z., would gain at least seventy-five seats in a parliament in which they had never had more than twelve. As editor-in-chief of the B.Z. I was responsible for this prophecy. My publishers challenged me. Such a landslide, they felt, was quite impossible. For my part, I was so thoroughly convinced of the increased strength of the Nazis that I offered to resign as editor if at least 100 of Hitler's men were not elected. It was not necessary for me to resign. The returns showed that 107 Nazis had been elected to the parliament of the republic. The Ullsteins were panic-stricken. A midnight editorial conference was called. Iron fences were built across the lofty entrances of the vast building. A special permit issued for that night was needed for admission. Rumor had it that the Storm Troopers were planning a Putsch and that they were on their way to capture the publishing plants. As a matter of fact, the Nazis had no intention of following up their triumph immediately with a night of terror. Two years more of intensive propaganda were necessary to educate Hitler's followers in mass sadism.

The editorial conference of the night of September 14, 1930, was an unforgettable scene of intellectual confusion and cowardice. The House of Ullstein, through its leadership of the great democratic press of Germany, held the most effective weapon by which the Hitler propaganda might have been defeated. Its decision was to wait and see, on the theory that fighting fire with fire could lead only to greater conflagration. The fact behind the theory was of course an enormous property interest. The Ullsteins did not dare to suggest the democratic procedure of giving Hitler a place in the government, which might conceivably have dissipated his power by forcing his hand early in the game. If Hitler had refused to take part according to democratic rules, he could have been defeated at the next election. Having no policy, the Ullsteins marched with the rest of the liberal bourgeoisie and the Social Democrats, under the command of the militarists, along the Brüning-Papen-Schleicher path toward the Third Reich.

Hitler met no real opposition. Brüning, an ascetic among political profiteers, was possessed by one central idea—to prove, by trying and failing, that Germany could not fulfil the Treaty of Versailles. In order to frighten the Allies into whittling down reparations, Brüning allowed Hitler to exist and to grow as a Frankenstein with which to threaten the Allies. Behind Brüning was the invisible pressure of the Reichswehr, which from the very beginning (1918) used Hitler as a pawn in its militarist strategy. Accordingly, Hitler was not liquidated at the beginning as he well might have been. Instead of being deported, the obnoxious alien was invited to become a German citizen, and encouraged to stay in opposition.

The capitulation of the great democratic press before the growing Nazi power took place gradually. The Ullsteins did not dare to fight and therefore they rationalized their retreat; they recalled their "responsibility" to their innumerable employees, for whose sake they "sacrificed" their political convictions, which began to appear to them daily as more and more utopian. The journalists in their pay, on the other hand, felt that they must "carry on." As a matter of fact, working German journalists in those days acted exactly as any highly skilled craft unionists would act in similar circumstances. They had achieved many years before what the American Newspaper Guild is now fighting for—the right to collective bargaining. They even had old-age and sickness insurance, vacations, and a satisfactory status. They knew what the bosses wanted done, and they did not have to be told to do it. This silent understanding was known as "the freedom of the press." During the first months of the Third Reich even Jewish journalists wrote and published the most chauvinistic propaganda in behalf of "awakening Germany." They would have followed Hitler, if he had let them, just as they followed Dollfuss and as they are now following Mussolini and Starhemberg. They were not driven out until later.

Brüning's dangerous strategy of playing both ends against the middle made him more and more neurotic. Finally he could not stand the least criticism. He brushed aside the many warnings he received about the Hindenburg clique. He clamped down on the press. When the B.Z. reported that the Cabinet was discussing a project for autarchy—a forerunner of Hitler's policy of economic self-sufficiency, dictated by the same military considerations—it was the first democratic newspaper to be disciplined. As editor of the B.Z. I wished to oppose the Brüning policy, to fight, not to yield; but the publishers frowned. They had the "public weal" in mind; they were not going to let "fancy notions" of the freedom of the press be misused to tout editorial convictions at such a dangerous time; they were going "to stand behind the Chancellor."

The liberal tradition of the House of Ullstein could not be thrown overboard all at once. It went piece by piece, and a whole year passed before the trend became clear. Meanwhile the winds of reaction blew ever more strongly and the Ullstein brothers bent with them. The older editors, burdened with family responsibilities, were willing to take any attitude which promised security against the oncoming storm. The great press viewed the onslaughts of National Socialism through rose-tinted spectacles. It took to optimistic discussions of non-controversial topics. The Ullsteins advised against offending the National Socialists by the use of the word "Nazi." Those among its editors who tended, either out of conviction or through naivete, to write the truth, had their wings clipped. Thus, gradually, fascism gained headway not only in German life but also in the press. A few incidents which occurred in 1931 will illustrate this prostitution of the liberal press.

The violent demonstrations which ended the performance of the film "All Quiet on the Western Front" were led in person by Goebbels and Count Helldorf, now chief of police of Berlin. This scandal, followed by a little pogrom, marked the first decisive advance of National Socialism in the streets of the German capital. Did the Ullstein papers defend the pacifist tendency of the film, which had been made from a book published by Ullstein years before? On the contrary. Restraint was the motto. When some of the younger editors protested, the Jewish editor-in-chief of the Vossische Zeitung remarked: "But gentlemen, remember we are not a Jewish sheet!" In this phrase, ironically but seriously uttered, he was already mouthing the Nazi doctrine that pacifism is Jewish. The House of Ullstein would have preferred to have it forgotten that it had ever published Erich Maria Remarque; and when Hitler came into power, the publishers actually sent a representative post-haste to Switzerland to cancel their contract with the author.

Carl von Ossietzky, the editor of the Weltbühne and the most distinguished of German publicists (he has been in a concentration camp since Hitler took control), was given a sentence of eighteen months for publishing a criticism of the aviation budget of the Ministry of War. The sentence was a crime against justice and even against the law—there could be no argument about that, and there was none. The conservative press applauded the verdict. The B.Z. alone among the Ullstein papers dared to register a protest, whereupon I was accused of high treason not only in the Nazi press but also in the increasingly more reactionary Ullstein circles. An attempt to clear up the affair at an editorial conference was cut short by the statement, "Right or wrong, anyone who mentions military matters deserves to go to prison." There you had the pacifism of the official German democracy. Needless to say, Hitler's construction of a modern war machine in the incredibly short space of two years would have been impossible if its skeleton had not been perfected when he came to power.

One day the Prussian Minister of the Interior, the Socialist Severing, asked some "left" newspapermen to come to his office for an urgent confidential meeting. I sat between him and the Catholic Dr. Klausner—murdered by Hitler on June 30, 1934. I can still see the excitement in the faces of both men. Severing read us a couple of typewritten sheets which on the following day became known throughout the entire world as the Boxheim document. The police had obtained it from a Nazi, the son of a Social Democrat, who had become conscience-stricken. Its author was a certain Dr. Best, one of the Nazi leaders. It contained a plan for the overthrow of the government. All the atrocities which Hitler actually committed later on were listed in the Boxheim document with true German thoroughness. Severing asked us to give this paper the greatest possible publicity; it would, he felt, have a sobering effect. His guests were skeptical. Had he overlooked, they asked, the preamble, which said that these measures were to be taken only in the event of a Communist Putsch—which was more unlikely than a visit from Mars? Severing insisted, and he was right, that the Boxheim document meant what it said without any reference to the Communists: the Nazis customarily put such "preambles" in their secret papers; it helped them to escape the law in reactionary courts if they were caught. The reactionary Supreme Court was only too glad to let itself be taken in. And so also was the democratic and liberal press. The B.Z. did not make itself more popular with its owners by exposing the document for what it was. (Dr. Best, of course, went free; the betrayer of the Boxheim document was shot by the Nazis.)

Kurt Tucholsky, brilliant writer for the Weltbühne, wrote every Sunday a non-political essay in the Vossische Zeitung. As the Nazi agitation grew, the publishers canceled their agreement with Tucholsky. Thus long before the Nazis had occasion to burn Tucholsky's books his work as a left-wing writer had been cut short by democratic publishers. This fact, rather than the Nazi suppression, was at the root of the despair which finally drove him to suicide in exile, in Sweden, on December 22, 1935.

In the B.Z. of December 12, 1931, appeared Hitler's secret summons "To Everybody Trained for the Aviation Service." Having formed infantry, cavalry, and motor corps, he was now organizing an aviation corps. It was obvious that he could not do all this without the secret approval of the Ministry of War. And it was not surprising that General Groener, who was both Minister of the Interior and Minister of War, saw red when he saw the B.Z. An hour later I knew that action was being taken against me by the Ullsteins. The jig was up. A high official of the publishing house came to see me. There were no objections to me personally, he said, but I had to learn to make compromises. I rejected this proposal. In fact, on December 13 I printed in the B.Z. further exposures of the secret Nazi activities. On that very afternoon I ceased to be editor-in-chief of the B.Z. am Mittag. The National Socialist press crowed: "High treason crushed at last! Editor brought down by Hitler's flying corps!"

Before Carl von Ossietzky went to prison he stated the political gist of the case in the Weltbühne of January 5, 1932: "The behavior of the Ullstein concern in this matter is something worse than a mere blunder of bewildered business men. It is the most scandalous capitulation before National Socialism on record. It is a crime against the freedom of the German press in its gravest crisis."

Thirteen months later the House of Ullstein was gleichgeschaltet. Despite their great gift for protective coloration the Ullstein brothers could not escape their fate. The violent anti-Semitism which is the birthmark of German fascism robbed them of their power, though they were compensated with an appropriate number of millions for their properties. They do not have to live on refugee funds.

[This is the first of two articles by Franz Höllering, who is now an exile in America. His second article, dealing with his experiences as an editor in Berlin at the time of the Reichstag fire, will be published next week.]

Washington Weekly

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, January 26

AL SMITH, in his speech at the Liberty League's banquet here, did more than read himself out of the Democratic Party. He also read himself out of the respect and affections of all men of good faith.

That, at least, was the reaction of the majority of those who sat at the press tables, and their reaction is more important than that of the du Ponts, Davises, Becks, and Reeds who paid to attend the rhetorical lynching Smith had been engaged to stage with Roosevelt as victim. The reporters belong to the great middle class which holds the balance of political power in this country. They also belong to the only group that Smith has a chance of swinging away from Roosevelt and to his enemies. I refer, of course, to the group that voted for Smith in 1928.

Unlike the bulk of the billion-dollar audience on the main floor of the ballroom, the majority of the reporters up in the balcony had not looked down their noses at Al in 1928 but had virtually worshiped him, had been anguished by his defeat, and in 1932 would have preferred him to Roosevelt. Furthermore, they had long since recovered from their 1933 infatuation for Franklin the First, and would have welcomed a bona fide criticism of his reign from Smith. But what they saw and heard was something that drove them back toward the Roosevelt camp and sickened them. It also drove back and sickened millions in the radio audience, presumably, for a substantial proportion of the telegrams that came to Smith after his speech were denunciatory.

What the reporters saw was the Happy Warrior of 1928 turned into the Waspy Harrier of 1936 and successfully using all the old tricks with which he had won their devotion—his slang, his eloquent grunts, his "foists," and his hoarse-voiced witticisms—to captivate a pack of stuffed shirts and fat bank accounts. They were prepared to ignore his obvious hatred for the present occupant of the White House, a hatred fed upon the knowledge that it is fully reciprocated. But they were not adequately prepared to see Al making slavish love to his former enemies, delighting the nation's richest sweatshoppers with his bludgeonings of the NRA, keeping the fastidious Mrs. Sabin in stitches with his vulgarisms, and edifying with tremolo-stopped references to his mother, wife, and sister a flotilla of dowagers who once shuddered at the thought of Mrs. Smith in the White House.

The humor of the occasion, however, was not wasted on the men and women in the balcony. Much of it was provided by members of the audience, such as a horsey Philadelphian in red who in a moment of bibulous indiscretion had dipped her fur muff in a plate of ice cream and constantly reminded observers of that mishap by waving the muff aloft on a diamond-braceleted arm as she shrieked cheer after cheer for Al on the slightest provocation. Most of the cheering done came from persons intoxicated with more than love for Al and the Constitution, and there was much cheering of that sort, for cocktails and wine were plentiful.

It is well that that was so, for otherwise the lack of applause at certain points in Al's speech would have been painful. An accurate chart of the Liberty League's hypocrisies and prejudices could be made by analyzing the rise and fall of the applause. When Smith said, "I am here because I am a Democrat," the crowd roared. But when he said he had joined the Democratic Party "because I was led to believe that no man owned it," and then paused for applause, none came; plainly his audience was embarrassed by the thought of an un-owned party. Similarly, when he spoke in praise of social legislation and of stock-exchange regulation, his audience evinced only discomfort. The complete give-away came when he got around to discussing division of governmental authority. When he said, "We don't want any Executive to tell Congress what it must do," the crowd bellowed approval; but when he added, "We don't want any Congress to tell the Executive what he must do," the applause was merely polite. When he went on to say, "We don't want Congress or the Executive jointly or severally to tell the United States Supreme Court what it must do," the crowd responded with delirious roars of applause and cheers; all of which quickly died as he continued, "We don't want the United States Supreme Court to tell either of them what they must do." Al should leave out that line next time.

He also will fare better if he leaves out the last five minutes of his speech, for it was his peroration that destroyed all that was meaty in the body of his diatribe. And there was much that was meaty, especially his thrust at Roosevelt as the beneficent autocrat. That was both an effective and a legitimate dig, and one that sensible men will remember, for Roosevelt invited it by saying in his message to Congress that the powers bestowed on the executive branch of government under the New Deal would be dangerous ones to have fall into "the hands of political puppets of an economic autocracy." Al quite properly interpreted that as meaning, "If you are going to have an autocrat, take me; be very careful about the other fellow." And with complete and prescient justification he added, "We don't want any autocrats. . . . We wouldn't even take a good one."

But there is hardly anything that will make up for, detract from, or excuse Smith's waving of the bloody shirt, his "Washington or Moscow," his "Star Spangled Banner or the Internationale," his "clear, pure fresh air of free America or the foul breath of communistic Russia." Such demagogic absurdities will drive away instead of recapturing his following of 1928. If they deserve any further comment, it is this: Jim Farley was right; it is going to be "a dirty campaign."

* * *

ONE of its dirtiest manifestations is about to occur down in Macon this week. There Governor Eugene Talmadge of Georgia, whom Ickes calls "His Chain-Gang Excellency," is about to hold an anti-Roosevelt rally of Southern Democrats. Within the last few days his organization has effected a liaison with what is left of the late Huey Long's "Share the Wealth" organization. Both groups are motivated chiefly by a White House denial of what they consider their just share of the spoils flowing out of the Democratic victory in 1932; the spoils have been distributed, but to rival gangs. To this motivation there is added a more subtle one through the Southern Committee to Uphold the Constitution, a Southern version of the American Liberty League headed by John H. Kirby, Texas lumberman and lobbyist. Between it and the red-gallused Talmadge there has been an understanding for several months, and there is reason to believe that plans are under way to place Talmadge in the field as a third-party candidate in the hope that he may cost Roosevelt some Southern states and thus the election. The roster of Kirby's committee contains the names of many of the South's leading steel men, bankers, and others closely allied with Eastern capitalists.

The only thing lacking in the line-up at Macon is the Townsend organization, which appears to be making little or no headway in the South despite a judicious use of Klan and Anti-Saloon League methods, including, it is reported, the enlistment of backwoods preachers ■ organizers on payment of modest weekly pourboires. The Townsend movement is also meeting one setback after another in Congress. Dr. Townsend has just had to renounce all thought of establishing ■ national third party under threat by members of the Townsend bloc in the House that they would take his movement away from him if he refused. From outside Washington come reports of dissension within the organization over tactics and finances. The first attempt of the session to obtain a test vote on the Townsend plan was made a few days ago by young Representative Monaghan, a Montana Democrat. It failed, Representative Cooper, a Tennessee Democrat, quickly ruling the motion out of order. Meanwhile hardly ■ day passes without some member of the House denouncing the Townsend movement and proclaiming his intention of having it subjected to a Congressional investigation.

Where the German Ghetto Leads

By WILLIAM ZUKERMAN

THE Ghetto has now been established in Germany. It was legally introduced with much pomp on September 14 with the promulgation of the Nürnberg laws and has since become an important fact in German life, one which both Jews and non-Jews must take into account in dealing with the German situation.

Soon after the promulgation of the Nürnberg laws many well-informed observers of foreign affairs in Germany, including some of the best foreign correspondents, believed that the new laws, cruel and bitter as they are, would end the chapter of anti-Jewish persecution in Germany and would somehow effect an improvement in the position of Jews. Several facts were adduced to support this belief. The first was that a considerable part of German society was thoroughly nauseated by the eternal din of "Jew, Jew, Jew," which has not ceased in Germany since the Nazis came to power, and felt a very intelligible desire to have a rest from the accursed question, which occupies more space in the Nazi press and in Nazi public pronouncements than almost any other problem facing the German people. It was thought that the Nürnberg laws would bring this respite, both to Germans and to Jews. Jewish life, it was recognized, would be tragically restricted within the confines of a virtual Ghetto, but the Jew would at least be free from anxiety and would have some assurance for his future. The lines of demarcation being rigidly drawn, the Jews would be left at peace within them.

Another ground for hope was the expectation that the new legislation would do away with the legal anarchy prevailing in Germany with regard to the Jewish question, which made it possible for every petty Nazi official in the provinces to proclaim his own laws and issue his own decrees affecting the lives and fortunes of many Jews. Under this state of legal anarchy hundreds of cities, towns, and villages in Germany had prohibited Jews from entering their precincts and proudly announced the fact by means of illuminated sign-boards; hundreds of other cities had banned Jews from their public libraries, archives, museums, theaters, cinemas, cafes, and other public places; many famous cities forbade Jews to use their public baths, swimming pools, rivers, and medicinal springs. A number of towns in Germany even now prohibit the sale of food to Jews, of milk to Jewish children, and of medicines to Jewish sick. This state of anarchy was also responsible for the terrible Jew-baiting campaign conducted by Julius Streicher, with its blood libels, its revolting particulars of "race pollution," its high-pressure blackmail methods in the boycott of the Jews, its hysteria and near-lynching of Jewish youths seen associating with German girls.

These considerations accounted for the comparative acquiescence with which the Nürnberg laws were accepted by some sincere friends of the Jews and even by some of the Jews themselves. The government issued many pronouncements about the stabilizing effect of the legalization of the Jewish position. Dr. Goebbels, and even Streicher himself, proclaimed the end of individual anti-Jewish acts. Some of the official Nazi newspapers gave expression to a feeling of relief in words which seemed to say: Now we shall be able to forget the Jews for a while, and we shall have a little peace. Certain foreign liberals also placed hope in the average German's respect for law now that he had laws concerning Jews to go by.

Such hopes were doomed to disappointment. Within a brief fortnight from the proclamation of the Nürnberg decrees it became clear to all who cared to see that this legislation was not the end of a chapter but the beginning of a new period of persecution. The new anti-Jewish laws have legalized the state of pogrom created by the Streicher drive, and this has been done not in order to call a halt to Jew-baiting but to make possible further advances. No sooner were the new laws proclaimed than a period of interpreting and implementing them began which promises to be even more tragic than earlier stages. The anti-Jewish boycott is being waged with as much virulence as before; the municipalities have been declared to be within their rights as autonomous governments in enacting their fanatical laws against the Jews; the orgy of Jew-baiting has not abated in the least. Moreover, the anarchic situation has not been resolved. There is as much agonizing uncertainty about the meaning of the Nürnberg laws as there was about the status of the Jew before these laws existed. The hunt of the Jew has not been called off; the beast has only been declared fair game for all, and the hunt has been made a legal national sport. The effect of the legislation upon the average law-abiding German burgher, too, has been only to put his legal conscience at rest. It is no longer verboten to bait the Jew, to persecute and humiliate him; so, therefore, it cannot be wrong. On with the hunt!

The fact is that Nazi Germany is already going ahead with a new and intensified anti-Jewish drive, probably the last and greatest of all. The new drive is against the remaining economic positions held by the Jews. Having safeguarded German blood, the Streicher forces are now out to safeguard German commerce and industry. And with much better reason than before. The economic position of the Third Reich is notoriously bad, even if the political prestige of the regime has risen. The new army, navy, and air force may be a source of pride and satisfaction, but they eat up 40 per cent of the budget. The internal debt has risen from two to ten billion marks since the Nazi regime came into power. Exports have diminished to a point never known before; wages have gone down; raw material is scarce; so are also certain kinds of foodstuffs. There were signs of unrest in the summer, and they may be expected to increase this winter. How is the emergency to be met? What other means has National Socialism of quieting the unrest except a strong drive against the remaining economic positions of the Jews? There still remain several thousand shops and enterprises in Jewish hands; several thousand Jewish physicians are still practicing in Berlin and in a few other cities. What more natural than that these businesses and posts should be turned over to pure Aryans to allay the increasing economic discontent? If there is not scope enough within the framework of the new laws for the new drive, a pretext will be found in some action of Jews abroad to warrant new legislation. Did not the Führer himself openly admit at Nürnberg that German Jews were, in effect, being held as hostages by the Nazi regime to insure the good behavior of Jews abroad?

Those who have looked for security, legality, and certainty in the Nürnberg laws have misjudged the temper of the Nazi regime and misread the clear lessons of history, one of the most striking of which is to be found in the remarkable resemblance between the present position of the Jews in Germany and their position in Czarist Russia in the last decades of the nineteenth century. There is a fascinating analogy between the Nürnberg decrees and the infamous anti-Jewish laws of Alexander III proclaimed in 1882. The resemblance is so close, both in spirit and detail, that one cannot escape the conviction that the Nazi regime is consciously imitating the legislation of fifty years ago which made the regime of Alexander III notorious for its barbarism.

The Nürnberg laws will lead German Jews and Germany itself along the path that Russia followed after the passage of the laws of '82. These laws drove Russian Jews, almost as a body, into the Russian revolutionary movement and thus quickened the process which brought the violent collapse of the forces of social reaction. It is probable that no other single legislative act of Czarist Russia served more effectively to bring about the downfall of the regime than did the anti-Jewish laws of '82. Once history has begun to repeat itself, what will stay its course? Who can say that Germany will follow the ghosts of Czarist history only until 1905 and no farther?

As the first result of the present anti-Jewish laws in Germany, German Jews will be thrown into closer association with those suppressed labor groups now working underground for the overthrow of the Nazi regime. Neither Germans nor German Jews are a revolutionary people. In spite of Hitler's ravings about Jewish Marxists, the Jews in Germany are mostly a middle-class people with a typical bourgeois psychology very much like that of the Nazis themselves before they were brutalized by power. They are an orderly, well-to-do, comfort-loving people, such as a high state of industrial civilization tends to produce everywhere among the middle classes. They lack the deep spirituality of the Russian Jews, and that passionate inborn sense of revolt against injustice which under similar circumstances of oppression in Russia sent thousands of Jews into the vanguard of the revolutionary movement and made their fight against Czarism one of the epic events of the Russian Revolution. But circumstances are rapidly changing the psychology as well as the social and economic status of the German Jews. The Nürnberg laws cut them off from all association with bourgeois society, of which they were an integral part, and no other social relationship is left for them except with labor.

For if anything emerges clearly from the chaos in Germany it is that the outburst of anti-Semitism which seems to have swept the whole people is, in fact, confined to the German middle class and petty bourgeoisie. Like Nazism itself, the orgy of Jewish hatred is probably the last stand of an impotent and ineffectual class doomed to extinction even as Czarism was, a class which sees its end approaching and clutches madly at the last chance of power. All competent observers of Germany are in agreement that neither the higher German aristocracy nor German labor is swayed by that anti-Semitic mass-hysteria which animates the small German shopkeeper and petty official. It is the German middle class, not the German people, that has failed the Jews. In labor quarters in Germany Jews not only find no hatred but often even sympathy and help. If it were not for this silent but powerful moral support from the mass of the German working people, the Jews in Germany could not have withstood so long the fierce fury of the Streicher drives. If the German working class were as anti-Semitic as the middle class, there would long ago have been massacres in Germany no less bloody than those that took place in Czarist Russia.

German Jews have hitherto entirely ignored German labor. Jewish associations have always been with the petty bourgeoisie in Germany, to whom they have rendered great historic services. The gratitude shown for these is the present anti-Semitic outburst and the reestablishment of the Ghetto. But German Jews have too long been a part of German society to go back to the Ghetto now and to feel self-sufficient in segregation. It is only the Jewish Nationalists, with a mentality akin to that of other nationalists, who find it easy to acquiesce in the Nazi plan of complete Jewish segregation and even to accept with equanimity the prospect of a Jewish exodus from Germany. The bulk of the German Jews have been a part of Germany too long to succumb so easily to despair. They do not accept Hitler's verdict as that of the entire German people, or National Socialism as the last word of German history. They feel that Germany is their home and that they are a part of German society. But with the German shopkeeper maddened for the moment and wildly shouting "Juda, Verrecke!" German Jews naturally turn to that other "nation" which they have hitherto neglected, which pleads for the aid and abilities of Jews in the hour of its greatest emergency. If German Jews will serve the German working class with half the zeal they showed in the service of the German shopkeeper and petty official, the Nürnberg laws will not mean a return to a real Ghetto. The future historian may see these laws as marking the turn of the tide in National Socialism, even as the Czarist laws marked a similar turn in Russia.

The Spread of Hitlerism

By M. W. FODOR

THE dream of the union of Germany and Austria, or rather, of the union of Germany with the Germans of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, is almost as old as Mazzini's dream of "Unita Italia": it coincides with the revival of nationalism all over Europe at the beginning of the nineteenth century. Union was actually attained for a few weeks when the famous parliament met in St. Paul's Church at Frankfort in 1848. The Austro-German union had famous champions as early as the third quarter of the past century in the persons of George von Schönerer, H. K. Wolf, Walther Riehl, and Rudolf Jung. Though Bismarck defeated Hapsburg Austria in 1866 and succeeded in breaking up the German Bund, he included in the second German Empire only the South German states, and left Austria, with a German population of 12,000,000, to the Hapsburgs. Bismarck rightly feared the further disintegration of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, which he regarded as a useful future ally.

The peacemakers of Versailles, however, did not realize the importance of this motley group of nationalities called Austria-Hungary, and they broke it up into small units. Severed from its natural markets, Austria, small and desolate, attempted a union with Germany in November, 1918, in order to find an existence in the economic life of a great empire which, even if defeated and derelict for the moment, was bound one day to rise from its ashes. The desire of these Germans in Austria and Czecho-Slovakia for union with the German fatherland after the war was genuine and strong. Plebiscites in the Tyrol and Salzburg in the post-war years yielded enormous majorities in favor of Anschluss. But the peace treaties stood in the way.

A change came with the swift growth of National Socialism in Germany. The idea of union was strong before, but Adolf Hitler's movement breathed new life into it. No race has suffered so much from an inferiority complex as has the German. National Socialism was a kind of Coué method of converting the inferiority complex, at least temporarily, into a feeling of superiority. Hitler wrote in his "Mein Kampf": "The German Reich as a state shall include all Germans, with the function not only of collecting and preserving for this people the useful remains of ancient racial elements, but also of leading them, slowly but surely, to a dominating position." Herr Schmidt in Reichenberg, Czecho-Slovakia, and Herr Schimmelpfennig in São Paulo, Brazil, read this sentence and became conscious of the greatness of their nationality.

In carrying out his ideas Hitler used the efficient propaganda machinery set up by Goebbels and Rosenberg. The chief results are the still uncertain situation in Austria, the victory of Conrad Henlein in the last Czecho-Slovak elections, the unrest among the Germans in Hungary, the considerable increase of Nazi strength among the Swabians in Yugoslavia, and the rapid rise of an illegal Nazi movement in Rumania. The brunt of this propaganda since Hitler's rise to power has been directed against "independent" Austria. Although the greater part of the Austrian population had previously desired to join Germany, after the establishment of the rule of Hitler this feeling was modified: the Social Democrats, after observing the fate of their comrades in the Reich, turned away from the pan-German idea. Had Austria possessed a great statesman in those days of severe pressure, he would have attempted to unite the ranks of the Catholics with those of the Social Democrats, both groups being anxious to escape the fate of their brothers in Nazi Germany. The late Dr. Dollfuss, however, failed to grasp the situation. In his hatred of the Socialists he followed the advice of Mussolini to fight a battle on two fronts, and was able to defeat, first, a Socialist rising, and then a Nazi Putsch. The second event, however, caused his own death. The defeated Socialists have an irreconcilable hatred for the Schuschnigg government, and if they are not yet open allies of the Nazis against the present regime, the danger exists that in case of a new revolt the Socialists, probably to their ultimate destruction, would offer a helping hand to the followers of Hitler.

The National Socialist Putsch of July, 1934, afforded a good opportunity to the Austrian government to break up the Nazi organizations. The Storm Troops were not only dissolved, but the Storm Troopers were thrown into jail or were sent to concentration camps. The secret party organization was dissolved, and every new attempt to reorganize the party has been frustrated by the vigilance of the authorities. Yet the Nazi movement in Austria, despite this persecution, appears to be invincible. One of the reasons is the weakness of the government, which is unable to inspire the youth of the country. The younger generation of Austrians know little of their country's splendid past, but they all know that Mussolini said, "What is Austria, who is she?" and then compared their country with a spittoon. And the young people also know—thanks to the ubiquitous German propaganda—that the Nazis won an enormous majority at the plebiscite in the Saar; that the camouflaged Nazis had an overwhelming victory in Czecho-Slovakia; that Hitler's Germany repudiated the military clauses of the Versailles treaty and no French troops marched in to punish the offenders; that England made a naval pact with Germany which is regarded by the Nazi youth as England's complete swing to their side; that the war in Abyssinia has weakened Italy's watch on the Brenner frontier.

Czecho-Slovakia is the largest of Germany's small-nation neighbors. It has a large, excellently equipped army. Moreover, it is an ally of France and has recently concluded a treaty of mutual assistance with Soviet Russia. But two other neighbors, Poland and Hungary, are only awaiting the day when an armed conflict shall arise between Germany and Czecho-Slovakia. Near the German border in Czecho-Slovakia are 3,500,000 Germans—out of a population of 14,000,000—who in the event of an armed conflict would be a potential danger to Czecho-Slovakia. This German population has always been German nationalist in sympathy.

After a short period of oppression the Czechs gave fair treatment to the German minority after the war—undoubtedly better treatment than the Germans experienced in any other country. Later the Czechs gained the cooperation of three of the minor German parties in the Czech Parliament. But other groups, especially the German National Socialist Party of Czecho-Slovakia and the German National Party, followed an opposition policy for which they received plenty of encouragement from across the frontier. When the Nazis in Czecho-Slovakia over a year ago tried to use high-handed and violent methods, the government ordered their dissolution. But soon after the dissolution of the Nazi Party and the suppression of the German National Party, a German gymnastic teacher, Conrad Henlein, started an organization intended to unite all the “nationally oriented” Germans in Czecho-Slovakia. Gymnastic groups have always played an important role in the Bohemian district. In the days of the old Austrian empire the gymnastic organizations, the “Sokols,” were important nuclei of nationalist revival among the Czechs. Henlein, pretending to stand for fidelity to the republic, succeeded with great energy in reorganizing not only a gymnastic movement but a political formation which he called the “Sudetendeutsche Front.” Although Henlein pretends to be standing for the status quo, there is no doubt that he is the precursor of Hitler in Czecho-Slovakia.

No National Socialist Party exists in Hungary. Yet a visit to the villages in western Hungary or in the Swabian settlements round Budapest suffices to convince one that the atmosphere in these German villages is National Socialist. The Germans in Berlin complained bitterly about the persecution of the German voters at the recent elections in Hungary. General Gömbös's government is undoubtedly in a dilemma. While on the one hand, for sentimental and economic reasons, Gömbös wants friendly relations with Hitler, whose internal political methods he admires and whose revisionist foreign policy he hails, Hungary is sincerely frightened by the pan-German aspirations of Nazi Germany. The Berlin propaganda is highly effective in the German parts of Hungary. Propagandists come in the guise of beggars, wanderers, tourists, and what not. They are eventually put over the frontier on one pretext or another, but hardly is one ousted when another arrives.

Equally difficult is the situation in Rumania with 600,- 000 Germans. These live mostly in large towns in the Banat or in Transylvania. During the last few years they have been subjected to intense National Socialist propaganda directed from Berlin, and in many municipalities the Nazis have succeeded in capturing the majority of the offices. Three years ago the German National Socialist Party of Rumania was dissolved, but this did not mean the end of the propaganda. The Rumanian press recently remarked with alarm the renewed growth of Nazi propaganda and the constant increase of Nazism in the cities of Transylvania. The youth wear, despite prohibition, the illegal brown shirts or black storm-troop uniforms. The Rumanian Henlein is a certain Herr Fabrizius, who is acting as “leader” and who is trying to do away once for all with the democratic groups among the Germans in the Banat and Transylvania.

The Yugoslav Germans are on good terms with the government. Nevertheless, a strong Nazi movement is noticeable not only in Maribor (Marburg) and Celje (Cilli) but also among the Germans of the Yugoslav Banat, in Pancevo, Beckerek, and other towns.

The penetration of Nazism among the Germans in Central and Southeastern Europe is magnificently organized. Before an astonished world has time to recover from the shock, one country after the other, it seems probable, will fall before this cleverly launched attack. If Austria goes, Czecho-Slovakia will not be able to survive, and subsequently the Germans of Hungary will be incorporated into Greater Germany. The speed of the progress depends on the various conflicts in Europe and on developments within Germany itself.

Loose Construction

By HEYWOOD BROWN

IT has been the custom of Al Smith to attack liberals on the ground that they are demagogues. In the course of his Liberty League speech he mentioned his mother, his wife, his children, his grandchildren, the Bible, the American flag, and the national anthem.

It is also in the Smith tradition to say, “Let us look at the record.” The chief theme of the show which he put on for a dozen du Ponts and their friends was the charge that all would be well with this nation if only it would go back to the Democratic national platform of 1932. It would be interesting to have Mr. Smith point out just how that platform would serve to solve unemployment and the plight of the farmer.

In speaking of taxation the Liberty League orator said, “There's no use talking about the poor.” This pledge was maintained by Al. Not once during his address did he suggest anything to relieve distress on the part of any underprivileged person. Nevertheless, it was an interesting evening. It is not every night that a large audience has the opportunity of watching a man sell his soul over a national hook-up.

* * *

THE Associated Press recently brought a suit to restrain the National Labor Relations Board from passing on the discharge of Morris Watson, guild leader who was suddenly dismissed by the press association. John W. Davis, chief counsel for the A. P., pleaded that the Wagner-Connelly act, which undertakes to protect the right of workers to organize, was unconstitutional. The Associated Press has legal rights like any other business concern, but the action has put it in a curious position. In theory the A. P. is a neutral pipe-line for the distribution of news. It has some 1,350 clients, whom it is supposed to supply with facts quite free from editorial bias of any sort.

However, it happens that the fate of the Wagner-Connelly act is important current news. The Associated Press has declared in court that it believes the measure to be unconstitutional. Accordingly, it has a stake in having that point of view upheld. It is possible that the A. P. might be wholly neutral in its news policy in spite of the position it has taken in court. It might even bend over a little backward to avoid suspicion of bias. By all standards of journalistic ethics the Associated Press ought to keep a couple of laps ahead of Caesar's wife. That would be a sound theory.

In practice the A. P. sent out a very long story when a Missouri judge held the Wagner act unconstitutional and a much shorter account when another federal judge in Memphis held the measure to be wholly within the powers of Congress. The New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune both played up the New Deal defeat as a front-page story. They both buried the New Deal victory inside.

Representative Marcantonio, who is one of the most courageous men in Congress, found a brief opportunity to call the attention of the House to the position of the A. P. in our national affairs. There was a short debate on the motion to grant the National Labor Relations Board $100,000 for its necessities. Mr. Marcantonio declared himself for the appropriation. "There is a concerted drive being made against the National Labor Relations Board and against the Wagner-Connelly act. This drive is being conducted on all fronts. First, a committee of eighty-six lawyers, substituting themselves for the Supreme Court, declared the law to be unconstitutional. Then the Liberty League did the same. Only the other day the Associated Press through its counsel, John W. Davis, declared the law unconstitutional in a United States district court. Thus you can readily see the great need that this board has for appropriations in order adequately to meet the onslaught of its powerful enemies I have just enumerated."

Mr. Connery chimed in and said, "You cannot fight John W. Davis unless you give the board an opportunity to sit down and function."

It is the rarest thing in the world for any Congressman to criticize a great press association. However, it does not seem to be news that Marcantonio attacked the Associated Press. At any rate the A. P. sent out nothing about the matter.

It is ironical indeed to find the great fact-finding neutral organization coming into court and asking for an injunction so that the facts of the Morris Watson case can be suppressed. Certainly the Associated Press deserves to stand in contempt of all working newspapermen in this country.

AT Jack and Charlie's restaurant on Fifty-second Street in New York, better known as 21, the waiters are on strike for recognition of their union. To some of the patrons of this rendezvous this is awfully, awfully comic. A few even take it as a personal affront that they must put up with the bad service of scab waiters. It seems strange indeed that customers who have been in close contact with the old waiters should not stand by them now when they are fighting for their natural rights. Indeed, a committee is being formed among the newspapermen and actors and, also, among the unorganized patrons to drive home to the management that strike-breaking is no longer considered a joke.

New Yorkers are creatures of habit, but some who have gone with a fair degree of regularity to 21 may have time enough to learn that there really are other restaurants in the city. So far Jack and Charlie have been faithful to the employers' tradition. They have raised the red scare.

Correspondence

The Sacramento Cases

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Parole Board of California met last month at Tehachapi, the women's branch of the state penitentiary. It heard the cases of Caroline Decker and Nora Conklin, sentenced in Sacramento last April to serve from one to fourteen years on a charge of criminal syndicalism, that is, organizing a union and striking for higher wages. The board did not set sentence for the two women; it will not meet again for four months. The board has not even heard the cases of Norman Mini, Pat Chambers, or the other Sacramento class-struggle prisoners in San Quentin.

All the Sacramento cases are being appealed, Mini's by the National Sacramento Appeal Committee. There are excellent grounds for appeal, both errors in the trial and a juror's affidavit that the verdicts were an illegal compromise. But the appeal has struck a snag. The clerk of Sacramento County refuses to deliver to the various defendants copies of a transcript of the trial proceedings indispensable for the preparation of an appeal. The defense needs several copies; the clerk says he has one copy and will deliver it to nobody because the defendants will not waive rights to other copies. Raymond W. Henderson, the attorney who fought most of the I. W. W. criminal-syndicalism cases in the old days, now retained by the N. S. A. C., is fighting for the right of all the prisoners to an appeal. His demands for copies of the transcript have been turned down in the District Court of Appeals in Sacramento, but he is going farther. He is also bringing action for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the constitutional right to an appeal is being denied. This issue may have to be fought out in the federal courts.

Jack Warnick, another union organizer, was acquitted in Sacramento when the others were convicted, but the American Legion Committee on Subversive Activities has, as the Hearst press boasts, incited federal authorities to hold him for deportation. Warnick was denied citizenship several years ago because he could not prove by documents that he had been born in Montreal, whence he emigrated at the age of eighteen months some twenty-five years ago. Now he is slated for deportation because he cannot prove he was not born in Montreal, and cannot establish the date of his entry into this country! Warnick is represented legally by Austin Lewis of San Francisco, who assures us that the only evidence against Warnick is the material on which he was acquitted in Sacramento. The N. S. A. C. is helping to finance Warnick's defense.

New York, January 11

HERBERT SOLOW,

Secretary-Treasurer, N. S. A. C.

Throw Out the Lifebuoy!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In reviewing Clara Weatherwax's "Marching! Marching!" in The Nation for January 15 Mary McCarthy reveals—perhaps only subconsciously on her part, but unmistakably, nevertheless—her white-collar snobbery. Miss McCarthy makes very violent protest against what seems to her the unwholesomeness of some of Miss Weatherwax's proletarian characters. To the white-collar mob the working class is always unwholesome and repulsive. Why the creatures actually sweat and smell! They have moles! Some of them even have ugly warts! And some of them are dirty!

Is this criticism?

St. Paul, Minn., January 20

J. O. MEYERS

President Butler on Dead Universities

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

It is gratifying to read in the New York Times of January 4 Nicholas Murray Butler's arraignment of the totalitarian states which have made their universities "dead except by names." "University life," President Butler announces, "begins left of the Rhine. If man is not free to think and inquire, progress is impossible."

I applaud. But I humbly beg President Butler to remember that for a long time in Italy universities have been "dead except by name," and human progress has been made impossible by a totalitarian state. When, in 1931, Italian university professors were obliged to take oath to educate their pupils according to the tenets of the Fascist regime, and great scholars were removed from their posts for refusing that oath, President Butler ignored this occurrence. Not until 1936 does President Butler find out that Italy, at least as far as universities are concerned, falls under the same category as other "totalitarian states."

Meanwhile the Casa Italiana of Columbia University goes on functioning as a center of Fascist propaganda. But President Butler, stepping into the shoes of the director of the Casa Italiana, has invited Count Sforza to deliver there an address which is meant to prove that Columbia is unbiased and impartial.

New York, January 7

ROBERT BOLAFFIO

Baiting Mr. Hearst

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Such a committee on Hearst as was suggested by Mr. Villard in the January 15 Nation ought to be set up. I believe the American Federation of Teachers, the American Civil Liberties Union, the Social Frontier, the Progressive Education Association, the Religious and Labor Foundation, the I. L. G. W. U., the Amalgamated, and other such organizations would support it.

Let's not let a good idea like that go to waste.

GEORGE DAVIS, Secretary-Treasurer,
Chicago, January 11 American Federation of Teachers

A 3-Way Guide: TELLS, SHOWS, EXPLAINS:

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

By C. H. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by E. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch.M., M.B., Specialising Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London, England

— and —

CHARTS OF SEX ORGANS WITH DETAILED EXPLANATIONS

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M.D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital

CONTENTS

- Section I. Bride and Groom
- Section II. The Cold Wife—Frigidity
- Section III. The Unsatisfied Wife
- Section IV. Married Courtship
- Section V. The Perfect Physical Expression of Love
- Section VI. Illustrative Charts and Explanations

THE CHARTS

- Female Sex Organs, Side View
 - The Internal Sex Organs
 - The External Sex Organs
 - Female Sex Organs, Front View
 - Entrance to Female Genital Parts
 - Male Sex Organs, Side View
 - Male Sex Organs, Front View
 - Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views.
- (Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

“From a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly. As a general thing, even in so-called normal coitus, the man considers only himself and not the woman at all.”

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."

—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."

—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Tells the ordinary man and woman what they want to know, simply and directly. I should like to compel everyone—particularly men—to read it (they'd give women a straighter deal if they did)."

—Ethel Mannin in the New Leader

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."

—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."

—American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."

—Journal of the American Medical Association

* The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

Only $1.95 (Postage 15c extra) EMERSON BOOKS, Dept. 330-N, 333 Sixth Ave., N. Y. C.

FOUNDED 1865

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Labor and Industry

Steel Robots That Came Alive

By ROSE M. STEIN

WHEN a dummy comes to life, that is news—especially if the dummy happens to be a company union in the steel industry. When last fall some of these unions, like Karel Capek's robots, suddenly began to move of their own initiative, most observers attributed to the phenomenon a disproportionate significance, but the incident is nevertheless important.

The employee-representation plan under which the steel industry's company unions operate was carefully drawn to prevent effective action. It was designed to deal with cases arising out of individual complaints presented by the individual worker to the representative in his section, and did not provide the framework for demands which originate with the representatives and for which the latter seek approval and support from their constituents; none of the steel companies are willing to tolerate demands of that kind. In their original form the employee-representation plans provided for equal representation from the employer and employee groups. No matter how many representatives of the employer were present, their vote on any vital issue was always to be exactly equaled by that of the employee representatives present, and as most important issues required the assent of at least a majority, and sometimes even of three-fourths of the combined number of representatives, a perpetual stalemate was guaranteed. Within recent months the plans have been uniformly changed to provide for only one management representative. This change made possible discussion of, and decision upon, demands hitherto regarded as unorthodox, such, for instance, as a general wage increase. To offset the effects of this change a new scheme has now been devised to keep "radical" discussions among company-union representatives from reaching the rank and file. The scheme is simple. Minutes of company-union meetings, which are supposed to be distributed among the employees or posted on accessible bulletin boards, are written up and mimeographed in the company offices, where "inflammable" material is faithfully eliminated. In plants where a howl was raised against this practice the blue-penciling was placed in the hands of a newly created and carefully chosen editorial committee of workers.

Company-union plans do not provide for mass-meetings, and requests for special permission to hold such meetings have met with refusal more than nine times out of ten. The reason is not far to seek. There are cases on record to show that such gatherings resulted in a decision to abandon the company union and to join a union of the worker's own choosing. On the other hand, most of the steel plant managers looked with favor upon social affairs at which workers and their overseers rubbed elbows and, presumably, built up mutual good-will. As it turned out, the whole company-union disturbance grew out of these social affairs.

Company-union representatives of the United States Steel subsidiary, the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company, in New Castle, Pennsylvania, about fifty miles northwest of Pittsburgh, last year arranged several parties and picnics.

By these they achieved two results: they brought together the mass of workers and found out what the men really wanted; and they acquired in the process a treasury balance of $1,200 quite independent of company contribution and control. In the course of these informal gatherings it was decided to spend this money in calling a convention of all the company-union representatives within the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company. Word went out to the other eleven mills, scattered over as many different towns in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana, and employing a total of 23,000 workers. Meanwhile an additional $1,000 was raised, and on September 25, 1935, thirty-two delegates from twelve company unions in the plants of the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company met in New Castle.

Plant managers endeavored to discourage the convention idea when it was first proposed, but without success. The employers then agreed to finance the convention; but they also organized a safe block of delegates which could be relied on to prevent the adoption of drastic measures. It is reliably reported that the company not only paid the routine convention expenses but supplied ample funds for liquor to keep the delegates in good humor. This money was handed out in cash, and the officials who dispensed it would take neither receipts nor itemized bills. Both devices failed. The men remained unaccountably sober during convention hours; the "safe" block at no time included more than fifteen delegates; and since most of the proposals required only a majority vote they were duly carried.

Arthur H. Young, United States Steel's vice-president in charge of labor relations, who is reputed to be the author of the employee-representation plan, came to New Castle in the expectation that he would be invited to the conference. His advance spies reported, however, that the delegates were in no mood to be interfered with, and Mr. Young quietly went back to New York. Lesser lights from the managerial group who came to the convention and were already in the hall were obliged to retire when a motion was carried at the very outset that "managers should not be allowed to be present at the meeting." Rank-and-file union leaders also came to New Castle to survey the scene. They talked with a dozen of the delegates whom they regarded as the most radical in the group and got them to agree to support a resolution demanding a 15 per cent increase in wages. When the convention opened, the men who had not been in touch with the unionists introduced a resolution asking for a 35 per cent raise. The so-called radicals then had to assume the conservative role and urge the lower rate.

In addition to the 15 per cent wage increase the convention agreed to ask for a revision of the pension system to provide a monthly minimum of $60 and a maximum of $100 for all employees, including executives. They worked out a scheme for vacation with pay for all employees, including those who work at hourly and piece-work rates, and proposed various changes in the employee-representation plan. They decided to convene again next August.

A committee of three, selected for the purpose, carried the convention's demands to the management of the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company, and on October 18 received a flat refusal of the whole program.

The story of the convention was carried by the newspapers and the "grapevine" to every steel worker in the country. The idea caught fire, and not even the refusal of the demands by the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company could stop its spread to other plants. Various efforts were made to hold other conventions, but the companies would not finance them and the unions had not sufficient funds to stage an independent meeting. They did the next best thing: they copied the demands of the New Castle convention and presented them to their respective employers, laying special emphasis on the demand for a wage increase. Company unions in the Aliquippa and Pittsburgh plants of the Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation, in the Duquesne, Pennsylvania, and Gary, Indiana, plants of the Carnegie-Illinois Steel Company, and in the plants of the Weirton Steel Company in Weirton, West Virginia, and the Republic Steel Company in Cleveland and Warren, Ohio, all asked for a 15 per cent raise. The National Tube Company in McKeesport, Pennsylvania, and the Edgar Thompson Steel Works in Braddock, both United States Steel subsidiaries, likewise received demands. The answer to all demands, in all plants, was a uniform no.

What will be the next step? The official Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, still dominated, or kept dormant, by the seventy-seven-year-old Mike Tighe, is doing nothing to capitalize this situation. It is significant that the company-union activity originated in New Castle, where the Amalgamated Association had never made any headway. It was no secret that throughout the organization campaign of the company unions a body of workers consisting largely of the native American element resisted organization principally because of their experience with the American Federation of Labor. Some of them had been members of the Amalgamated in former years and had been dissatisfied with it. Employers made it their business to recruit company-union representatives for the most part from this group. When a company-union representative would testify, as he was often called on to do, that he was once a union man but had found that "it did not work in the interest of the workingman" he supplied the very note employers were seeking. Basically these representatives were not scabs. Those who denounced the Amalgamated may have had very good reason for it. Others may have conveniently rationalized themselves into believing that the company union was worth a try. Still others, of course, did and said what they were expected to for the sake of a good job. But as the struggle between the inside and outside unions continued and employee representatives were called on time and again to testify in behalf of the companies, as more and more union men were discriminated against and their cases brought before these same representatives for adjustment, they began to realize the meanness of the part they were playing. There is nothing a steel worker hates more than to be regarded by his fellow-workers as a scab. Some gave up their company-union posts in disgust. Others either could not afford to or did not have the courage to make such a sacrifice, since representatives get paid for every minute they give to company-union work, and many earn full-time wages in that capacity. Rather than give up, they decided to try to make something out of the company union.

There is ample reason for the belief that the companies were very well pleased at first. The American Sheet and Tin Plate Company might have succeeded in preventing the New Castle convention if it had really tried. Certainly the other corporations could have suppressed the news that wage increases were being demanded at the various plants. Company-union representatives are not versed in the art of handling publicity. The news was, in fact, for the most part released by the companies themselves. It was good policy to establish in the public mind the fact that the company union was a real bargaining agency. The companies had nothing to lose in the process since they refused the demands and the unions had no way of enforcing them. But other developments are worrying management.

The employee representatives of the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company and of other companies, having found that the company union will not work, are now deciding upon the next step. In the Chicago-Gary district several company unions have voted to disband and to seek another form of organization—at the insistent request, it is asserted, of the men whom they represent. Independent unions have been set up in the South Chicago plant of the Carnegie-Illinois Steel Company and in the plants of the Calumet and Inland Steel companies in the same district. In the Pittsburgh area any number of company unions are ready to disband the moment the Amalgamated, or some other organization, shows that it is really ready "to go places." The one ray of hope is John L. Lewis. Steel workers have long envied the miners their strong union. They know, too, that in any effective struggle against the steel trust they will need the aid and cooperation of the United Mine Workers of America. Confidentially they express the fervent hope that John L. Lewis means business.

Working conditions, meanwhile, are growing worse. The steel industry carries at least twice as many persons on its pay roll as are normally needed. This surplus labor is expected to come in very handy in the event of war as well as in the event of a major strike. In the first instance the companies would be guaranteed against a serious labor shortage, and in the other they would find it easier to recruit a scab army to work and live inside the mills. But this arrangement means that even under the recent increased productivity in the steel industry most of the men can hope for little more than two or three days' work a week. This means continued poverty and semi-starvation.

The steel workers will follow John L. Lewis. They waste no love on him personally, any more than do the rank-and-file miners, but they have confidence in his leadership. The moment John L. Lewis launches a campaign to organize the steel workers, it is safe to prophesy, judging by the present temper, that company-union organizations will disappear from the steel mills with even greater suddenness than they appeared in 1933 under the stimulus of the NRA. The employers, it may be added, are more afraid of John L. Lewis than of any other man in the labor or radical movement.

[This is the third of a series of articles on the company union in various key industries. The fourth, also by Miss Stein, will deal with company unionism as it is practiced in the public utilities, namely, in the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company. It will appear soon.]

Silicosis Village

[We print on this page a report made a year and a half ago to the Federal Emergency Relief Administration on the village of Vanetta, West Virginia, which is situated near the site of the Hawk's Nest tunnel at Gauley Bridge. The report is dated July 19, 1934. It deals with fifteen wage-earners, "fourteen of whom suffer from silicosis," who provide sustenance for an entire community of ninety-one persons. It is based on a report by Leon Brower, "statistician for West Virginia, NRA." The report is labeled "Confidential Research Bulletin" and was first made available to the public on January 21 when Representative Vito Marcantonio read it into the record of the subcommittee of the House of Representatives which has been investigating the deaths of hundreds of men who worked on the Hawk's Nest tunnel. So far as we know, it has not been published in full in any newspaper.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

IN the early months of 1930 large numbers of able-bodied Negroes were brought to Vanetta, West Virginia, an abandoned coal-mining settlement which was prosperous as late as 1925, to engage in the drilling of a three-mile tunnel required by an electric-power development. The mountain to be pierced was found to consist of pure silicate. In spite of the warnings of the West Virginia Department of Mines the contractors took no precautions against the consequences to the workers of breathing the dust, which causes silicosis, a disease which destroys lung tissues and ultimately causes suffocation. As early as the fall of 1930 hundreds of workers had died, allegedly of pneumonia, but exact figures are not available as many of the sick were allowed to wander away. The labor turnover on the job was estimated at more than 300 per cent.

On the completion of the project in September, 1932, Vanetta reverted to the status of an abandoned village. In 1934 there were ninety-one persons in residence, occupying sixty-one tumble-down hovels—fourteen children, forty-four adult females, and forty-three adult males. Of the latter all but ten have silicosis. Support for the community comes from the earnings of fifteen of the males, fourteen of whom suffer from silicosis. Thirteen are engaged on a road-construction project eighteen miles away and are forced to walk to and from work, leaving them but five hours a day for labor. Moreover, many, because of their illness, must lay off work every other day and are frequently too weak to lift a sledge hammer. Quoting Mr. Brower:

Coupled with all these hardships is starvation. Relief has always been spasmodic and irregular, and more irregular than is warranted. Every family related the lack of food, and for days at a time during the last winter, they had nothing to eat. One white person living in Vanetta kept many from starving. Many of the Negroes went to Gauley and begged for food and work. Several white people in Gauley contributed regularly to the support of some families. Clothing was always inadequate, and there were numerous cases of slightly frozen limbs; also several families were evicted during winter, and nearly every family was served with eviction notices.

Before coming to the community, the people were accustomed to three meals a day. During the last two winters, if they had one meal a day they considered themselves fortunate. The food consisted of white and red beans, corn bread, and syrup. Occasionally they had some sow-belly "white meat"—that is, cheap white pork. No variety existed even for the sick or the children. Milk had been unheard of for at least two years.

Several men gathered in a group related how at first the elder folks would economize on food so that the children could have more. And then the men would cut their allowance to practically nothing so that the women could eat. Direct relief was seldom given. Many families received commodities, but very irregularly. Just three men were given CWA work, and these three worked a few weeks only. The relief office is fourteen miles from the community. These people would get up at four o'clock and trudge through the heavy snow to the office, inadequately clothed and hungry. Too often they found that the relief agency was in no position to give assistance.

Brower makes the following recommendations concerning rehabilitation of these destitute Negroes:

Since those persons are not normally unemployed employables, they will not remain under the FERA. But for the time being the position of the W. V. R. A. in dealing with all persons having silicosis should be as follows:

1. To discourage any person from work if the medical problem indicates the necessity.

2. To provide for all in need by direct relief. The relief should be adequate despite the protests of the white people.

3. To improve the housing and sanitation programs immediately. A public-health nurse should spend a considerable amount of time in Vanetta.

If these people desire to return home, they should be assisted, probably by the Transient Bureau. Since these men have a short period to live, as much security as possible should be provided for them. A trained qualified worker should be in this community to assist in the transportation and to arrange inter-community contact.

At any rate, it is inadvisable, socially, to keep a community of dying persons intact. Every means should be exerted to move these families, so that they may be in communities where they will be accepted, and where the wives and children will find adjustment easier.

Contributors to This Issue

CARLETON BEALS has written many books and articles about oppressed peoples in Latin America. Last year he turned his attention to regions nearer home, and wrote "The Story of Huey Long." Recently, in Decatur, he has been watching the trial of the Scottsboro boys.

FRANZ HÖLLERING was editor of important liberal and left journals in Berlin until he was forced by the Nazis to flee the country. He is now in America.

WILLIAM ZUKERMAN is a prominent London journalist with a special interest in the international Jewish problem.

M. W. FODOR is the Vienna correspondent of the Manchester Guardian.

ROSE M. STEIN was formerly research secretary of the Pittsburgh League for Social Justice.

GRACE ADAMS is the author of "Psychology: Science or Superstition?" and "Your Child Is Normal."

JACQUES BARZUN is a member of the History Department of Columbia University.

Books and Drama

Made in Japan

The Wooden Pillow. By Carl Fallas. The Viking Press. $2.50.

MR. FALLAS has introduced several new refinements into an art which already was languishing, some say, from a superfluity of such things. The art of fiction has almost ceased to be the art of telling big stories in a big way, "Anthony Adverse" notwithstanding; indeed, the occasional attempt of someone to revive the ancient glories only proves how ancient they are, and apparently how irrecoverable. The art turns elsewhere now, leaving its larger responsibilities to the cinema and contenting itself with a thousand minor triumphs, which, to be sure, have their fascination. Mr. Fallas, for instance, plucks a few strings and his story is told; plucks them more or less at random on the special instrument he has built for his purpose; and the charm of the result is not unconnected with an appearance of ease in the musician's manner. Or perhaps it should be said that he takes the finest brush in his hand and, scarcely attending to what he does, produces all at once a picture, a Japanese picture, with the minimum of strokes. He does anything at all except write what once would have been considered a novel. His people, for instance. He has made them all toys. They are the most engaging little creatures, and they undoubtedly are possessed of some quaint power to move across the pretty scene. But the word for them is toys.

Whether or not this represents a refinement of condescension toward Japan is something for the foreign offices to debate. Let us trust that no offense is taken and go on to see what we have here. We have in the first place two Europeans in Yokohama, an Englishman and a Dane. Both of them are life size, if not a little more so; at least Jessel the Dane is a tower whom three native gendarmes can barely scale by standing on one another's shoulders. He and Grier, the English hero of the piece, stride like gentle and respectful Gullivers among the little people with whom they argue or gossip or make love as the occasion demands; the fable itself demanding that Grier shall make love to O Kaya San and leave her in the end very much as Madam Butterfly was left.

The fable, however, is not the important thing. The book is about the smallness, the remoteness, the delicacy, the piquancy of all these bowing images—these manikins whose courtesy is so exquisitely managed and so consistently, so fanatically carried out as to make us wonder at their lifelikeness. For they are lifelike too. They may have no organs in their tiny bodies, they may be nothing but painted silk and wood; yet from somewhere in them come little, modest, murmurous voices saying English sentences that are as brief as they are baffling to a Western mind brought up on the ruder necessities of speech. Grier, and doubtless Mr. Fallas with him, never gets over his amusement at the politeness of Mr. Okada, O Kaya San, and O Setsu San. Wound up to bend from the waist down and say "honorable" as their foreheads tap the floor, but sent forth from the artificer's shop with their English grammar not quite finished, they are indeed amusing and wonderful, and capable of making us ashamed of our own size, our own bluntness.

Mr. Fallas is not unaware of ironies beneath the contrast, and he sees well enough that they strike both ways. He is very intelligent, and he has intended no condescension. Yet there is one irony he has missed, and to that extent his vision is peccable. He has not seen everything that is involved in the spectacle of an Englishman who considers the whole of another nation odd; who interprets their stature literally; and who supposes that because their voices tinkle in his ears across the vast gulf of mutual ignorance they have—again literally—only the little things to say. Of course Mr. Fallas himself has only a little tale to tell. That he tells it on an appropriate scale is a tribute to his tact, and that he tells it with delightfulness is a sign of his own pleasant nature. Let us merely hope that some Mr. Okada never takes it into his head to turn the tables and write a novel called, say, "The Fur Kimono."

MARK VAN DOREN

Cross-Currents in Psychology

The Evolution of Modern Psychology. By Richard Müller-Freienfels. Translated from the German with an Introduction by W. Beran Wolfe. Yale University Press. $5.

THIS book, which was written especially for American readers, represents a heroic attempt not only to tell the story of modern psychology in the fulness of its "systematic" detail, but to find a meaning and an inherent purpose in that story. Few intellectual tasks could be more difficult.

The course of modern psychology has run almost every way except straight. It has been random and devious; and only too frequently it has led its enthusiastic and conscientious pursuers into experimental blind alleys. Its result to date has been a great many often brilliant, but even more often impractical and contradictory theories, a mass of "proved" but unrelated facts, and an everlasting wrangle over the meaning of some of the simplest words in all the civilized languages.

Such is the material with which Dr. Müller-Freienfels has had to deal. Yet if it be possible to extract order and purpose from such a conglomeration, he has done it. And he has been able to do it not only because he knows all the contradictory theories and all the conflicting facts so thoroughly that he presents them all in their proper setting and with just the right emphasis, but because through his own individual temperament and training he is peculiarly fitted for his task.

He learned the rules of meticulous research in those German laboratories where minute, meaningless data were valued more highly than diamonds; but he also studied under William James, to whose influence and guidance he affectionately and gratefully dedicates his present work. Moreover, he came to psychology by way of the study of aesthetics and is still, for all his rigorous laboratory training, an avowed and unashamed vitalist.

Briefly, Dr. Müller-Freienfel's thesis is this: psychology developed an inferiority complex in relation to all the other sciences on that day in the later 1800's when it deliberately, self-consciously, and with a great show of pride discarded the notion of a human soul—which since the time of Plato had been its one excuse for existing as an independent realm of experimental inquiry. So powerful and devitalizing was the effect of this inferiority complex that it caused all the facts presented in the early bustling laboratories to be, if not actually still-born, at any rate too puny and cold to have any meaning in the emotional hurly-burly of ordinary human life. Carrying this idea still farther, he sees all the various schools which have arisen and flourished since 1900—functionalism and the other purposive psychologies, psychoanalysis, and the rest of the subconscious interpretations of mind, even the upstart behaviorism—as representing a real, if seldom clearly formulated, effort to give man back some semblance of a soul—not the metaphysical soul of the Patristic philosophers, it is true, but at least a unique personality amounting to more than an accidental hodge-podge of discrete sensations and isolated muscle twitches. And he hopes that this trend toward an organic conception of the human being will finally transcend the bickerings of the various schools and lead to the establishment of a sane and inclusive "philosophical anthropology."

Dr. Müller-Freienfels apologizes for his possible neglect of some of the more recent work of American investigators, which has not been available to him in Germany. But for American students this omission is all to the good; for in place of material that is almost too familiar to us he gives us full summaries of the work in phenomenology and related fields now being done in Europe which has not yet been adequately translated into English.

GRACE ADAMS

The Poet in Politics

Mazzini. By Stringfellow Barr. Henry Holt and Company. $2.75.

FOR all its abandonment of the "great man" theory of history, our age seems uncommonly devoted to biographies. "Movements" and "forces" are convenient abstractions for the textbook writer, but the student who really wants to know what made the movement move or the force act is thrown back upon the initial truth that movements are the energies of men and that some men are more energetic than others. It is encouraging to that view to find in the most recent biography of Mazzini repeated assertions that he and Cavour and Charles Albert did shape the course of Italian history, and were not mere pinheads stuck on a map to show whither an inevitable movement was proceeding.

With regard to Mazzini, Mr. Stringfellow Barr's work, by its exhaustive scholarship and admirably clear organization of materials, convincingly settles this question of effectiveness. "The answer probably is," says Mr. Barr, "that Joseph Mazzini did more than any other single human being to foster in nineteenth-century Italians the urgent determination to achieve independence and unity; and that more than any other man Camillo di Cavour made the historic decisions that satisfied that determination." Sir John Marriott had already suggested this solution in his "Makers of Modern Italy," but the conclusion seemed always to break down when confronted with a recital of the events of Mazzini's life. The rhetoric, the pitiable military failures, the financial distress, the impracticality, the religious and political chimeras one encounters at every turn in Mazzini's career, have rebuffed many potential admirers and turned others into idolaters who worshiped because the idol had feet of clay. The merit of Mr. Barr's "Mazzini" is that it shows us the utility of these failings as well as their necessary relation to the man Mazzini was.

Reared in an atmosphere of political repression, between a practical father and an idealistic and strongly intellectual mother, "Pippo" became the poet in politics, the man whose idea is stronger than the contingencies of reality, and who still wins when he fails. Fortunately, Mazzini's biographer is not led by his sympathetic understanding to condone the stupidities that Mazzini's faith made him commit. In other words, if we have in this book a splendid example of the "great man" hypothesis, it is an example wholly free from hero-worship.

Especially impressive for its vividness, ease of telling, and painstaking but artfully concealed research is the treatment of Mazzini's exile in London. The Carlyles, Rossetti, John Stuart Mill, and others of liberal-radical circles interweave their lives and opinions with Mazzini's ceaseless devotion to Italy, his childish-cunning schemes for financial support, and his magnificent political prose. From the beginning of his career Mazzini had no sense about money. But he could analyze with perfect clarity the economic condition of the European working class, predict in large measure its function, and proclaim what all his business-like contemporaries refused to see—namely, that political liberty was a means and not an end; that liberty was vain without true economic independence; and that the future lay, not with the intrenched bourgeoisie, but with the dispossessed proletariat.

Two other important matters are settled by Mr. Barr's work. One is that Mazzini's rule of Rome in 1848-49 was not the musical-comedy affair that it has so often been represented to be. The second point deals with Mazzini's nationalism. There is really no excuse for the prevalent idea that Mazzini and other romantic nationalists were the narrow bigots and ill-informed fanatics that go by the name of nationalists in modern Europe. For one thing, they were too near to the cosmopolitan eighteenth century of Voltaire and Hume to fall into rank tribalism; for another, their nationalism was an idea and not an instinctive rationalization of commercial interest. Mazzini's nationalism, as restated from his writings by Mr. Barr, could be indorsed by the most rigid internationalist of today.

After acknowledgment of these services that Mr. Barr's excellent book has rendered, an objection to details of background may pass for carping. But it is regrettable to find in a portrait in which the figure is impeccable that the landscape is out of drawing. I refer to Mr. Barr's treatment of the romanticists in his early chapters. For him they are the usual extravagant, sentimental nincompoops that conventional criticism loves to pillory. Yet how can Mr. Barr, who understands Mazzini, fail to understand the romanticists? Mazzini was a romanticist all his life; not the best type, perhaps, but that is only another reason for judging his better-balanced contemporaries more equitably. And what does Mr. Barr mean when he calls the classicist-romanticist strife "a half-forgotten struggle"? Is he not aware of its continuance under slightly different labels in every realm of thought and art, and, in Europe at least, in practical politics too? I like to think that Mr. Barr has been misled more by words than by things. He could not have gone over the mass of material necessary for writing such a brilliant and yet sober book without discovering that "lachrymose and atheistic" and "schism between head and heart" are not precisely the right terms in which to describe the nineteenth century.

JACQUES BARZUN

Junket

The Sound Wagon. By T. S. Stribling. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

MR. T. S. STRIBLING returns from a "two years' junket," a "peripatetic jollification," with a walletful of sheaves entitled "The Sound Wagon." A successful trilogy, assuredly, merits a holiday in the open with junketings and jollification; and we infer both from the novel itself and the author's printed commitment on the jacket that the vacation was properly diverting. During this interval, we learn, Mr. Stribling motored across the country, interviewing an assortment of civic dignitaries ranging from dog-catchers and deputy sheriffs to councilmen and gentlemen of the House. And in "The Sound Wagon" he has made use of all but the dog-catchers.

"The Sound Wagon" is, by courtesy, satire; yet it is satire impelled by laughter rather than indignation, and as such is perhaps more justly set down as burlesque. The satirical pattern, in so far as it may be said to exist at all, remains throughout undisciplined and fitful, discharging jibe after jibe, like grapeshot, at figures drawn with the grotesque simplicity of the tabloid cartoon. The arch-scoundrels of the piece carry

BOOK BARGAINS

★

To clear out the small quantities which remain on hand, the following titles have been marked down as much as 75% off original prices. Each book is strictly brand-new in condition, stock-perfect, a permanent addition to your library. Because in many cases there are less than 10 of a kind in stock, orders must be accepted subject to sell-out. Orders will be filled in the sequence received.

Up to 75% Off Regular Retail Prices

1. KIPLING'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS
Rudyard Kipling's Verse

Inclusive edition, 1885-1928. Containing index to first lines, besides the alphabetical list of Contents. Handsomely, durably bound in cloth, reinforced with silk head and footbands, title and cover decoration stamped in gold, gold top, silk bookmark. Boxed. 862 pages. The complete poetical works of the first to be awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature.

Special Ass'n Price, $2.79

2. THE WORK, WEALTH AND HAPPINESS OF MANKIND. By H. G. Wells. First Edition. In 2 large, fully illustrated vols. Boxed. (Retail price, $7.50) Ass'n Price, $1.98
3. MARK TWAIN'S "1601." This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation as it was at the Fireside in the Time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New. ($3.00) Ass'n Price, $1.58
4. DON QUIXOTE. By Cervantes. Over 400 Illustrations by Gustave Dore. "Hilarious parody of the absurd romances of chivalry. 855 pages. Size: 7 x 10 x 3 3/8 inches. Boxed. ($12.50) Ass'n Price, $1.98
5. Marquis DeSade's JUSTINE, or The Misfortunes of Virtue. Written in 1791, this book led Kraft-Ebing, authority on sexual vice, to coin the word SADISM (from DeSade's name) to denote the strangest of all human perversities—sexual cruelty. ($7.50) Ass'n Price, $1.49
6. VENUS OCEANICA. Anthropologic studies of the life of savages. Three masterpieces in 1 vol. By W. E. Roth, Prof. B. Schidlöf and Dr. H. Basedow. Profusely illustrated with 100 amazing photographs. Complete in 1 vol. Privately printed. ($6.00) Ass'n Price, $2.98
7. TWELVE-INCH MAJESTIC GLOBE. Printed in 10 beautiful colors. Up to the minute in every detail, this magnificent Majestic Globe measures 15 3/4" from top to base. Brand-new. (Retail price, $13.50) Ass'n Price, $3.98
8. GIOTTO: LEGEND OF ST. FRANCIS. Illustrated in full color as depicted by the famous Assisi Frescoes, faithfully copied by Edith M. Cowles. Foreword by G. K. Chesterton. Put up in portfolio size, 10 1/2" x 14", ($10.00) Ass'n Price, $2.98
9. THE ILLUSTRATED WORLD HISTORY. An illustrated record of world events from the Egyptian dynasties to the modern dictators. Edited by Sir John Hammerton and Dr. Henry Elmer Barnes and a staff of 150 contributors. Over 1,000 half-tone illus., 10,000 subjects, 800,000 words. Complete in 1 large vol. of 1,024 pages. Ass'n Price, $2.95
10. A BOOK OF GREAT AUTOBIOGRAPHIES. By Christopher Morley, Joseph Conrad, Selma Lagerlof, Helen Keller, William McFee, W. N. P. Barbellion, Walt Whitman, Etsu Inagaki Sugimoto. 4 plate vols. In 1. 1300 pages. Special Ass'n Price, $2.98
11. 50 FAMOUS MODERN WRITERS: "Traveller's Library." Six complete books in one. Compiled, and with notes, by W. Somerset Maugham. 1700 pages of full-length selections from 50 famous modern writers. Fabricoid binding. Special Ass'n Price, $2.98
12. HEINE: A Life Between Love and Hate. By Ludwig Marcuse. A thoughtful, illuminating interpretation "to which the scholar may turn with profit and which the casual reader may read a little less casually." ($3.00) Ass'n Price, 89c
13. DAWN. By Theodore Dreiser. (A History of Myself.) "The most intimate confession of youth since Rousseau." An honest, fearless, revealing narrative. ($5.00) Ass'n Price, $1.19
14. GREAT MASTERS IN ART. With full-page illustrations. "The best that has been written about the life and art of the great masters." Reproduces most important paintings of such artists as Giotto, DaVinci, Michelangelo, Raphael, Velasquez, Goya, Titian, Rubens, El Greco, Rembrandt. Ass'n Price, $1.89
15. ARCHITECTURE TODAY. With 82 full-page illustrations. THE INTERNATIONAL STYLE: Architecture since 1922. With 133 pages of illustrations, 82 of which photographic plates of contemporary buildings throughout the world. ($5.00) Ass'n Price, $1.98
16. PICTURESQUE AMERICA. By John F. Kane. Illustrated with over 250 photographic plates. New and revised edition. (June, 1935.) Former edition sold at ($15.00) Ass'n Price, $2.98
17. BANKING THROUGH THE AGES. Profusely illustrated. ($3.00) Ass'n Price, $1.25
18. ARTHUR TRAIN'S FAMOUS DISTRICT ATTORNEY SERIES. 3 vols. Ass'n Price, the set, $3.98

19. GREAT DEBATES IN AMERICAN HISTORY. Edited by Marion Mills Miller, Litt. D. Full set of 14 volumes, originally published at ($42.00). Ass'n Price, the 14 vols., $8.95
20. WISDOM AND DESTINY. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Handsomely bound in decorated green cloth, stamped in gold on both front and back. A remarkable survey of morality, conduct, and life, by the winner of the Nobel Prize for literature. ($2.50) Ass'n Price, 79c
21. THE LITTLE NATURE LIBRARY: Birds. Trees. Butterflies. Wild-Flowers. Contains 136 full-page plates of which 88 are in full color and 48 in black and white. A nature appreciation course bound to give you many delightfully interesting hours. ($10.00) Special, the four volume set, $3.98
22. THE DEVIL IS AN ENGLISH GENTLEMAN. By John Cournos. In 2 vols. Attractively bound in black cloth, cover decorations and titles stamped in gold on both front and back, stained tops. 608 pages. Boxed. ($3.75) Ass'n Price, the set, 89c

NO MORE IMPORTANT CONTRIBUTION TO THE SOURCE MATERIAL OF THE LATE WAR EXISTS THAN THE MEMOIRS OF MARSHAL FOCH AND GENERAL PERSHING. —Chicago Daily Tribune.

23. This Work Won THE PULITZER PRIZE

MY EXPERIENCES IN THE WORLD WAR

By JOHN J. PERSHING

FIRST EDITION. Illus. with 69 reproductions from photographs and numerous maps. In 2 large vols. 836 pages. Boxed. "General Pershing has not only written THE MOST AUTHORITATIVE, the most penetrating and most decisive account of our own part in the war, but has presented a finer spirit in narration than any of the others."—Pulitzer Prize Committee. Special Ass'n Price, 2 vols., $2.98

24. THE MEMOIRS OF MARSHAL FOCH
By Col. T. Bentley Mott, Liaison Officer Between Marshal Foch and General Pershing

"This is no documentary military history of the war, but A VIVID PERSONAL RECORD BY THE GREATEST STRATEGIST OF MODERN TIMES."—"A Book of Ravishing Fascination."—Outlook. "The English translation cannot be praised too highly."—New Republic. Illustrated throughout with full page half-tone plates and maps. ($5.00) Ass'n Price, 98c

25. THE SCIENCE OF LIFE. By H. G. Wells. 4 large, fully illustrated vols. ($12.00) Ass'n Price, the set, $2.98
26. FINE PRINTS OF THE YEAR. 1932. With 100 beautiful full-page illustrations. ($10.00) Ass'n Price, $2.98
27. ROGER WILLIAMS—New England Firebrand. By James Ernst. 538 pages. "PROFESSOR ERNST HAS DONE HIS WORK THOROUGHLY, and tumbled some images from their pedestals and torn some traditions out of the pages of history. All the time the author is trying to paint a real man—not simply a theologian, nor a statesman, nor a writer, but a human being who was a firebrand and a stormy petrel. For such a biography there is ample room in New England history, and it is a real contribution to such a history, and A VIVID PICTURE OF A FLAMING PERSONALITY."—Boston Transcript ($4.00) Ass'n Price, Only, 89c

FREE!
Write for profusely illustrated Catalog describing hundreds of other unusual bargains in books. Ask for Catalog No. 267-N.

USE COUPON
Order by number, using the coupon for your convenience.

NOTE:
All books postpaid U. S. or Canada at these special prices—elsewhere, 14c extra per volume.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR YOUR MONEY BACK!
THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION, (Est. 1884)
367-373 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.
Gentlemen: I enclose $..... Please send the books circled below:
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9
10 11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18
19 20 21 22 23 24 25 26 27
☐ Please send me FREE CATALOG No. 267-N.
Name
Address
City State

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

their labels with them, like all good caricatures that desire to make their identity apparent at a glance: Canarelli, the syrup-racketeer (Italian), speaking with the "soft intensity" traditional to his station; Myerberg, the party "mouthpiece" (Jewish), waving his hands and meeting all contingencies with cynical sang-froid; Krauseman, the "Big Stick" (German), giving orders invisibly out of Cloudeuckooland. To this roster are appended, for reasons best known to the author himself, a financier immured among Greek peristyles, secret panels, and storm-cellar dug against the advent of war from within or without; likewise a chemist with horrendous formulas for death rays and high explosives; likewise a millionairess; likewise a hero, the Honorable Mr. Henry Lee Caridius.

The Honorable Mr. Caridius is cited cursorily here for the sufficient reason that his function in the novel is cursory. Badgered by a worshipful and suspicious wife, yet possessed of a "strain of kindness and simple good-heartedness," he ricochets eventfully from chapter to chapter at the mercy of his campaign managers and the whim of the author. Intrigues too dastardly for utterance accumulate about his name; yet in every case he functions unobtrusively, with a charming ineffectualness that is perhaps the single satirical weapon which Mr. Stribling has employed with any very notable consistency. The details of Caridius's rise from shyster to senator are extraordinary in themselves; but perhaps the most extraordinary tale of them all would lie in his refusal, on one occasion, to accept a rebate due him on unused senatorial letter-heads—an act offensive to him on grounds of taste and decorum. For Caridius the decorous ideal was one of very immediate concern; consequently, there was nothing to prevent it from working both ways, or to preclude his accepting, in place of a cash refund, a fine gold cigarette case worth twenty-five dollars in excess of the amount due him.

This is, if you will, pleasant and companionable lampooning, and "The Sound Wagon" as a whole bristles with banter of this sort. Yet—if one dare regard the novel with any solemnity whatsoever—what is it Mr. Stribling has been after, in this Walpurgis Night of junketing and jollification? Is it his purpose to inform us that in our body politic some are opportunists, others, blackguards, and many, blockheads? If so, we had already been apprised of these facts; we had already laughed at them; and somehow Mr. Stribling's tardy restatement of the jest ceases to provide cause for merriment.

BEN BELITT

Shorter Notices

The Song of the Messiah. By John G. Neihardt. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

This is the fifth book in Neihardt's epic cycle of the West. This poet has long used American historical materials and, in particular, American Indian legends for his poetic re-creations of the past. His new book is based on the anthropologists' accounts of the Ghost Dance religion, and these accounts are in themselves fascinating. In the eighteen-eighties there sprang up among the Indians a legend to the effect that a white god was among them, a god risen from the dead, and that this god would lead them to victory against the Americans and restore to them their land. Here, of course, is a curious mingling of Christian and Indian religions. The Ghost Dance religion spread from the Plains Indians clear across the country. New rituals and songs were composed. Self-scarification and even a form of crucifixion became part of these rituals. The Indians actually made ready for the conquest of a country once theirs. In the end, however, the United States stepped in with its soldiers and put down the rebellion by force. Mr. Neihardt tells the story of the messianic "coming." He sees in it—quite properly—a mingling of religious elements, an exploited and partially destroyed people turning to a suffering god. But one must remember that torture to induce visions was an old concept among certain of the Indians of our country. Neihardt's poem indicates that even the Indians met death they saw their brothers in the American soldiers commanded to slaughter them. This, one suspects, slightly sentimentalizes the uprising, which drew to its close in the massacre at Wounded Knee in 1890.

Like a Mighty Army—Hitler Versus Established Religion. By George N. Shuster. D. Appleton-Century Company. $2.

This is an effort by a Catholic writer to present a narrative and an analysis of the Nazi attack upon Judaism, Protestantism, and Catholicism. "First," he says in his Introduction, "I shall be objective. . . . Second, this cannot be a scholarly monograph. . . . Third, partiality is cheerfully admitted." After this somewhat confused beginning Mr. Shuster plunges in, glibly, conversationally, without footnotes or documentation. He succeeds fairly well as a narrator, though his material is almost all available elsewhere in more complete form. He fails as an analyst because he does not understand the economic and psychological dynamics of fascism. Mr. Shuster dislikes Herr Hitler because Der Führer persecutes Catholics, Protestants, and Jews. Otherwise, one suspects, he would not find Hitler so bad. Mussolini is "extraordinary" and "has to his credit solid achievements," including presumably his unholy alliance with the Catholic hierarchy in Italy. Mr. Shuster dislikes agnosticism, contraception, and communism. He sheds no tears for the liberals, pacifists, Socialists, and Communists who have suffered from the Nazi terror more than the racial and religious martyrs. He is saved from complete blindness only because the Catholic Weltanschauung, even at its narrowest, is broader, more humane, more universal than the Nazi Weltanschauung. Of his book one must say what Lessing said of Voltaire: "He has written much that is new and much that is true. But the true things, alas, are not new and the new things are not true."

A Handbook of Marxism. Edited by Emile Burns. Random House. $1.75.

The need of a comprehensive book presenting under one cover the more significant writings of Marx and his followers has been felt for many years. In an attempt to meet this need, several volumes have recently been issued containing extracts from Marx; but Emile Burns has gone farther and rendered a unique service in preparing a somewhat larger book which includes generous selections from Engels, Lenin, and Stalin, together with over three hundred pages of Marx's own writings. While some Marxian scholars will doubtless differ with Burns regarding the relative importance of certain of the selections, all of those most widely quoted are here, including among others "The Communist Manifesto," "The Civil War in France," "Theses on Feuerbach," Engels's "The Origin of the Family," "Capital," Lenin's "Our Program," "What Is to Be Done?" "Imperialism," "The State and Revolution," Stalin's "Foundation of Leninism," and the "Report at Seventeenth Congress of the Communist Party," as well as the "Program of the Communist International." Because of the wide range of subjects treated, the excerpts from "Capital" are not as extensive as some scholars might desire—forming only about one-fifth of the thousand-page volume—but are sufficiently varied to give a complete picture of that monumental work. For the average reader who does not care to tackle the complete works of any of these writers, this book will satisfy practically all requirements, while the more serious student will find it invaluable as a convenient reference book.

Beany-Eye. By David Garnett. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.25.

This is another of those brief character studies Mr. Garnett does with such a pleasant mixture of slightly mad fancy and contrary realism. It will never reach the best-seller class because its virtues are in miniature: it stops short by 850 pages of the required length; it is a stray, pathetic subject treated in an unobtrusive, delicate way. Since the tendency in such cases is to notice only the biggest figure—the man with a cast in his eye, given to seizures of homicidal proportions, terrifying dreams, and those uncertain, recurrent phases of gentleness and lucid insight of a half-wit—a hint is not out of place. Beany-Eye's employer, the humanitarian little Mr. Butler, is as brave and likable a hero as a novel reader could desire.

Drama

"Ethan Frome"

"ETHAN FROME" as now acted at the National Theatre is successful and engrossing beyond all reasonable expectation. Under the circumstances it is not easy to assign with any confidence duly proportional credit to the various persons involved, but the largest share probably goes to the three actors who have given it superb performance. Owen and Donald Davis have, to be sure, prepared a dramatization which it would be grudging to call merely resourceful and workman-like—especially when one considers the difficulties involved—but it is probably Pauline Lord, Raymond Massey, and Ruth Gordon who make it live. Thanks to them and to the direction of Guthrie McClintic, the whole is not only tense and absorbing; it manages somehow actually to recreate on the stage that sense that one is in the presence of a tragedy almost mathematically complete and crushing which made unforgettable the sculpturally simple outlines of the novel.

"Ethan Frome" is a story which must have tempted and then discouraged many playwrights before now. Few novels have a fable more obviously or more simply dramatic, but the story is so told from the point of view of an outsider that the narrator is appropriately ignorant of many things to which the dramatist must give direct presentation. Curiously enough, Mrs. Wharton seems almost to have been warning against any attempt to tell it differently when, in an introduction explaining her method, she declared that "every subject contains its own form and dimensions" and that "any attempt to elaborate and complicate" the sentiments of her characters would necessarily be to falsify the whole. Yet there can be no questioning the fact that the play does much more than merely justify itself.

It is true that the Messrs. Davis have been able to build the chief scenes around incidents which the original author did herself describe directly. It is also true that they have not made any attempt to "elaborate and complicate" very greatly the characters, wisely preferring to leave them simple, inarticulate people whose motives are so perfectly comprehensible as part of universal human nature that no complicated psychological analysis is necessary. It was nevertheless necessary to give them many specific attributes, physical and spiritual, with which Mrs. Wharton in her role of narrator at second hand was not concerned. On the stage, for instance, we must be presented with concrete appearances, and we must have reduced to definite gestures certain deeds and occurrences which the original author naturally presented only in the fragmentary form in which they were supposed to reach her through the memory of others. What is much more important, the change

FRENCH NOVELISTS OF TODAY

By MILTON H. STANSBURY

The LONDON TIMES says: "A skilful mingling of criticism, subject-matter of the novels and such biographical details as help to the understanding of the author under discussion. . . . Each essay is equally well balanced and informative . . . packed with information and ideas." The fourteen authors presented are: Gide, Giraudoux, Mauriac, MacOrlan, Larbaud, Morand, Colette, the Surrealists, Cocteau, Green, de Montherlant, Drieu La Rochelle, Romain, Malraux.

$2.00

HISTORY OF AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY 1800-1935

By EDWARD H. O'NEILL

E. F. EDGE in the BOSTON TRANSCRIPT says: "An amazingly complete survey and appraisal of the entire field of biographical research and writing during the period. Mr. O'Neill proves himself to be an extraordinarily capable historian both in his command of his subject and in his ability to make a continuously readable book."

$4.00

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA PRESS: PHILADELPHIA

Praise for WILL IRWIN'S new book PROPAGANDA and the NEWS

Morris L. Ernst: "In these days when the world is threatened with dictatorships which can only survive by the suppression of the press this book is peculiarly timely."

Stanley Walker: "This book tells how a perfectly simple fact may be mauled, twisted, painted and kicked around until it becomes misleading and dangerous."

Harry Elmer Barnes: "An amazingly informed and incisive analysis of twentieth century journalism. Mr. Irwin at his best."

$2.75

WHITTLESEY HOUSE, McGraw-Hill Bldg., New York

☐ LECTURES ☐ THEATRES ☐

THREE CONTEMPORARY REVOLUTIONS

RUSSIA

Hans Kohn

ITALY

Max Ascoli

GERMANY

Frieda Wunderlich
Alvin Johnson

Friday Evenings—Beginning Feb. 7

15 Sessions, $12.50

Single Admission $1.00

THE NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

66 WEST 12th STREET, NEW YORK ALgonquin 4-2567

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC IMPLICATIONS OF HOUSING

Mumford • Bauer • Churchill
Polakov • Wright • Ackerman
Kohn • Mayer • Walker • Edelman
Selley • Schapiro • Stein

BEGINNING FEB. 6

PRACTICAL HOUSING PROBLEMS

Vladeck • Abrams • Milner • Ackerman

BEGINNING APRIL 16

Thursday eves., 8:20. Combined fee $12.00. Single admission $1.

THE NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

66 WEST 12th STREET, NEW YORK ALgonquin 4-2567

"I am greatly impressed by 'PARADISE LOST', so much so that I have been thinking of it ever since. It is crowded with illuminating material. It should cause millions to think and even if it did not do that it should still be recommended as thrilling entertainment."

—Theodore Dreiser

'Paradise Lost'

By Clifford Odets

LONGACRE THEA. W. 48th St. Eves 8-10. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2-40

☐ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says ☐

Boy Meets Girl. Cort Theater. Rough and ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

Dead End. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on the East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

Jumbo. Hippodrome. Paul Whiteman, Jimmy Durante, and a remarkable clown named A. Robbins surrounded by acrobats and animals. Literally better than a circus.

Let Freedom Ring. Civic Repertory Theater. A second chance for this drama of a strike in a Southern mill. I found it hard going, but it has been highly praised.

Libel. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English court-room play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

Mid-West. Booth Theater. Homely and slightly sentimental picture of the joys and more particularly the sorrows of the farmer. Best when it isn't editorializing.

Paradise Lost. Longacre Theater. Clifford Odets' complicated picture of a family composed exclusively of pathological futilitarians. He calls it a picture of the middle class but it strikes me as somewhat less than typical.

Pride and Prejudice. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaption, brilliantly staged and acted. It gave me more pleasure than any other play of the season.

Winterset. Martin Beck Theater. Maxwell Anderson's surprisingly successful attempt to write a poetic play on a modern theme. Bold, original, and engrossing.

is one which goes deeper than the mere technique of presentation. Part of the characteristic effect of the novel depends upon the incompleteness of our knowledge. We are led to speculate upon many how's and why's; the challenge to our imagination is the challenge to imagine for ourselves just how certain things would have worked themselves out and even to brood upon alternative possibilities, to shudder at half-guessed mysteries. Inevitably, the stage not only makes the personages more concrete but at the same time fixes definitely much that the novel left undetermined. And yet, as has been hinted already, I should hesitate to say that the different effect in the theater is wholly inferior. Thanks largely to the actors it is overwhelmingly powerful. One awaits the inevitable with that ambiguously fascinated horror which only tragedy knows. And, above all, one cannot choose but hear.

When Mrs. Wharton wrote "Ethan Frome" she was fresh from the lessons which Maupassant and Flaubert, not to mention Henry James, had taught her. From them she had learned how the realistic novel could be redeemed by a scrupulously selective craftsmanship from the sprawling and chaotic formlessness to which it seemed condemned; how its materials, if economically used, could be given comely form; and how the effect could be pointed up until there emerged from a story of everyday life something not too remotely resembling the clear, clean note of ancient tales. Fortunately, however, she had not been taught (as all writers and readers of today so insistently have been) that "we" are "no longer interested" in tragedies which affect mere individuals, that "we" no longer perceive the importance which persons who had the misfortune to write before 1917 seem to have deluded themselves into imagining might inhere in stories about loving and losing, or happiness and sorrow, as they happen to affect single lives. If she had been taught that, she would of course have realized that she was wasting her talents on a trivial theme which "we" would not think of bothering with. But if I may risk a prophecy, it is that the "we" who are no longer interested form a group which falls sufficiently short of being universally inclusive to leave outside its bounds enough of our contemporaries to keep the National full for some time to come.

Lynn Riggs's "Russet Mantle" (Masque Theater) is a tenuously lyric little romantic comedy which has more than half a chance of considerable popularity largely because of one superb and superbly played character—that of a casual Southern mother who somehow manages to sum up in highly diverting form all the sense and nonsense, the frankness and hypocrisy, the conventionality and the unconventionality of a certain recognizable type. Aside from her the play, which is concerned with a rebellious girl redeemed by the love of a poetic adolescent, is itself rather too full of adolescent yearnings to be taken very seriously, but it is pleasant enough and made quite worth attention by the presence of the character referred to.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"A Room in Red and White" (Forty-sixth Street Theater) submits a pageant of pathological maladjustments murkily enacted against a background of spiral stairways, bowlfuls of gladioli, and an interior onerously carried out in red and white. The burden of the piece, which devolves principally upon Miss Chrystal Herne, Mr. Leslie Adams, and a talented young man who plays the son, is one of sadism chiefly. However, the author appears to have combed the Freudian indices for additional blandishments with which to enveigle the fancy—incest, persecution mania, and an Oedipus fixation looming most largely. The three principals struggle impressively with exhausting roles, but their efforts cannot transform a play that is both digressive and pointlessly macabre into a "study" that will demand to be heard in spite of its unpalatability.

B. B.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1936

No. 3684

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	169
EDITORIALS:
Picture of Confusion	172
Can We Be Neutral?	173
Relief, Today and Tomorrow	173
Mr. Rice Resigns	174
ISSUES AND MEN. THE MORRO CASTLE CONVICTIONS.
By Oswald Garrison Villard	175
WHAT I SAW IN GERMANY. By Louis Fischer	176
SCOTTSBORO INTERVIEW. By Carleton Beals	178
LOOSE CONSTRUCTION. By Heywood Brown	180
WASHINGTON WEEKLY. By Paul W. Ward	181
I WAS AN EDITOR IN GERMANY. II. "FIRE IN THE REICHS-
TAG!" By Franz Höllering	182
CORRESPONDENCE	184
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Starving on Relief. By Isidor Feinstein	186
Facts for Consumers. By Ruth Brindze	187
The Labor Index	188
MIDWINTER BOOK SECTION
"HE BELONGS TO THE PAST." By Joseph Wood Krutch	190
KIPLING: PROPHET OF A LOST FRONTIER. By Alvin Johnson	192
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Rorty Reports America. By Anita Brenner	194
A Life Well Lost. By Mark Van Doren	195
The Fascist Knight in Shining Armor. By Louis M. Hacker	196
On Keeping Out of War. By Frederick L. Schuman	196
Recorded Memory. By Florence Codman	198
A Great Architect. By Talbot Hamlin	198
The Romantic Feeling. By Eda Lou Walton	199
Introduction to the Dance. By Francis Fergusson	200
Shorter Notices	200
Drama: Call It an Evening. By Joseph Wood Krutch	201
Films: 70,000,000 Americans. By Mark Van Doren	203
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	204

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8;
Three years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN:
$1 a year additional.

THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS
THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S
ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1936, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Grueninger, Circulation
Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

WHILE THE SUPREME COURT kept the country in a state of jitters over the TVA, President Roosevelt in a brief message asked Congress to carry out the logical consequences of the Hoosac decision and repeal the three remaining farm acts. The acts in question are the Bankhead Cotton Control Act, the Kerr-Smith Tobacco Act, and the Potato Act. All of them have presumably the same flaw of federal regulation and coercion that six of the justices found fatal in the AAA. Whether the President is being the good soldier or the clever strategist is hard to say, but there is a possibility that this latest move combines both. The President is drinking to the last dregs the hemlock cup presented by the Hoosac decision. But he is also thereby giving genuineness to the intentions of the Administration to make its new farm program constitutional. It is difficult to reconcile this sweet reasonableness on Mr. Roosevelt's part with Secretary Wallace's forthright condemnation of the Supreme Court's order in the rice millers' case to return the $200,000,000 of impounded processing taxes as "probably the greatest legalized steal in American history." Mr. Wallace's statement is the most courageous we have heard from a high Administration official since the President's radio message to Congress. Our only regret is that Mr. Roosevelt does not see his way clear to equal directness and courage.

ONCE MORE a strategic moment has appeared for the Administration to present a program of genuine social taxation. The invalidation of the AAA and the passage of the bonus have thrown the budget badly out of balance. Conservatives and liberals alike are troubled by the mounting national debt with its rapidly increasing interest burden. Speculators and monetary cranks are pleading for inflation as preferable to continuing to give the banks a "rake-off" on bonds. With the depression over as far as the security holders are concerned, the time has undoubtedly come to pay as we go. The net earnings of the first eighty-seven industrial companies to report for 1935 were 55 per cent higher than in 1934, and in one instance—the General Motors Corporation—profits were a thousand times greater than in 1932. Unless prompt action is taken to divert these sums from the pockets of those who cannot use them into socially desirable channels, we shall again confront the problem of a deficient consumer buying power and industrial stagnation. Last summer's tax bill was admirable as a political gesture, but grossly inadequate as a measure of social taxation. While the tax on the very wealthy was raised, the average well-to-do individual escaped practically scot-free. A comparatively small increase in the surtax on all incomes over $5,000 would provide more than enough to amortize the bonus and replace the processing taxes. Such action might alienate a few votes in election year, but it is our guess that those who oppose social taxation on principle are already bitter enemies of F. D. R.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S latest housing program, by which it definitely commits itself to the encouragement of privately financed housing at the expense of slum clearance, involves another disastrous retreat from the earlier principles of the New Deal. A few years ago housing was hailed as the field in which large public expenditures could yield the maximum social benefit with the least interference with private enterprise. An adequate housing program offers full scope for the employment of the country's idle men and idle dollars, and a remarkable opportunity for the stimulation of its most depressed industries. As Senator Wagner has pointed out, from a third to a half of America's thirty million families are now living in dwellings "that imperil their health and shock their sense of decency." Private enterprise has failed to meet the housing needs of the two-thirds of the population whose incomes are less than $1,500 annually, and must fail, as we pointed out editorially last week, unless it is willing to bring interest rates down to approximately 0.9 per cent. The Administration's es-time that at most private capital will build 200,000 homes next year is a tacit admission of the inadequacy of the program, since approximately 500,000 new families are created yearly in excess of those which disintegrate through death or other causes, and replacement of 1 per cent of the existing houses would necessitate building 280,000 additional dwellings. A program designed to replace within a period of ten years all the unsatisfactory structures now in use would call for some 2,000,000 houses a year. Further evidence of the unrealistic approach of the FHA and other Administration agencies is seen in the decision to keep interest rates, for the present at least, at 6 per cent. Under these conditions such new houses as are constructed must—as previously—go to the few who can afford that luxury, not to the many who need them.

USING A TECHNIQUE similar to that practiced by Tammany chieftains in New York City, the politicians of Europe seized upon King George's death as an occasion for extensive diplomatic maneuvers. With the eyes of the leading statesmen of Europe upon him, the new King has been aware that anything beyond the merest formality in greeting foreign guests would be interpreted as an indication of future British foreign policy. Considerable importance, therefore, may be attached to the King's marked friendliness toward the Nazi representatives, Baron Constantin von Neurath and Dr. Leopold von Hoesch. Informed Britishers take this to reveal not only a friendly feeling toward Germany, which Edward is long known to have had, but a marked sympathy with the German way of "solving" its political and economic problems. For the moment, however, the British government has apparently found these speculations embarrassing and has sought valiantly to counteract the political implications of the King's action. Sir John Simon broadcast a tribute to the late King over the wireless network of France, which was the only country to receive this special consideration. Although receiving representatives from all the powers, Captain Anthony Eden, Minister of Foreign Affairs, made a point of having three conversations with M. Litvinov. While the latter's indiscreet frankness concerning the intellectual qualifications of the King has undoubtedly chilled Anglo-Soviet cordiality for the moment, there is every indication that developments in the Far East are forcing the two countries into closer collaboration.

DESPITE EXISTING UNREST in the army, the death of Marshal Kondylis has probably saved Greece from a fascist dictatorship and paved the way for a return of Venizelos, who has been in exile since the failure of last spring's rebellion. On January 26, in the first election to be held since the restoration of the monarchy, the Venizelist party obtained a slight majority. Kondylis, whose coup d'état last October brought back King George, ran a close second and openly announced his intention of again overthrowing the government should Venizelos take office. He had particularly opposed the reinstatement of Venizelist officers in the army, within which he had built a powerful organization. Ex-Premier Tsaldaris, although also a reactionary, has been more favorably inclined to the Venizelists and has been reported as willing to join a coalition Cabinet under Venizelist leadership. Left as the sole leader of the opposition, he is now expected to shift to the right and support the military clique. The fact that Kondylis's fascist sympathies had led him to support Mussolini and to oppose the recently concluded British-Greek military understanding gave the bitter domestic struggle international importance. His sudden death brings to an end any hope that Il Duce may have held for an early break in the ranks of the sanctionist powers.

SWEDEN'S NEW BUDGET is a tribute to both the efficiency and the social-mindedness of its labor government. Although expenditures will exceed last year's by 5.4 per cent, there will be a surplus of twenty million kronor, which will be applied to a 12 per cent reduction in income taxes. The reduction in the normal tax will be of benefit primarily to the less well-to-do classes and is vigorously opposed by the large taxpayers, who have been clamoring for the elimination of the surtaxes levied on large incomes during the crisis. These are to be maintained and consolidated into a permanent system with an even sharper incidence of taxation. The increase in expenditures is to be devoted chiefly to social and cultural purposes, such as old-age and invalid pensions, loans to farmers and cottagers, public housing, and scholarships. There is, however, an increase of five million kronor in the appropriation for national defense. Perhaps the most unusual feature in the budget is the plan to amortize the whole of the short-term indebtedness incurred during the depression, a large part of which will be paid off by the end of the current budget year.

TACTLESSNESS, which in itself involves the absence of more fundamental wisdom, is the chief charge laid against President Robinson of the College of the City of New York by the alumni committee which has lately investigated the deep antagonism between the president and the students. Study of recent events at the college which have resulted in the expulsion of large numbers of students and considerable unpleasant newspaper publicity has revealed an unwieldy mass of regulations imposed by the administration, a belief on the part of President Robinson that radical activities at the college were engineered by an outside group bent on embarrassing him, and want of ordinary common sense in dealing with situations that began simply and ended in a burst of notoriety and hard feeling. The alumni committee of sixteen, headed by Dr. Henry Moskowitz of the class of '99, voted twelve to four that "the president lacks the human qualities necessary to achieve the widespread confidence of his faculty and his student body and to provide genuinely inspired, resourceful, and socially imaginative leadership." At a meeting of City College graduates on January 27 this opinion was upheld by a vote of 519 to 217, and the committee's report will be submitted to the city Board of Higher Education for action. Indicative of President Robinson's administrative methods is the fact that when he came before the alumni committee for questioning he brought with him twenty department heads, who, on being asked for their opinion about his official acts, politely upheld him at every point; indicative also is a petition signed so far by 112 of the 175 faculty members approving his conduct of office. This petition is being submitted to faculty members by their department heads. Refusal to sign it would obviously not be healthful for any teacher who wished to remain in good standing.

YALE UNIVERSITY has been made the beneficiary of a bequest of $100,000 for scholarships from the late Charles Howard Warren, who accompanied the grant with the following explanation of his purpose: "Because I wish each award to serve . . . as a memorial to the Anglo-Saxon race, to which the United States owes its culture, I direct that the beneficiaries shall be confined to those boys . . . who shall be the sons of white Christian parents of Anglo-Saxon, Scandinavian, or Teutonic descent, both of whom were citizens of the United States and were born in America." While this bequest can and doubtless will be defended by Yale on the ground that it does not discriminate against, but provides for a particular group, it is unfortunate that the donation should have been made at a time when any stirring up of racial prejudice is likely to have dangerous and far-reaching results. Any public institution, and especially a university with the prestige of Yale, should act with particular care to avoid lending the stamp of its approval to the doctrines of Nordic racial superiority that have been proclaimed by Nazi Germany and are even now being agitated for similar purposes in America. The recent action of President Conant of Harvard in refusing the somewhat similar scholarship bequest of Hitler's Hanfstaengel pointed a way that Yale might well have followed. In particular one regrets that Yale, in accepting the grant, lays itself open to the charge of subscribing to the statement that the United States owes its culture to any single racial strain. Even though the university's trustees may agree, surely the faculties of history and anthropology know better.

HAVING TASTED BLOOD during the days of the NRA, a large portion of big business has united in an effort to obtain a Supreme Court decision permitting price-fixing, which is to say, an interpretation nullifying the force of the anti-trust laws. A test case, the outcome of which may rank in importance with the Northern Securities and Standard Oil decisions, has been pushed by the Sugar Institute, a trade association comprising the principal American refiners of imported raw sugar, who control between 70 and 80 per cent of all the refined sugar sold in the United States. The institute was found guilty of violating the anti-trust laws by the Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, and has appealed to the Supreme Court. Filing a brief as a "friend of the court," the Cotton Textile Institute, the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, the Consumers' Goods Industries Committee, and the Window Glass Manufacturers' Association have asked that the Sugar Institute be upheld in its price-fixing, called "mass bargaining." The brief makes amusing reading for those who have been unable to believe that the present system can even limp along without conscious controls. Paying lip service to "the continuance of the fundamentals of competition," the brief admits that the NRA "recognized the need, which industry had long felt, for affirmative action to create affirmatively sound competitive conditions and practices." Such action by the government, however, was "regimentation," and there should be allowed in its stead "voluntary cooperative effort among the competitors in an industry." Furthermore, "it is not too much to say that the development of methods of securing reasonable stability and the elimination of destructive practices . . . must be effectively continued if the competitive system in its present form is to survive."

A VIOLATION of the federal labor law has been found against the management of Consumers' Research by the New York regional director of the National Labor Relations Board. The present decision, handed down on January 23 by Charles A. Wood, trial examiner of the board, will be referred to the national board for the initiation of appropriate court action. Consumers' Research is ordered to bargain collectively with the Technical, Editorial, and Office Assistants' Union, to reinstate three discharged employees with back pay from the time of their dismissal, and to re-employ in their former positions and at their former pay all workers who went on strike September 4 unless they have already been reemployed. Although the five-day period during which an answer may be filed has elapsed, no reply has been received from Mr. Schlink. The next steps are for the New York board to file notice in Washington of non-compliance, and for the national board to issue a cease-and-desist order. But Mr. Schlink, in his role of traditional labor-hating employer, has already denied the jurisdiction of the labor boards and the constitutionality of the Wagner labor law. The strike itself was called off on January 12, and forty workers about whose competence there has never been any question are put to the expedient of looking for jobs when jobs are scarce. These former workers announce that they are planning the establishment of a rival organization which will supply information "not only as to the quality of advertised commodities, but as to the labor conditions under which they are produced." We wish it all success.

TWO WARS are being fought on the American waterfront—a long battle line which extends from Vancouver, British Columbia, clear around the coast to New York City and beyond. It is a highly important line because whoever holds it holds the key to many an inland stronghold. The main quarrel is between organized labor and the ship-owners. The second is a desperate struggle for control between old-line union leaders and the young aggressives among the rank and file, best typified in the name of Harry Bridges. In recent months occasional spurts of flame have indicated that the smoldering fires were growing more intense, but there has been little open fighting since the general strike in San Francisco in 1934. The internal union fight recently broke into the headlines when the International Seamen's Union of the Pacific revoked the charter of the Sailors' Union. The reasons given make it clear that the International is disciplining the Sailors' Union because it has become militant and effective. The special bone of contention is the Maritime Federation, which the bureaucracy hates because of its rank-and-file control and no doubt because it smells of industrial unionism. The Sailors' Union was ordered to withdraw from the federation, and its funds have already been tied up by the International. But the rank and file on the West Coast have won too much through the Maritime Federation to give it up without a fight; moreover, its prestige has run like lightning round the coast. At the Washington conference three sailors from New York spoke for unity. "We want democracy in the East," said they, "we want a maritime federation in the East and Gulf." They went on to say they wanted the same wages and working conditions that prevail on the West Coast. That is the meat of the argument; wages are $5 higher in Mr. Bridges's territory than they are outside.

Picture of Confusion

AMONG the seats of the mighty Franklin D. Roosevelt has simultaneously occupied at least three with surprising and continuing success. The seat on the left has held Roosevelt the friend of labor, rememberer of the forgotten man, reformer and crusader. On the right has sat Roosevelt the lawyer and country squire, friend of legitimate business, primer of pumps, dispenser of breathing spells. And in the dead center, stabilizing the whole arrangement, has sat Roosevelt the politician, friend of everybody. So it was in the beginning; but recently events have conspired to upset the nice balance necessary to so broad a straddle. Mr. Roosevelt has had one chair jerked out from under him with unceremonious violence; the friend of business is a man without a seat.

The disbalance produced by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court on the one hand and the attacks of the allied reactionaries on the other is certain to produce confusion in all ranks. At this stage even old political hands refuse to prophesy the results to the present Administration of Mr. Smith's threatened walk, of Governor Talmadge's near-convention with its near-platform, of hints in various quarters of bi-party coalition. The very composition of the emerging alliance is fantastic, comprising such alien and disparate groups as the Ku Klux cohorts of the Georgia governor, Al Smith's mixed following of du Ponts, Catholic reactionaries, and disappointed Democrats, and the New York Herald Tribune. But uncertainty is inevitable in the early months of a campaign, and strange partnerships are common enough to be accepted without much question by a patient electorate. More dangerous are the confusions likely to result in regard to the position and purposes of Mr. Roosevelt.

In the months following the Congressional elections of 1934 the glamor of the New Deal slowly faded. Liberals and radicals, workers and farmers, ceased to expect administrative miracles. Labor learned that with or without a Magna Charta it had to fight for even the right to fight. Social security turned into a diminished hope long deferred. Public housing remained a dream and a blueprint. Many farmers were paid for what they failed to raise or sell, but the poorest among them received nothing but a dole and suffered more than at the depth of the depression. Millions of men and women were kept alive by rapidly shifting methods of relief, but their level of subsistence remained beneath the lowest standards set by the government statisticians. Eleven or twelve million workers were still without jobs. Wages and employment, it is true, made small gains, but not until profits had begun to soar.

As usual, disillusionment produced both clarity and cloudiness. Criticism of the New Deal began to crystallize in political forms as various as snowflakes. Most of them were grotesque and appealed to a discontent based only on desperation, but some represented a genuine growth in understanding of the sources of power. Especially in the lower ranks of labor were these signs of growth manifest. Among unionists militancy developed, a demand for new and more aggressive leadership, and an increasing unwillingness to take the promise for the performance in Washington.

Talk of a "third" party emerged in groups hitherto politically insulated; in a few localities actual labor parties were formed; unions of relief workers, especially in the white-collar ranks, besieged the Administration with petitions and demonstrations and strikes; criticism of the New Deal swelled in volume and volubility, and the labor spokesmen of the Administration, from Frances Perkins to Donald Richberg to Leo Wolman, were written down as renegades. Much of the criticism was justified by the course of events; to this moment that course has not been altered.

But the attitude of labor has altered—with results that may prove important. Between them, the Supreme Court and Al Smith and the rest of the motley opposition have managed to reinvest the New Deal with glamor, to recreate illusion. Without moving an inch to the left Mr. Roosevelt suddenly finds himself again the champion of labor. It takes a tough and tempered radicalism to withstand the temptation of supporting a man who is attacked for being radical. When Smith assails Roosevelt for shoving through "socialist" measures in defiance of the Constitution, the average liberal is inclined to defend laws he knows well to be inadequate. When Talmadge sneers at the reckless waste of federal funds on projects of relief, even the unemployed begin to doubt that relief is as scanty as their stomachs assure them it is. Already signs of labor's softening have begun to appear. The most sensational evidence, of course, is the speech of John L. Lewis before the United Mine Workers' convention in Washington and the unanimous vote of the convention actively to support the reelection of the President by work and funds. It is true that Lewis and the miners, despite disappointments, have been continuously more friendly to the Administration than many unionists. But their action is almost unprecedented in labor history and cannot be interpreted as anything but a defiant answer to Roosevelt's enemies. This mood will doubtless spread as the emotions of the campaign grow more intense. Smith has handed Roosevelt the labor vote.

It would be pleasant to believe that pressure from the right will similarly incline the President toward labor and a more consistent policy of reform. But experience of political behavior in a campaign year counsels skepticism. Only one event might force the President to take a stand justifying the hopes of the workers and the abuse of the reactionaries. If the NRA and the AAA should be followed to the scrap heap by the other major measures of social control, Mr. Roosevelt might have to face the dreaded issue of constitutional change. But even then it is more likely that the President will move warily down the middle of the road that leads toward reelection. He will probably try to dodge the issue of the Constitution by proposing new laws contrived to survive the court if possible but in any case to tide over till election day. If labor and liberals in general will watch closely the actions of the Administration instead of listening to the vituperations of its opponents, they will save themselves much ultimate regret. Above all, they should decline to take Mr. Smith's word for Mr. Roosevelt's radicalism.

Can We Be Neutral?

THE bitter attack on the Administration's neutrality bill by John Bassett Moore, former justice of the World Court and recognized as one of America's leading experts on international law, symbolizes a growing opposition to the proposed legislation. Washington observers report that the hearings in both the House and the Senate have been attended by indescribable confusion. Congressmen skilled in dealing with the petty problems of their constituents have been utterly baffled by the conflicting arguments on what is unquestionably one of the most complex and crucial issues of our time. They have found that it is one thing to analyze the forces which drew us into the World War, but quite another to chart the effect of a series of unprecedented regulations under all the circumstances which might possibly arise in future years. It is scarcely surprising, therefore, that a large part of the enthusiasm which existed for new neutrality legislation a few months ago should have evaporated under the heat of criticism.

Opposition to the Administration bill has come chiefly from two quarters. The diehard isolationists, such as Senator Johnson—and to a lesser extent Senator Borah—have been disturbed at the prospect of giving up America's traditional insistence on the freedom of the seas and by fear that the new legislation might prove to be a back door into the League. This group has been responsible for a series of amendments which, if incorporated into the final law, will largely destroy its effectiveness. The latest and most damaging of these is a provision, written in by the House committee, which in effect suspends the embargo on war materials pending the revision or termination of existing commercial treaties, an action which would preclude an embargo against oil shipments to Italy.

On the other hand, there has been a growing recognition among peace groups that certain aspects of the new neutrality bill are unsound in principle. Neutrality, if it is to mean anything, must involve complete impartiality. This not only means that we dare not be concerned regarding the fate of Jews in Germany, Catholics in Mexico, or American investments in Manchuria, but that we may not—as a people—pass judgment on the question of war itself. We must treat aggressor and aggrieved with complete equality. Such impartiality, or disinterestedness, might be possible for the residents of Samoa or even Argentina, but it is out of the question for Americans. As a leading creditor and as one of the chief commercial nations in the world, the United States is inextricably involved in world events. No great imperialist power, with commitments in all parts of the earth, can be truly neutral unless it voluntarily chooses to renounce its widespread interests.

A further grave weakness in the present bill, as contrasted with that proposed recently by the National Peace Conference, is to be found in the provision limiting embargoes on war materials to those amounts which are in excess of the "normal" peace-time trade. While in theory this protects American business against a loss of trade, it actually recreates all the problems faced by President Wilson in his unsuccessful attempt to maintain neutrality in 1917. If, for example, a war broke out between the League powers and Nazi Germany, there would be the same squabble about "freedom of the seas" and neutral "rights," and the same pressure to increase trade with the "Allies" in order to offset the loss of German markets.

Despite the shortcomings of the bill, however, some neutrality legislation should be enacted before the expiration of the present resolution on February 29. Although a law empowering the President to cooperate with the League in the prevention of war would be distinctly preferable to either the Pitman-McReynolds or the Nye-Clark proposals, the United States dare not risk a return to the old neutrality, with its insistence on American "rights." Fortunately, the Nye Investigating Committee has done its work well. The American people are not in a mood to allow the pressure of financial interests to involve us in another war. They will demand at least an embargo on loans and credits. There is no basic inconsistency in endeavoring to limit the war-breeding influence of our financial and business leaders while seeking to establish an international system of law. Such inconsistency as appears to exist grows out of the misuse of the word neutrality when applied to the proposed legislation. It is true that we cannot cooperate in the establishment of an effective organization for the enforcement of peace and at the same time maintain a strict "neutrality." We cannot and dare not evade our responsibility as a world power. And we can and must curb those interests within our boundaries which would lead us into war. Both objectives can be achieved by giving the President discretionary power to raise the embargo on shipments to countries attacked in violation of the Kellogg pact.

Relief, Today and Tomorrow

"BALANCE the budget" is the war cry with which the anti-Administration forces will advance against Mr. Roosevelt in the coming campaign. In the words of the mellifluous Governor Talmadge, "Shall we continue to borrow and spend, or settle down and settle up?" Without the Georgia Governor's fireworks, even Governor Landon, in a discussion of the unbalanced budget, declared that "relief appropriation has been more than ample," but that bureaucracy has taken more than its share of the amount that should have been spent on the unemployed.

In the light of these criticisms it is pertinent to inquire just how much the federal government is spending for relief, and how wide an area these appropriations are covering. Estimates of the number of unemployed in the country today vary from nine to seventeen million. The American Federation of Labor estimates 11,672,000 as of November, 1935. For the week ending January 4, 1936, there were approximately 3,550,000 persons on the federal work-relief pay roll. With the termination of the FERA approximately 1,500,000 unemployables were transferred from federal relief to state or local aid. Assuming that all of these persons are now obtaining some form of government assistance, we have a total of a little over 5,000,000 being cared for today by the state, leaving, according to the A. F. of L., about 6,500,000 unemployed for whom no such provision is being made.

Last spring an appropriation of $4,800,000,000 was made for federal relief, the eight hundred million to be expended before the end of the fiscal year in June, 1935, the remainder to be used for relief in the current year. An article in the Annalist for January 24 estimates that something like a billion of this will be still unexpended on June 30 next. The annual expenditure for relief this year, therefore, will be almost the same as it was last, namely, three billion dollars. Assuming that every dollar of this sum is used for direct relief of the unemployed, it means an expenditure of $850 a year each for 3,500,000 people; each of these, however, represents a family unit of three and a half persons. What it amounts to is that the federal government supports 3,500,000 families at $850 a year each, or about half the subsistence-level income as it is generally estimated, and that the remaining 8,000,000 unemployed—also presumably representing families and not individuals—are dependent upon admittedly inadequate state or municipal relief, the casual benefits of private charity, or their own dwindling resources.

From this standpoint it is seen that although the federal government is spending enormous sums of money, it is hardly plunging the beneficiaries into luxury. Elsewhere in this issue Mr. Feinstein indicates what these expenditures mean when separated into geographical and personal units. At best, in the New England states, where the relief rate is highest, they mean enough to eat, of a sort, shelter, and fuel, with almost no allowance for clothing or household necessities. At worst, in the Southeastern states, where the average monthly relief grant per family is $17.50, they mean something less. Yet even this meager allotment is considered extravagant by the advocates of a balanced budget, and Mr. Roosevelt himself wishes to give the impression that some attempt will soon be made to scale down relief expenditures.

The Annalist article offers general criticism of the overcostly federal relief program, and suggests an alternative which may be taken as the program of many Administration critics. It is simply a return to the dole, as the least expensive way of meeting what is admittedly a problem of large-scale distress. This would have the additional advantage of eliminating government competition with private industry, so objectionable to Mr. Smith's Liberty Leaguers. It is perfectly true that as it is now administered the work-relief program of the government is not all that could be desired. There is undeniably a good deal of boondoggling and extravagant overcrowding at the top. But when useful work is economically performed, work relief is obviously preferable to the dole. In the January Survey the directors of thirteen national organizations discussed relief now and in the future. None of them could see an immediate prospect of smaller government expenditures. Most of them thought, with the inevitable decline of private resources attendant upon six years of depression, that this would be the "worst winter yet." Almost without exception they called for a federal program that was definite and consistent and that at the same time recognized relief as a more or less permanent problem. Even with the return of "recovery," estimates of probable unemployment range from six to eight million. These recommendations are made by persons in direct, daily contact with the suffering and insecurity that unemployment brings. Without adequate social-security legislation, based on increased taxation, proposals to "balance the budget" are bound to seem unrealistic and remote.

Mr. Rice Resigns

ON January 23 Elmer Rice, the well-known playwright, resigned as regional director for New York of the WPA Theater Project. Mr. Rice's resignation was accepted with obvious alacrity by Jacob Baker, national administrator of the WPA arts, but it is difficult to see how the incident can fail to be embarrassing to the Administration.

Mr. Rice, who says that he was promised an absolutely free hand and that partisan politics would not enter into the matter, charges the government with bad faith and a determination to exercise a censorship which it had agreed to withhold. Ostensibly the clash came over the first edition of the proposed "Living Newspaper," which dealt with the Ethiopian situation, but Mr. Rice insists that the issue raised here was merely a pretext. Baker and Hopkins, he says, were alarmed by the possible political consequences of two other proposed scripts, one dealing with relief, the other with the plight of the share-croppers, and were determined to force his resignation on a less clear-cut issue. Accordingly Mr. Baker, just before the production of "Ethiopia," issued an order forbidding the representation on the stage of any foreign ruler, minister, or Cabinet member, well knowing that "Ethiopia" could not be presented under the ruling and that Mr. Rice would be compelled to resign. Miss Hallie Flanagan, though sympathizing with Rice, feels that the whole project is too important as a relief measure to be dropped at the present moment and will remain as national director of the theatrical and musical projects of the WPA. Philip Barker has been appointed temporarily to fill Mr. Rice's place.

The situation raises a good many complicated questions. One of them concerns the extent to which it is advisable to attempt to combine relief and cultural objectives as they were combined in this project. Another and even more complicated one concerns the extent to which, either in theory or in practice, even a democratic government can be expected to give active aid to the spread of doctrine which it regards as dangerous to its existence or even to its program. On the one hand it may be argued that the doctrine of free speech is merely permissive, that it denies the right of any group to forbid the free expression of opinion without imposing an obligation on any such group actively to further opinions which it does not hold. On the other hand, if this is the attitude which the present Administration planned to take, it is hard to understand why it chose to appoint such a well-known and notoriously intransigent radical as Mr. Rice, or to give him every assurance that he would not be subject to censorship. The whole incident is certainly the result of a blunder if not of a crime.

Mr. Rice, who has been insistent in expressing his belief that the private theatrical enterprise is doomed by economic conditions to triviality, may well ponder again the question whether such enterprises do not, after all, permit a greater freedom of expression than, for the present at least, seems likely to be enjoyed by any governmental project in any country. He has declared himself "done with the commercial theater"; it will be too bad if he is now done with the state theater also.

Issues and Men

The Morro Castle Convictions

THE conviction of two officers of the Morro Castle and an official of the Ward Line is of the utmost importance as bringing home to steamship men everywhere their responsibility to the traveling public. One may feel some sympathy for the acting captain who was saddled with the command of the ship by the sudden death of the captain a short while before the disaster occurred. But a really able seaman would not have headed his ship up into the wind and would have risen better to the emergency. The case of the vice-president of the line, Henry E. Cabaud, who was fined $5,000 in lieu of a prison sentence of a year, is more appealing, however, because the real responsibility for the ship's condition rested not with him but with the superintendent, who under the law could not be tried, and he was hardly guilty of having "knowingly and wilfully" connived at conditions which caused loss of life. As for the chief engineer, he was a miserable poltroon, and his four years in prison are merited even though his refusal to go to his post did not actually jeopardize the working of the ship. The $10,000 fine levied against the line was all that was possible under the statute. It should have been much more. Society has a duty to "encourage the others" in a case like this, all the more because the Ward Line had not borne too enviable a reputation—to put it politely—before the Morro Castle disaster occurred. As it is, this is the first conviction of ship's officers since the burning of the Slocum nearly thirty-six years ago.

The convictions must not, however, distract public attention from the remedial measures needed at once to protect the seagoing public. Congress has been inexcusably derelict in allowing itself to be prevented by the Seamen's Union from approving the treaty which would bring about our adherence to the International Convention for Safety of Life at Sea, already ratified by nearly all the other maritime nations. It should act at once, for this convention advances the protection of ships from fire dangers far beyond our own statutes, which are sorely in need of strengthening and amendment. The modern ship, with its needlessly luxurious fittings and lavish use of wood for purely decorative purposes, is nothing less than a fire-trap, as was shown when the Europa and the brand-new Bermuda burned at their piers, the former just prior to the date of her first sailing. Next, the Steamboat Inspection Service, which was proved guilty of negligence and venality at the time of the Slocum disaster, needs again to be overhauled, brought up to date, and freed from political interference and appointments. Perhaps the addition to the Board of Supervising Inspectors of that gallant and experienced officer, Captain George Fried, may lead to some improvement. The next constructive measure would be to bring all seamen under the workmen's compensation law—something strenuously resisted now by the Seamen's Union and its lawyers—and there should be compulsory insurance of all passengers. With this should be studied the whole difficult question of how to have adequately trained sailors to man the lifeboats when the modern seaman has degenerated into a paint-chipping handy man or mechanic.

Unquestionably conditions of life aboard ship are unsatisfactory despite great improvements in living quarters and food. Inadequate pay and uncertainty of employment—the latter especially in the stewards' department, where the personnel fluctuates with the seasons—do much to prevent the maintenance of a thoroughly efficient crew. The status of the officers is also bad. An experienced and able commander of merchant and naval ships who attended the official inquiry into the Morro Castle disaster could not conceal his amazement at the poor quality of that ship's officers, even those who were without blame. He declared that they not only could not speak their own language properly, but that they gave no evidence of having the personality or the efficiency or the habit of command essential to the successful officer, whether in the engine room or on the bridge. This is due chiefly to underpayment and the failure to make the career attractive to the right kind of men. Officers are often horribly overworked, and they are hampered in their own development as commanders and executives by the radio, which has made it possible for them to turn to the home office for instruction at all times, even in minor matters, with the result that they are less and less willing to assume responsibility. From this point of view the radio is almost a misfortune for navigators. When all is said and done, however, you cannot have good ship's officers unless you pay them well, give them a good social standing, and allow them sufficient leave on shore to have something of family life.

When you put these conditions up to the steamship managers they reply that they would like very much to do all these things, but where is the money to come from? To which the answer is that if they cannot manage a steamship line with efficiency and with safety for their passengers they ought not to be in the business. If that means government ownership and operation, then that must be faced. Unfortunately the history of navigation proves that even in the most prosperous times officers and men have been inadequately paid and often dreadfully maltreated, starved, and abused. Meanwhile the burden of command placed upon the captain of the ship steadily increases. As I have written before, some Cunard captains actually protested to their home office against the building of the Queen Mary on the ground that no individual should be saddled with a greater responsibility than that of the captains of the then existing ships. They are the heads of communities that in the case of the Queen Mary will number 3,600 persons. In addition, they must be skilled navigators equal to any emergency of the sea and hosts and rulers of their share of the traveling public.

Lowell Garrison Kilgus

What I Saw in Germany

By LOUIS FISCHER

Berlin, January 6

I ARRIVED in Berlin almost fourteen years to a day after I had first seen it in December, 1921. I have been in Germany every year since 1921, sometimes for several months at a stretch, sometimes for several weeks. I have never known it so pessimistic, not even in the worst period of currency inflation, when the suffering was greater. Germans of all classes fight for their pessimism, insist it is justified, and maintain that an optimism achieved by an effort of will would vanish at the slightest touch of today's reality. They are resigned to a long siege of gloom. No improvement is expected. The official press, with welcome honesty, feeds this humor. "The government and the nation," Joseph Goebbels, Minister of Propaganda, announced in a New Year broadcast, "had their troubles last year and will have them in the future too." He spoke of "scarcity, inconveniences, and sacrifices." "Sacrifices on the altar of Mars," was the comment of several Germans with whom I listened to this talented coworker of Adolf Hitler. At the table of every German family sits an invisible but voracious eater who grabs the butter, the meat, the eggs, before anyone else can reach them. He wears a steel helmet and his mouth is the maw of a cannon.

Many German citizens—good Aryans, of course, for the others lost their citizenship at Nürnberg and are men without a country in their native land—complain about the same things in almost the same language. This in itself is significant. "We were promised national elections every year," they say. "Why did no elections take place in 1935?" Intellectuals, government employees, and workingmen pose this question. They have an answer: "The regime probably fears the result." This implies that the Nazis know the mood of the population. They would have to be blind and deaf not to know it, for not since Herr Hitler came into office three years ago has there been such widespread vocal opposition.

I walked into a big bookstore in the fashionable west end of Berlin and asked for political literature. The salesman proposed Die Neue Rundschau. I said I had been a regular reader of the old Rundschau and had found it stimulating, but that this new editor and his contributors went on for pages and pages without uttering a single sensible word, without offering a single thought. "That is their function," the salesman replied. Then he suggested a pamphlet entitled "Bodentreuer Adel" about the nobility's love of and loyalty to the soil and added, "This publishing house is as hostile to the regime as one dare to be nowadays."

Quite a number of Berlin streets have been rechristened in recent years. The Church of Matthew Street, for instance, has been named for the flag. Even the old-timer whose memory is better than his sense of direction errs a bit. I asked a vendor of inflated rubber balloons where such-and-such a street was. "God knows," he answered, "they change everything." His tone encouraged me to engage him in conversation. He had been a workingman in Wedding, "red Wedding," as this proletarian quarter of Berlin was once called. Two years of unemployment had forced him to move into the country. Because he was a peddler he was not entitled to the dole or to a job, "but jobs don't come to men of my age." He was forty-six. People of his generation could do nothing except "close their eyes," die. "Things can only get worse." He hoped for nothing. His son could only hope to go to war. Last week he had been in prison for four days. "I was grumbling about the butter shortage to some neighbors. A Hitler Youth girl of sixteen heard me. Fortunately, my documents were in order, so they released me." "That means," I probed, "that you were never a Communist or Social Democrat." "Ach," he said, "what is in the heart need not be written on the paper or on the face." I stood and talked to him for about fifteen minutes. He greeted persons who approached to inquire about the price of a balloon with a snappy "Heil Hitler." In his lapel buttonhole he wore a Hakenkreuz.

An old friend who lives in the workers' district of Neukölln informed me about the mood of the workingmen. They had always been suspicious of the Hitler regime, yet when it brought some of them employment they became reconciled though sullen. Now unemployment had increased. The charity of the Winter Aid was insufficient, insulting, and precarious. The fat shortage was not only trying in itself, but indicated that the government was facing serious difficulties. "If it imports butter, lard, and meat it will import fewer raw materials and then there will be less work. If it imports raw materials we shall have no fats. For weeks before Christmas there was practically no fat, and the workers went to their factories with dry sausage sandwiches for lunch. Sausage is of poor quality and expensive. The workers are bitter." He told me this story. Several weeks ago a poster appeared in Neukölln which read, "The German Communist Party is still alive." Nazis then wrote on the signboard below: "Come to such-and-such a hall on Friday night for a frank discussion. We guarantee your unhindered departure." The next morning Communists had scrawled their answer. "It won't work," they wrote. "We are on S. A. duty." Many radicals have entered the S. A. and other Fascist organizations for protection rather than from conviction. Subsequently a foreign diplomat told me of the same Neukölln incident. He also related this anecdote, which is making the rounds of Berlin salons and cafes. General Hermann Göring, who enjoys the reputation of a "liberal" among Fascists, was visiting a factory. He gathered the workers about him and wanted to have a heart-to-heart talk with them. He asked them to speak openly. "I promise that nothing will happen to you if you do." Then he asked about their political beliefs. "Tell me where you stand," he said turning to a gray-haired foreman. "I have been a Communist for many years," was the reply. "And are you still a Communist?" "Yes." "And are there many Communists in this plant?" Göring pressed. "Oh, only about 30 per cent of the force." "What are the rest?" "Well, approximately 50 per cent of the total are Social Democrats," someone volunteered. "And the remaining 20 per cent?" Göring asked hopefully. "They are Christian Socialists." "Then where are the National Socialists [Nazis]?" Göring inquired perplexed. "We are all National Socialists," several men smilingly assured him. This sort of protective coloration to ward off "protective custody" or worse is very widespread and complicates the task of the Hitlerites; they cannot count their real supporters.

A German woman of Christian faith explained to me that she had recently taken her daughter out of the state school and put her into a Catholic school. Her daughter was fifteen. In her old class she was always being informed that she "would soon be a National Socialist mother" and had to "know her duty to the nation." Boys of thirteen and fourteen were regular readers of the anti-Semitic Stürmer, which specializes in the minutest pornographic details of "race violation" of Aryan women by Jews. Because of this atmosphere and for other reasons many parents were transferring their children to Catholic parochial schools. In one such institution—crowded now—forty Jewish boys and girls had been enrolled and were receiving favored treatment; a class in Hebrew had been opened for them. Decent Germans abhor the official policy toward Jews. "The Jews cannot be as bad as Goebbels and Rosenberg paint them." Nazi boys, on their own initiative, sometimes escort Jewish children home from school to guard them against harm.

In a Berlin autobus I notice empty seats, yet men are standing up. They are Jews. If they sit down an Aryan woman or man may indicate objection by a move or a grimace. It is this constant humiliation which oppresses German Jews almost as much as their utterly hopeless economic and political position. They must always be on their best behavior, and are kept away from many places less by actual prohibition than by the fear of being snubbed or insulted or forced to act against their conscience. While I was having a meal at Kempinski's a Brown Shirt came in with a tin box to make a collection. What Jew would want to contribute and what Jew would refuse to do so? In that restaurant, incidentally, I ordered chocolate ice cream. It had a bad taste. I called the waiter and said, "A rotten egg must have gone into this ice cream." He protested that there could be no rotten egg in it because there were no eggs at all in it. They used egg-substitute—this in one of the best Berlin eating houses. A salesgirl in a big store on the Leipziger Strasse looked at me pityingly when I asked, "Is this pure wool?" and said, "Nothing in Germany is pure wool now. At least 10 per cent of cotton and artificial wool is admixed. But our strict instructions are to call it pure wool."

Everywhere among Germans I discovered an eagerness to do their bit against the regime by saying something unfavorable about it. On January 1, I was lunching in the expensive Hotel Bristol on Unter den Linden. "Well," I said to the waiter, "how was business at yesterday's celebration?" "Fine," he said. "Probably worse than last year, however," I suggested. "No, rather better," he said. "I suppose there were many foreigners," I volunteered. "Ah," he replied, "very few foreigners could afford the price. Some of the guests were industrialists. But the vast majority were party functionaries." Numerous stories circulate about the rich villas, rich automobiles, and luxurious living of National Socialist officials. Such people as Göring, Goebbels, Ley, Darre, Rosenberg are the butt of endless jokes and jibes. Indeed, from the point of view of the regime, the worst feature of the public's attitude is that it laughs at the Nazis. Only Hitler is respected. The others, big and small, have no moral authority. Intellectuals especially resent the disrepute into which the government has brought their country and German culture abroad. "The Nazis," one liberal author who lives unmolested under a Hitlerian camouflage said to me, "aver that they are the bulwark of European civilization against bolshevism. I cannot believe that any foreigner takes this claim seriously. Civilization should begin at home." There is a lot of bitterness about the deterioration of art and culture. Numerous Germans boycott the theaters and cinemas, and judging by the one film I saw, entitled "Henker, Frauen, und Soldaten," I cannot blame them. Only the opera is excepted. Göring captured the two Berlin operas and has managed to keep them out of Goebbels's hands. He pays good salaries to the best artists and has retained the Jews. Blech, the Jewish conductor at the Prussian State Opera, is demonstratively cheered whenever he appears. This sort of "National Socialist competition" is quite common: Göring against Goebbels; Hanfstängel talking openly against Goebbels; the black-uniformed S. S. disgusted with Alfred Rosenberg. In his New Year message to the Reichswehr Hitler spoke neither of National Socialism nor of the revolution nor of the party. In greetings on the same occasion General Blomberg, Reichswehr Minister, mentioned Hitler but no other word that would recall the existence of the regime, while General Fritsch, the commander-in-chief of the army, and Admiral Räder, the commander-in-chief of the navy, mentioned neither Hitler nor National Socialism. Nevertheless, it would be wrong to think that political changes will originate with the armed forces. German Fascism has done a great deal for them; they expect it to do more.

I sat in a packed cafe with a prominent member of the staff of a Berlin daily. His business is to write pro-Nazi editorials, but his sentiments were decidedly anti-Nazi when he talked with me. He told me how the circulation of most German dailies, including his own, had fallen off sharply. The exceptions were the Völkische Beobachter, which was compulsory reading for the party, and the Frankfurter Zeitung, which was still allowed some freedom of judgment in order that at least one German newspaper might find some credence abroad. He gave me all the gossip about the regime, and then passed to anecdotes. I reproduce one. A Dutch boy was standing on the Dutch frontier and a German boy on the German frontier. "Ech," said the Dutch boy, "we have butter." "Yes," countered the German boy, "but we have the Führer, Hitler." "Huh," replied the Dutch boy, "we have butter and we have the Kaiser. Soon we shall also have the Führer." This imaginary Dutch boy is too sanguine.

For a whole long evening German intellectuals regaled me with stories about general conditions and about their own lives. They discussed the hostility to Fascism among the workers, among government officials, in the S. A., and among the farmers, who object to Nazi legislation and to price control and other restrictive measures. "Then what section of the population does support this regime?" I demanded. "Not one." They were unanimous in this opinion. In three years, they testified, National Socialism, once the movement of millions, has lost its popular backing; hence the failure to call elections. Its only really convinced followers are the armed and well-disciplined S. S., the Nazis' praetorian guard—and fine-looking, strong fellows they are.

But intellectuals, workers, and everybody else I met emitted their anti-Fascist poison and immediately added: "Don't think anything will happen. The regime is stable. It has the guns and the concentration camps behind it." I asked all my acquaintances whether they saw illegal Communist or Socialist literature. They did not. One man who works in a big publishing house said, "We are ready for it but none ever comes our way." It is obvious that the Marxist movement, heroic and indefatigably optimistic though it be, is too limited to organize and direct an opposition which is so nation-wide. All people agree that hostility to Nazism unites the opposition but, as yet, nothing else does. One hears that the monarchists feel encouraged by developments in Germany and Greece and by the sympathy of certain Reichswehr elements. Their candidate for the throne is Prince Louis Ferdinand, grandson of the Kaiser, whom I met. Once he worked at the Ford plant in Detroit and now he is employed by the Lufthansa. He is a nice chap. It is hard to imagine, however, that he will some day rule Germany. If there were free public discussion or assembly the other groups might temporarily find a common language. But the eye of the Gestapo is sharp and its punishment fierce. The hostility to National Socialism, consequently, is ubiquitous and impotent. The strength of the regime lies in its enemy's disunion, in its own large armed forces, and in the strong, almost mystic hold which Hitler still has over many Germans. The weakness of the regime is explained by the fact that it has redeemed only two of its pre-1933 pledges: it is exterminating the Jews and it is forging a vast military machine which, in the opinion of Germans, enhances the danger of a world war.

Scottsboro Interview

By CARLETON BEALS

IN the Negro ward on the fourth floor of the Hillman Hospital on Sunday afternoon I saw Ozie Powell, the Scottsboro boy who was shot in the head by Deputy Sheriff J. Street Sandlin in the mysterious scuffle on the road between Decatur and Birmingham. Ozie lies in the first room after one steps from the white ward into the ill-kept black quarters. At his doorway are stationed highway patrolmen, sheriffs, and gum-shoe men, who survey all comers with suspicious eyes. Ozie was lying on his left side asleep, a white bandage on his head, his right foot chained to the bed.

I was speaking to the nurse when a lanky sheriff poked me in the chest with a hard finger and snapped, "Who are you?"

I explained, and almost at once he became loquacious. "I'd give a fifty-dollar bill," he repeated several times, "if you could talk to that nigger. But it's against the Governor's orders. I'd like you to see for yourself that that New Yawk lawyer Leibowitz is a damn' liar. Why, we had a man planted outside Ozie's window when he and Watts wuz talkin' to the nigger, and we know everything that was said."

"What do you think of these niggers?" asked a fat gum-shoe man. "They're guilty, ain't they? You'd shoot a nigger that knifed your buddy, wouldn't you?"

I managed to convince him that I thought as any good Alabaman does, and the sheriff grew mellow with the idea that at last he had found a friendly New York newspaperman. "Stand right here in the doorway," he said, "and have a look at him."

Before I could protest, he strode over to the bed, woke up the boy who had undergone a serious brain operation less than forty-eight hours before and whose life was still in the balance, and began firing questions at him. There was fear in the spasmodic twitching of the Negro's body and his rolling dazed eyes; he answered respectfully in a weak voice. Even so, he refused to incriminate Roy Wright, one of the other two manacled Negro boys in the car where the trouble started. When the sheriff insisted on an answer, saying, "That Leroy Wright's a bad fellow, isn't he? He put you up to this, didn't he?" Ozie groaned out, "Naw, he didn't have to put me up to it."

Similarly Ozie refused to answer the question, repeated again and again, "Leibowitz was mad at you, wasn't he?" This in a triumphant tone.

"Naw, he wasn't mad," the Negro boy managed to groan.

"But he was different toward you, wasn't he?"

"Naw, I guess—" And Ozie's voice drifted into unintelligibility.

"He didn't talk to you very long, did he?" persisted the sheriff.

"Guess—he didn't have much time."

"He was in a hurry, wasn't he?"

Merely a negative sort of groan answered this question. The Negro boy was perfectly lucid, but he seemed to grow weaker from the prolonged questioning, of which only a sample is given here.

The sheriff, with several others who had crowded into the Negro's room, came back to me with a gloating expression. "Now you can tell the truth about this, cain't you? You seen for yourself that Leibowitz was lying when he said this nigger wasn't in a fit condition to be questioned. You seen that he knows everything he's saying."

This scuffle on the road (following prolonged efforts by the sheriffs, and what appears to be collusion between the prosecution and the court, to force the boys to throw over their lawyers and accept a court-appointed lawyer on the promise that they would get off with lighter sentences) is merely an incident that further obscures the guilt or innocence of the defendants and further conceals the grave social and racial implications of the whole case.

These nine Negroes, ranging from thirteen to nineteen at the time of their arrest, have varied intelligence and character. Some were illiterate, although all of them can now read and write. All the young folk, black and white, taken off that fatal train at Paint Rock, Alabama, five years ago, were driftwood. One of the seventeen-year-old Negro boys had both syphilis and gonorrhea and was barely able to get about with a cane. Haywood Patterson, who received a sentence of seventy-five years in his fourth trial, was apparently chosen by the prosecution to be tried first because he has the blackest skin, the wickedest gleam in his eyes, and the meanest expression on his face. He is what is known in the South as "a bad nigger." This means that he is wilful, self-assertive, independent, not properly servile. Add five years of jail, and it would not be surprising if he had become hard and perhaps treacherous. Yet he is decidedly likable and, in contrast to Victoria Price, he has a straightforward honesty in his manner; he is more gentle and restrained than his accuser, who viciously spits out her words, some of them foul. He was generous enough to save Orville Gilley from death under the wheels by hauling him back by his feet into the "chert," or gravel car, although the white boy had trampled on his hands and almost caused him to fall off the moving train and had been heaving "stud," or rocks, at him. Haywood writes good English in a beautiful hand.

Ozie Powell, who was shot in the brain, was sullen and shift on the stand and sometimes flared up with anger. Five years in a jail cell, with no proper exercise, no sunlight, and no amusements, have given him an acute prison psychosis. One of his fellow-prisoners says he has been "queer" for nearly a year. "He jus' sits off all by himself and plays that little harp of his and after a while throws a fit. He jumps up and curses everybody and everything. Theah's something the matter with his haid."

Willie Robertson, the sick boy, has at least improved in health during his jail experience. As one Southerner described him, "He is so dumb he tells the truth." When he first appeared on the stand he had a wild mop of kinky half-combed hair that split into tufts in the back. Now he is well dressed and slicks his hair with anti-kink grease, as do most of the others. Strangely enough, this seems to irritate the good people of Morgan County even more than the crime the Negroes supposedly committed; it is a constant topic of bitter conversation how well the boys are now dressed; and they are ridiculed for taking pains with their appearance. The fact is that they are better mannered and better dressed than most of the spectators at their trials.

Olen Montgomery, the nearly blind boy, who was hoping to get free treatment from an eye specialist in Memphis when he was taken off a box-car far removed from the part of the train where the supposed rape occurred, seems an honest, simple boy. He is "funny." One likes him at once.

The two Wright boys are both very bright. The youngest, only thirteen when arrested, has since been jabbed in the face with a bayonet by a state militiaman who was supposed to protect him; his cheek is drawn into an artificial perpetual grin. The older, Roy Wright, is a fine type of Negro with a good mind and open, good-natured countenance. Because he is the most intelligent of the lot, he is the one most fiercely hated by his guards.

At the recent trial, watching the half-illiterate talesmen shuffle forward in response to Judge Callahan's sharp calling of their names, surveying their shabby clothes, their dull eyes, their vacant countenances, their malformed bodies, and seeing them fill the spittoons with tobacco juice, one felt a sense of shame. These are of our purest American stock. What has brought about their degeneracy?

As one rides through the countryside and sees the shacks in which they live, the boards warped and rotting, the windows broken and stuffed with rags, as one looks at the stony hillsides and the pine trees standing in swampy pools, one realizes that many of these people in America in the twentieth century live worse than most peasants in the Balkans and certainly have fewer cultural attainments. They fear the Negroes. It is an economic fear. It is a physical fear. It is a cultural fear. It is a blind fear.

I have no space to summarize the evidence. Certainly in the recent trial there was not sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction. There was, in addition, a constant effort to obscure the defense testimony and to rule it out through tricky but legal procedure. The most vital evidence for the defense was barred. The prosecution could not call Ruby Bates, who has recanted her previous testimony and has declared the boys innocent. It could not call Orville Gilley, presumably an eyewitness, though it had him there under guard, for Gilley is now serving time in the Tennessee penitentiary for knocking down two women on separate occasions and stealing their purses. The prosecution, since the Horton trial, has not dared call Dr. R. R. Bridges, the official doctor who examined Victoria an hour and a half after the alleged rape, because in the first place his testimony contradicts Victoria's and in the second place, by not calling him, it prevents the defense from bringing in rebuttal testimony that would knock the prosecution's case into a cocked hat in any fair court in the land.

In one of the earlier trials a state's attorney, in his summation to the jury, waved Victoria Price's cotton drawers over his head and shouted a defense of Alabama's "pure womanhood." No other garments were offered by the state. Dr. Bridges had testified that there were no stains on the girls' clothing. At the recent trial the drawers were again waved in the courtroom, but this time they had become silk. Before the defense could make a protest, Judge Callahan testily ruled that they were inadmissible as evidence. But they had already had their effect on the jurors.

This is typical of the farce of the trial. Technically everything may have been perfectly legal. The record may read fairly, for all I know. But no one who was not present can realize the inflections of the court and the subtly changed meanings that were put upon words. In charging the jury Judge Callahan said that if such and such things were true, in a tone implying they probably were, then the defendant was a "rapist" and should be convicted. As he said these words, he glared over at the defendant in fury, his lips drew back in a snarl, and he rolled out the word "r-rapist" in a horrendous tone. The record will never show such things; but continue them hour after hour and day after day in an already prejudiced courtroom, and the sum total weighs upon the minds of the jurors.

Next Week

Colonel Frank Knox as a Presidential Candidate

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Loose Construction

By HEYWOOD BROWN

I HAVE been wondering whether the Republican National Committee would consider outside manuscripts for its famous radio program, "Liberty at the Crossroads." By now, I suppose, everybody is interested in the two characters, John and Mary, who have been created under the auspices of Chairman Fletcher. Undoubtedly you remember that in an early instalment of the series John and Mary were about to get married and were frightened off by a short talk on governmental extravagance and the mounting burden of taxation. John and Mary believe that all budgets should be balanced, and when last I heard of them they remained unwed out of deference to the sound doctrines of the Republican Party.

My sketch is based on the conception that somehow or other love finds a way as it did in the case of Romeo and Juliet, who hurdled certain political obstacles, although I must admit that the issues which stood in their way were municipal rather than national. At any rate, my radio sketch is founded on the assumption that John and Mary have a three-year-old boy known to them as Junior. They are living in a suburban cottage which is only partially paid for.

The background for my little drama must be explained by the announcer before the play proper begins. It has been snowing all night. In fact, it has been snowing for weeks. Nothing can stop it. The Democrats are still in power. A huge weight has piled up on the roof of the little villa. Our five-minute tragedy opens with a flock of studio sound effects. There is the sound of shrieks and outcries and of crashing timbers. Under the weight of snow the roof of John and Mary's house has caved in. Fortunately they have noted the preliminary rumbles and have had time to flee to the front lawn, now deep in drifts. But during the excitement both forgot Junior.

MARY: Junior is trapped!

JOHN: You mean?

MARY: I mean what I say. Somewhere under that pile of wreckage lies Junior in his crib, provided he has not been hit by some falling plank.

JOHN: This is awful.

MARY: You may well say it is awful, and, indeed, everything has been awful since America repudiated the Republican Party on account of a worldwide depression which Herbert Hoover was just about to turn to our own advantage when the partisan and subversive activities of the Democratic Party prevented him.

JOHN: You mean that by tinkering with the tariff the Democrats allowed the products of cheap coolie labor in foreign fields to flood our markets and destroy the best efforts of business men to maintain a wage scale adequate to continue the American standard of living for the working-man.

MARY: I mean that and also more. The Founding Fathers wisely laid down a way of life under which certain powers were granted to the federal government and others reserved to the states. All this was set forth at some length by that great Republican statesman Thomas Jefferson and his logical successors, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, not forgetting Alf M. Landon of Kansas, who has rigorously balanced the budget of his native state each year.

JOHN: And Junior is lying somewhere under the wreckage.

MARY: It is a wreckage wrought by various under secretaries and visionaries whose names can scarcely be pronounced, like Wallace, Frank, and Henry Hopkins.

JOHN: But how about a wrecking crew? Couldn't I call up on the telephone, the administration of which is a tribute to the initiative of private capital, and get some men with a derrick and possibly shovels to dig our little Junior out?

MARY: John, I am surprised and shocked to hear you utter such a thing in a land where we must choose between Washington and Moscow.

JOHN: Mary, I do not understand the nature of your Republican rebuke.

MARY: Have you so soon forgotten the bitter day we left the marriage-license bureau sweethearts in name only because we realized that we could not possibly balance the budget?

JOHN: I do remember.

MARY: You do well to remember because we founded our life upon the agreement that each day before we said our prayers we would get together in holy and sweet conference and balance our own budget before sleep and Tugwellian darkness had overcome us.

JOHN: "Pay as you go," was what we said.

MARY: And should we abandon that principle now under the slim excuse of an emergency? Derricks for Junior and steam shovels would set our financial plan awry and be but the first step in boondoggling extravagance.

JOHN: You bring me back to my better senses. I'm glad I married a girl from the sidewalks of New York, where the gate of opportunity is kept forever opening. There is always room at the top, and until I get there by honest effort in the good old American way, Junior can remain at the bottom of the wreckage.

MARY: Let us give proof through the night that our budget is still there.

JOHN: Yes, we must choose between the "Star Spangled Banner" and the "Internationale."

MARY: Between the "Volga Boatman" and "Waiting for the Robert E. Lee."

JOHN: Between Thousand Island and Russian dressing.

MARY: Between caviar and the general-welfare clause.

JOHN: Between the Founding Fathers or further fondering.

This could go on forever, but John and Mary and everybody but Junior are rescued by the studio orchestra, which breaks in with a medley of popular selections including "Columbia the Gem of the Ocean," "Du Pont, Can You Spare a Dime?" and "Walking Down Park Avenue."

Washington Weekly

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, February 2

ALMOST any day now the Supreme Court will hand down another anti-New Deal decision. Whereupon the Administration's apologists, still dodging the issue of constitutional reform, will again blame the New Deal's fate not upon the Constitution but upon the prejudices of the men appointed to construe the sacred document. Mr. Roosevelt will be pictured as the victim not of a system but of a group of reactionary old men. Mistaking the kernel of truth in this for the whole nut, leaf, branch, and tree, liberals will extend instant sympathy, and to that extent the fundamental issue will be further obscured.

All of which makes it pertinent to note at this time that sympathy of the kind mentioned is little deserved by the Roosevelt Administration. It has brought more than a few enlightened men into the federal service, but if it has assigned any of them to the federal bench, the fact has escaped notice. The truth seems to be that in this field more than in any other Roosevelt's appointments have been guided by purely political considerations. In consequence, the men he has elevated to the federal bench or promoted from the trial courts to the appellate courts have been no whit different in their general character from the men who received similar honors from Hoover, Coolidge, and Harding.

Nor has the recent piling up of anti-New Deal injunctions in the courts brought any noticeable change in the character of these appointments. Instead, they grow increasingly political. Candidates for the judiciary are being asked with no attempt at delicacy whether, if appointed, they will contribute a certain percentage of their first year's salary to the Democratic campaign coffers. In at least two recent instances they also have been asked by the President's official agents whether they will "go along" with the Administration in the handling of cases.

That attitude toward the lower courts is also the Administration's attitude toward the Supreme Court. It needs only a brief survey of the available evidence to convince any objective observer that, if given leave, Mr. Roosevelt would appoint to the Supreme Court men less interested in the public welfare than in putting the stamp of their approval on any measure the New Deal might pass up to them. Before you jump to the conclusion that this would not be so undesirable a situation as I hint, let me point out that it is precisely on a par with the court situation in Germany and Italy.

THE close parallel between New Deal and Old Deal tastes in judicial appointments has just been brought into sharp focus by an obscene brawl between Senators Bilbo and Harrison of Mississippi over President Roosevelt's selection of Judge Edwin R. Holmes for promotion to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. The essential details of that squabble have been reported fully in the daily press. It is mentioned here only because of one detail the daily press overlooked, an incident which illuminates both the status of civilization in Mississippi and the character of one of its favorite sons, Senator "What-a-Man" Bilbo.

The Senate judiciary subcommittee considering the nomination of Judge Holmes had evidence laid before it indicating that Bilbo, who is fond of quoting Scripture, apparently does not count among his favorite passages Deuteronomy 25:4, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn." For the committee was told that Senator Bilbo actually puts muzzles on Negroes who work for him. Reporting a conversation he had had some years ago with Bilbo when the present Senator was serving a jail term for contempt of court, Judge Holmes said: "He [Bilbo] was very interesting, giving me an account of his pecan orchard; how the pecans are gathered in the fall by little Negroes, how he had to muzzle them while they were at work and search them after they had finished, as they would eat a pound a day and carry off another in their pockets when they left; and pecans at that time were worth nearly a dollar a pound."

The narrative evoked no word of comment from the committee members. Nor did it elicit any attempt at refutation from Bilbo. All sides seemed to take the situation described for granted, including the man Roosevelt thinks deserving of an appointment to the Appellate Court. The committee was assured by other witnesses that Judge Holmes was noted for his impartiality, for his determination to deal equally with rich and poor, black and white.

THIS talk of muzzles reminds one that the past few days have produced evidence that at least two federal agencies—the Interior and Labor departments—apparently give no heed to Roosevelt's Jackson Day assertion of the public need for "facts and yet more facts, in the face of an opposition bent on hiding and distorting facts." Eight months ago there was completed under the joint auspices of these two departments an investigation which showed that under the New Deal federal funds had been used to help manufacturers dodge labor organization in the North by fleeing to Southern towns, where, under the guise of "vocational training," they were supplied with free labor and their foremen were put on the public pay roll as "instructors." Though embarrassing questions concerning this report were asked in House committee hearings on the Interior Department's appropriation bill for 1937, and even more embarrassing references were made to it in floor debate on the bill this past week, the departments in charge still refuse to make the report public. The official defense is that the report was drafted for administrative rather than public purposes—it seems there is a difference between the two—and in the opinion of officialdom contains nothing of public interest.

The man directly in charge of the report, Commissioner of Education Studebaker, tendered that sort of defense in a formal statement he supplied to Representative Crawford, a Michigan Republican, in answer to the charges made in the House, chiefly by Representatives Wigglesworth and Kahn, Republicans from Massachusetts and California respectively. Commissioner Studebaker's answer was chiefly to the effect that in the great majority of instances the government-subsidized vocational-training programs in the various states are being properly administered, and the public might get the wrong idea about the program as a whole from reading the "few instances of maladministration" in the investigators' report. Mr. Studebaker was more inclined to belittle the report than were the men who represented his office before the Appropriations Committee. In testimony given behind closed doors they admitted that the investigation had covered only thirteen "plant training programs" and was confined to textile and garment plants.

Publication of the report itself would show that virtually every tenet of vocational training had been violated; that the "students" were taught only one process of manufacture, became actual production workers in a few hours, and continued as "students" without pay from a few weeks to as long as six months; that no academic training was given but the educational pretense was carried to the extreme of organizing the "students" into Greek-letter fraternities which coarse persons would call "company unions"; that after weeks and months of training "students" were graduated to the factory pay rolls as "learners" at learners' wages; and that no effort was made to avoid bringing the production of these "students" into competition with the output of regularly employed workers in the textile and garment industries or to avoid creating a surplus of workers and, therefore, unemployment. Mr. Studebaker's colleagues told the committee this situation was being remedied, but they admitted that the Office of Education has only four inspectors and cannot properly superintend all the sixty-six "plant training programs" in operation under federal subsidy.

THE mild Congressional furor over the report was cooked up by a few labor lobbyists, acting independently of the official A. F. of L. lobby. According to the journals of commerce and finance, that lobby is the most powerful in Washington and has only to nod its collective head to make Congress jump through the hoop. The facts are quite to the contrary. The A. F. of L.'s full-time, salaried lobbyists do a lot of nodding, but it is usually of the somnolent kind. They compose a moribund crew, some of whose members long since should have been relegated to the infirmary, and their effectiveness on Capitol Hill is almost nil. Most of the effective lobbying in labor's interest is done by free agents.

The A. F. of L.'s professionals are preoccupied with chasing patronage for themselves and their pals, a fact attested in the latest edition of the federation's weekly clip sheet. It features proudly an announcement that "Red" Hushing, a brother of W. C. Hushing, one of the federation's paid lobbyists, has just been appointed United States Marshal for the Panama Canal Zone and that "the Senate promptly confirmed the appointment." While the men employed by union labor to lobby for them were busy maneuvering this appointment, the thirty-hour-week bill came up for action in the Senate and was passed over on objection by Senator Vandenberg. In the column adjoining the Hushing item appears an article on the thirty-hour bill, but no mention is made therein of how the federation's lobby flubbed its opportunity to carry out the A. F. of L. convention mandate to press this bill.

I Was an Editor in Germany II. "Fire in the Reichstag!"

By FRANZ HOLLERING

AFTER I was forced out of the editorship of the Ullstein Berliner Zeitung am Mittag in December, 1931, I served as American correspondent for the Ullstein papers for a year. On January 4, 1933, I returned to Germany and became editor of the daily 12 Uhr Blatt and the weekly Montag Morgen, both smaller left-democratic journals. As it happened, I started to work on January 30, the day Hitler came into power. The very first news item laid on my desk was a solemn declaration by Dr. Frick, the new Minister of the Interior, that in the Third Reich the freedom of the press would be inviolate. From that time on all official statements bore a similar relation to the truth.

Hitler dissolved the Reichstag and in "accordance with the constitution" called new elections for March 5. Things seemed to run smoothly, and many good people made fun of those who continued to distrust Hitler.

The 12 Uhr Blatt was a morning paper, and therefore we worked at night. We soon realized that the Nazi regime also worked mainly at night—and at other things than torchlight demonstrations. Every hour brought stories of shootings in working-class districts, of motor-cyclists whizzing through the streets firing into windows, of armed gangs storming the beer halls that were the election headquarters of the workers' parties. The police and the Red Cross always arrived too late. The official press regularly proclaimed "Inhuman Communist Atrocities," whereas our objective and non-partisan reporters night after night piled up evidence that the attacks were made by Storm Troopers in civilian clothes. It was difficult to prove the truth, for the police were already covering up the tracks of the murderers and no longer gave out any information. Only indirectly, by describing all the incriminating circumstances of an attack, was it possible to hint at the truth. And the truth was that the terror was organized by Chancellor Hitler himself. Meanwhile, in the daytime, the official election campaign was being waged more and more furiously. Shock troops were sent to the assemblies of the opposition parties. They shouted down Brüning and wounded Stegerwald, his former Minister of Labor. Workers' meetings were broken up and their quarters demolished.

The attempt of the 12 Uhr Blatt to report news objectively did not escape Goebbels's attention. In the Angriff I found myself mentioned in a list of radical journalists under the heading "Intellectual Murderers." In those days one learned to read and to write between the lines. I changed my address.

In spite of the terror the election prospects throughout the country were that Hitler could not win the majority he wanted, much less the two-thirds' majority required to change the constitution. That, however, was his goal, and it was to be expected that he would stop at nothing to achieve it. He had already forbidden, on the flimsiest pretext, the election posters and meetings of the labor parties. A week before election open propaganda against the Nazis had ceased. The Storm Troopers dominated the streets. There was danger that the use of force might turn the voters against the regime. Yet it was obvious that desperate measures must be taken if the Chancellor was to have the legal cloak he needed for the violation of the constitution.

The editorial in Montag Morgen of February 26, 1933—the last I wrote in Germany—began: "Unless something unforeseen happens, the Chancellor cannot win the election." An analysis of the probable election returns followed, and in conclusion came the statement that nothing unforeseen could happen because Hitler had not only taken the oath to abide by the constitution but had promised on innumerable occasions to govern "legally." As I intended, the article was misunderstood by the overworked censor, who interpreted it as a pro-Hitler statement. But the readers of the Montag Morgen, definitely an intellectual journal, understood very well. They even thought that the writer knew what the "unforeseen" circumstances might be, and the telephone rang incessantly. They were wrong; I had not the slightest idea of the nature of the desperate device the Nazis would use to break all opposition—though at the very moment there was a story on my desk which might have given me a clue.

The story was by a reporter who had covered a house-warming given by the well-known clairvoyant Erik Hanussen. Hanussen was a Moravian Jew whose real name was Steinschneider. He passed for a Danish nobleman and was on intimate terms with the Storm Troop leader Ernst (murdered by Hitler on June 30, 1934) and Count Helldorf, the present chief of police of Berlin, both of whom he supported out of his large earnings. He had begun his career as a clairvoyant while he was in the trenches by persuading the mail clerk to let him read the soldiers' letters from home before they were delivered. No wonder he could inform the captain that back in Vienna his wife had given birth to a healthy seven-pound boy! Before long Hanussen exchanged the front trenches for headquarters, where he entertained the officers with his gifts. After the war he led a fantastic life as itinerant magician in the Balkans. Then he hit on the idea of giving his hocus-pocus a scientific disguise, and his star rose on the German vaudeville stage. Hanussen made the most of the moment. He backed his business with an occult magazine which was printed by the same press as the Montag Morgen and the 12 Uhr Blatt. That was how we knew of his connections with the National Socialists and had been able to gain admission to his house-warming.

My working hours were from 5 p.m. to 5 a.m., with time out for dinner between nine and ten. On February 27 the constant nervous strain under which every radical worked in those days had exhausted me, and instead of going out I decided to take an hour's nap in the office. I made myself as comfortable as I could on two armchairs and was dozing off when a telephone conversation in the next room roused me. "Fire in the Reichstag," a reporter shouted. A short circuit, I decided, and turned over. A second alarm sounded, a third, a fourth, a fifth! I jumped up. The Reichstag was going up in flames. The "unforeseen" had happened.

Fifteen minutes later, after the rush in handling the sensational news was over, I sat down at the telephone and began warning friends. Suddenly—it was a little after half-past nine—Hanussen, the clairvoyant, was on the wire.

"How much of a fire is there at the Reichstag?" he asked.

"Where are you calling from?"

"From my apartment." His apartment was miles away from the Reichstag.

"How did you find out about the fire?"

There was a second's pause, then Hanussen said: "As a matter of fact, I wanted to speak to the business manager. I want to warn you all. Be on your guard tonight. No one knows what may happen. The Communists have set fire to the Reichstag."

"The Communists? Ridiculous! They wouldn't dream of it. They don't want to commit suicide. Their policy—"

"Wait and see! And better be careful."

He hung up. The story of his house-warming flashed into my mind. The intimate of the Nazis had seen "flames" in a trance. They had now become real.

The first official statement concerning the fire blamed a gang of incendiaries, who had supposedly been pursued and shot at. But all except Van der Lubbe had disappeared without a trace. Then came a second statement which spoke of a Communist conspiracy and of conclusive evidence that Social Democrats were implicated. Two Socialist journalists, generally known as entirely harmless citizens, had been arrested. New versions of the fire came in hourly. The latest invariably contradicted all the rest. Obviously someone was hard at work making up these statements.

At eleven o'clock I wrote an editorial telling the truth: all the evidence indicated that the Nazis had set fire to the Reichstag. At midnight I threw this manuscript into the wastebasket. I wrote another, a more cautious editorial, and then another. None of them would do. It was plain that from now on not a word of truth could appear in print. News had already reached me that the few proletarian papers which had survived so far no longer existed. The current issues had been confiscated at the printing presses, the editors arrested. A night of terror, unbroken since that hour, had descended upon Germany.

My assistant smiled ironically at my attempts to give the truth a guise in which it would escape censorship. (I had suspected from the very first that this man was a Nazi, and later I learned that the owner of the paper had hired him just to be on the safe side.) Finally he came to me with the proof of the headline "Madman Sets Fire to the Reichstag," and quite sensibly he asked whether it wasn't I who had gone mad. For the headline was a flat contradiction of the official position that the Reichstag had been fired by the left parties. It would mean the end of the paper, it would cost a hundred persons their jobs, and moreover it would never get out into the street.

The dead line was getting closer and closer. Reports of the suppression and confiscation of various publications kept pouring in. I edited the articles of the terrorized reporters, trying to make them more objective. But what worried me was the front-page headline and how we might tell the real story. The make-up man stood over me demanding copy. Finally I gave him the government statements to set up, directing him to put the most flagrant inconsistencies in larger type. Not till the last second, with the whole staff waiting, did I see the way out. Headline: "The Reichstag Fire." Subhead: "Official Reports of the Prussian Government News Service." Then an entire page of these reports, and not another word! That page was a huge tangle of lies—taken directly from official sources. Any child would understand: the government lies! Any child would know why.

For an hour we waited anxiously. Would the paper escape suppression? It did. Goebbels had not yet perfected his machinery to the point of censoring Hitler and Göring.

Toward the end of the election campaign the terror grew with each night. Two of our staff men were kidnapped by Storm Troopers. One was captured as he left the printer; the other was dragged out of his bed and beaten to a bloody pulp. Many journalists I knew vanished without leaving a trace. Foreign visitors, and even most of the people who lived in Berlin, suspected nothing. Terror organized on modern lines remains invisible.

The papers gave no inkling of what was really going on, although reports of kidnappings, beatings, murders were constantly coming in. We sent these reports to newspapers in Prague and Vienna, but they were not used. Why not? Because they were not believed—not yet!

Only in the office itself did we now feel safe. Goebbels had forbidden violence in newspaper offices in order not to arouse our friends, the foreign correspondents. The most difficult thing for us was to evade the Storm Troopers who lay in ambush on the way from the printer, and to find places of refuge after work. With caution, tricks, money, and the technique acquired during and after the war, we managed it for a while, always going criss-cross through the city, changing conveyances unexpectedly, and sleeping in a different place every day. But what was the good of enduring all this torment? There was no longer anything one could do. Passive resistance had lost all meaning. What was the use of printing covert, ambiguous little statements in the face of the greatest crime in modern history?

On Friday, March 3, I escaped a visit from the Gestapo. On the morning of the election, March 5, 1933, a friendly representative of a foreign power informed me that a warrant for my arrest had been issued. I had to leave Berlin. But where could I go? Every train, every automobile going across the border, was inspected. After a day of aimless wandering in the streets of Berlin I took a local train to Dresden, and at two-thirty at night I crossed the German border into Czecho-Slovakia by a route that is still used by refugees.

On the day of my flight the 12 Uhr Blatt was suspended, to reappear only when the owners had completely capitulated. Montag Morgen was later suppressed altogether.

Erik Hanussen was murdered by Storm Troopers two weeks after the burning of the Reichstag. His body was found in the woods near Berlin. His head was almost shot off. The clairvoyant had foreseen many things, but like the rest of us, not enough.

[This is the second of two articles by Franz Höllering. The first appeared last week.]

Correspondence

Share-Cropper Misery and Hope

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

A blizzard out of the Northwest brings suffering to hundreds of destitute and homeless share-croppers who have been evicted from the land because of membership in the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union. All the families on one plantation—more than a hundred persons, including twenty-eight small children and three infants—were evicted because they were members of a union which sought to make the landlord settle his account with them. With only $16 among them, after a year's grinding toil in the cotton fields, in which they averaged nearly a bale of cotton to the acre, they had not sufficient food, bedding, or clothes. Blacklisted by the planters, none of them have been able to settle in other places. They were not even permitted to gather firewood from any of the nearby plantations.

The struggles of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union against the domination of the landlords and planters in Arkansas and other states of the South and Southwest have aroused the determined opposition of the plantation interests. Mass evictions of tenants who are members of the union are taking place on numerous plantations. Union meetings have been broken up by planters and officers of the law, while men, women, and children have been kicked and flogged, shot, arrested, and jailed.

Howard Kester, union organizer and secretary of the Central Defense Committee of the union, was dragged from a Methodist church near Earle, Arkansas, on January 18 as he attempted to address a meeting of 450 white and Negro share-croppers. Kester was accompanied by H. I. Goldberger, union attorney. Both were threatened and driven from town. The church was practically wrecked as the mob of planters slugged share-croppers with ax handles and billies and brandished pistols over their heads. All of the windows of the church were broken. Women as well as men were attacked.

Two Negro share-croppers were shot by deputy sheriffs as they were returning home from a union meeting which had been raided and broken up by another mob. No arrests of planters' thugs have been made and none are expected by the union, as the officers are in league with the plantation interests and have sworn to stop the union "with Winchester rifles if necessary." The mob which took Kester from the church near Earle warned him not to return on pain of death and announced that if "the union doesn't stop disturbing our labor there's going to be another Elaine massacre."

The union has grown within a year from a membership of a few hundred to more than 25,000. Despite the terror which has broken out anew in Crittenden County, new locals are being organized each day. After the meeting at Earle was broken up the organizers took in about twenty-five new members. One of the men who joined last night said, "We know the union is all right now, for the big bosses is trying to bust it up." Despite eviction and terror the union members throughout this area are standing firm. Scores trekked through the swamps and over the muddy plantation roads to come to Memphis today to pledge their faith and loyalty to the union.

The union needs funds to fight its legal battles, and for food, clothing, and shelter. Contributions should be sent to H. L. Mitchell, secretary, Box 5215, Memphis, Tennessee, or to John Herling, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York.

Memphis, Tenn., January 18

H. L. MITCHELL,

Executive Secretary

HOWARD KESTER,

Secretary, Central Defense Committee

A New Law for Privacy

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The article The Lindberghs Leave, by Oswald Garrison Villard, in The Nation of January 8 impressed me with the pitiful inadequacy of our laws in protecting an individual's right of privacy. The statute of New York State (Civil Rights Law, Article 5, Sections 50, 51) provides that a person, firm, or corporation that uses for advertising purposes or for the purposes of trade the name, portrait, or picture of any living person without having first obtained the written consent of such person, or if a minor of his or her parent or guardian, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and an action in the civil courts may be maintained for an injunction and damages.

I would recommend to the legislatures of every state that a statutory provision be made in the penal law or criminal code to the effect that any person, firm, or corporation that prints, publishes, edits, or knowingly circulates, sells, distributes, or publicly displays any book, paper, document, or written or printed matter in any form containing the photograph, portrait, or picture of any living person under the age of twenty-one years, without having first obtained the written consent of his or her parent or guardian, or the consent of the police authorities, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Such a statute would promptly discourage the Mephistophiles of journalism (see The Nation, August 17, 1918) and his cohorts in their nefarious activities.

New York, January 6

LOUIS MARDER

A Threat to Workers' Schools

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The workers' schools on the Pacific Coast are threatened with fascist destruction. In Seattle on January 7 legionnaires raided the School of Social Science. In Los Angeles on January 17, the Los Angeles Workers' School was threatened by the Hearst Examiner and the anti-labor Times. The article in the Examiner appeared on the front page under big headlines: "L. A. Red College Revealed." On the following day both papers carried editorials. The one in the Times was labeled "Legal Treason" and that in the Examiner "Colleges of Crime." The Examiner stated: "We do not wait until this or that insect pest gets an upper hand before taking steps to stamp it out. We know that it would then be too late. We should be as immediately active in suppressing those colleges of crime in which young Americans are being taught disloyalty to the institutions of their country."

Los Angeles, January 21

MIRIAM BONNER, Director,
Los Angeles Workers' School

Anne Douglas Sedgwick

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

I am preparing for publication a collection of the letters of the late Anne Douglas Sedgwick (Mrs. Basil de Selincourt). I shall be greatly obliged if persons possessing letters from her will send them to me for consideration for this purpose. Copies of such letters as are desired for inclusion in the proposed book will be taken and the originals returned promptly to their owners. Letters should be addressed to Far End, Kingham, Oxon, England.

Boston, January 15

BASIL DE SELINCOURT

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

TWO EXCITING and TIMELY BOOKS

Out Of The Night

A BIOLOGIST'S VIEW OF THE FUTURE

By H. J. MULLER

Professor of Zoology, University of Texas, now serving as Senior Geneticist at the Institute of Genetics, Academy of Sciences, Moscow.

● Are children to be produced by the artificial insemination of women with the seed of the outstanding men of the race—twenty-five years after the death of these men?

Concerning Government Benefits

By JACOB BAKER

Assistant Administrator, F.E.R.A., C.W.A., W.P.A.

● This book attacks, from a novel and fundamental point of view, the most pressing and immediate problem of today: who is to receive government benefits—and why?

$1.50 each. At All Bookstores • THE VANGUARD PRESS, 424 MADISON AVE., N. Y. C.

SAFEGUARD PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL

Bank credit deflected from production of goods and employment of labor by recurrently inflating ground rent and heavy taxation.—Credit thus piles up abnormally.—Interest rates fall and credit goes into stock speculation.—Real issue today is productive capitalism vs. finance capitalism.—Can be dealt with only by transferring taxation from industry and improvements to ground values.—No exploitation of labor by capital in absence of ground monopoly.

Minneapolis Tribune: "A sensible suggestion at a time when big business and small business as well is crying for relief from heavy taxation. . . . Seems to fit the picture of what industry needs today."

A new approach to the business problem, by LOUIS WALLIS, author of "The Struggle for Justice" and other volumes dealing with economic forces in world history.

75¢

All booksellers

Published by DOUBLEDAY, DORAN, Garden City, N. Y.

Labor and Industry

Starving on Relief

By ISIDOR FEINSTEIN

THE President is in a fighting mood these days. He trounced the Tories at Atlanta. He trounced the Tories in his annual message. He trounced the Tories at the Jackson Day dinner. Nevertheless, the poor Tories, though trounced, continue to be well fed. As much cannot be said of the unemployed.

At Atlanta Mr. Roosevelt thought it "of interest to point out that national surveys prove that the average of our citizenship lives today on what would be called by the medical fraternity a third-class diet. If the country lived on a second-class diet we would need to put many more acres than we use today back into the production of foodstuffs for domestic consumption. If the nation lived on a first-class diet we would have to put more acres than we ever cultivated into the production of an additional supply of things for Americans to eat. Why, speaking in broad terms in following up this particular illustration, are we living on a third-class diet? For the very simple reason that the masses of the American people have not got the purchasing power to eat more and better food." Speaking in narrow terms it might also be said that millions of Americans are living on a third-, fourth-, and fifth-class diet because Mr. Roosevelt—for all his Tory-trouncing—insists on cutting relief.

Mr. Roosevelt grew even more eloquent on the subject in his annual message to Congress. "Shall we say," he asked, "to the several millions of unemployed citizens who face the very problem of existence—yes, of getting enough to eat: 'We will withdraw from giving you work, we will turn you back to the charity of your communities and to those men of selfish power who tell you that perhaps they will employ you if the government leaves them strictly alone?'" The answer is that it has now been Mr. Roosevelt's policy for some time to get the federal government out of relief as quickly as possible and in fact to turn "several millions of unemployed citizens who face the very problem of existence—yes, of getting enough to eat"—back on the charity of their communities.

While the President at Atlanta was denouncing "gentlemen in well-warmed and well-stocked clubs" and spreading himself on the subject of third-class diets, relief administrators in the District of Columbia cut families on relief down to a fourth-class diet. An order was issued reducing all relief allowances 25 per cent. The Washington, D. C., average will now be $22.50 a month per family. At about the same time, too, Secretary Wallace was asking in a radio speech, "How can you feed and clothe and maintain the health of a family of four or five properly on $15 or $20 a week?" "The answer," Secretary Wallace said, "is that you can't." District of Columbia jobless may find it difficult to appreciate the unconscious humor in this or in the fact that in November, when the federal government began to cut relief, a New York Times tabulation showed that dividends reached their highest total since June, 1931.

The condition of the unemployed is of little interest to the larger part of the American press. A small group of liberal papers pays some attention to their problems. The Hearst press supplies us with such stories as the recent one published in the New York American under the heading, "Give Us More! More! Demand Those on Relief; Mostly Foreigners, Says Bullard." The rest is silence. But from stray items and from the Federated Press, a labor news service, it is possible to put together a picture of the plight of those on the relief rolls.

Here are some glimpses of relief conditions in the country, covering conditions during the past few months:

Allentown, Pennsylvania. Members of the Inter-County Unemployed and Works Division will not dine on turkey Thanksgiving day—or even corned beef; they will be on picket duty all week before local relief offices in Berks, Lehigh, Lancaster, and York counties, protesting against the discontinuance of relief.

Austin, Texas. So many people were thrown off relief last fall "to pick cotton," and never reinstated, that C. E. Wayman, district WPA administrator, complains there are not enough employables left on the rolls to carry on county highway improvements with full man power.

New York City. "Everybody will have a Thanksgiving dinner," the Emergency Relief Bureau announced, but Thanksgiving came and went and everybody didn't. Among those who didn't were the 100,000 human beings represented by 28,000 piled-up relief applications which the bureau's overworked staff has not yet had time to investigate.

Boston (AP). A complaint that payment of a "coolie" wage by the WPA was directly responsible for lowering wage scales of professional and technical workers in and near Boston was made to the state WPA today. A complete investigation was asked, six specific cases being named of alleged "chiseling" among private employers using the WPA wage scale as an excuse for reducing wages.

Phoenix, Arizona. Two more workers have been deported to Mexico as an aftermath of a Phoenix relief workers' strike when police and thugs charged pickets with clubs and tear gas, injuring fifty. The two men, José Flores and José P. Barcenas, who bring the total number of deportees to seven, were charged with being Communists. Felony charges are still standing against twenty workers who participated in the strike.

Newport, Kentucky (UP). Enraged because they had not been paid, 200 WPA workers raided a federal relief warehouse here today and seized 100 bags of flour and other articles before they were dispersed by police.

New Orleans (FP). The tapering-off process preparatory to "quitting this business of relief" is already bearing fruit in New Orleans. Eva Killian, twenty-nine, was declared by physicians to be starving to death when brought by an ambulance to a charity hospital here. She had been living on coffee and bread. A child who fainted at school was found to have been without food for twenty-six hours. A woman and four children were found hiding in an empty house. An aged woman and her fourteen-year-old granddaughter, found rummaging in the scrap heaps behind grocery stores, are but two of hundreds engaged in similar searches.

Chicago (FP). Single men on relief will not have to starve and freeze this winter, the emergency relief commission announces. They will have a chance to enter work camps. "In return for their work they receive sustenance plus one dollar a week in wages," the announcement says.

Newburgh, New York (Special to the New York Herald Tribune). About 300 WPA employees who have received no pay since December 14 assembled this morning at the City Hall to see what was wrong. They received only about half the pay they expected on December 14.

Vancouver, Washington (FP). A decision that WPA workers are not relief recipients or indigents has been handed down by Washington WPA officials. While at first sight the decision would seem to be in favor of the workers, the real effect of the ruling is to deprive the WPA workers of free medicine, medical aid, and hospital service from the county. The workers are supposed to furnish these items from their meager WPA wages, "just the same as other wage-earners do."

Austin, Texas (FP). Texas relief clients face the prospect of living on half-rations until February. After February there may be no rations at all. County relief administrators have received $375,000 for December, and the state is asking for $500,000 more in federal funds to keep relief up even to its customarily low Southern level. There is little prospect that the added amount will be forthcoming. No provision for the continuance of the state relief system in any form after February was made at the recent legislative session.

Des Moines, Iowa (FP). Calling the $40 a month paid WPA workers in sixty-six of Iowa's ninety-nine counties a "starvation wage," 300 labor and unemployed delegates, meeting under the chairmanship of President J. C. Lewis of the state federation of labor, called for a state-wide strike January 2 for the prevailing scale of wages. The strike would affect nearly 30,000 workers.

Toledo (FP). The relief crisis is acute in Toledo, as funds appropriated by the state legislature face exhaustion before the middle of the month. Wholesalers have announced they will cut off credit for relief supplies.

Sioux Falls, South Dakota (FP). When South Dakota WPA workers recently demanded increases in wages which were frequently lower than direct relief had been, WPA Administrator M. A. Kennedy issued a statement charging them with "laziness" and threatening arrests. A week later he was all smiles and good-will as he announced an average raise of $8 a month. What changed his tune was that the Workers' Alliance lined up the trade unions, the Sioux Falls Ministerial Association, and various civic groups in support of the jobless, and Kennedy quickly found it possible to get South Dakota raised from a Class 2 to a Class 1 state, thus bringing in the higher wage scale.

Boston (FP). Unless the "relief-roll-preferential" system of hiring is abolished, members of local unions affiliated with the Boston Building Trades Council will be barred from transferring from ERA and WPA projects to contract work. The move is designed to protect the incomes of building-trades workers not on relief rolls.

St. Louis (FP). WPA workers, already harassed by the difficulties of providing food and clothing for their families on $55 a month, are facing the prospect of living in the damp cellars of the city's most run-down buildings. The city's real-estate exchange, in a move almost tantamount to boycott, has advised its members not to lease property to WPA workers on the ground that their wages do not permit their paying rent.

Globe, Arizona (FP). Ten cents a day for food, clothing, and shelter; this is what Arizona's December allocation of $2,294 for relief in Gila County works out to when divided among 700 persons on the dole. The end of federal relief is causing untold misery.

And now one last look at what has been going on in the President's own backyard while he has been trouncing the Tories:

Washington (FP). With relief cut 25 per cent on account of stoppage of federal funds, slow starvation is already gripping many jobless in the District of Columbia, case workers report. One relief office has received three letters in a week from clinic doctors who say that relief patients sent to them don't need medicine, "they need food."

Leroy Halbert, District relief statistician, estimates that of 14,984 persons certified for WPA jobs, 2,500 will receive less each month on the "security wage" than they have been getting on direct relief.

Facts for Consumers

BEFORE the Seventy-fourth Congress reconvened, the food-and-drug bill was reported to be on the "must" calendar. Now the rumor is current that no action will be taken on it. Representative Virgil Chapman, chairman of the subcommittee to which the bill has been referred, has been quoted in the trade press as saying that he is too busy to consider food-and-drug legislation. Speaker Byrnes wants to limit the calendar to "urgent" bills, and does not consider the food-and-drug measure in that category. The powerful Proprietary Association is of course lobbying for the passage of the bill in its present amended and emasculated form and may be able to exert sufficient pressure to bring it out of committee. Except for a few diehards, leaders in the affected industries would like to see the bill passed in the hope that the public's interest in food-and-drug legislation would then subside. Whether it may not be to the best interest of consumers to let the present bill die in committee, and to make food-and-drug legislation a campaign issue, is being seriously discussed in many quarters. The Consumer, official publication of the Consumers' Division, devotes several pages of its current issue to an unfavorable article on the bill, and the Journal of the American Medical Association points out editorially that "legislation should be enacted in a form better designed for the protection of the consumer." The bill's proponents maintain that even in its present form it is better than the old Wiley act. The next move is up to Representative Chapman and his committee.

ATHREE-COLUMN advertisement in the New York Times of Pro-Ker—the "latest achievement" of Charles Nessler, inventor of the permanent wave—is another example of the advertising copywriter's art. Two months ago Pro-Ker entered into a stipulation with the Federal Trade Commission that it would stop "representing that the preparation is a competent treatment for baldness or any other hair troubles, and that it will replace falling hair or retain the amount of hair on the head at the time the use of the product is begun. It will no longer be advertised that this product makes the scalp vital, healthy, or strong and creates the perfect hair-growing condition." A skilful copywriter is not daunted even by such an apparently inclusive stipulation. The agreement provides that Pro-Ker shall not be advertised as a "competent treatment." The new advertising claims only that "the Pro-Ker treatment helps [italics mine] retain at least the amount of hair you now have. It will help you bring your scalp back to normal. . . . Any other promises are simply misleading. Intelligent people cannot accept them." The Bureau of Investigation of the American Medical Association writes that although it has made no thorough analysis of this product its laboratory made some tests of Pro-Ker in 1934 and found it "essentially a soap solution possessing an odor resembling tar. There is of course nothing wonderful about such a mixture."

* * *

WORK done by the Food and Drug Administration during the past month includes seizures of unclean butter shipped by Swift and Company and Jerpe Dairy Products Corporation; of unsanitary limburger cheese shipped by Badger Brodhead Cheese Company, Lakeshore Cheese Company, and Shefford Cheese Company; of chili powder shipped by Miller Brothers Company and of cocoa shipped by the Massachusetts Chocolate Company, both found to contain excessive lead and arsenic residue; and of wine contaminated with fluorine shipped by Coast Wineries.

Among the fines assessed in cases against drug manufacturers was one of $200 against the Upjohn Company. The Aconite Tincture Tablets manufactured by this company were found to possess a potency of only approximately 40 per cent of the amount stated on the label. There have been four previous seizures of Upjohn products and three prosecutions. The company is now reported to be making an effort to establish better control of production.

* * *

THE complaint about the activities of consumer cooperatives recently filed with the Milwaukee Association of Commerce by the local retail grocers' association is undoubtedly good news to all friends of consumer cooperation. Apparently the Milwaukee co-ops have grown so strong that tradesmen are now lining up to fight them. The two-million-dollar business reported by the cooperative Wisconsin Wholesale Food Distributors aroused the grocers to a realization that the consumer-cooperation movement is a real threat to their profits.

What may be even more significant news is the announcement by Edward A. Filene of his projected chain of consumer-cooperative department stores. Into his Consumer Distribution Corporation has already gone more than a year of planning; behind it is Filene's successful experience with credit unions and with retailing. As the founder of credit unions in the United States, Filene has already made a noteworthy contribution to the cooperative cause. Now he is turning to retailing, the business in which he amassed his fortune. Filene expects that his cooperative department stores will "eliminate the tremendous wastes of traditional merchandising" and show the way to enterprises which are operated for private profit. Consumer Distribution Corporation starts with a capital of $1,000,000. It will compete directly with large retail organizations and will make its bid for business on the sharing of profits with consumers and on the sale of consumer goods according to specifications and established grades. If the C. D. C. plans are carried through, we shall have the interesting experiment of a cooperative organized as a big business meeting private-profit institutions on their own ground.

RUTH BRINDZE

[Facts for Consumers appears every other week in The Nation. Miss Brindze cannot answer questions about the merits of individual products.]

The Labor Index

AIDED by seasonal factors, The Nation Index of Labor Welfare regained all of the previous month's losses in December and is once more 2.6 per cent above the 1932 average. The seasonal influence was noticeable primarily in an increase of 342,000 in the number of department-store employees, which more than offset a 0.4 per cent decline in factory employment. Total pay rolls in the manufacturing and non-manufacturing industries were up $13,300,000, bringing the average weekly wage to a new high of $22.47. For the fifth consecutive month the National Industrial Conference Board reported a sharp increase in the cost of living, raising the index 8.7 per cent above the 1932 level. According to the more conservative estimates of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the cost of living was 3.3 per cent above that of December of a year ago, as against a 7 per cent increase in weekly wages. Real wages for employed workers were 2.8 per cent over the 1932 level, but 15 per cent below that of 1929.

THE CHART OF LABOR WELFARE
(Average 1932 = 100)

As an illustration of the difficulty of obtaining accurate statistics in the field of labor welfare we cite the varying estimates of unemployment made by different organizations for the month of November:

The National Industrial Conference Board	9,177,000
Government Committee on Economic Security (September, 1935)	10,915,000
The American Federation of Labor	11,672,187
National Research League	14,175,000
Labor Research Association	17,029,000

Taking the revised A. F. of L. estimates as a criterion, we find that a 50 per cent increase in industrial activity since 1932 has brought a decrease in unemployment of only 11 per cent.

Preliminary figures for December for the various items entering into The Nation Index, together with revised figures for November, follow:

(Average 1932 = 100)

	Dec., 1935	Nov., 1935	Dec., 1934
Industrial Production	150*	151	120
Average Weekly Wages	110*	107.9†	103
Cost of Living	107*	106.4	103.7
Real Wages	102.8*	101.4†	99.3
Unemployment	89*	91	94
Index of Labor Welfare	102.6*	100.8†	98.1

* Preliminary. † Revised.

"LIKE VINCENT SHEEAN, she is a journalist who takes sides, once the evidence has indicated to her where the justice probably lies. . . . She has written a book to be read along with Lincoln Steffens' Autobiography and the other great documents of liberal America."—John Chamberlain, New York Times.

"SHE HAS WRITTEN a book of reminiscences that will bring a deep nostalgia to the hearts of many people who, at the beginning of the century, were awake and alive to the stirring and growth of that thing glibly labeled by this generation as social consciousness. Thirty years of change and reform and rebellion are encompassed in these pages. A stirring pageant of brilliant individualists. Each name leaps out of her book with fire and meaning. Written with anger, with indignation, with laughter and with color. The document of a rebellious mind and of an era of rebellious minds . . . a contribution to American social and labor history."—Rose Feld, Minneapolis Journal.

"IT SEEMS INCREDIBLE that one woman could see and do so much in ten years. . . . It is a picture, a record, vivid and shrewd, of ten world-shaking years. It is a book that ought to be put in the hands of every complacent middle-class man and especially woman in the country. . . . A Footnote to Folly is sometimes breathtaking, but it is consistently illuminating."—Granville Hicks, New Masses.

"IT IS INEVITABLE that A Footnote to Folly, being in essence one of the great pleas, packed with tenderness and a quiet bitterness like sugar and vinegar, for decency toward the weak and justice for the strong, should also turn out to be one of the most powerful documents against war of our time, a kind of children's All Quiet on the Western Front. . . . Is there anywhere in the world a monument to the Unknown Child? It is here, a bit of sculpture in prose done by Mary Vorse, and underneath it are chiseled the words A Footnote to Folly."—Harold E. Stearns, The Nation.

One of the most enthusiastically reviewed books of the year

A Footnote to Folly

REMINISCENCES OF
Mary Heaton Vorse

For sale at your bookseller, or use the attached coupon.

FARRAR & RINEHART
232 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK

"IT WASN'T any sacrifice to Mary Vorse to dedicate herself to labor; she liked it. It made her feel more alive. Her book communicates that life."—Lewis Gannett, New York Herald Tribune.

"FEW WIVES AND mothers of her day have seen so much of the world as Mary Heaton Vorse. Few men or women have a better right than she to consider her reminiscences of an active life a footnote to the history of her time."—Time.

"IN THIS RICH, stirring autobiography Mrs. Vorse, who was so intimately a member of it, writes of the generation which fought for social change in the early decades of the century. One feels, reading this colorful, warmly human book, that Mrs. Vorse has lived twice as hard and twice as intensely as the average person."—The Forum.

"IT IS A LIVING record, a veritable footnote to history, and the companion volume to the Autobiography of Lincoln Steffens."—Durham, Herald-Sun.

"ONE OF THE NOTABLE pieces of autobiographical writing by an American woman. With her gift of languages (she speaks five) and of writing she was sent to 'cover' the great dramas of the decade. . . . She has put the life and color of her assignments into this book."

—Saturday Review of Literature.

"ONE OF THE MOST effective pleas of our time for sanity in industrial and international relations."—Birmingham News-Age-Herald.

SPECIAL OFFER TO READERS OF THE NATION! So sure are we that you will enjoy reading this book that we are anxious to send it to you on approval for one week. Clip and mail coupon. SEND NO MONEY.

FARRAR & RINEHART
232 Madison Ave., N. Y.

Please send me a copy of A FOOTNOTE TO FOLLY. I will pay the postman $3.00 plus a few cents postage. (Post free if you remit with coupon.) You will refund the purchase price if I return the book within one week.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Midwinter Book Section

"He Belongs to the Past"

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THERE is one phrase which seems to fall with peculiar ease from the pen of the contemporary critic: "He belongs to the past." Sometimes, to be sure, this phrase indicates no more than a political disapproval. The author thus relegated has no significance in relation to certain of the critic's burning convictions, and it is convenient to dispose of him thus without being compelled to deny absolutely those qualities responsible for the esteem in which he was held. But though this sort of dismissal is both frequent and exasperating, it is not precisely the sort I have now in mind. More purely literary schools and sub-schools come and go with vertiginous rapidity. Sometimes, indeed, they hardly achieve any existence outside the minds of their members and of a few cliquish commentators who discover a new "tendency," enthusiastically chronicle its development, and then announce its exhaustion before most members of even the more distinctly literary public are aware of its existence. Yet any one of them is used with all seriousness as a point of reference, not only in portentous literary criticism, but in the very book reviews which solemnly "date" yesterday's novel with reference to the novel of the day before.

There is even something a little absurd about gravely classifying a novel as "pre-Hemingway" or "post-Hemingway," or in declaring that "Erskine Caldwell has made it impossible any longer to write in this fashion about tenant farmers." To say anything of the sort is to give at once too much credit and too little to Messrs. Hemingway and Caldwell—too much because it exaggerates their power to impose a norm upon our persistently variable sensibilities, too little because it is inevitably preparing the way for the not distant moment when some other more or less original writer will be hailed as having closed their day.

Mr. Caldwell and Mr. Hemingway are worthy of admiration, not because they mark epochs and supersede all previous imaginative formulations of certain areas of experience and sensibility, but because their own particular formulations are to some extent original and convincing. Even the appearance of Mr. Eliot's "Waste Land" or Mr. Joyce's "Ulysses" did not correspond to a crisis in human sensibility of sufficient magnitude to justify us in speaking of the times before and after their publication as we speak of the Renaissance or the Middle Ages. But neither, on the other hand, did Mr. Joyce, for instance, become a mere historical curiosity when M. Malraux began to write.

Surely few novelists have ever been regarded as more "important" by their cult than Mr. Joyce, and yet only recently I saw him referred to by a generally perceptive and distinctly "advanced" critic as worthy of honor because "he summed up an epoch" now past—as though, of course, he could no longer have anything really pertinent to say for the new generation and was from now on to be regarded as an imposing historical monument about as "modern" as Boethius and somewhat less so than the author of "Piers Plowman," who, by virtue of the fact that he spoke with compassion of the economically unfortunate, somehow anticipated a sentiment which, except in very rare instances, was not felt by any writer who lived longer ago than the day before yesterday.

When a certain very young but "promising" essayist collected in the slender volume which he derisively denominated "The Works of Max Beerbohm" those seven brief pieces which constituted his output up to the moment of publication, he concluded the intentionally slender claim to fame with a farewell discourse called Diminuendo, and toward the end of it he bowed his head to those enthusiasts of his own day who also loved to close epochs as though they were doors:

I shall write no more. Already I feel myself to be a trifle outmoded. I belong to the Beardsley period. Younger men, with months of activity before them, with fresher schemes and notions, with newer enthusiasms, have pressed forward since then. Credo junioribus. Indeed, I stand aside with no regret. For to be outmoded is to be a classic, if one has written well.

Nowadays it behooves writers to take with something like real seriousness the attitude which Mr. Beerbohm took with his dandiacal tongue in his fresh young cheek. We use up our authors with reckless rapidity, and we should certainly be most of the time without a genius to admire if it were not for the fact that we canonize as readily as we relegate to limbo. And there is one precious consolation enjoyed by the author of "The Works" which is denied to those of our contemporaries who, like him, no longer have "months of activity before them." To be outmoded is not now to be a classic. It is merely to be "historically interesting," to "sum up an epoch" (of perhaps six months' duration). And the best that the discoverer of last year's new literary form can hope for is to hear himself referred to as a writer as interesting as it is possible for any pre-somebody-else novelist, or poet, or playwright to be.

Doubtless those commentators who divide and subdivide recent literature into a score of compartments, discovering semi-annual turning-points and gravely deciding that a certain writer was indubitably great five years ago but is now separated from the present by an unbridgeable gap of time, get some sense that they are magnifying the importance of the material with which they are dealing and give themselves the illusion that they are actually doing what every critic would like to do—namely, exercise his powers continuously upon works of real importance. But in actual fact the effect of their attitude is not only to render the highest rank which they ever bestow ridiculously ephemeral, and the effective life of a genius like the effective life of a may-fly; it is also to render trivial the whole enterprise of literature by depriving it of one of its fundamental assumptions—the assumption, that is, that human intelligence and human feeling are characterized by a continuity in virtue of which it is possible for a man to say something which will continue to seem to the point some centuries, let alone some months, after it was said.

Consequently, there is a fundamental contradiction in

A NEW BOOK BY KAY BOYLE

The White Horses of Vienna

Here is Style, as Clifton Fadiman remarked after reading Kay Boyle's most recent novel, "My Next Bride." But here is also a richly varied collection of short stories that reveals the power and admirable skill of Kay Boyle as a prose writer.

The title story was awarded the O. Henry short story award for 1935. The other stories are:

Keep Your Pity, Life Being the Best, White as Snow, Count Lothar's Heart, Natives Don't Cry, Astronomer's Wife, Peter Foxe, Career, Convalescence, Rondo at Carraroe, Maiden Maiden, First Offense, Dear Mr. Walrus, Major Alshuster, Security, Your Body Is a Jewel Box, and Winter in Italy.

355 pages, $2.50

VILFREDO PARETO

The Mind and Society

4 vols., $20.00

HARRY ELMER BARNES

The History of Western Civilization

2 vols., $10.00

R. W. CHAMBERS

Thomas More

$3.75

BY L. M. NESBITT

Desolate Marches

An engineer's story of surveying a large tract of wilderness in Venezuela. Mr. Nesbitt's prose has been compared to that of W. H. Hudson by David Garnett in England; and in America the book has earned wide praise. "His pages sparkle with incident. . . . In addition to the gift for writing lovely prose, Nesbitt can re-create character. His story of the convict escaped from Devil's Island is unforgettable."—Harry Emerson Wildes. 2nd printing, $2.50

BY BONAMY DOBRÉE AND
G. E. MANWARING

The Floating Republic

An account of two great mutinies in the British Navy in 1797—a work of important research by two historians. "It should be given a prominent place on the shelves of any library that has a corner for a book dealing with maritime history."—Boston Transcript. $3.00

BY JAMES GOULD COZZENS

Men and Brethren

The distinguished new novel by the author of THE LAST ADAM. "Mr. Cozzens deserves almost special praise for creating a clergyman as real as Ernest . . . a brilliantly integrated and authentic characterization. . . . He is like somebody we know in life, a contradictory and rather insoluble figure. . . . By creating an indestructible human being Mr. Cozzens has proved himself not only a livelier but a better writer than those whose talents are forever out of breath trying to keep up with their pretensions."—Louis Kronenberger, The Nation.

2nd printing $2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY, 383 Madison Ave., New York

the belief that James Joyce was a really great writer five years ago and a mere monument to a past age today. He could not have been great then if he is not almost as great today. Men cannot be so very different from what they were a short time before. If they were, it would be not only literature which could not exist, for neither could society. The world keeps going by virtue of the fact that there is a good deal that is constant about the way men think and feel, about what they believe and want. The world changes. It may perhaps be changing with unusual rapidity today. But ninety-nine one-hundredths of anything significant said about it five years ago is significant today. Any author who really became outmoded so soon could only be an author concerned exclusively with the most insignificant ripples on the surface of human nature.

In the pages of The Nation itself I have seen estimates of still living writers the whole point of which was the demonstration that their "importance" consisted almost exclusively in their embodiment of attitudes now completely irrelevant to the concerns of more youthful men. But if this is really true, then either the writer discussed or the more youthful men must be of an almost inconceivable triviality. Of course, ideas, conceptions, and sensibilities are continuously modified by time, and of course it is very much worth while for any critic who is dealing with a writer not strictly contemporary to analyze those shades which distinguish him from newer talents. But if the man is worth talking about at all, then the most significant thing about him is that part which is still valid, and if nothing still valid exists he can never have been of any genuine significance whatever.

Let us test the statement that even the most outmoded writer who is interesting at all is interesting for something very nearly as pertinent as it ever was. Let us take, for example, Oscar Wilde, who certainly represents in its most extreme form the type of writer who is part of a temporary fashion. If one cared to do so one could analyze him exclusively in terms of what was false, cheap, and transitory. But one can also discover that he has things to say which are not only relevant today but relevant to the very discussion here pursued. "Fashion," he remarked, "is a form of ugliness so intolerable that we have to change it every six months." He was speaking, I presume, of hats and dresses, which we still do change every six months or oftener. But the remark is quite as applicable to fashions in literature and to those theories about art which have passed almost as frequently as fashions in clothes. Aesthetic doctrines of the sort which are vehemently preached as the truth at last by each newly modish school are merely forms of absurdity so intolerable that they also have to be changed every six months.

Kipling: Prophet of a Lost Frontier

By ALVIN JOHNSON

TO the youth of today Kipling is at most an artist of parts, a poet who is occasionally felicitous, a storyteller who is often thrilling. But to the youth of the late nineties Kipling was much more than this. He was the prophet of a new frontier, arriving just when the old frontier had disappeared in fact but not in the dreams and aspirations of the young.

More than two hundred years of a slowly receding frontier had stamped a definite character upon American youth. "Go West and grow up with the country" was an injunction dinned in the ears of every boy in every village. The majority went West only in their day dreams. Many were held back by lack of energy; many by satisfactory opportunities nearer home. But every county had its tales of young men who had gone West and had attained to wealth and power. Particularly in the communities that had grown up on a recent frontier, as in the prairie states, the yearning for an open West was intense. All through the country were men who had come empty-handed from the East or from Europe and now were owners of wide stretches of rich land, or had established a profitable business or an extensive legal or medical practice, developed from insignificance by the unearned increment of community growth.

The westering impulse was in the nervous mechanism of American youth, as the swarming impulse is in the nervous mechanism of the bee. Probably no generation felt this impulse more intensely than the youth of the late nineties. But the West had run out into the Pacific Ocean. Apparently there was nothing for the swarming youth to do but fly disconsolately around the old hive like bees without a queen to give impetus and direction to their flight.

Then Kipling appeared, to point out to American youth that the greater part of the world, though thickly occupied by dark-skinned peoples, was a majestic frontier for the expansion of the white race, particularly the English-speaking part of the race, with its alleged instinct for government and justice. Prior to the advent of Kipling, Americans had thought of British India and colonial possessions generally as nothing more than fields of exploitation for greedy imperialist nations. When they tried to picture to themselves the type of Englishmen who made up the imperial personnel, they summoned before their imagination Warren Hastings and his pirate crew, or Joseph Sedley, Collector of Boggley Wallah, or some more contemporaneous band of retired Indian civil servants, rich, fat, and choleric, with livers permanently gone bad. There was nothing in this sort of picture to tempt the young American who had dreamed of rich territories, vacant except for a few scattering Indian tribes who did nothing with the natural resources and therefore might justly be ordered to move on. It was a clean and moral life to which the young American looked forward and from which he hoped to grow rich—not the life of a gorging robber among a helpless native population.

Kipling changed the picture entirely. Imperial dominion as seen through Kipling's pages was characteristically the establishment of order where there had been villainous tyranny or bloody anarchy before. There were, indeed, occasional buccaneers, like the Man Who Would Be King, but even their greedy enterprises, if successful, would be followed by orderly government and strict justice, so far as justice

NEW

1936

BOOKS

*Ogden L.
MillsLIBERALISM FIGHTS ON

No spokesman for his group enjoys a higher standing than does Mr. Mills. Here are his recent articles and speeches on current problems. (Feb. 18)

$1.50

*William F.
RussellLIBERTY vs. EQUALITY

One of the most important figures in education seeks and finds the answers for most present issues in the field of "proper education." (Feb. 25)

$2.00

*ed. by William
J. PerlmanTHE MOVIES ON TRIAL

An offspring of the movement for cleaner movies, this volume contains the views and opinions of many prominent individuals. (Feb. 4)

$2.50

*Storm
JamesonIN THE SECOND YEAR

What happens when a nation goes Fascist? What if England or America follows Germany? Here is a vivid answer in fiction. (Feb. 18)

$2.50

*Charles WilliamsNEW BOOK of ENGLISH VERSE

Probably no man alive today has a wider knowledge of the field of poetry than has the editor of this carefully-arranged anthology.

$3.00

*Walter
LippmannINTERPRETATIONS
1933-1935

A collection of his famous editorial-essays on current events covering the most vital period in American history, from Roosevelt's inauguration to late 1935; edited by Allan Nevins.

$2.50

*Michael
J. FlorinskyFASCISM and NATIONAL SOCIALISM

A study of the economic and social policies of the totalitarian state; by an eminent historian, associate professor of history at Columbia University.

$2.50

*Edwin W.
KemmererMONEY:

Principles of Money and Their Exemplification in Outstanding Chapters of Monetary History.

$3.50

*Agnes Sligh
TurnbullTHE ROLLING YEARS

A rich, vivid, powerful novel of American life, with its background a Scotch farming section of Western Pennsylvania. (Feb. 4)

$2.50

*Phyllis
BentleyFREEDOM, FAREWELL!

The author of INHERITANCE presents a deep, stirring novel of Caesar's era, drawing a startling parallel with today's civic crises. (Feb. 25)

$2.50

At All Bookstores

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, NEW YORK

could be done where evidence is as dark as the witness's skin. Essentially, British imperialism was a moral enterprise. It was an imperative moral enterprise. The white man had no right to keep to himself his genius for government. He was morally bound to put it at the service of peoples not possessed of the true political instincts. To be sure, such peoples would not understand the value of the white man's gifts, and therefore would not accept them without resistance. The application of a certain amount of force would be unavoidable, but an imperial moralist would apply force in as humane a fashion as possible.

The youthful reader of Kipling could dream of himself as the gallant commander of an intrepid squad of white soldiers, cowing untold thousands of gleaming-eyed barbarians bent on rapine and murder; or he could dream of himself as the administrator of a half-forgotten province, making his own final decisions in matters of life and death, fighting famine and plague and crushing the native intrigue that was more disastrous to the population than either. He would perform his difficult duties perhaps while burning up with fever, and would be rewarded with severe assaults on his integrity by uninformed busybodies at home. It has never been expected that even the most moral of men should invariably serve God for naught. Our gallant soldier or brave administrator would live like a prince, surrounded by dark-skinned servants and dependents to whom he would stand as Protector of the Poor—a career very different from the only one actually in sight for our Kipling reader, the job of bookkeeper in Brown's Hay, Grain, and Coal Store—and among the dark-skinned peoples one might stumble upon treasure trove.

At a slightly earlier period the expansion of commerce and industry in England and Germany had slowed down under a long depression, and the rising generation saw its hope of careers at home sadly thwarted. There, too, the young responded eagerly to Kipling's call to the imperial frontier. It is, however, doubtful whether European youth was raised to quite the same romantic height as that of America. European youths had never known a frontier at home. They could not have felt so bitter a sense of deprivation, even though they found their condition equally hopeless.

If in the late nineties Mexico and South America had fallen into a chaos of revolution, it would have been difficult to restrain young America from taking up the white man's burden in earnest. We were prompt enough to seize upon a flimsy pretext to wrest Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines from Spain. But the great expansion of world industry after the turn of the century and the enormous multiplication of urban careers opened new opportunities at home. The yearning toward colonial careers subsided as quickly as it arose.

Bernard Shaw has explained the waning of Kipling's popularity on the ground that he had never grown up. But the real trouble was that the world had grown up. Even the youths are grown up and sit on their haunches brooding over a gray world without frontiers to attract, whether of the free West or the slave South: a world with the places of promise tightly held by the vested right of the older men and those whom they choose to favor. Kipling can still speak to youth, but he cannot speak for it. The prophet in him is silenced, for there is no longer a promised land.

Rorty Reports America

Where Life Is Better. An Unsentimental American Journey.
By James Rorty. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

SOME months ago James Rorty started out from his farm in Connecticut to report the United States for the New York Post and other publications. Like a great many other worried people, writers especially, he wanted to know what kind of action might be expected from American majorities in our present economic and social breakdown. There were quite a lot of us riding around the country in buses or flivvers like Rorty's at about the same time, in search of the same information. We pulled in and out of industrial centers, spent many days in small towns, hung around CCC camps and other federal projects, stared appalled at the shanty settlements and cabin villages of our pariahs—Negroes, Mexicans, poor whites—tried to discover in situ what Louisiana and California fascisms are made of, picked up all sorts of people constantly, and listened and listened and listened.

We were not doing this in a mere hunt for picturesque literary material. Nor, as is clearly indicated in the subtitle of Rorty's book, was it a romantic impulse. The thing that was driving us to explore this country and more especially this people was—and of course still is—affecting people like ourselves in other countries in much the same way. It was something that should make Rorty's book as important to you as your morning paper. It was fear.

James Rorty is a writer who takes himself seriously. This means that to him truthful and useful writing is equivalent to living. He knows also that any social situation that curtails or destroys this activity attacks all creative activities by which human life can be made progressively freer. He sees very sharply the physical and spiritual threat to himself in such material for fascism as legalized strike-breaking, vigilante gangs, jingoism and racial terrorism, company unionism, and quasi-religious demagoguery of either the Long or the Coughlin type. Like the rest of us who, prodded by the spectacle of Germany, fear a parallel catastrophe at home, and who know that the only effective defense against it is the kind of mass defense that only the labor movement can mobilize, Rorty was looking for two things: first, the size and place and shape and characteristics of fascism in embryo; second, the number and strength and identity of the conscious fighters against fascism. In other words, he was looking at two armies, our enemies and our friends.

Rorty covered a lot more ground and worked much harder than most of the rest of us. He is furthermore—in contrast to such reporters as Spivak, for example—scrupulously honest; not one degree of wish-fulfilment distorts what he sees. His report is therefore pretty frightening, emphasized as it is by his own sickened thoughts and feelings. Duffus in the New York Times discounts the gravity of what Rorty says because somewhere in the book he records that he was shell-shocked in the World War. Well, I wasn't, and just the same I "smelled war"—saw it being prepared—as pervasively as Rorty did. The kind of shock that Rorty is suffering from is deeper and more lasting because it is being inflicted on him all the time. You can see its cause in his account of how "rugged individualism" was destroying priceless natural and human resources everywhere he went, and of how the wasteful stupidity of economic anarchy was making life for the American majorities progressively worse and worse.

The picture is more moving because it is poetically made against the generous grandeur of New World landscape, the natural wealth of California, the industrial and scientific miracles displayed at the Chicago fair, the courage and wit of people struggling to free our wealth from paralysis-for-profit. Rorty notes in a number of places that the "best people," as in Italy and Germany, can already be found in jail. He says much less about these people, what they are like and what they are doing, than about the sheriffs and vigilantes and combinations of capital and ignorance that obstruct them. Rorty estimates in despair that the "best people" constitute no more than 5 per cent of our population, but this only means that he is impatient. He forgets that five years ago this 5 per cent was probably one one-hundredth per cent, and that it grows in geometric proportion, particularly when it becomes active. He knows, for example, how swiftly one intelligently led union in Minneapolis made labor history and materially strengthened the anti-fascist forces in the entire country.

Beyond question Rorty tells many truths necessary for us to know; the disproportion in his estimates, corresponding perhaps to his own quick irritation and a touch of panic, is the only serious weakness in his book. It is noticeable that he found the bulk of his material in the lower middle-class and the lowest unskilled proletariat. By themselves these groups justify his view of the United States as in a state of degenerating chaos, with a drift toward fascism. One must draw the same conclusion if one looks longest and hardest at the farms and small towns, with the now quaint idea that they are the key to the United States. Intellectually Rorty knows that they are not, but he is betrayed by his emotions, as is indicated in the tone and many subjective details of his book, almost into agreement with Sinclair Lewis fiction. Rorty, however, is much too honest to subscribe to Lewis's sentimental rescue of America from fascism via the farm and village. His book, therefore, is much more seriously worth your time than anything Sinclair Lewis has done for years, including his latest novel. James Rorty is real, if not so easy to take.

ANITA BRENNER

A Life Well Lost

The Exile. By Pearl S. Buck. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

THERE would appear to be a discrepancy between the manner of any book by Mrs. Buck and the things it is saying. Her style, which by this time has become a habit she cannot be imagined without, is so entirely unaccented, so thin and fluid, so consciously free from the customary devices for achieving climax, so skilfully and artificially relaxed, as to indicate a content of minor and indeed trivial importance. Such, however, is notoriously not the case. Her books deal exclusively with the major human events: birth, education, courtship, marriage, work, death, love, compassion, and extreme cruelty. "The Good Earth" was successful among other reasons because it reminded novel readers that such things are of greater interest than the catchword of the moment or the manners of last month. Another reason perhaps was that the experiences of Wang and his people seemed never to be mitigated; their suffering was intense, their relief from suffering was likewise, and the catastrophes were such as only a wise and able writer can keep from being intolerably painful.

The present volume, a biography of Mrs. Buck's mother, is crowded in the same way with rich and radical matter. Its heroine was born in Virginia of a Dutch father and a French mother; was infected with missionary zeal and went as the young wife of a mystical and impractical prig to spend most of her days in the filthiest country on earth; bore seven children of whom four died dreadfully; had all the worst diseases herself, including tuberculosis and cholera; was moved, until she decided to ignore her husband's "calls," up and down and across the perilous vast rivers of China; endured dozens of those fetid summers in which no Occidental ever learns how to live; was several times in danger of her life because she was a "foreign devil"; nursed thousands of miserable people and saw hundreds die of starvation outside the walls of her house; returned every nine years to an America whose clean and fragrant memory was for her a temptation to commit the mortal sin of wanting to stay where she belonged; and went back each time—the last time to die slowly and be buried ten thousand miles away from the mountains she loved with an inexpressible devotion. Inexpressible, that is, unless her singing at the organ expressed it to her children, and unless the stories she was always telling them of their grandparents and of the clean hills at home gave them notions of America which no mere American is permitted to have. For in addition to the terrible material which makes up the body of this book, there is the idyl of a nineteenth-century America such as no man or woman ever saw with actual eyes; in addition to it, and playing against it, like the second of two powerful themes.

Enough has been said to indicate that "The Exile" says a great deal. Here, nevertheless, is the immemorial and rather watery style of "The Good Earth" and "A House Divided." How reconcile the matter and the manner? How justify the manner? I am not sure that it can be done, or could at any rate be done in another case. In Mrs. Buck's case I am disposed to agree with the general judgment that she had better be taken as we find her. Since she is so good a writer the secret is a real secret, and her very own; though it can be observed in passing that her style must have an accent to which the reader's attention is never called, and though it may be admitted that a very fine kind of selection is always in process, along with the most delicate arrangement of details, so that the biggest ones become the barest and so that the right ones remain longest in the memory. Nor should I neglect to remark that a number of the most brilliant details in this volume have to do with its American portion; Hermanus with his elegant white collars and the small French wife who will not let her son be taken away by Southern soldiers are persons impossible to forget.

Mrs. Buck restrains herself most of the time from passing judgment either upon the barbarous institution of missions or upon the exasperating blindness of her father, who never saw what kind of woman wasted her life in his service. It is perhaps rash to say wasted, in view of the fact that magnificent human beings of her kind are seldom used by circumstance as we should like to see them used, and in view of the poor knowledge we have at best concerning the purpose of anybody's existence. Yet in one passage Mrs. Buck does break out:

Strange remote soul of a man that could pierce into the very heavens and discern God with such certainty and never see the proud and lonely creature at his side! To him she was only a woman. Since those days when I saw all her nature dimmed I have hated Saint Paul with all my heart and so must all true women hate him, I think, because of what he has done in the past to women like Carie, proud, free-born women, yet damned by their very womanhood. I rejoice for her sake that his power is gone in these new days.

If she had not broken out we should have known well enough how she felt, but I am glad she was unable to suppress her bitterness, and perhaps it would have been impossible for her to do so in any case. For her impulse to write this book must have been an irresistible desire to rescue Carie from oblivion, and the desire must have been bitter at the same time that it was strong. Here anyhow is one woman picked out of ten thousand; her life justified by a record of her good works; and her existence rendered meaningful if only by the accident that a surviving daughter happened to be gifted with the potency of words.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Fascist Knight in Shining Armor

The Coming American Fascism. By Lawrence Dennis. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

THIS reviewer has never met or heard Lawrence Dennis, but he is certain that the author of "The Coming American Fascism" is a charming and agreeable person. How could one fail to fall under the spell of an individual who is always the Christian knight: so affable and courteous toward his foes, so charitably disposed toward the weak, so bold and lion-hearted when the demons of ignorance and privilege are to be met and routed? And when such a knight has the extraordinary capacity for self-delusion to be found in Mr. Dennis—when the first victim of his persuasive logic is himself so completely—it is doubly difficult to resist him.

About one hundred years ago, in England, there appeared a somewhat similarly bemused young man who—perhaps more than Mr. Dennis—was confronted by the necessity for creating a career for himself. His name was Benjamin Disraeli, and he too, as a youth, was a knight in shining armor; but because of the accident of his birth he could not very well call himself a Christian knight. So his knightliness—he insisted upon its superiority—was of the Saracen variety. Disraeli resembled Mr. Dennis in many ways. He was very skilful verbally. He was quite learned. He also talked of service. The particular ogre he was getting a party together to hunt down was the young and lusty British industrialism; Mr. Dennis's ogre is the same industrialism, now in the form of finance capitalism grown aged and vile. And beneath the slightly ridiculous romantic exterior which Disraeli affected, there functioned the brain of a person who was as keenly appreciative of the main chance as anybody in shoe leather. Disraeli sought to rally to his banner the high-born youth of England in a crusade against the factory system, the destruction of rural England, and the money changers. This program he called Popular Toryism; but although he loudly professed it, he was not above understanding that the support not so much of the young men as of their land-owning and stock-jobbing fathers was necessary for the realization of his political ambitions. In the same way Mr. Dennis calls to his side America's young élite, while the weekly journal which he edits openly defers to the Elder Statesmen of the Republican Party.

When Benjamin Disraeli came into power, he sold out young England to British industrial and finance capitalism. He made India and Egypt safe for the ten-percenters and gave the textile and steel lords a new lease on life. We do not have to conjecture what Mr. Dennis and his friends would do if they were to come into power. His long theoretical discussions of the roles of the state, private enterprise, finance, the family, and foreign affairs under fascism really are of no significance except as indicating the character of his own intelligent progress. Fascism lives and breathes not in Mr. Dennis's fair pages but in the "coordinated" labor movements, the gigantic armies, and the concentration camps of Germany and Italy.

The reader is asked to remember, says the jacket of this book, quoting from the author's first chapter, "that Italian Fascism and German Nazism are not primarily the subjects of discussion." Indeed, they are never discussed, but their ugly shadows lie across every page Mr. Dennis has written. All his talk is brave and sweetly reasonable. Could there be a fairer description of a lower-middle-class paradise than the following?

Under fascism, private property, private enterprise, and private choice in the market have no rights as ends in themselves. They have different measures of social usefulness subject to proper public control. If these institutions and ways are to have social utility to the state, the liberal regime must be ended, the great monopolies nationalized, and all the economic processes subjected to the discipline of a national plan. The ultimate objective is welfare through a strong national state, and neither the dictatorship of the proletariat nor the supremacy of private rights under any given set of rules.

There are many minor curiosities in this book, as well. In one place Mr. Dennis speaks of his "faith in the vitality of American democracy and individualism"; in another, of "honest socialism"; in still another, of fascism "as a formula for order and abundance." The author hotly denies that fascism is anti-intellectual or anti-Semitic. Can it be that Mr. Dennis, after all, is only another Gottfried Feder, destined after the successful fascist "revolution" to end his days as a petty pen-pusher in some minor functionary's office? I don't think so; for this book closes on a sinister note.

If [says Mr. Dennis] liberal capitalism is doomed, we must expect its successor to be largely the work of angry and frustrated men with a will to power. Preparatory thinking, nevertheless, can bring into alliance with these men the less frustrated and embittered and bring to the new movement their contributions. Only a body of enlightened and sympathetic opinion will be able to impose on an emergent fascism counsels of moderation and avert the extremes of a bitter class war.

Mr. Dennis is threatening the armed gangsterism which made possible the successes of Hitler and Mussolini. Who fed and drilled the fascist gangs and furnished them with their pretty little daggers in Germany and Italy we now know; and what forces today dominate the council tables and barrack rooms of fascist Germany and Italy we also know. In a recent interview with a New York Times correspondent Hitler admitted that there was no such thing as a Nazi economics. He was not telling the whole truth, of course. Nazi economics is finance-capitalist economics; and all of Mr. Dennis's fancy rhetoric to the contrary notwithstanding, it is becoming increasingly difficult to persuade Americans that this is not so.

LOUIS M. HACKER

On Keeping Out of War

Can We Be Neutral? By Allen W. Dulles and Hamilton Fish Armstrong. Harper and Brothers. $1.50.

Neutrality: Its History, Economics and Law. Volume I: The Origins. By Philip C. Jessup and Francis Deák. Columbia University Press. $3.75.

ON August 29, 1790, Thomas Jefferson wrote: "It is expected that the flames of war will be kindled between our two neighbors [England and France]. Since it is so decreed, we have only to pray that their soldiers may eat a great deal." Later, in connection with threatened war between Russia and Turkey, he observed that "the life of the feeder is better than the life of the fighter. . . . Let us milk the cow while the Russian holds her by the horns and the Turk by the tail."

This same seeker after peace-with-profits learned later that his country could have peace or profits in a general European conflagration, but not both. In the embargo of 1808 he sacrificed profits to peace and failed. Madison sacrificed peace to profits and lost both. Wilson kept both during a precarious neutrality and then discovered, as had his predecessors, that it was too late to choose. The neutral that insists on "milking the cow" must fight when the warring dairymen kick over the milk pails.

This elementary truth has at last permeated the American public mind and created the dangerous illusion that the cure of war lies simply in limiting trade with belligerents or refusing to protect such trade. In a fine frenzy of determination Congress and the Administration have abandoned "freedom of the seas" and resurrected a qualified version of Jefferson's embargo. But such are the ways of Washington statesmanship that the cure promises to be worse than the disease.

These two volumes are indispensable to anyone who would see the problem of American neutrality as a whole. The scholarly work of Professors Jessup and Deák is the first instalment of a series of four volumes. The authors have succeeded brilliantly in the difficult task of presenting the development of the international law of neutrality from the Middle Ages to the end of the eighteenth century. This "law," as it relates to neutral trading rights, they properly describe as a "highly artificial and unreal body of illogical compromises." They show conclusively that the "acknowledged rights" and "immutable principles" in the name of which America paradoxically fought in 1798, 1812, and 1917 to protect its trading privileges as a neutral have always been mere rationalizations of decisions dictated by calculations of profits and power.

Americans are not again likely to be persuaded to sacrifice life and treasure for the sake of such "principles." They have, in intention at least, abandoned diplomatic and military protection of opportunities to make "blood money." The how and why of this startling reversal of policy are admirably presented in "Can We Be Neutral?" Messrs. Armstrong and Dulles have written for the Council on Foreign Relations what is unquestionably the most lucid and comprehensive analysis of the present dilemma of American foreign policy. The text is a primer of neutrality, followed by fourteen appendices of invaluable documents and statistics. The most important conclusion which emerges from this presentation is that a mandatory embargo on American exports to belligerents, leaving the President no discretion as to the time, scope, and incidence of application, will wreck American economy in a general war abroad, tend to make the world safe for aggression, and prove in practice as unworkable as Jefferson's unhappy experiment. While the authors do not urge a mandatory policy of discrimination based upon the Kellogg pact, they concede the desirability of a distinction between aggressors, victims of aggression, and sanctionist countries seeking to restrain aggression. They would leave the President free to consult with the other signatories of the pact and, where he thought discrimination warranted, to seek authorization from Congress to apply the embargo—whether on arms alone or on other goods—only against the nation violating the pact.

In short, it is here demonstrated that the only feasible policy is one of refusing public protection to war traders—Caveat mercator—and of permitting the Executive to decide in particular conflicts what prohibitions shall be imposed on such traders in the interests of peace. Such was the policy urged by the Administration last summer and now abandoned in the face of Congressional pressure. Finally the authors point out that all neutrality policies are mere palliatives: "The only sure way for the United States to escape entanglement in foreign wars is for there to be no wars. . . . No neutrality legislation can give us the advantages of an isolation which does not in fact exist. . . . The duty to help prevent wars is not primarily one which the United States owes to other nations. It is a duty which we owe to ourselves."

These conclusions will be accepted by almost all observers who have made a logical analysis of the problem. But it is painfully evident that logic is no more likely to play a part in pending decisions than it did in earlier decisions to enforce neutral rights. In the one case the result was to plunge America into war. In the other case, the result may be to wreck League

LOTTE LEHMANN

Records a New Victor Album of

GERMAN LIEDER

The songs that melt the heart, sung by one of the great voices of today! Madame Lehmann gives to them a deeper tenderness, a mellower beauty, the special warmth of her voice and personality that will bring you back to them again and again when you own this Album.

Thousands of people have gathered in concert halls in Europe and America to hear Lotte Lehmann sing Lieder. Now you can have the greatest songs in her repertoire to hear whenever you will . . . and to hear with all the luscious fullness and rich sentiment of Madame Lehmann's voice, caught so faithfully by Victor higher fidelity recording. The Album of 5 records, 10 sides, includes the following songs:

Die Verschweigung—MOZART—Secrecy

An Chloe—MOZART—To Chloe

Ungeduld—SCHUBERT—Impatience

Im Abendrot—SCHUBERT—Sunset Glow

Die Kartenlegerin—SCHUMANN—The Fortune Teller

Waldesgespräch—SCHUMANN—Voices of the Woods

Therese—BRAHMS—Theresa

Meine Liebe ist grün—BRAHMS—My Love is Green

Der Tod, das ist die kühle Nacht—BRAHMS—Death is Like the Cool of Night

Anakreons Grab—HUGO WOLF—Anacreon's Grave

In dem Schatten meiner Locken—HUGO WOLF—In the Shadows of My Tresses

Ask your dealer to play this new Victor Album of German Lieder as only Lotte Lehmann can sing them!

The price of the Album is $7.50.

VICTOR

RECORDS

RCA Victor Division, RCA Manufacturing Co., Inc., Camden, N. J.

sanctions, foster autarchy and war abroad, make the United States an economic ally of fascist imperialism, and bring the country to the brink of conflict with all the League powers. The pending legislation, incredibly supported by certain isolationist "liberals," is one part lunacy, one part stupidity, and one part criminal ignorance of diplomatic and economic realities. Peace is to be had only at a price which American isolationists have hitherto been unwilling to pay. That price is not the abandonment of American foreign markets after war has broken out. It is American cooperation with the League of Nations in rendering war everywhere so costly and dangerous to the aggressors that it will become an impossibility.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

Recorded Memory

Innocent Summer. By Frances Frost. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

HOW far the matter of perspective influences the quality of writing about children for adult readers is well shown in Miss Frost's first novel. Actually, children in fiction as in life fit into categories no more and no less than any other persons, places, or things; but writers' attitudes toward their child subjects do tend to classify themselves. A child, for instance, can be regarded by his author as a Lilliputian, in which case he may be treated as father to the man, one of the little people in a world differing only in degree from the adult world, or he can be seen as a member of a primitive race dwelling forever strange and apart, differing from men in kind as well as in degree. Children of the first sort are miniatures of their elders—Dickens, Mrs. Burnett, and Hugh Walpole have told their stories; the others show no such parallel, their path is unpredictable—they are the children of "The Innocent Voyage" and "Les Enfants Terribles," who live in alien but poetic isolation.

Miss Frost's children are of the first order, distinctly and purposefully of recognizable heritage and environment: Paul, the kindly, sensitive, too generous son of a drunken farmer; Fern, the happy-go-lucky daughter of the carefree village apaiser; suspicious, fearful Mart, whose drunken, lecherous father drives the town hack; tomboy Dorothy, the grocer's child; Don with weak lungs; and illegitimate Sam, adolescent and ambitious. In their brief summer they mark their own time and reflect the life of the village around them, gaining from June to October an introduction to the inevitable experiences of death, love, human cruelty and pettiness, understanding and fear. The merit of the book is its accuracy in recapturing the nature of the children's reactions. The vernacular used is right to the point of being the very essence of their thoughts and moods. Observation ranges from the young leaves of the maple that turn red too soon, to the copper wire holding the toilet paper together. The thoughts of youth are the long, long thoughts flecked by the first stirrings of hope and despair, the uncontrollable tortures of adolescence, the impulses that lead to climbing trees or to a spanking or a whaling with a leather strap.

It is all as familiar as oneself and as vivid as yesterday. There is nothing unexpected except what the reader has momentarily forgotten. The pleasure of memory awakened without nostalgia or enchantment is in this book, for about its truth there is no doubt. For some readers the satisfaction of identity and the discovery of a well-known pattern fully repeated is enough. A stricter standard, however, demands that if a novel is to be called good, it must contain elements subtler than truth, that quicken not only memory but feeling and imagination.

FLORENCE CODMAN

A Great Architect

The Architecture of H. H. Richardson and His Times. By Henry Russell Hitchcock, Jr. New York: The Museum of Modern Art. $6.

THIS book is a complete and carefully documented study of Richardson the artist. For Richardson the man Mrs. Van Rensselaer's book is still the best source; for his place in the general stream of American architecture Lewis Mumford's "Brown Decades" is still indispensable—and both of these facts are explicitly and graciously stated in the preface. Thus this book is a study of creative artistic development, and of this development in a specific period of American culture. The influences that Richardson must have felt—the Harvard environment and the important new Harvard buildings of those years, Paris and the Ecole des Beaux Arts of the early sixties, the buildings of Théodore Labrouste upon which Richardson worked, and the incoherent but vividly alive architecture of post-Civil War America—are set down here with wide scholarship and painstaking research. It is all seen as an integral part of Richardson's career, clarifying alike the uncertainties of his earlier work and his essential greatness in rising above these influences—as few of his contemporaries could have risen—to the heights of artistic achievement reached in the Marshall Field store. The book is a detailed study of a great romantic by a scholarly critic in thorough sympathy with his subject's own romanticism.

It is precisely the detailed and romantic character of the criticism which leads at times to a false emphasis on architectural details—that is, on the precise character of Richardson's carved ornament. In Richardson's case particularly, the derivative sources—whether Gothic, pre-Raphaelite, Romanesque, or Byzantine—are always secondary to the important fact that, whatever the sources, Richardson's superb sense of material changed the forms into something new and fresh. And in the work of any architect details of ornament are merely modes of expressing a conception embracing an entire building, to be judged only incidentally for themselves and primarily in their relation to the whole.

In style, too, the book suffers from this over-archaeological point of view. It frequently sounds like the shop talk of learned specialists. It is full of names of styles and periods, not clearly defined, which must be puzzling to the general reader. Who but a student of architecture, for instance, knows off-hand the difference between the neo-Grec and the Greek revival? Or between the Gothic revival and the Victorian Gothic? A few paragraphs to define these terms might, it seems to this reviewer, have been more valuable than some of the long descriptions of projects, which are better explained by the plans and photographs shown. Like specialists' shop talk, too, the book uses its own extremely personal type of colloquial—almost too colloquial—English, at times brilliant, at times merely careless. It varies from sentences as obscure as "Indeed, the very fact that in Paris the art of the Middle Ages was a sort of not too secret vice led him to consider the Romanesque he was using as a personal vehicle of expression," to such terse and really epigrammatic summations as "The twentieth-century windows, correct conventional exercises in French High Medieval design, serve only to show that the more we know about medieval art the less we are able to equal it." Or "The exaggerated pursuit of asymmetry in architecture is a sign of youth, quite as out of place in the work of a mature genius as its exaggerated avoidance."

There are a few minor historical inaccuracies. The mansard roof was popular in New York at an earlier date than Mr. Hitchcock seems to think; Detlef Lienau—who had worked in Paris under both Henri Labrousse and Cendrier between 1842 and 1847—used it on almost all his early New York and Newport houses from 1849 on. The architects of the old New York Equitable Building were Gilman and Kendall; Post was associated, but his function was structural only. Gilman also seems to have been the chief creator of the original design for the New York State Capitol, though Fuller was appointed the architect; and Gilman was at least as much responsible for the eclectic “French Renaissance” public buildings as Mullet.

Moreover, Richardson's originality and rationalism were not as unique as they first appear. Robert Dale Owen's “Hints on Public Architecture” (1848) is primarily rationalistic, and only secondarily a plea for any style. The earlier work of McKim, Mead, and White, to its first culmination in the Boston Library, evidences a pursuit of originality on a rationalist basis. Enthusiasm for the genius of Richardson need not lead, as sometimes it seems to do in Mr. Hitchcock's book, to a belittling of the real achievements of his predecessors and contemporaries.

Yet, after all, these are secondary matters. Here at last, in Mr. Hitchcock's pages and in the not-too-well-reproduced plates of Richardson's work, is a study of an artist in “Victorian” America the like of which we have not seen before. Here we have a real monument, not only to Richardson, but to American architecture itself—to its importance and its promise. It is a monument massive, dignified, buttressed with scholarship, and founded on meticulous research; like all good monuments it should direct a new and a more understanding attention on Richardson himself and on the development of American architecture.

TALBOT HAMLIN

The Romantic Feeling

One Season Shattered. By James Daly. The Centaur Press. $2.

WHEN so many of our poets are showing the imprint of Eliot's technique, imagery, and philosophy, it is a relief to read a book of lyrics illustrative of an original creative imagination. James Daly's poems are purely his own, and they are good. They are not, to be sure, always perfect in craftsmanship. Working as he does with subtle and irregular rhythms, giving form to impressions which, rooted in reality, reach, cone-shaped, toward a mystic wonder, Daly frequently fails to point his emotional experience with sufficient sharpness. His language combines startling and good imagery with the older literary language of mystic rapture.

The lyrics of his first group, obviously personal poems, are the best. In the latter part of his book Daly writes about the maladjustment of our times in poems which might be called “class-conscious,” and these are much less successful. Daly's own milieu is the world of romantic feeling; his poetry is a kind of impressionism arising from the subconscious mind and its curious associations. The emotion which stirs him most frequently is love. Even though, as in much modern poetry, this poet's mind denies his emotional persuasions, the sense of wonder before love and beauty nevertheless prevails in him. Yet he can write a good reflective lyric, too. This brief poem is spoken, supposedly, by the poet's father:

Suppose, lad, in the end you too should know
The ordeal: courage that has not won victory?
See your heart's proud city razed; and know
The destroyer was in some fierce way yourself,
An inward flaw, destruction in your soul?

Your city must not fall! But if it should,
What's courage for, if not to understand
Being anvil rather than hammer of the hand?

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Sweden Has Announced

A 10% Tax Cut!

You Will Learn How This
Was Possible When You Read

SWEDEN

The Middle Way

By MARQUIS W. CHILDS

Here is an account of a system of controlled capitalism that enables men to produce and distribute goods for the general welfare without recourse to Communism, Fascism or any radical departure from the high plane of human dignity. It reveals how Sweden has solved its economic problems by organizing its consumers. Many illuminating oversize illustrations. $2.50

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
New Haven, Conn.

□ JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH says □

Boy Meets Girl. Cort Theater. Rough and ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since “Once in a Lifetime.”

Dead End. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

Ethan Frome. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon and Raymond Massey.

Junjo. Hippodrome. Paul Whiteman, Jimmy Durante, and a remarkable clown named A. Robbins surrounded by acrobats and animals. Literally better than a circus.

Let Freedom Ring. Civic Repertory Theater. A second chance for this drama of a strike in a Southern mill. I found it hard going, but it has been highly praised.

Libel. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English court-room play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

Mid-West. Booth Theater. Homely and slightly sentimental picture of the joys and more particularly the sorrows of the farmer. Best when it isn't editorializing.

Paradise Lost. Longacre Theater. Clifford Odets' complicated picture of a family composed exclusively of pathological utilitarians. He calls it a picture of the middle class but it strikes me as somewhat less than typical.

Pride and Prejudice. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaption, brilliantly staged and acted. It gave me more pleasure than any other play of the season.

Victoria Regina. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Winterset. Martin Beck Theater. Maxwell Anderson's surprisingly successful attempt to write a poetic play on a modern theme. Bold, original, and engrossing.

More characteristic are the cycle which deals with the whole romantic experience of love, loss, and memory, and such a poem as The Tracks Led Nowhere, which closes

Flight it was, of course: flight and hiding
But the tracks led nowhere, you never found
Her refuge. This was the mystery.
And so you are careful now of all your syllables
And no one could think your hand unsteady.

On finishing the book one feels that James Daly is a poet who is slowly developing a greater precision and beauty of phrase and a very much surer grasp of form. "One Season Shattered" is a much better book than "The Guilty Sun," which preceded it. Daly's mind, obsessed by mystery and sometimes terrified at its own discoveries, is an interesting mind. If he clears his work of the too easy phrase, the too literary image, he will be an authentic artist.

EDA LOU WALTON

Introduction to the Dance

Dance. By Lincoln Kirstein. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

MR. KIRSTEIN has written a very enthusiastic and lively book in "Dance," subtitled "A Short History of Theatrical Dancing." He starts with ancient Egypt and ends with Balanchine and the school of the American Ballet, touching briefly in his progress on Greek tragedy, the Roman theater, early Christianity, the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, and numerous other topics down to Mary Wigman and Massine. Included are a chronological list of important events in the history of the dance, an index, a good bibliography, a list of recordings of music for theatrical dancing, and a large collection of pictures with good explanatory notes. The pictures, as Mr. Kirstein himself remarks, are the best part. But the book as a whole will prove useful both as an introduction to the subject and as propaganda for the dance.

Dancing is of course a very difficult thing to write about. Little is known about dancing before the Renaissance, when forms were invented which persist in some shape or other down to our own day; one cannot, for example, find out enough about Greek dancing to stage the choruses in Greek tragedy with any approach to historical accuracy. There is no generally accepted system of notation for dance steps or even choreography, as there is for music. Ballet has developed an exact technique and a technical jargon to go with it; but lists of pirouettes, glissades, pas de deux, and entrechats make dreary reading for the uninitiated. They describe mechanics of movement or traditional figures, and leave out the subtle elements of action, mood, and style which are the life of any theatrical presentation. The historian of the dance is thus driven back to memoirs, to pictures, to descriptions, to impressions and conjectures, to anecdotes about ballerinas—to everything but the dance itself. This is not Mr. Kirstein's fault; and he has on the whole steered very successfully between impressionism and atmosphere on one side and lists of dance steps on the other.

The least satisfactory part of the book is the first hundred or so pages, from Osiris to the Renaissance—a kind of preface as he says to the main theme of theatrical dancing proper. For all this period our knowledge of actual dancing is extremely sketchy, and Mr. Kirstein is reduced to showing the place of dance, its part in religious festivals, in tragedy, in spectacles, popular merrymaking, and comedy. This leads him inevitably to a short account of Greek tragedy, to summarizing the differences between the civilizations of Greece and Rome, and to telling us what death meant to the man of the Middle Ages—to the writing of "outlines," in short. Now there is much to be said both for and against the contemporary genre of the outline. An outline may serve a useful function as an introduction to a new field, as stimulus to discussion in a field which is already familiar, or as propaganda and publicity, as, for example, Oliver Saylor's books on Reinhardt and the Moscow Art Theater. The chief danger in outlines is that they may dispose of historic forms, periods, or forces which might nourish our own time. Thus one would never guess from Mr. Kirstein's account of Greek tragedy that this form had found a new and genuine, if rather cerebral, life in "Murder in the Cathedral"; a sensational but suggestive life in Cocteau's translations of "Antigone" and "Oedipus"; and a poetic, if not dramatic, reincarnation in Mr. Yeats's two plays about Oedipus—all in the space of one generation. One may take another example from his chapter on the Middle Ages: he quotes a paragraph from H. O. Taylor on medieval symbolism but does not mention the fourfold method, the foundation of the "Divine Comedy," the guide of Eliot and probably of Joyce. These are criticisms such as are always to be made of outlines. Yet Mr. Kirstein's book would have gained in authority if he had managed to stick closer to the dance itself, and been more wary of that deadly device, the scholarly generalization.

When Mr. Kirstein reaches the beginnings of ballet he is on firmer ground. The last part of his book, though marred by an overfondness for adjectives and an inadequate grasp of abstract words, gives an intelligible account of the development of modern dancing. He has accumulated a valuable collection of contemporary material, unpublished as well as published, and is indebted to two pages and a half of friends, helpers, publishers, and so on. The upshot of it all is, of course, a strong defense of ballet, both as the theatrical dance of Western civilization and as a form capable of infinite growth and development. Mr. Kirstein recognizes the contributions of Duncan, Laban, and Wigman, but believes that they can all be absorbed by ballet. He makes an excellent plea for dramatic content in the dance; indeed, his whole book may be read as a demonstration of the fact that dance, like poetry, has nearly always had content with meanings beyond the aesthetic, until the rise of the modern specter of pure art. The American Ballet as well as the exponents of modern dance should take this to heart.

FRANCIS FERGUSSON

Shorter Notices

The Last Civilian. By Ernst Glaeser. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

Like Ernst Glaeser's fine first novel, "Class of 1902," "The Last Civilian" endeavors to show the effects on a small community of an event of national importance. This time not war but fascism is the issue. But whereas in "Class of 1902" the catastrophe was depicted mainly in terms of its relation to the hero, a sensitive growing boy, in "The Last Civilian" no such simplification has been attempted, and the menace of fascism loses much of its weight when distributed evenly among a number of people with whom the reader is allowed little more than a nodding acquaintance. Much of the chaos of his subject, moreover, seems to have penetrated to the author's treatment of it: for all its sincerity "The Last Civilian" is a drifting, haphazard piece of work, covering much ground but getting nowhere. Nor does Glaeser's genuine indignation serve to resolve it: he plainly hates Nazism but he seems singularly uninformed as to its real nature, and the only alternatives to it which he is able to offer are exile, a return to the soil, or suicide—surely Hitler's defenders never had so triumphant an argument! And it is difficult to feel any sympathy for the three rather sentimentalized characters who choose these various means of escape and whose opposition to the movement is thus reduced to a cowardly and meaningless form of subjectivism. Against so brutally concise a program as that launched by the leaders of the Third Reich, Herr Glaeser's kind of antagonism can end only in vague yearnings, empty denunciations, and a novel which is weak, badly constructed, and hopelessly confused.

Mark Twain. The Man and His Work. By Edward Wagenknecht. Yale University Press. $3.

Mr. Wagenknecht's account of Mark Twain is the best-balanced one to date, but it is not the most interesting. Passion is as desirable in criticism as it is in the writing called creative; indeed, it must be there before we have anything approaching either truth or greatness. Mr. Wagenknecht seems to be perfectly free from prejudice, and the industry with which he has read everything about his subject is remarkable, even admirable. The result, however, is a work of reference rather than a piece of criticism. It does not appear that Mr. Wagenknecht believes Mark Twain to have been any particular kind of man. Yet he was clearly some kind of man, and those who have made the attempt to say so, even when they have perverted the simple truth, have honored it as this humorless and unimaginative volume never does.

Drama

Call It an Evening

"CALL IT A DAY" was brought from England and should run a year. Ostensibly a "slice of life" (cut where the raisins are thickest), it is actually about as artificial as a play can well be, but it is blessed with the priceless gift of universal appeal, and only the veriest Scrooges of criticism will succeed in concealing their delight. Simpler souls may take it for a miracle of realism—which it isn't—but even those not unaware of the wheels going round will join in the laughter, and applause, for "Call It a Day" is, to an extraordinary degree, neat and witty, lively and gay.

The general plan of the piece is much like the plan of "Dinner at Eight" and doubtless derives, more remotely still, from "Grand Hotel." To my mind, however, it is a much better play than either of these, partly, at least because the tone is much lighter and because the audience is not asked to take the artificial pattern with anything like the same seriousness. The two earlier plays aspired toward tragedy and actually got as far as very portentous melodrama. One had to take them very seriously or not take them at all. But "Call It a Day" stays pretty consistently on the level of comedy and imposes upon its brittle structure no greater emotional weight than that structure is capable of bearing.

We begin with the rising of a middle-class English family on the first dangerous day of spring. The scene shifts to the kitchen, where the new waitress is discovering the charms of a neighborhood butler at the same time that the dog has discovered the charms of the butler's bull, and the play then permits us to follow the various members of the family as they meet the various crises which the season provokes. But when midnight reunites them at last, we learn that nothing very serious has happened to anyone. The daughter—through no fault of her own—was not seduced by the philandering painter; the husband did not push beyond the limits of a mere indiscretion the flirtation with his actress client; the wife did not carry any farther than a faithful wife may be reasonably permitted her little adventure with her friend's brother; and the son was saved, by the opportune appearance of a girl over a garden wall, from planning that Easter hike with a suspiciously intense young

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim
CALL IT A DAY
A comedy by Dodie Smith
with GLADYS COOPER
and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEA., 45th St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees Thursday and Saturday at 2:30

See Page 199 for "Joseph Wood Krutch Says"

Bargains in Books

Offerings of America's Oldest Mail-Order Book House

Up to 75% OFF former prices

To clear out the small quantities which remain on hand, the following titles have been marked down as much as 75% off original prices. Each is brand-new, perfect in every way, a permanent addition to your library. Orders accepted subject to prior sale.

- | | |
|---|---|
| 1. DON QUIXOTE. By Cervantes. Over 400 illustrations by Gustave Doré. "Hilarious parody of the absurd romances of chivalry." 855 pages. Size 7x10x3 3/4". Boxed. ($12.50) Ass'n Price, $1.98 2. THE HOMOSEXUAL NEUROSIS. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Authorized translation by Dr. James S. Van Teslaar. ($5.00) Ass'n Price, $1.69 3. THE WORK, WEALTH AND HAPPINESS OF MANKIND. By H. G. Wells. First edition. In 2 large, fully illustrated vols. Boxed. ($7.50) Ass'n Price, $1.98 | 4. THE WORKS OF FRANCIS RABELAIS. Edited by Albert Jay Nock and Catherine Rose Wilson. The Urquhart-Le Motteux translation. "In all probability, it will remain for many years the definitive edition of Rabelais."—Sat. Review. 2 vols. 952 pages. 84 illustrations. ($15.00) Ass'n Price, the set, $4.95 5. THE GREATEST ARCHITECT OF THE RENAISSANCE—Peruzzi of Siena. By W. W. Kent, Member, American Inst. of Architects. Illus. with 89 full-page plates. ($7.50) Ass'n Price, only 89c |
|---|---|

LIMITED QUANTITIES OF EACH TITLE

- | | |
|--|---|
| 6. A HISTORY OF CHINESE ART. From Ancient Times to the Present Day. 80 full-page color plates, and many line drawings in the text. ($10.00) Ass'n Price, $3.98 7. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL'S WORKS. (Centenary edition.) In 7 handsome maroon linen vols. Stamped in gold. ($21.00) Ass'n Price, $5.95 8. NEW DIMENSIONS: THE DECORATIVE ARTS OF TODAY IN WORDS AND PICTURES. By Paul T. Frankl. Chapters on fabrics, modern furniture, lighting, city architecture, etc., with 122 half-tone illustrations. ($6.00) Ass'n Price, $1.98 9. IDEAL MARRIAGE. By Th. H. Van DeVelde, M.D. The sanest, most comprehensive book in English of the sexual relationship. At our very special Ass'n Price, $5.95 | 10. PECULIARITIES OF BEHAVIOR. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Perhaps the most fascinating analysis of human conduct ever written. 2 volumes. ($10.00) Ass'n Price, $2.98 11. THE OUTLINE OF SCIENCE. By H. G. Wells. Edited by J. Arthur Thomson. Over 400 illus., including 20 full-page plates. "No other book in existence presents all the sciences from the modern point of view in familiar language." "Astonishingly readable." ($9.00) Our Ass'n Price, the 2 vols., only $3.98 12. VENUS OCEANICA. Anthropologic Studies of the Sex Life of Savages. Three masterpieces in one volume. By W. E. Roth, Professor B. Schidloff and Dr. H. Basedow. Profusely illustrated with 100 amazing photographs. Complete in 1 vol. Privately printed. ($6.00) Ass'n Price, $2.98 |
|--|---|

These books postpaid within U. S. or Canada at these special prices; elsewhere, 14c extra per volume.

Satisfaction Guaranteed—Or Your Money Back

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION, (Est. 1884) (N-8)
367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... Please send the books encircled below:

- | | | | | |
|---|----|----|----|----------------------|
| 1 | 2 | 3 | 4 | Name |
| 5 | 6 | 7 | 8 | Address |
| 9 | 10 | 11 | 12 | City..... State..... |

☐ Send me FREE CATALOG OF BOOK BARGAINS No. 268-N, JUST OFF THE PRESS!

Unique Informer

WHEN a distinguished foreigner has nothing to say, he visits America and says it to us. When an American journalist or publicist makes a tour of foreign lands and writes his reports and impressions for publication at home, he frequently entertains, but seldom informs except in a superficial sense.

But there is in America a way, long tried and proved, of obtaining an authentic and consumingly interesting monthly account of foreign affairs and of seeing intimately into the minds of other peoples—the way developed ninety-two years ago by Eliakim Littell when he established The Living Age to “bring the world to America.”

This The Living Age achieves, not primarily by sending reporters abroad to see what they can see, but by “listening in” on what the great statesmen and authors of the world are saying, each to his own people, in the outstanding journals of five continents.

Here in New York, all this material is translated, sifted and sorted, and the most significant and timely portion of it so grouped from month to month that each issue of The Living Age girdles the earth with a broad white beam of enlightenment for the benefit of American readers. Even short fiction, when it discloses new trends of thought and extraordinary insight, is included in The Living Age. Thus is composed a magazine as lively as it is authoritative, of unique interest to English-reading people who wish to be well informed.

Regularly by subscription The Living Age costs $6 a year. You can acquaint yourself with it at the special price of only $2 for a 7-month subscription

THE LIVING AGE, 253 Broadway, New York

For the enclosed $2 please enter my seven-month subscription at once.

Name

Street

City

N 2-12

man. All is for the best in this best of respectable families, and if the more romantically inclined spectators feel the least bit cheated, they may take comfort in imagining for themselves what happened to the dog—whose adventures were either forgotten by the author or deliberately left veiled in a decent obscurity. Besides, it is clearly stated that the cat next door is going to have kittens.

Obviously the success of a play like this depends in considerable measure upon the success of the author in keeping his audience amused by a continuous succession of minor incidents immediately recognizable as veracious by anyone who has ever been part of a family, and upon his success in making the surface so unmistakably real that one accepts without too much question the artificiality of the arrangement. But granted that these conditions have been met as completely and as gaily as they have in this piece, then there is nothing surprising in the fact that it should afford a simple but genuine delight to almost any spectator, since it accomplishes in the simplest of manners something which art always strives to accomplish—it imposes, that is to say, a recognizable pattern upon the disorder of life.

The plan, I said before, suggests “Dinner at Eight” and “Grand Hotel.” But there is no real reason for stopping there. It also suggests “Street Scene,” “Pippa Passes,” and, to stretch a point, “The Lower Depths.” And obvious as it is, there is no simpler method of creating the pleasant delusion that even ordinary life is characterized by that neat balance and round completeness which we so much wish it had. Such a play of everyday existence has much the same relation to everyday existence itself that dancing has to walking. It substitutes for our plodding gait the unnatural grace and measured rhythm of a ballet.

Tyrone Guthrie has staged a well-paced production for the Theater Guild amid settings by Lee Simonson, and the whole is very pleasantly acted with Gladys Cooper and Philip Merivale in the leads. Glenn Anders is also excellent, especially in the scene where he is painting the portrait while, for the benefit of the love-sick sitter, he discourses casually of more beautiful models whom he has used in the past. But I am not sure that the acting honors ought not to go to thirteen-year-old Jeanne Dante, as the schoolgirl who has just acquired all the language of maturity without knowing very precisely what it is intended to convey.

“Lady Precious Stream” (Booth Theater) is a comedy written in the ancient Chinese manner and produced with some comic emphasis on the very visible property men and the other conventions of the Chinese theater. It was originally produced in London, and ostensibly Mr. S. I. Hsiung, the author, is entertaining the audience by inviting them to smile tolerantly at the quaint tale and the quaint staging. Unless, however, I am very much mistaken, he is a great deal slyer than appears upon the surface and is laughing at his audience quite as much as it is laughing at his play. In traditional Chinese fashion, the hero leaves his wife for eighteen years while he is away on a military expedition, but the Princess of the Western Regions who follows him back and who can be disposed of only by being handed over to the Minister of Foreign Affairs (“Affairs” in quotes) very strongly suggests an English lady. Bewildered by the etiquette of the Chinese court and contemptuous of the reserve with which the husband greets the wife, she is much impressed by the hand-kissing Foreign Minister. But when, at the last, the reunited pair exit with the remark, “Our affection is for our mutual delight and not for public entertainment,” Mr. Hsiung is quite obviously giving the last word to that civilization at which he has been helping the Londoners to smile. As Precious Stream, the faithful wife, Helen Chandler is very agreeable, if not conspicuously Chinese, and the whole thing is quite charming.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Films

70,000,000 Americans

IN 1929 a hundred million Americans went weekly to the movies. Only seventy million go now, what with hard times and—so the pious think—the determination of a great and good people to show Hollywood that obscenity doesn't pay. Wrong or right, the pious have been busy of late with the morals of the silver screen; and if two or three chapters in a recent book* are any indication, they have made their usual mess of it. The book is a symposium on "Screen Entertainment Past and Present," and the variety of its views is greater than one might have expected; so great, indeed, as to provide a number of excellent answers to the wolves within its very fold. By wolves I mean censors—such men, for example, as the Bishop of Los Angeles and San Diego, who makes the remarkable statement that "one hour spent in the darkness of a cinema palace, intent on the unfolding of a wrong kind of story, can and frequently does nullify years of careful training on the part of the church, the school, the home." This seems to me a very damaging statement about the church, the school, and the home; nor does Bishop Cantwell appear to understand the significance of certain sordid figures he adduces on another page, tending to prove that "clean, wholesome" films have paid better than "dirty" and "oversexed" ones. Nor does Representative Cannon of Wisconsin, who in 1934 introduced a bill for national censorship of movies, give even a passing thought to the grave moral danger of his plan to make the movies "show" this, "encourage the thought" of that, and "give an impression" concerning certain "right values." Deliberate dishonesty, I imagine, would destroy everything. The only qualified censor of the cinema or of any other art is its audience; in the present instance that audience is millions of people, and they had better be trusted to decide what is good for them. Abundant evidence that they can do so is supplied in other chapters of the book, notably those by Edward G. Robinson, Don Marquis, and Judge Ben Lindsey, who, to be sure, do not so much present the evidence of statistics as let in the eager air of human sense. They so effectively dispose of the Bishop and the Congressman that when the time comes on page 131 for Seymour Stern to dismiss all censors as "perennial pests" the dismissal seems quite as adequate as it is brief.

Mr. Stern has, however, his own pedantries, chief of which is the conviction that no movie is worth mentioning as art unless it represents a technical advance over all previous movies. A corollary is that there have been no movies worth mentioning since D. W. Griffith was in his prime—since, in fact, "Intolerance." This is not equivalent to damning the English drama since 1600 because it has failed to produce another "Hamlet"; it is equivalent rather to lamenting the fact that "Hamlet" is still effective in a theater which should have turned itself inside out several times during three centuries of technical revolution. All that Mr. Stern will admit in favor of the current cinema is its excellence as "popular entertainment catering to an inevitably shallow vein of sentiment."

It is popular, of course, as it should and must be, and as the Elizabethan theater was in a degree nowhere equaled until the days of Griffith. It is estimated that 30,000 out of 100,000 Londoners went weekly to see plays in Shakespeare's time, and this circumstance may have had much to do with the quality of what they saw. My own hope for the cinema is that it

*"The Movies on Trial." Compiled and Edited by William J. Perlman, The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The Nation

now announces for early publication...

GEORGIA'S TALMADGE

Benjamin Stolberg has visited Governor Talmadge. What this keen analyst and caricaturist has to say about Talmadge as a man, politician, presidential critic, and very remote presidential possibility should prove exciting reading to Democrats, as well as Republicans, Communists, Socialists, Farmer-Laborites.

AUSTRIA—PEG, KEY and MATCH OF EUROPE

In his series on "Arms Over Europe", Louis Fischer visits Austria . . . the peg of a vinegar barrel because it prevents German Fascism from pouring over southeastern Europe . . . the key to Central Europe and the Balkans because it now prevents Hitler's re-arranging the map of Europe . . . because of its location, the match which may easily ignite the powder box. Mr. Fischer's authoritative interpretation written from Vienna helps you to understand tiny Austria's tremendous importance in maintaining world peace.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SUPREME COURT

In the remaining articles of his expository series—Max Lerner, editor of The Nation and former lecturer on government at Harvard discusses the effects of the recent court decisions on our economic policy, the judicial prospects of the balance of the New Deal legislation and the proposals for limiting the power of the court either by Congressional action or by constitutional amendment.

ALSO — DRAMA Joseph Wood Krutch
FACTS FOR CONSUMERS . . . Ruth Brindze
ISSUES AND MEN . . . Oswald Garrison Villard
FILMS Mark Van Doren
LOOSE CONSTRUCTION . . . Heywood Brown

ORDER FORM

THE NATION 20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK CITY

☐ Enter my subscription for one year for $5. ☐ I enclose payment OR ☐ I will pay in thirty days. (☐ 2 years for $8. ☐ 3 years for $11.)

Name _____

Address _____

THE TIMES OF LONDON

LITERARY SUPPLEMENT

The Times (of London) Literary Supplement is the foremost authority on books, new and old, written in the English tongue. It provides the widest variety of reading, from the newest thriller to the latest work of scholarship. Those who consider books an essential part of life rely on its impartial and expert judgment and delight in its eloquent and exact diction.

Printed in the clearest of type on the whitest of paper, The Literary Supplement is an invitation to the eye.

Annual subscription: $4.15 (post free). Full particulars from The Times Office, 280 Broadway, New York City.

remains popular. I have respect for Mr. Stern's learning and for his powers of critical analysis, but I hear with a touch of horror that he wants to start Film Universities and organize Little Cinema Groups. The daily and weekly critics for whom he has so much contempt because they persist in noting microscopic differences between one technically undistinguished film and another are actually up the proper tree. Most of them shake nothing down except the rotten fruit of their rhetoric, yet there they are where they can see the pictures—as entertainment, or, as Don Marquis puts it, as story. And it remains possible that a few of them will begin to talk about the things that matter: the conduct of a narrative, the simplification and illumination of a theme, the use of imagination in transitions from one locality or one episode to another—in short, the things which make the best movies as exciting as they are.

Excitement is good for the soul, and I freely confess that that is what I look for among the picture houses of New York. I haven't the least objection to such popular devices as the recognition scene; they are the profoundest also, as Euripides and Shakespeare perfectly knew. And I seriously doubt that Mr. Stern uses the word "shallow" with discretion. The other night I tracked down "The 39 Steps" to Canal Street after having missed it all winter in the warmer and more fragrant theaters. If such a film is shallow I find I do not mind; it is what any film should be and what the best of them have always been regardless of date or fashion: simple, clear, swift, and very exciting. I cannot say as much for "Charlie Chan's Secret" (Roxy) or "Ceiling Zero" (Strand). And "Itto" (Cinéma de Paris), the French film taken in Morocco under the direction of Jean Benoit-Levy and Marie Epstein, celebrated for the theory which stood them in such good stead in "La Maternelle," merely proves that a theory had better be understood before it is applied. The theory is that there should be no conscious acting in a film, and indeed no actors. It worked for the children of Montmartre, but it does not work for men and women. Even the adults of Morocco need to know what they are doing before we can become absorbed in what they do.

MARK VAN DOREN

3 POPULAR MAGAZINE BARGAINS

All subscriptions are for one year, sent to different addresses if desired, new or renewals. Payment may be postponed thirty days.

The Nation with

Harpers Magazine $6.⁵⁰

The Guardian 7.⁰⁰
(Manchester, England Weekly)

Reader's Digest 6.⁰⁰

The Nation 20 Vesey Street New York City

Please enter my order for the magazines listed below. ☐ I enclose my check for $ OR ☐ I will pay in thirty days.

MAGAZINES

SEND TO

2-12-36

Contributors to This Issue

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's Moscow correspondent, is contributing a series of articles from various European capitals.

CARLETON BEALS is the author of "The Story of Huey Long."

FRANZ HÖLLERING was editor of the Berliner Zeitung am Mittag and of other liberal papers in Berlin until he was exiled by the Nazis.

ISIDOR FEINSTEIN is an associate editor of the New York Post.

ALVIN JOHNSON is director of the New School for Social Research.

ANITA BRENNER contributes articles to various periodicals.

LOUIS M. HACKER, lecturer in economics at Columbia University, is the author of "A Short History of the New Deal."

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, of the Department of Political Science of the University of Chicago, is the author of "The Nazi Dictatorship."

TALBOT HAMLIN is a practicing architect of New York and lecturer at the Columbia University School of Architecture.

FRANCIS FERGUSSON is a member of the staff of Bennington College.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1936

No. 3685

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	205
EDITORIALS:
Lewis—for Better or Worse	208
The Budget in Chaos	209
J. P. Morgan, Theorist of the Leisure Class	209
The Gustloff Affair	210
ISSUES AND MEN. POLITICS AND FRIENDSHIPS. By Oswald Garrison Villard	211
CARTOON. By Fritz	212
THE RIDDLE OF THE SUPREME COURT. II. THE LAW. LESS SUPREME COURT. By Max Lerner	213
WASHINGTON WEEKLY. By Paul W. Ward	215
PHOTOGRAPHING THIS WORLD. By Margaret Bourke-White	217
PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES. KNOX—PUBLISHER INTO CANDIDATE. By Raymond Gram Swing	219
LOOSE CONSTRUCTION. By Heywood Brown	220
CORRESPONDENCE	221
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE	223
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
The Dressmakers' Strike. By David Scheyer	224
Hollywood Goes Closed Shop. By John R. Chaplin	225
BOOKS, DRAMA, FILMS:
Patriot and Idealist. By Clara Gruening Stillman	227
Subtle Artificer. By Philip Blair Rice	228
Judging the Judges. By William Seagle	228
Scotsman, Georgian, Cosmopolite. By Milton Rugoff	229
The Esoteric Science. By Maxwell S. Stewart	230
Shorter Notices	231
Drama: The Follies Must Go On. By Joseph Wood Krutch	231
Films: Charlie Chaplin. By Mark Van Doren	232

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional.

THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1936, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Gruening, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

BY REJECTING a Labor motion calling upon the government to summon an international conference on the distribution of raw materials, the Baldwin Cabinet has forfeited whatever moral prestige it retained after the disastrous Hoare-Laval fiasco. This action is particularly distressing because Sir Samuel Hoare's speech at Geneva in October had given the impression that Great Britain was prepared to discuss fundamentals. The issue runs even deeper than the question of access to raw materials. Sir Samuel's historic statement came as part of an inspiring plea for collective action against those who would take the law into their own hands. But if collective security is to have any permanence, it must involve something more than mere defense of the status quo. War cannot be eliminated unless some machinery is created for meeting the legitimate complaints of the "have-nots" among nations. As the most powerful of the "haves," Great Britain has a pivotal responsibility for such action, a responsibility which the present government is plainly unwilling to assume. The fact that the Conservatives, after a pre-election flirtation with collective security, have returned to straight imperialism, with reliance on ever-increasing armaments, gives Labor a golden opportunity with the ten million Britishers who voted to support the League in the peace poll.

MUNITIONS MAKERS, oil magnates, and Wall Street bankers will rejoice in the decision of Administration leaders to abandon permanent neutrality legislation at this session of Congress. The extension of the present resolution, even with amendments forbidding loans to belligerents and limiting the export of certain war materials, will leave the United States with very little more protection against war than existed in 1914. It will not only be possible for American business men to continue "normal" trade with the war-makers, but they may sell unlimited quantities of war materials, including arms and ammunition, through neutral countries. Continued insistence on the freedom of the seas will afford a constant source of friction in any conflict in which the British Empire is involved. The prohibition of loans to belligerents is of vital importance, but without other safeguards such a regulation is bound to break down as it did in 1916. What may prove to be even more serious, the failure of Congress to take decisive action has played into the hands of Mussolini. After a week's session the Oil Sanctions Committee of the League had reached the conclusion that an oil embargo, if supported by the United States, would bring Italy to its knees within six months, and was prepared to recommend such a step to the Council. Its position was quickly reversed, however, when it became apparent that the United States would make no attempt to curb its oil profiteers. The tremendous increase in our trade with Italy during December, despite the slowness with which collections are being made, indicates that certain of our business interests already have a considerable stake in an Italian victory. Can it be possible that they have more influence in Washington than the multitudes of men and women who desire peace?

THE INDICTMENT of four men and three companies for gun-running during the Chaco war reveals certain of the difficulties that must be faced in enforcing neutrality legislation. The government charges that in July, 1934, the Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation with the aid of the Barr Shipping Company smuggled fifteen machine-guns into Bolivia in violation of the Presidential arms-embargo proclamation. Later four airplanes were also sent to Bolivia, ostensibly as test planes for a new commercial line, but in reality as bombers which were to be fully equipped in Valparaiso. The machine-guns were obtained from the Colt Company after a false declaration of State Department authorization and a false bill of lading had been presented. Colt thereupon delivered the guns to Curtiss-Wright and they were hidden away in cases containing airplane parts. The bombers were flown to Bolivia, but the United States government grounded them in Peru and they never reached Bolivia; the machine-guns did. This is but one of about a dozen instances of alleged violation of the arms embargo during the Chaco war which the government is investigating. Two facts stand out challengingly in all this gun-running:

the enforcement of the embargo through the Customs Office failed; and government prosecution lagged a year and a half after the offense. There is no reason whatever to hope that munitions control through the customs will ever succeed. Government inspectors may be found in meat-packing houses, in distilleries, in banks, and in other enterprises subject to official control. Why not place them also in the munitions factories and make it more difficult to evade embargoes?

ON SEVERAL OCCASIONS recently the New York Times has printed articles purporting to show that the Soviet Union is actively aiding Mussolini in his campaign against Ethiopia through the export of oil and other war materials. For example, on February 5, under the head "Huge Soviet Sales of Oil Help Italy," the Times spoke vaguely of a contract for "enormous oil supplies from Russia," the only confirming evidence being a guarded statement regarding the purchase of 400,000 barrels at Batum. In the absence of an oil sanction the Soviet Union, like all other oil-producing countries, has continued to trade with Italy. But as is the case with England there has apparently been a conscious effort to curtail all commercial transactions. For the first eleven months of 1935—the latest available figures—the total of Soviet exports to Italy were only 11,720,000 rubles as compared with 17,126,000 in the corresponding period of 1934, a decline of more than 30 per cent; while Soviet imports from Italy—which are more directly affected by existing sanctions—dropped more than 50 per cent. And what is more to the point, Soviet exports of oil for the eleven-month period were 199,381 tons in 1935 as against 569,453 tons in 1934, a decline of nearly 70 per cent. By way of contrast, American exports to Italy for the first eleven months of 1935 increased 8 per cent over 1934; our imports from Italy rose 5 per cent; and our sales of oil to Italian Africa jumped from $4,587 to $672,155, an increase of 14,600 per cent! Nor can the New York Times plead ignorance of these facts. The early editions of the Times of February 5 carried two paragraphs describing the decline in the sale of Soviet oil to Italy from 7,000,000 barrels in 1932 and 1933 to 1,350,000 barrels in the first ten months of 1935. But these two paragraphs with their subhead "Russian Exports Long Low" were dropped in the later editions of the paper, presumably because they were not "fit to print."

TWO DAYS before the Winter Olympics opened at Garmisch-Partenkirchen, the State Secretary of the German Propaganda Ministry gave a reception to several hundred journalists assembled to report the events. In a long political speech Secretary Funk scolded the correspondents for not telling the truth about Germany and offered trained guides who would present things in the proper light to foreign newspapermen. Moreover, he held up the German press as an example of what supreme public service might be expected of newspapers. Apparently taking this homily to heart, Frederick T. Birchall, reporting for the New York Times, describes the Winter Games as compounded almost entirely of sweetness and light. There is the greatest efficiency and courtesy everywhere; not the slightest evidence of religious, political, or racial prejudice is visible; "anti-Jewish signs have been removed from villages"; the Stürmer is being kept out of sight; and "a Jewish hockey player has even been drafted for the German team." This last evidence of German magnanimity is almost overwhelming. For the "Juden Hier Nicht Willkommen" signs can be put back again directly the games are over; but if a Jewish hockey player should shoot a goal for the Nazis, it would stand on the records permanently as an example of nasty Semitic internationalism.

G GOVERNOR LEHMAN'S program of crime prevention and control has had a much better press than it deserves. The best thing that can be said about it is that it represents a vigorous and comprehensive attempt to deal with the entire problem of the administration of criminal justice. The sixty-odd bills cover prevention, capture, court procedure, problems of prison and parole, and procedure for inter-state extradition. They are designed mainly to close the loopholes in the law through which so many criminals escape from justice. Particularly controversial are the bills making compulsory the finger-printing of all persons arrested, permitting a judge to comment on evidence, making it possible for five-sixths of a jury to convict, and making the discovery of a gun in a car presumptive evidence of its illegal possession by all the persons in the vehicle except the driver. The intentions behind the program are clear. Like those who hold that the weaknesses of democracy can be cured by having more democracy, Governor Lehman and his advisers seem to feel that the inadequacy of law enforcement can be remedied by the simple process of having more law enforcement. Given such a point of view, it must be admitted that the program has been ably and ingeniously drawn. The juggernaut of law enforcement is to be driven irresistibly over every obstacle in its path. Undoubtedly the program will remedy many of the abuses of criminal justice which are now due to the sophistication of hardened criminals and their unscrupulous lawyers. But the resulting effectiveness of the bill has probably been overestimated, and the price that has to be paid for it has been underestimated.

THE PRICE OF JUSTICE in the case of Governor Lehman's program involves a possible surrender of long-cherished constitutional safeguards and civil liberties and a potential weighting of the scales against labor defendants. The finger-printing provisions are extended to include all misdemeanants and those charged with disorderly conduct; it is trade unionists who are charged with disorderly conduct more often than criminals. Anyone once convicted of disorderly conduct and again accused of a felony is, even if he is not convicted, to be refused the return of his finger-prints and other identifying material. This makes the acquisition of a police record dangerously easy, and a police record is no help to an active unionist. The provision about dangerous weapons in vehicles offers attractive possibilities for a frame-up. The five-sixths jury provision undermines the protection furnished hitherto by the phrase "reasonable doubt." To anyone who has had experience with labor cases before a New York court these possibilities are not phantoms but very real dangers. Governor Lehman's program is the most elaborate and articulated gesture of impatience at the lumbering processes of democratic justice that we have yet had. But to abandon constitutional liberties which have been won by the people over so many centuries of struggle is too high a price to pay for such a gesture. This is especially true in New York State, where the criminal code instead of being too lax is already notoriously severe. The problem of crime will not be solved by the blunderbuss methods of Grover Whalen or J. Edgar Hoover. There are two points at which it should be attacked which the Lehman program does not envisage. One is the corruption of the entire political structure which administers the law, especially the police and the magistrates' courts. The second is the soil of poverty, malnutrition, and slum conditions out of which crime grows.

TWENTY-FIVE STATES and thirty-eight local areas in various parts of the country lately supplied data for a survey conducted by the American Association of Social Workers to determine how much relief an unemployed person or family might hope to receive. In general the results showed that the abandonment of the FERA program left to local relief not only unemployables but a large number of persons able to work. Drastic reduction in relief budgets has followed; in many cases medical care is being abandoned; many localities report themselves entirely unable to carry the relief load. Specific examples of particularly inadequate relief include Pensacola, Florida, which every two weeks allows relief budgets to cover all needs as follows: One or two persons, $1; families of three or four, $1.50; families of seven, eight, or nine, $3; families of more than nine, $3.50. Nebraska reported that the regular allowance for food was cut 37 per cent, with an average allowance of $7.50 a month for all types of relief. Dallas, Texas, reported all relief abolished "except in cases of permanent disability." Grand Rapids reported a reduction of 10 per cent in food budgets and cash relief allowances; "if reduced any farther they will enter the danger zone." Texas declared that a constitutional amendment would be necessary to increase relief appropriations. The Florida constitution prevents the state from appropriating funds for direct relief. These facts and figures give some idea of what will happen to more and more of the unemployed if the federal government does not reassume the relief burden.

THE GRASS GROWS GREEN again over the deepest fissure so far made in the solid Democratic South. The bitter fight between Administration Democrats and Huey Long Democrats has ended in a truce. Its terms are a last tribute to the Kingfish; its practical effect of making Louisiana safe for Roosevelt must have caused a thin blue curl of profane smoke to rise from Huey's grave. In return for guaranteed delivery of Louisiana's twenty delegates, the Long machine was able to enforce stiff terms. The income-tax indictments pending against Seymour Weiss, former treasurer of Long's machine, will be quashed; Long's inheritors will be allowed access to the rich table of federal patronage—Representative Paul Maloney was recently consulted regarding his choice for postmaster at Gretna, Louisiana; Frank H. Peterman, a Farley man, has resigned as WPA director for Louisiana, opening the way to the Long machine for a share of control over federal funds. The decision to let Huey's heirs keep Louisiana until the crucial moment when Roosevelt should need it came, to be sure, only after the Administration had made a heroic but unsuccessful attempt to defeat the Long machine. The recent primary, in spite of the fact that federal relief suddenly grew more bounteous and widespread, resulted in an overwhelming victory for Long's forces. Aside from conceding Louisiana's delegation to Roosevelt, the Long machine made one minor sacrifice. The Reverend Gerald K. Smith, who as head revivalist of that old-time religion, Share Our Wealth, controlled the swamp and Spanish-moss vote in Huey's kingdom, has been ordered to pipe down. He has already offered his services to Brother Talmadge.

THE FEDERAL COURT in Minneapolis which censured Governor Olson, Mayor Latimer, and the National Guard took extraordinary action to meet an extraordinary situation. It is not often that the state militia in its determination to maintain law and order closes a plant on strike, although that would prevent nine "labor riots" out of ten. Instead, the military usually helps strike-breakers run the picket line to the accompaniment of tear-gas bombs and clubs. In Minneapolis the labor movement, headed by the famous Local 574, wields genuine power. It exercises, in other words, an influence which has some relation to labor's contribution to the community. Governor Olson, even if he were not sympathetic to labor, would not dare to turn the National Guard on labor's picket lines as it is turned in most states. The tone of the federal court's edict leaves no doubt where its sympathies lie. "To say that because lawful use of property will incite lawless persons [workers on strike] to commit crime and destroy life and property such lawful use must be suppressed is to say that the will of the mob [workers on strike] and not the Constitution of the United States is to become the law of the land." As Governor Olson pointed out, the court's criticism of himself "would have been accomplished with more finesse if coupled with it there had been a gentle, courteous, and decorous hint to the plaintiffs [the employers] respecting arbitration." The decision will probably be seized upon by other employers and employer-minded courts. And it serves as a sign of what may be expected whenever labor begins to approximate the power blocked out for it, say, in the Wagner Labor Relations Act.

MEANWHILE IN PEKIN, Illinois, the general strike, which in most cases has been turned into a weapon against the workers who resorted to it, seems to have won a moderate victory for labor. According to newspaper dispatches, the American Distilling Company, where the strike began, acceded to "almost all" of the workers' demands. Here again the state militia played a crucial role. Governor Horner's refusal to order troops into Pekin probably threw the victory to the workers. The Pekin Trade and Labor Assembly did not, however, force the resignation of Chief of Police Harry Donahue for giving help to strike-breakers. A busload of scabs were protected by a detail of deputies and police who threw tear and stench bombs into the picket line. Chief Donahue distinguished himself further by repeating the old formula: "What this town needs is a vigilante committee of 100 tough citizens." There is no doubt that if they had been on hand the general strike would have been violent where it was peaceful and "riots" would have helped to break it. Instead, the two-day tie-up (the Chicago Tribune called it "mob rule in the saddle") was complete and bloodless; it ended with a settlement that seems acceptable to labor. We may be sure that Chief Donahue and his friends among the "tough citizens" will do their best to see that this does not happen again in Pekin.

Lewis—for Better or Worse

WITH a showmanship worthy of P. T. Barnum, John L. Lewis took over the leadership of the American labor movement on February 3. The setting was the nation's capital—the United Mine Workers, whose home is Indianapolis, held their convention in Washington for the first time; and the ceremony of investiture, personally conducted by Lewis, was as dramatic as any power-hungry leader, or any front-page editor, could wish. The audience, composed of some 1,800 delegates from the largest union in the American Federation of Labor, was for the most part in the hands of Lewis, who drew forth roaring cheers, rising votes, and hostile boos as he desired. In contrast to the sun-dried Miami meeting of the Executive Council of the A. F. of L., to whose querulous ultimatum it was an answer, the miners' convention was a rich and lively manifestation of mass strength pushing toward genuine power in national affairs. No wonder William F. Green, though he made a passionate and able speech in an attempt to persuade his fellow-miners that their first allegiance was to the A. F. of L., should have appeared futile and outworn beside the confident Lewis, who brought the meeting to a climax when, having won the support of the delegates, he crumpled in his fist the sheet bearing the dissolution order of the Executive Council, and said, "President Green, you have received your answer!"

Returning to reality, it must be said that Lewis's battle with the Executive Council is not yet over. Though he has a mandate from the U. M. W. to take the union out of the federation if necessary, he will make a strong effort to avoid the final break, and it is even possible that by forcing the Executive Council to a compromise he will himself accept something less than complete victory. But there is little doubt that he will be the leader, however the labor movement develops. He has already shouldered out Green, in the public mind and in administration circles. As for his Committee for Industrial Organization, it has started a wildfire of resolutions of support extending from Edmonton, Alberta, to Pea Ridge, Alabama. In this connection, it is illuminating to record that when John Lewis spoke recently in Cleveland he drew an audience of 7,000, while John P. Frey, dominant figure in the Metal Trades Section of the A. F. of L., who had preceded Lewis, drew a paltry 500.

The miners' convention, closely examined, offers indications as reliable as can be found of the quality and direction of the leadership Lewis will provide and of the motives which animate him. The personal magnetism of the born leader and his intuitive knowledge of the avenues to popular support were never better displayed than at the Washington meeting. But there were also laid bare, in unmistakable terms, the strong man's proclivity—and his disturbing talent—for dictatorship and his predilection not only for power but for its least romantic perquisites. The history of Lewis's rise to supremacy in the miners' union is the history of a series of seizures of power as well as of hard-boiled and completely fearless conquests by means of the strike, when Lewis was forced to that way of bringing operators to his terms. There are strong voices to say even that Lewis has not achieved for the miners benefits at all commensurate with his power. The charge undoubtedly has truth in it; the trouble is that its final proof or disproof is made impossible by the fact that Lewis has been operating in a steadily declining industry.

The bid for autonomy in the seventeen provisional districts was an attempt not to oppose Lewis but to have a hand in directing his course. It failed. An interesting question is raised by the doubling of official salaries. It is not clear whether its subsequent rejection was a deliberate gesture of renunciation or a yielding to critical pressure. Will Lewis stop short of his announced goal of organizing 30,000,000 workers if it appears likely that their sheer mass pressure will threaten his supremacy? The answer at the moment seems to be that Lewis's conception of power is a very ambitious one—he would not, for instance, be satisfied with the kind of limited position that Green has occupied in national affairs. That being so, he is intelligent enough to know that he will have to make more concessions to his new followers than he has ever made to the miners.

It seems certain that the influx of millions of workers into the labor movement would mean a stronger and stronger pressure for democratic control and that it would also mean a pressure toward the left. Whether Lewis will be big enough and strong enough to satisfy these new elements and still retain leadership is a problem whose working out will make the next few years of labor development highly interesting as well as crucial. As to his relation to radicalism, that can at least be guessed at. Miners, if only because of their occupation, are traditionally radical—though it is a radicalism having more to do with their daily contact with death and disaster than with revolutionary theory. Lewis is a miner and the son of a British miner. Radicalism is not for him a bearded monster under the bed. It is a force to be reckoned with in realistic terms. Certainly he will not indulge in anything resembling a red-hunt in the trade-union movement. This does not mean that he will ever play with the Socialist or Communist parties as such. It does mean that he would support a labor party if he reached the point where political power was essential to his plans.

For the present Mr. Lewis has indorsed Roosevelt in a passionate speech as the most humanitarian of Presidents, and the United Mine Workers have taken the unprecedented action of voting to contribute to the Democratic campaign fund. It is surely an irony that the most promising militant leader of the American labor movement should as late as 1936 express such support of one of the old parties. But there are extenuating circumstances. Not long ago Lewis was a Republican. He is not now an unquestioning Democrat despite his support of Roosevelt. Under the New Deal he commands a position which he, least of all, could be expected to repudiate for idealistic reasons. He is not one to sacrifice the favor of the party in power in order to start a movement which could not possibly have any strength for several years at least. When the labor movement has become under his generalship a genuine force, he may be expected to turn it to political ends.

The Budget in Chaos

AMERICAN government finances have never been more chaotic than at the present moment. This is not, of course, due entirely or even principally to the prodigality of the present Administration. The Supreme Court's invalidation of the AAA processing taxes subtracted $547,000,000 from the estimated receipts and returned an additional $200,000,000 of impounded taxes, and the passage of the bonus over the President's veto inopportunistically added $2,249,000,000 to the government's burden. The possibilities of economy are definitely limited. With more than 11,000,000 persons still unemployed, relief expenditures cannot be curtailed; nor is there any possibility of a drastic cut in the subsidies to agriculture. Under such circumstances any government, Republican, Democratic, or Farmer-Labor, would be faced with a serious financial crisis.

But the issue has been so clouded by partisanship and misrepresentation that it is difficult to see the true state of the federal budget. As a result the public has been led to believe the situation to be more desperate than it actually is. Early in January, when President Roosevelt presented his budget estimates for the 1936-37 fiscal year, there was an indicated deficit of only $418,000,000. To this must be added $2,000,000,000, which Secretary Morgenthau estimates will be needed for relief in addition to the amount specified in the budget, $500,000,000 for the farmers, $200,000,000 to replace the impounded AAA taxes returned to the processors, and approximately $200,000,000 to cover the cost of amortizing the bonus. If no further taxes were levied and no economies effected, this would leave a deficit, excluding all allowances for debt retirement, of approximately $3,300,000,000, which compares not unfavorably with this year's estimated deficit of $2,682,000,000 or last year's shortage of $3,002,000,000. Although this would carry the federal debt to approximately $36,000,000,000 in 1937, the actual burden of interest would probably not be more than 20 per cent higher than in 1929.

Rumors have been flying thick and fast about the means the Administration will adopt to reduce the deficit to a manageable amount. But at the time of writing nothing very tangible has been suggested, apart from the reimposition of general taxes on the processing of farm products to replace those invalidated by the Supreme Court. The Administration's indecision is perhaps understandable on political grounds. Neither economies nor increased taxes can be put through without injury to some portion of the voting public. Nevertheless, something must be done, if only to offset the Republicans' charge of extravagance. The fact that the present Administration had little to do with some of the main items which have unbalanced the budget will not be considered by the average voter in November. President Roosevelt's action in canceling a billion dollars in unused lending authorizations is a gesture toward economy, but it has no effect on the budget. The Treasury is apparently still looking for a tax which the people will pay without knowing it. Since such taxes almost invariably fall on the general consumer, they are perhaps the least desirable of all.

The inability of the Administration to formulate a consistent fiscal policy is dangerous chiefly because it presents an invitation to pressure groups to launch new raids on the Treasury. Billions of the taxpayers' dollars have been handed out to organized groups merely because the Administration was unable to present Congress with a carefully worked-out program. Nearly half a billion, for example, has been squandered on the silver interests to no purpose whatever. Munition and armament manufacturers are obtaining in 1936-37 approximately $400,000,000 more than the huge sums allotted to them in the 1935 fiscal year. Having seen these groups plunder the Treasury, is it any wonder that the veterans, potato growers, and coal operators should have demanded and obtained a hand-out? The tragedy is that once the money has been distributed to these pressure groups there is none left for such socially necessary projects as slum clearance, social security, or adequate public-health activities. We hear much today about the threat of inflation, which would be catastrophic in its effect on both the working and white-collar classes, but there is an equally great danger that the present Republican-inspired mania for economy will lead to a recurrence of deflation and depression. A truly efficient government might be compelled to spend vastly more than has been spent in the last three years, but it would pay for these expenditures by taxing the hoard of capital which is still accumulating, idle, in the vaults of our great banks.

Morgan, Theorist of the Leisure Class

THE inquiry into the House of Morgan has come and gone, and for those who doubted that it would turn up anything of value it has yielded finally a theory and a definition. Both were contributed by Mr. Morgan himself, and both referred to the leisure class. The theory was that the leisure class is the basis of civilization. The definition, added at the request of reporters after the formal hearing, and evidently in the nature of a reconsidered judgment, was that the leisure class was "all who can afford to hire a maid."

That meant, Mr. Morgan added, "perhaps thirty million families." The estimate seems overgenerous. It would include every family alive in the country today, and a few dead ones as well. Actually, there are 3,438,000 women engaged in domestic and personal service, of whom slightly more than a third are household servants. Even if you spread them out one to a family, that means not much over a million families who have been able to hire a maid.

But even if Mr. Morgan is a confused statistician, he got a good press as a social theorist. He deserved it richly. Americans have been treated to discussions of the leisure class by radicals and sociologists, but the men of wealth themselves have been chary of discussing it. It will be recalled that the last important American contribution to the theory of the leisure class was by Thorstein Veblen, who wrote an acid book on the subject. But Veblen, being a professor and a son of the soil, was an outsider. The Morgans are different. The elder Morgan was something of a mathematician in his own right, and as a patron and connoisseur of the arts he followed the tradition of the merchant princes of the Renaissance. The leanings of the present Morgan, if we can judge from the Nye committee record, seem to be toward a social philosophy of the leisure class. It was a subject he was certain to illumine and adorn. After all, he ought to know.

"If you destroy the leisure class," Mr. Morgan warned the Nye committee, "you destroy civilization. Civilizations have died before, but they always come back. How great the danger would be I've never been able to decide." These speculations on history have a sweep and a scope that furnish a welcome contrast to Henry Ford's now historic conviction that history is bunk. Like Spengler and other German philosophers, Mr. Morgan has a cyclical theory of history. Like them also he considers a leisure class the carriers of civilization instead of—following Veblen—its parasite. In fact, in its ultimate terms, Mr. Morgan's theory is not necessarily pessimistic. Those who are concerned about the prospect for our generation will be consoled when they remember Mr. Morgan's certainty that civilizations come back. That should help us to confront the forces that are leading to war and barbarism.

But however optimistic for civilization, Mr. Morgan fears for the leisure class itself. What is the nature of his fears? How will the leisure class be destroyed? Not by war, surely, since it is predominately the common man who fights the wars and gets destroyed by them. Not by the blight of depression and inflation that follow a war, for those bear more heavily on workers than on the leisure class. Not by revolution, surely. Mr. Morgan was talking to the committee about taxes. His fear was that the leisure class would be destroyed by taxation, and in order to save the leisure class and civilization as well he was advocating that the costs of war be shifted to the lower-income groups.

This makes us more certain than ever that the leisure class that Mr. Morgan had in mind was not the "family of five" with one maid. It was the class that has to bear the burden of the excess-profits tax in war. The heaven of theory is never very far from the earth of economic interest.

The Gustloff Affair

SO far the assassination of the Swiss Nazi leader William Gustloff has not had the dire consequences for Jews in the Reich which were generally expected. Nevertheless, it is difficult to believe that Berlin will be content to leave retribution for this ill-considered and ineffectual deed entirely in the hands of the Swiss authorities. For the present the Winter Olympics, which began in Garmisch-Partenkirchen on February 7, make it advisable for the Reich government to observe the strictest decorum in its treatment of the Jews. But one can read between the lines of an announcement that memorials will be held for Gustloff after February 16, the end of the Winter Olympics.

Dr. Gustloff was little known beyond the borders of Switzerland, where he was a notorious figure. He went there in 1932, sent by Hitler just before he became Chancellor. Prior to that time National Socialism had been a strictly German affair to the Swiss people. It was Gustloff who organized the first Nazi groups in Switzerland, and who later was instrumental in uniting all nationalist and reactionary political groups with his Nazi followers into a "National Front." The growth of the Fronten movement brought almost immediate unrest and disturbance into the placidity of Swiss politics. The rise of German National Socialism, the brutal force of its coordination of all public and private life in the Reich, its destruction of trade unions and political parties, and above all its emphasis on the German nationalist idea reverberated wherever German-speaking Swiss congregated.

What followed was a repetition of the last years of German National Socialism before Hitler's accession to power. Social Democratic editors and trade-union leaders in Zurich and Berne were attacked and beaten, and several assassinations were attempted. In the colleges and universities teachers who were members of the Gustloff organization spread anti-Semitic views. A reign of political terrorism reached such dimensions that police headquarters in Zurich were forced to issue a warning on February 1, 1934, "to political terrorists who tried to intimidate witnesses called by the police to testify in a number of bomb explosions." Shortly before, Grau, the Social Democratic editor of the Volksrecht, and his family had narrowly escaped death in a bomb attack. The rise of the Swiss Nazis was coincident with the growth of rowdiness in national politics.

What aroused the particular resentment of anti-Nazi elements was the fact that the National Socialists made no secret of their belief that Switzerland must, sooner or later, become a part of the great German empire. Indeed, since Herr Gustloff bore the title of Leader of the Nazi District of Switzerland, it appeared that National Socialists already regarded Switzerland as a part of the Reich. Carrying out the idea of its Austrian and Russian legions, the German National Socialist Party in Berlin created the Bund National-Sozialistischer Eidgenossen, a league of uniformed Swiss Nazis living in Germany, with the help of which the Swiss S. A. was organized to "come to the assistance of the Germans in Switzerland in the hour of liberation." When this legion was founded in Berlin, Dr. Morganti, its organizer, declared that Switzerland was sorely in need of a government upheaval. He referred to the Swiss constitution as a citadel of Freemasonry and called the National Council a college of seven Freemasons. The land, he declared, must be freed from the corrupting influence of the Jews.

The presence of Fascist Italy on the borders of Switzerland had never had any influence on Swiss national affairs until after this development. But with the growth of the Nazi forces Mussolini's followers in the non-German cantons began to take notice. The Italians in Canton Tessin inaugurated an energetic secessionist campaign, and French nationalists likewise began to take a more active interest in political affairs. All this did not contribute to the tranquility of the tri-lingual republic. The bourgeois parties, which were at first inclined to lend a sympathetic ear to the demands of the Fronten movement, began to realize that the emphasis on national and racial differences would sooner or later endanger the existence of the state. The old Conservative Party was the first to sever its connections, and the Fronten movement lost heavily in all cantons in the last elections. As a matter of fact, National Socialism as imported from Germany has already ceased to be an active menace in Swiss politics. Dr. Gustloff, having lived through the rise and decline of the Swiss Nazi movement, now follows it into a grave of its own making.

Issues and Men

Politics and Friendships

AL SMITH'S bitter and unjust attack upon President Roosevelt doubtless ends what was once a beautiful friendship. If one recalls the famous Madison Square Garden convention in 1924 there arises at once the picture of Franklin Roosevelt, lately recovered from his illness, achieving a new height as a speaker in his "Happy Warrior" address in behalf of Al Smith. It made many besides myself then wonder whether Mr. Roosevelt, were he a bit older and more firmly reestablished in health, might not be the compromise candidate instead of Newton D. Baker or John W. Davis. Certainly it would seem as if the obligations under which Franklin Roosevelt placed Al Smith at that time might have barred a man with finer feelings from ever criticizing the man who so gallantly championed him.

But the history of politics teems with similar instances of broken friendships which have profoundly affected political currents. Henry Pringle has just reviewed at length for the Dictionary of American Biography the famous quarrel between Theodore Roosevelt and William H. Taft, which resulted in the Republican split in 1912, the election of Wilson to the Presidency, and all the national and international consequences thereof. He finds that there was no one cause for it, no break over any particular act of Mr. Taft's, but a general drifting into active antagonism because of differing points of view. This is, I think, the true explanation. I remember that one of Mr. Taft's private secretaries asked me very earnestly before Mr. Roosevelt returned from his European visits whether I believed it possible that he would break with Mr. Taft. When I replied that I was sure that he would, the secretary remained incredulous. It was not possible; it could not be. It would be an inexcusable betrayal of man and party. None the less, the break did come. Hurt as he was, however, Mr. Taft never descended to a personal attack and exercised exemplary restraint.

The parting of the two men was not only a matter of diverging philosophies and temperaments and political programs. It grew in considerable measure out of Theodore Roosevelt's fatal mistake in choosing his successor, and Taft's in allowing himself to be chosen and forced on the party. That immediately created an impossible situation, especially with Theodore Roosevelt's personality. He could not forget what he had done for Taft; consciously or unconsciously, it made him feel not only that the new President was bound in honor to walk precisely in his footsteps, but that any divergence constituted treason and disloyalty. Had he not made him both Secretary of War and President? There is where the mischief was done. When one of two friends accepts a tremendous favor from the other, a deadly blow may be struck at the edifice of their friendship. Precisely this element entered into the Smith-Roosevelt relationship. Al Smith cannot forget that it was he and no one else who gave Franklin Roosevelt his opportunity to reenter public life when he drafted him to run for Governor. As I have pointed out elsewhere, under the Tammany code this should have made Franklin Al's faithful vassal from then on, with no right whatever to put himself ahead of his benefactor. Al Smith today does not consider that he has been disloyal to a friend in his latest attack. For he feels with every fiber of his being that Franklin Roosevelt betrayed him first—at Chicago in 1932 by taking the nomination himself. There, Al would say, was where the break took place, for he feels sure that the "breach of faith" alone kept him out of the Presidency—he is certain any Democrat, Catholic or otherwise, could have been elected when Roosevelt was.

It would be, of course, wrong to lay down the law that friendships must always be kept intact at the expense of political principles, or the welfare of the nation. No matter how close the tie between two men, it is bound to give way before a conflict on pure principle. The difficulty is that in these political friendships it is so hard to keep the question of personal success or prestige out of the motives influencing the break. But no one can expect silence on the part of a friend when the other has done what appears to be a wrong and unworthy act. Gladstone had warmly cooperated with Charles Parnell for years to bring about Home Rule in Ireland. When the news came that Parnell had been made co-respondent in the O'Shea divorce case, Gladstone at first wanted to keep out of the whole matter. "What!" he cried, "because a man is what is called leader of a party, does that constitute him a censor and a judge of faith and morals? I will not accept it. It would make life intolerable." But he soon found that he could not maintain that attitude. He would not or could not defy the rising public protest in religious and social circles because Parnell had committed the sin of being found out. Historians and playwrights differ about his subsequent policy and the sincerity of it. But Parnell was forced out, to die within a couple of years, and the cause of Home Rule was put back for nearly a third of a century. The suspicion remains that at heart Gladstone was glad to see Parnell disappear. They were of course not intimate friends, but they had been pulling together for something that was profoundly needed, as history has since shown, and the resultant years of delay cost both England and Ireland dear in ill-will, disorder, destruction, and death.

It now remains to be seen whether Al Smith, in the hate and bitterness which corrode his soul to such a degree as to make him reverse himself in his political thinking and political associations, will foment a third ticket like the Bull Moose Party in order thus to insure Roosevelt's defeat, if possible, by drawing off a sufficient number of Democrats. It would be a pitiful spectacle, if only because it would make Al continue to stultify himself, and might result in the election of a completely reactionary President opposed to all the things that Al stood for until the break at Chicago in 1932.

Howell Garrison Villard

Poor old Constitution! How can she get rid of all her protectors?

The Riddle of the Supreme Court

II. The Lawless Supreme Court

By MAX LERNER

NOTHING is clearer in Washington today than that the Supreme Court justices are at sixes and threes. The personal tension among them is no mere accident of individual temperament or will. One of the marks of constitutional crisis is the sharpening of differences on the court.

During the preliminary skirmishes on the New Deal legislation the court seemed to fall into three loose groups. The most cohesive was that of the four "diehard" conservatives—Justice Van Devanter, Justice McReynolds, Justice Sutherland, Justice Butler. At the opposite extreme were the three "liberals"—Justice Brandeis, Justice Stone, and Justice Cardozo. That left a "balance-of-power" group of two—Chief Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts. It was these two who by their vacillations sent the judicial fever-chart of the New Deal careening from high to low. As the sense of economic panic decreased and the political tension increased, the three groups became two. The bitterness of the diehard judges reached such a pitch that they became completely indistinguishable from Liberty Leaguers. The liberals suspended whatever differences of economic philosophy they had, and even grew critical of the inherent abuses of the judicial power itself. The balance-of-power pair, after a somewhat indecent flirtation with the liberals in the Minnesota moratorium case and the Nebbia milk-control case, were finally forced to make a definite choice. They could not continue to commute between two worlds. Nor could they, when the heavens were falling, merely stand aloof and murmur, "A plague on both your houses." Whatever may have been their previous constitutional waverings, they threw in their lot with the diehards and chose the side of the entrenched order. The Supreme Court is now two armed camps confronting each other.

To the believers in the judicial power, this is of course distressing. It is not so much that the court fails to present the serried ranks of a united front. Since the days when John Marshall held the court under his hypnotic sway, no united front has been possible except sporadically. What is distressing is that a persistent series of six-to-three decisions will weaken the prestige of the court. When justices divide with a monotonous uniformity, even the hardened believer in divine right may feel that the Constitution is curiously unclear for so compelling a document.

When the crisis was most desperate it seemed for a time that the court might join the colors in the war against the depression. Among the brilliant young lawyers who flocked to Washington there was an amazingly sanguine view that the New Deal would prove constitutional. It seems surprising now that anyone should ever have thought we could have a drastic dislocation of our economic life, with all the desperate efforts at economic control that it entailed, without having a constitutional dislocation as well. With the advantage of hindsight we glimpse today what the relation of the Supreme Court is to capitalist crisis. At the period of greatest panic and despair the court is likely to sanction heroic remedies. Enough liberals and balance-of-power judges can be mustered who have the wisdom to see that capitalist survival would be impossible without a summary use of the federal power. But it is only when the economic crisis itself has eased, and business enterprise has recovered from its mortal anguish, that the real constitutional crisis comes. The old taboos against government control are reasserted. The court seeks to prevent the country from making the new measures of control permanent, and so from paying too high a price for survival. The liberals on the court find themselves isolated. The balance-of-power judges find it is no longer necessary to be liberal. The conservatives give every indication that in them is the grace confessed.

To trace the career of the New Deal in the court is to describe the rise and fall of a felt need. In 1933, before the New Deal legislation was passed, Chief Justice Hughes speaking for the court took judicial notice of the depression. That was in the Appalachian coal case. In the Minnesota mortgage-moratorium case, in January, 1934, Justice Hughes read a five-to-four decision upholding the government. In March the same court majority, speaking now through Justice Roberts in the Nebbia case, upheld price-fixing by the New York State milk-control board. The Panama (hot-oil) case represented the first break. But the case turned on delegation of powers and administrative carelessness rather than on the substance of the legislation; and the next cases—the gold-clause cases—reassured those who had grown anxious. There Chief Justice Hughes seemed to go out of his way in unusually tortuous reasoning to save the financial stability of the government and uphold its contentions. This augured well, and Justice McReynolds's dramatic outburst in the courtroom, when he warned that the Constitution had been scrapped, seemed merely to be an elegy over an order that was dead. It was then that the really ominous decision came—the five-to-four opinion against the government, read by Roberts in the railroad-retirement case. This opinion, when compared with Justice Roberts's earlier Nebbia opinion, measured the judicial crack-up of the New Deal. After that, of course, came the Schechter brothers, the Hoo-sac mills, the rice processors' case, and a brood that threatens to lengthen out into the future.

There is a measure of truth in the contention that if the crucial New Deal measures—NRA and AAA—had come before the court sooner, they would have fared differently. The timing was undoubtedly bad, and time was the heart of the matter. And yet the President had able lawyers among his advisers, some of whom may have felt, along with General Johnson, that the NRA should be given time to become an effectively functioning mechanism before it ran the court gauntlet. Meanwhile, however, the crisis tension was passing. If the cases had been pushed earlier they might have been validated. If they had been declared unconstitutional early enough President Roosevelt would have had behind him a vast force of opinion for any attack he might make on the judicial power.

Such reasoning, however, does not go far enough. When the economic tension was finally eased, the court would have found little difficulty in retracing its steps. The crux of the constitutional impasse today is that any permanent extension of the federal power would be regarded by concentrated wealth as a decisive threat to its dominance. The constitutional crisis might have been delayed; it could scarcely have been eliminated.

The overwhelming issue today is whether we shall have a power in the federal government that can meet and cope with the concentration of economic power in our society.

This question really involves something like a three-ring circus. It involves first what we may call the area of economic activity, which has moved from independent farming and petty trade to the scale of the giant corporation. It involves, secondly, the area of government control of that economic activity. It involves, finally, the area of judicial tolerance—the extent to which the Supreme Court will allow government control. While the first is part of the inevitable sweep of the machine process, and the second has responded to waves of democratic feeling, the last is unlimited except as it may limit itself. In the now famous words of Justice Hughes, spoken while he was still Governor of New York and therefore relatively irresponsible, "We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is."

What has happened since the eighties is that government control on the plane of state units has grown increasingly irrelevant. While the court has through most of its history been intolerant of state control, and fought it especially through the doctrine of due process of law, Justices Holmes and Brandeis succeeded in developing a persuasive philosophy of judicial toleration. Holmes was for allowing experiments in "the insulated chambers of the states." Brandeis was for giving the decisive weight to the legislative history of an act and the social context in which it was placed. But such philosophies are now less applicable. We have an economic system that can be run successfully or curbed effectively only on a national plane.

We must face the fact that the area of government control today must coincide with the area of economic activity. Since one is on a national scale, so must the other be. Industry is not contained within state lines. Mining, manufacturing, transportation, communication, labor, finance—all constitute an unbroken industrial chain flung out over a national market. Moreover, industry not only operates on a national scale, but its power is national in its magnitude and concentration. And when our economic system breaks down, it can be restored only by governmental action on a national scale. In fact, whether the economic system is functioning or threatening or in collapse, the states as the principal regulatory agencies are now anachronisms.

Can we achieve genuine control on the plane of the federal power? The answer that the court is spelling out, in one grim decision after another, increasingly dooms the federal power. But there is something even more important than to grasp the answer—and that is to grasp the fact that it is not the only possible answer the court could give. "That is not law," said a trial judge to Daniel Webster. "It was until you spoke, Your Honor," answered Webster. Each time that the Supreme Court has spoken since Justice Roberts's fatal decision in the railroad-retirement case, something that had been law ceased to be law. Each time some path that might have led toward an adequate federal power was blocked or hopelessly rutted. When Justice Holmes once stated that "hard cases make bad law" he was looking ahead into 1935 and 1936 with amazing clairvoyance. The general run of cases that come before the court are fairly clear. They involve usually the extension of an old rule to a new instance. They do not involve lengthy opinions, bitter dissents, personal tension among the justices, counsel on the point of collapse, and an agitated country. The New Deal cases have been "hard cases"—where novel issues are raised, or where the familiar issues are pushed so far that they seem to change their character.

The New Dealers relied on three Congressional grants of power in order to have the courts decide the "hard cases" in their favor. One is the power of Congress to regulate commerce, the second is its taxing power, the third (closely related to the second) is its spending power.

The commerce power was the one most relied on for vaulting into the heaven of federal control. There was a strong tradition of liberal interpretation of the commerce power, and it did not need much stretching to make it adequate for industrial control. The tendency toward a broad construction, as Professor Corwin has shown, became marked under the influence of Holmes and Taft, starting with the Swift case in 1905. The court had accepted the regulation of the meat-packing industry and of the grain-futures exchanges as coming within the scope of the commerce clause. The only real stumbling-block was Hammer vs. Dagenhart (1918), the first child-labor case, which held invalid a federal act forbidding the shipment of the products of child labor in interstate commerce. The court has, in interpreting the term "commerce," fluctuated between restricting it severely to physical transportation, and expanding it to mean anything essential to the functioning of the economic mechanism. In interpreting the term "regulate" it has at times restricted it to the Hamiltonian sense of fostering and aiding commerce, and at times ventured into the more militant sense of subjecting it to government restraint. Accordingly, when the court in the railway-retirement case and again in the Schechter NRA case adopted the narrow view of the commerce power, it was a deliberate choice of the less liberal among alternative lines of precedent.

When the commerce power had been blocked, the new white hopes became the taxing power (under the general-welfare clause) and the power of making appropriations. Both were clearly and deeply entrenched in American constitutional history—in the history of legislative practice and in that of judicial interpretation. To have overturned these powers directly would have meant a judicial revolution. The only real precedent that the government had reason to fear was the child-labor tax case (or the second child-labor case) in which, after the court in Hammer vs. Dagenhart had held an attempt to regulate child labor invalid under the commerce power, Congress sought to accomplish the same regulation by imposing a tax on the products of child labor. As is well known, the court, when confronted by the problem of the taxing and spending powers in the Hoosac case, tried the flank attack. It studiously avoided passing directly upon the scope of the general-welfare clause or of the spending power. It insisted that the purpose of the act was the federal regulation of agriculture, that under the Tenth Amendment this was reserved to the states, and that Congress could not assume such a regulatory function under the guise of taxing the processors or making appropriations for the farmers. While legally a loophole was left open for the use of the taxing and spending powers (if such a use refrains from being coercive), the practical effect of reasoning from the Tenth Amendment would seem to be a flat, clear, and positive judicial prohibition of attempts to use these powers for regulatory purposes.

I know that it is a paradox and also lèse majesté to speak of the Supreme Court as lawless. And yet, if the meaning of the word be properly understood, the conviction is overwhelming that the Supreme Court majority represents the most lawless force in American life today.

I can only list the counts in the most summary fashion. First, in economic terms, the present course of decision can only lead us to economic chaos. By denying the federal government the power to deal on a national plane with the problems of economic control, the court is doing more to weaken the American economic structure than all the allegedly subversive radical parties in the country. But it is accomplishing more than a blocking of the federal power in the name of states' rights. By a process familiar in our judicial history, which we may without loss of dignity call the "two-way stretch," it is also blocking the state power of economic control. The same session which saw the Hoosac decision saw also the decision in the Vermont incometax case and the North Dakota tax-commission case. The result is to cripple both state and federal control, leave the public interest in a dark no man's land, and leave business enterprise itself at the mercy of the forces of collapse.

To economic chaos must be added administrative anarchy. It is not only that the Supreme Court's animus against legislative control is encouraging the lower federal courts to grant injunctions generously and give free rein to their inherent conservatism. Something even more serious is presented in the court's ruling in the rice millers' case. With a reckless disregard of administrative consequences, the court in effect placed a premium on refusal to pay taxes. Those who do not pay but seek injunctive relief may have their taxes impounded in court and eventually returned to them. This would effectively sabotage any administrative set-up, no matter how good.

More strictly within the judicial realm are two other matters. One relates to the court's cavalier treatment of established and fairly clear precedent, as pointed out earlier in the article. The other relates to the departure from the tradition of constitutional law which holds that if a case can be disposed of on narrow or procedural grounds, the larger issues ought not to be raised. If this tradition had been followed, much havoc might have been avoided in the interpretation of the commerce power. For some reason the court seems anxious to look ahead and pass on the large and impending constitutional issues. The result is a needlessly rapid and savage rate of legislative destruction.

Finally, there is a lawlessness involved in the court's being a law to itself. Justice Stone, in his brilliant Hoosac dissent, charged the majority with assuming an arbitrary and irresponsible power, subject to no restraint except their own self-restraint. In a supposedly democratic state, based on the separation of powers, this is the height of lawlessness.

[This is the second of four articles on the Supreme Court. The third will appear in an early issue.]

Washington Weekly

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, February 9

JUST as the Caesars, riding in triumphal processions, needed slaves to whisper in their ears reminders of their mortality, so the President of the United States and his Congressional leaders need constantly to be reminded that the purpose of government is to further not merely their own but the public welfare. Just now such a whispering service is especially needed. Without it, as events of the last few days show, the Administration is hell-bent on accomplishing in this session of Congress nothing of merit—and much that is meretricious.

The purposes of government have been forgotten in the rush to get Congress out of town and keep the Presidential campaign free of solid issues. If the Administration has its way, Congress will go home in May after having done little more than pass the routine appropriation bills and enact an insubstantial and unplanned work-relief program for 1936-37. Under heavy Administration pressure all efforts at constitutional reform are being crushed. Under similar pressure the movement for permanent neutrality legislation is being brought to a standstill. The old AAA program is being rushed to reenactment in a disguise protected from close scrutiny by a deliberate denial of public hearings on the measure, which contains all the anti-social elements of the old AAA and none of its consumer-protection devices.

Most disgraceful of all is the situation with respect to taxation and the bonus. After the latter measure was passed without his active opposition but over his veto, Mr. Roosevelt informed Congress that it would have to find the $2,249,000,000 in revenues needed to pay the bonus in June. His bravery was short-lived. When Congress balked at the implied command to make heavy additions to the nation's tax bill in an election year, Mr. Roosevelt suddenly discovered that the bonus was not at all the frightfully costly thing he had proclaimed it to be. He released the good news that, after all, it would add only $100,000,000 to the immediate annual cost of government; and straightway he busied himself in trying to make room for that item in his budget without recommending the levying of additional taxes.

He has been working at that task for several days, with apparent success. All that threatens now in the way of new tax legislation is the reenactment of the outlawed AAA processing taxes as excise levies. Reformation of the nation's anti-social tax structure waits, while the $547,000,000 in consumption taxes lifted off the body politic by the Supreme Court's AAA decision are strapped back on to that body at the behest of a President who in 1933 won public acclaim by loud opposition to such imposts.

QUITE properly, considering the low level to which Congressional operations have sunk this session, the United Mine Workers' convention threatened at times to eliminate Congress from the front pages. The convention was a good show, but it was not a perfect hit. Coming after the unnecessarily cruel treatment accorded Bill Green, Apostle of Inaction, the vote to double the salaries of the union's executive officers struck a sour note.

Exception could not be taken to the increases themselves. (If Hearst and other captains of industry draw salaries ranging from $100,000 to $500,000 a year, John Lewis deserves a salary sufficient to pay off the national debt.) It was the steam-roller tactics used by Lewis's lieutenants that were deplorable. They were deplorable chiefly because many persons anxious and able to assist Lewis in his campaign to reshape the American labor movement have been holding back to see whether the Lewis of 1936 is a new Lewis or just the Lewis of 1932 et ante with a new vocabulary. The salary-vote tactics increased their suspicions, and it may take more than Lewis's morning-after renunciation of the $13,000 raise granted him to arrest their fears and bring them into camp.

THOSE who cursed Representative O'Connor of New York last summer for the aid he gave to H. C. Hopson of Associated Gas in the power trust's fight against the holding-company bill now must turn about and spare this Tammanyite a few thanks. The same power that he used as chairman of the House Rules Committee to obstruct passage of the holding-company bill he is now using with greater effect to block passage of the Kramer and Tydings-McCormack "anti-red" bills. O'Connor is motivated in his present stand by lessons he learned as a New York Assemblyman when the Lusk boys were on the rampage. Patriots, he says, cannot be made by legislation.

MORE than a few of our opulent gentry have been willing in the past to donate as much as $100,000 to Presidential campaign funds in exchange for nothing more than occasional invitations to dinner at the White House. It is doubtful that they will be willing to do so henceforth, for the honor of dining at the White House has just undergone considerable tarnishing. The White House secretariat, adding another to its series of costly blunders, has let a convicted criminal, Elmer B. O'Hara, be added to the select company of men invited to sup with Roosevelt.

O'Hara could not accept because he was under trial at Detroit on election-fraud charges and the jury was still out on the night of the dinner. It has since returned a verdict of guilty against him. He previously had been convicted of bribery in a Macomb County, Michigan, land-condemnation case and was awaiting sentence on that count when the White House dinner invitation reached him. It was sent to him because he continues to hold the title of chairman of the Michigan Democratic State Central Committee, though the duties of that post were transferred to an executive committee last year when charges were filed against O'Hara.

IF a season ticket to the White House is worth $100,000 to a certain few rich men like Bernard Baruch, what is a Senate committee chairmanship worth to the White House? The answer seems to be about $5,000,000. To obtain the basis for that answer one must explore the $200,000,000 trans-Florida ship-canal project, which may shortly be the subject of a Senatorial investigation.

The project involves a plan to dig a 206-mile canal for oceangoing vessels across northern Florida from Jacksonville to the Gulf. There seems to be no reason for the canal, for most of the lines operating in the area assert that their ships would not use it, but Jacksonville interests have been pushing the plan for twenty years. The RFC turned thumbs down on the scheme when it was presented by a private corporation. Later it was urged upon the PWA as a public project. Ickes twice turned it down. Then, last summer, it got to the White House, where at last success awaited it. Mr. Roosevelt gave the project a Presidential allotment of $5,000,000 out of the $4,000,000,000 work-relief fund and started the War Department engineers to work on it.

Why did he do it? Why did he commit the federal government to an investment that can be retrieved only by the expenditure of an additional $140,000,000 to $200,000,000 over a period of six years? The best available answer to date is that he did it as a favor to Senator Fletcher of Florida in recompense for his assumption of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee chairmanship. Fletcher, at seventy-seven, is careworn and feeble and wanted a less arduous committee assignment. And why was Roosevelt so anxious to have Fletcher at the head of Banking and Currency? Because that was the only way of keeping the chairmanship away from Carter Glass. None but Fletcher on the committee outranked Glass, who automatically would have succeeded to the chair if Fletcher had declined it.

When Roosevelt, running counter to the findings of the PWA, made the $5,000,000 allotment to the canal project, he emphasized that the project's sponsors would have to look to Congress for the rest. Fletcher is preparing at the moment to seek a $20,000,000 appropriation to supplement the initial $5,000,000, now virtually exhausted, and Senator Vandenberg of Michigan is trying to call a halt on the project before it goes any farther.

To that end, he has introduced a resolution for an investigation of the project. Hearings on the resolution have been held and a decision is pending. At those hearings Ickes reiterated his opposition to the project on grounds of economic feasibility. The War Department's representative, General Markham, testified that work had been started without a final report from his board of engineers and that this was an unprecedented procedure but he was operating "under orders" from a superior authority. Vandenberg presented letters from twenty-eight potential users of the canal none of whom regarded the project favorably. Nine who opposed it had been recorded by the War Department as favorable to the project.

Photographing This World

By MARGARET BOURKE-WHITE

AS the echoes of the old debate—is photography an art?—die away, a new and infinitely more important question arises. To what extent are photographers becoming aware of the social scene and how significantly are their photographs portraying it?

It is some years since the photographer has felt the need to defend the thesis that the photograph has as much creative quality as the painting. It is generally accepted that photographs are as like or unlike painting as painting is like or unlike sculpture. There is no essential creative difference between hammering stone with a chisel and hammering silver with rays of light. The art of pointing the camera at an object does not transfer it automatically to the back of the photographer's little black box. The illumination, modeling, choice of boundaries, focal length of lenses control the transfer of an object to a sheet of sensitized celluloid, but the major control is the photographer's point of view.

There was a time when fuzzy trees against a fuzzier sky, mist at dawn, sleeping babes, and calla lilies comprised the art-forms of photography. Then rhythmic gear wheels and gleaming pistons shot into the photographic scene. The dynamo became respectable.

This was an advance toward realism and, as such, was good. But it was not enough. It is possible for hydraulic presses to rear their giant forms majestically in automobile factories, and for the workers who place and replace the metal sheets beneath the stamping block to be underpaid. It is possible for cranes to etch their delicate tracery against the sky, and for the iron miners to look from the front doors of their company houses across the deep-tiered stripping and see the derricks, exquisite but idle. It is possible for glistening saws to whirl their way, halos of living steel, and for the mill hands to watch those saws slow down into stillness, knowing this betokens another stretch of unemployment.

In the year before the great depression conditions were ideally suitable for the experimenting industrial artist. In the early days of my own experimenting, done largely during 1928 and the first half of 1929, it seemed to me that I was free. I could photograph what I liked without supervision, because then the idea of beauty in the owner's own factory was novel to him. Anything that brought out the glamor of his industry was acceptable because to him his own industry was glamorous. It was piling up profits.

Here I was fortunate, because I had the high flowering of big business in which to learn. Anything I took that had artistic value sold. I do not mean that I marketed everything I photographed, for I was going through a difficult training school and I knew it. Starting in the steel mills, I had to master what is probably the most difficult set of lighting conditions in the world, and literally hundreds of negatives which were poorly exposed or non-interpretative went into the wastebasket. I had to find myself among the cranes, ladles, and blast furnaces. In the beginning, I was so thrilled by this vital, living industry I was trying to photograph that I literally had no idea what to take. I would come into the steel mills, into the riot of flying sparks, rushing metal, bursts of smoke, and feel as though I were coming home, it seemed so much a part of me. But it was a long time before I learned to imprint it significantly on panchromatic film.

When I gradually became more sure in capturing this newly discovered glory, I found that my main customers were the banks. Cleveland was a growing city. No one dreamed that it was not going to expand indefinitely. The banks promoted this theme. Their use of photographs on the covers of their booklets, stockholders' statements, dividend reports was Utopia for a groping, experimenting industrial photographer. It meant that I could offer a choice of any of these subjects which moved me—a pattern of structural steel, the arch of a railroad bridge, a coal rig loading freighters, the revolving disks of flywheels; any of these subjects symbolized to the bankers, or at least to their press agents, the greatness of industrial Cleveland.

Perhaps a prophetic note was struck in one of the last of these pure pattern pictures which I sold in this way. Leaving a factory where I had been working one day, I was struck by the beauty of the late afternoon light on a pile of rusting gear wheels which had been thrown on a dump heap. The resultant photograph was everything that the advertising manager desired in the way of composition and contrasts of light and shade. The soft twilight was deceptive, and the corrosion marks on the gears did not show. The picture was run as a full page in the Cleveland newspapers as an advertisement of the soundness of this mighty Cleveland bank, and my rusted gears were labeled "Keep the Wheels of Industry Turning."

Then came the crash. One by one the banks which had been my customers folded up. The publicity managers who had been my buyers shifted about to other occupations. Clevelanders who had been brought up on the omnipotent, everlasting dynasty of those famous railroad brothers who were my star customers incredulously read headlines which proclaimed the crumbling of the Van Sweringens.

My work went on. After coming to New York I was as busy as ever. I was still under the delusion that I was free, but imperceptibly the nature of my work underwent a change. Instead of being turned loose for a month in an automobile factory to portray the drama of the manufacture of the motor car, I was sent out with a tissue-paper layout, drawn by the art director of an advertising agency, with a group of smartly garbed and professionally smiling models, to show the style points of the finished car. What is known in the trade as institutional advertising had become a luxury product. The task now was to show that a certain make had streamlier streamlines, a glossier paint job, more luscious upholstery for less money than you would pay for a competitor's car.

The desire for technical excellence leads one into this kind of thing with a magnet. I felt, and I believe rightly, that the art-for-art's-sake idea had no place in modern photography. The function of photography was to do a job, to do skilfully and effectively the task of selling soapflakes, perfume, or motor cars. The degree of technical facility required is so great that advertising teaches invaluable lessons. The advertising photographer cannot be sloppy or inexact. Here we have a use for photography which increases still further the photographer's approach to realism.

It has been forced on me increasingly that there is a limit to the progress that the photographer as an artist can make while pursuing this path. The technical problems are so difficult, so varied, so stimulating, and for a long time so challenging that his work will leap ahead if he successfully meets the problems put to him. But a point comes where his work will increase in merit from the advertiser's point of view only if he himself begins to adopt that point of view. This business of adopting the advertiser's point of view is a subtle and curious thing. If his interests are drawing closer to social realism and he is growing farther away from the artificial atmosphere his clients are trying to promote, he finds, as he goes out on an advertising assignment, that he makes unaccountable mistakes. A desire to do honest work, a social view of the world, will lead him into unexpected pitfalls. To go on competently in the line along which this work leads him he must abandon his own artistic and social conceptions.

I discovered, after many unhappy days of working with a certain brand of motor car, that I had been looking at the automobile with the wrong eyes. This car was not an automobile in the ordinary sense; it was a winged chariot which floated smoothly off into space; only happy individuals, only well-dressed people rode in it; no one went to work, wept, worried, or suffered in its tasteful, though inexpensive, insides. I did not realize this, so my pictures were wrong. By great effort and continuous application I could make them adequate for the advertising pages, but the old, joyous, workmanlike feeling was gone. The pictures did not compose themselves so happily and swiftly on the groundglass.

Once in a while I was given the opportunity to do a job that I really liked, and yet all too often, even in the performance of this work, unexpected obstacles crossed my path. During the drought I was hired by a most reputable magazine to cover the entire stricken area from north to south. I was a very happy photographer when I started out. I had the advantages of all modern technique, an airplane, my instructions, an expense account. Here was an opportunity to show what was really going on—a chance to get close to the realities of life. It was common knowledge that there was cattle shooting. The papers had been full of it. In Omaha I was told that there was no more cattle shooting in Nebraska; true there had been a little, but it was not going on any more. But if I wanted to go to Kansas City, I would find plenty. In Kansas it was impressed on me that Kansas had never shot many cattle anyway, but if I went on to Texas, I could get all I could use. In the Panhandle persuasive AAA officials tried to assure me that whatever isolated episodes of cattle shooting had occurred were in the past, but across the border in New Mexico I would find a great deal of it. By that time I had talked with farmers who had seen their herds depleted—herds which they had built up over the course of years and which they regarded almost as they would their families. I had authoritative figures on Texas cattle shooting. I left the AAA gentlemen, and scouting around myself among the ranches, I found the material for my pictures.

Thus, even when doing a job he believes in, the artist frequently finds unexpected limits to his free expression. When doing a job he does not believe in, he suffers through the necessity of portraying his subject in a way that has become to him unreal. Just as the portrait painter may offend a society lady if he allows lines of age or temperament to come into his picture, so I will displease my client if, in my portrait of an automobile, I allow the reflection of a tree branch to mar its sleek, lacquered surface. The relation of the artist to the patron underlies these incidents. When the social ideals of patron and artist coincide, at that moment art flourishes. When the grandeur of industry appeals alike to manufacturer and photographer, the industrial artist is creative and free.

The artist's livelihood becomes involved at this point. He likes to think of himself as apart from business. Yet he stands or falls with the business cycle. In a period of prosperity the artist is given the opportunity to develop his technique. He can experiment, learn, grow—and the business man will help him. But in time of crisis the business man is too preoccupied or too poor. And even under the best conditions the environment may be antagonistic to the artist. The adoption of the ideals of his customer or patron may require that he abandon his own artistic and social conceptions. How will he escape from his dilemma? Either he adopts those ideals and prospers temporarily, or he repudiates them and becomes increasingly unhappy. At a moment of crisis, he has neither happiness nor prosperity.

Like the painter, the photographer is seeking a wider world, one in which his desire for self-realization is not achieved at the cost of his integrity. In an effort to plot a course which will defend their interests as independent artists, photographers are joining with painters, sculptors, graphic artists, and designers in the first American Artists' Congress, at which artists from all sections of the country will discuss the serious issues which face them. Recognizing that the gravest threat to their independence lies in the very real menace of fascism, more than three hundred American artists, among them Rockwell Kent, Paul Manship, Alexander Brook, Max Weber, Edward Steichen, Ralph Steiner, Paul Strand, Peggy Bacon, Peter Blume, Norman Bel Geddes, and Art Young, have committed themselves, through signing the call to the congress, to an active defense of their freedom of expression by concerted opposition to the dangers of war and fascism.

Problems posed in the opening session of the congress on February 14 will be dealt with more exhaustively in two days of closed sessions to follow at the New School for Social Research in New York. Out of these discussions of vital issues—esthetic, economic, and social—confronting artists in America today should and I hope will come the clarification needed. And although this is an artists' congress, those attending will realize that their problems are so broad as to reach far beyond their own immediate field, embracing the problems not only of artists but of playwrights, engineers, all creative workers. And they will comprehend that in a larger sense these problems apply to all workers whether they are building motor trucks, railroad trestles, power dams, or pictures. It is my own conviction that defense of their economic needs, as well as their liberty of artistic expression, will inevitably draw artists closer to the struggle of the great masses of American people for security and the abundant life.

Presidential Possibilities

Knox—Publisher into Candidate

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

IT is not easy to make a satisfactory political identification of Colonel Frank Knox. Those who have heard or read his recent speeches and noted in them the acid animosity to President Roosevelt, the want of constructive social thought, the strained pietism toward the Constitution, and the vague talk of "voluntarism" as an American "system" may have concluded that he belongs with the conservatives of the Liberty League. His open hostility to the Wagner labor law would tend to confirm the opinion. But it would be a mistaken opinion. He is difficult to appraise, perhaps because he is two persons. One is the man who lived a full sixty years without a tinge of Presidential ambition, following an altogether intelligible career. Then he put on another character, that of a man touched by the ambition, and underwent changes which now are impossible to measure. The private Colonel Knox was anything but reactionary, bigoted, and devoid of balance. But this is not the man he is putting forward. Instead, he has captured the position of Critic Number One of President Roosevelt, and is making his race on the premise that Roosevelt can be made to beat Roosevelt, not that Knox could do it.

His virulent attack on Roosevelt coincides with the ground swell of the reaction against the New Deal. The fact is, of course, that President Roosevelt never was the savior he seemed. National feelings, having risen irrationally, had to sink irrationally. That of itself explains the tide against the New-Deal. And here, in Colonel Knox, is the voice for it. On March 16, 1934, he could speak of the President reverently as "the man who sits in the White House and bears the well-nigh intolerable burden of leadership in this crisis in our affairs." But on July 25, 1935, he went into intellectual falsetto in Los Angeles, crying: "Upon what food does this our Caesar feed? What madness has seized upon him? Does he not see how dangerously close this comes to conspiracy to break down our institutions of government?" And as recently as November 6, 1935, at St. Louis, referring to the Congressional investigations of business, he declared: "I say to you deliberately that most of these investigations are designed by the New Dealers to draw red herrings across the trail of their real intentions. Their intentions are to discredit private industry so these New Dealers may encounter a minimum resistance and later, it may well be, seize private property on the Marxian philosophy of government ownership." Now this is balderdash, and Publisher Knox of two years ago, if he could be projected into the present, would be the first to scoff at it.

But even the private Colonel Knox offers a clue to this change. He is fundamentally a trusting nature, and he has often shown himself a shade too ready to believe in the persons he meets. Then, with disillusionment, he over-reacts. Behind his attack on President Roosevelt, I imagine, is some episode in which he utterly believed in him and was fooled.

To find the real Knox one must go back to his speeches as a private person, before the Presidency entered his mind.

In these he stood out as a Bull Mooser. He had not developed the riper judgments suited to the epoch of 1936. He remained the voice of 1912. But he was refreshing, forthright, and courageous. He still is this person in the main, as anyone will learn in private conversation with him today. I have had several talks with him recently, and I found him passionately committed to the restoration of the competitive system in American life, as ready as T. R. to smash the trusts, unsparing in his condemnation of monopoly, genuinely concerned with finding a way back to the departed days of economic laissez faire. (Laissez faire is not his word but it is his meaning.) He hates bigness in business; he believes it incompetent, uneconomic, and dangerous. And he believes that if he were given the power he would find the moment and the audacity to turn back the clock in defiance of big business and high finance.

Colonel Knox has been a newspaper publisher nearly all his life, and there is no business quite so competitive, even in these days of chain papers, when publishing has become far more a matter of advertising and circulation than of able opinion. So Publisher Knox is genuine in his enthusiasm for competition. Furthermore, he is a first-class publisher, his five years with Hearst notwithstanding. Till well beyond fifty he was a small publisher, successful in a small way, honorable and intelligent in a large way, and he took the Hearst job, first publishing the Boston American, then managing all his newspapers, as a final clinching of success. He earned half a million dollars in five years, and at the end of that time he was ready in mind to retire. Nor was he a Hearst satellite, caught in the cobwebs of intrigue which make the Hearst organization so unhealthy a working place. He came in at the top and maintained his independence, finally resigning because of too many vetoes by his employer. The time with Hearst, together with an old friend's help, provided the cash with which he was able to buy his way into the Chicago Daily News, and make himself for the first time a big publisher on his own. When he gained control over that paper he determined to round out his career with a new achievement. He dreamed of making it the best newspaper in the English-speaking world, best in style, information, opinion, and appearance. It is impossible, of course, to say whether he ever could have accomplished this. I have called him a first-class publisher, but I do not know whether he is also a great one. I am not sure that Colonel Knox could himself train first-rate newspapermen, and so raise the standard of writing and trenchant thought in the American press. Nor am I sure he could watch his circulation fall by a couple of hundred thousand because of a conviction, though his first attacks on the New Deal did cost him readers by the five thousands.

The men on the Daily News, who have worked intimately with Colonel Knox and who for reasons of long friendship would speak freely to me, give a glowing account of him as a publisher. They have yet to see him, in a major issue, come to what they consider a fundamentally wrong decision. Even when it cost something they have seen him, again and again, do the right thing. Furthermore, he has refused to subordinate the newspaper to his new political life. His paper is not his personal organ. It is not boosting his candidacy. Moreover, the men on the Daily News feel free to express themselves. One of the best reporters on the paper nearly lost his job for asking Colonel Knox how he wanted him to write a certain story. American newspaper traditions being what they are, the freedom of writers on the News is certainly wide; as in the case of Howard Vincent O'Brien, whose column on the editorial page sometimes goes so far to the left of the editorial opinion close by as to appear like an antidote. Colonel Knox thinks O'Brien is "mad," but gives him a column to be mad in. And he gave it when Columnist O'Brien commented on the Presidential candidacy of Publisher Knox. This is what O'Brien wrote:

I hope he gets the nomination. What is more, I would gnash no teeth if he were elected. But I think that within thirty minutes after he took the oath of office there would be some teeth-gnashing—and they would be his! He believes sincerely that, as President, he could alter the course of government. I do not. . . . I believe that, when put to the test, Mr. Knox's platform would remain as shiny and unmarred as the Democratic platform has been. I believe that a new hat on the White House hatrack would change the flow of events little more than a new president of Tel. and Tel. would affect our use of the telephone. I am convinced that Frank Knox would be a good President, efficient, worthy of all trust; but I am equally convinced that as President he would do things that are utterly abhorrent to him now, and perforce leave undone practically all of the things he now advocates.

Knox is a big-business executive rather than an editor in the old-fashioned sense. It is in the management of a newspaper property that his gifts have been exceptional, and in this one-sidedness he is like all outstanding publishers in America that I have encountered. Few of them know much about writing or rate wise judgment above all other qualities. Knox is not versatile in dealing with ideas. He is an extrovert, a doer, in other words a business executive, not a thinker. And as a business executive he is like others of the type in America—impetuous, dominant, lonely; in the last analysis he makes all decisions himself. As an extrovert who dislikes delegating authority, he resembles Franklin Roosevelt. But having come through the harsh school of competitive business, he is more hard-boiled. To his business associates he is known for bluntly speaking his mind. And they admire his ability to say "no" to temptations to spend money. He can manage property, curtail expenses, defy all considerations which tempt a weaker man into precarious business methods. His business associates think he would have the courage to reduce the government budget, withstand the infinite claims made on a President, and do what is known as "cleaning up the New Deal mess at Washington."

Like most large papers in America, the Daily News is a great business institution as well as an organ of public opinion. Even so, in its way it is a servant of the public, and even of liberty. During the witch-hunt at the University of Chicago, while the News did not bristle with indignation it did come out on the opposite side to Hearst. Its editorial spoke of "an agitated minority" that had become alarmed by "reports of disloyalty in certain universities."

"Even if some individual teacher," it went on, "is guilty of unlawful activity or seditious teaching—which is yet to be proved—it would be unjust and contrary to public interest to indict an entire institution or to impose shackles upon teaching and inquiry. It would be a permanent setback to this community if, in a moment of hysteria, the cardinal principles of academic freedom and the perennial quest of truth should be circumscribed."

Today Candidate Knox has in his organization two leaders of the American Legion, one of them former National Commander Hayes. As an ex-service man of both the Spanish-American and World wars, he is making the strongest bid for the veteran vote. After opposing the bonus as a publisher, believing in economy, he found as candidate that it might as well be paid, if it could be out of funds already appropriated. Whether he would be as quick to rationalize the suppression of academic freedom and "the perennial quest for truth" to please the Legion remains to be seen.

[In two earlier articles on Presidential Possibilities Mr. Swing discussed the candidacy of Governor Landon. Next week he will analyze the campaign strategy of Colonel Knox.]

Loose Construction

By HEYWOOD BROWN

THE conservative wing of the Republican Party is riding high in the party's councils at the moment. The Smith speech at the Liberty League dinner and the Talmadge speech at the Macon convention both indicated that potential walking Democrats are seeking the exit at the extreme right. With the exception of Herbert Hoover, whose name would arouse a certain personal resentment in the Smith forces, it is hard to think of any G. O. P. candidate reactionary enough to alienate Al or Gene. This growing faith that a Bourbon can be nominated and elected was illustrated the other day by a Republican Congressman who bridled at the mention of Ogden Mills. "Ogden Mills for President!" he exclaimed. "You don't think I'm going to support one of those crackpot liberals."

Don't forget Jim Wadsworth. His strength is growing rapidly. Already he is being freely mentioned as a vice-presidential candidate and he may move higher in the picture. The Representative from New York was considered antediluvian a few months ago but he begins to shape up as just the type. It must be remembered that Republicans are preparing to make much of "Washington or Moscow" or some such slogan. It isn't altogether easy to find a candidate who has not been called communistic by somebody. After all, the list of those against whom the finger of suspicion has been pointed includes Roy Howard, Nicholas Murray Butler, Dean Russell of Teachers College, Bishop McConnell, William E. Borah, and just the other day Ralph Easley suggested that Ham Fish was slipping.

IN considering the speech of William Green at the United Mine Workers' convention it should be pointed out that Mr. Green was not nearly as inept as he seemed to many of the newspaper reporters who were present. The gentlemen of the press held the length of the speech against Green, and it is true that he talked for more than an hour and a half. But that is by no means a long speech as labor standards go, and miners in particular like their eloquence long drawn out.

John L. Lewis is not always given to brevity. He is a genius on the platform and makes his own rules, but certainly in passing up his opportunity for an extended reply to Green he broke away from well-established precedents. The revolutionary quality of his tactics was one of the things which captured the imagination of the mine workers. In labor groups there is a considerable tendency to believe that the man who takes the most time has the best case. McAllister Coleman told me that once in Illinois he listened to a mine leader who talked for three and a half hours without a break. "What did you think of my speech?" he asked Coleman at the conclusion.

"Well," replied the newspaperman as tactfully as he could, "it was certainly pretty long."

"Long nothing," said the labor leader, "you should have caught me down in Alabama last summer. I was speaking under a tent and it was 103 in the shade. I spoke for eight hours. Twenty people fainted, but the stretcher bearers always came back to hear me finish my speech."

John L. Lewis did not require the stretcher bearers to wait so long. He knocked out William Green in precisely three minutes.

* * *

IT is too soon to make predictions that the squabble at the convention necessarily means a split between the United Mine Workers and the American Federation of Labor. It is well to remember that the executive committee of the A. F. of L. made a violent gesture toward the Committee for Industrial Organization in its Miami resolution. I imagine that Lewis felt his group would be decidedly on the defensive unless he could show the potentiality of an even more powerful and punishing blow. He did so and now the warring groups are back where they started.

If no successful compromise is reached at the Tampa convention this year, then there may be a split. I look for a partial surrender by the craft groups. But whatever the outcome it seems to me almost certain that John L. Lewis will be in command of the labor movement in this country within the next two years. His greatest assets are his drive, his courage, and his extraordinary grasp of popular psychology. His weakness is his tendency for wholly autocratic decisions. To be sure he works for the most part through democratic forms, but when John L. Lewis asks any delegate who is in disagreement to stand up it is rather more a challenge than an invitation.

Fortunately Lewis does not bear grudges and he will work whole-heartedly with individuals who have at one time or another been his bitter enemies. Penance and apologies are kindly omitted. Many an individual "radical" has worked in close cooperation with John Lewis without fear or friction on either side. But Lewis is still a little skittish about the word "radical" when applied to any group and he is decidedly conditioned against the word "communist." But as the fight for industrial unionism continues I have a feeling that John L. Lewis will grow even faster than his following and that he will begin without reluctance to broaden the base of his support.

THE new quarters of the Supreme Court are far more spacious than the room in the Capitol—the old Senate chamber—where it used to sit. The old room was so small that it would have made it well-nigh impossible to throw away so many acts of Congress. Some of them would have bounced right back again.

Correspondence

What Don't the Dailies Print?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

The Nation, in a widely circulated letter promoting subscriptions, says, "It is edited with far more detachment and perspective than your newspaper"; and adds, "It [The Nation] places at your disposal every week: (1) the significant news most dailies dare not print. . . ."

I ask: (1) What news? (2) Which dailies?

I add: It is my belief, based on many years of experience, that "most dailies" print much more "significant news" adverse to their policies than does The Nation or its type—and they do it less grudgingly.

I am a reader of The Nation and a liberal—I think—but, as a newspaperman, which I still am, at least at heart, I become irritated at the smugness of the so-called radical journals in seeking to portray their own virtue by belittling the other fellow's. I think the newspapers do a pretty good job; no other country gets as high a degree of public service from its press; most countries get far less.

New York, January 20

HERBERT BAYARD SWOPE

A Few Examples

Mr. Swope raises a fundamental question which is well worth extended discussion. The Editor and Publisher touched upon it in its issue of November 16, 1935, when it stated in an editorial that "certain weekly journals of opinion and news are conducting a sly campaign of disparagement of the daily newspapers—without which they could not exist." On this page we cite a few examples in answer to Mr. Swope's challenge. Because it would be impossible to check every item in every paper of the United States we have for the most part let the thoroughly indexed New York Times represent the press in this discussion; in a few specific instances we have accepted the statements of authors in regard to the coverage of local papers or press services. Moreover, we have limited ourselves to the past year.

At the outset news must be defined. In the simplest sense it might be said to consist of facts which are affected with a public interest. But Mr. Swope and the Editor and Publisher would surely agree that news does not consist merely of facts; the implications of any given fact and the significance of a group of facts also constitute news. In a given situation it might be proved that the newspapers had printed each separate item; yet if those items were not printed in such fashion as to reveal their collective significance, an important piece of news might have remained hidden.

To cite an example: In the early part of 1935 Anthony J. Drexel Biddle, Jr., was being suggested for various diplomatic posts. On January 19 in a small item on page 14 the New York Times noted that Mr. Biddle had called on Secretary Hull and that Mr. Biddle was being mentioned for Minister to Ireland. On June 2 it recorded that Biddle had been required to post a bond because he was the defendant in an accounting suit against the Sonora Products Company. On July 16 the Times reported on page 17 that Mr. Biddle had received an appointment as Minister to Norway. There was a portrait of the new diplomat and there were several paragraphs outlining his career. Paragraph one mentioned that he played match tennis and had been known as an amateur boxer; paragraph two stated that he was a member of the advisory board of the Chase National Bank; paragraph three summarized two marriages and one divorce; paragraph four related that Mr. Biddle had made his residence in Paris in recent years but that he had come back to the United States to help in the successful political campaign of his friend George H. Earle for the governorship of Pennsylvania; the last paragraph cited his war record.

In this account two key facts were omitted—facts which seem to us even more important and interesting than, for instance, Mr. Biddle's former standing as a boxer. The first was that in 1934 Mr. Biddle, along with certain business associates, had been held guilty in the U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals of diverting between two and three million dollars in profits in connection with the Sonora Products Corporation. The second was that Mr. Biddle had contributed some $30,000 to the Democratic campaign chest, though the best he had been able to offer in expiation of his financial obligations to the Sonora stockholders had been $160,000. One final note: A little later, on August 31, there appeared in the Times a report headed "Biddle's Liability Fixed in Report." The story was half a column long and reported among other things the finding of the court that "the four defendants [including Mr. Biddle] bought 180,000 shares for $90,000, and reaped a profit, exclusive of interest, of fourteen times that sum." From this story, too, one fact was missing. It was not stated in so much as a subordinate clause that the Mr. Biddle whose liability had been fixed was the newly appointed Minister to Norway.

The Nation for August 7, 1935, published Mr. Biddle's record as financier and politician. We submit that in this instance The Nation printed an important piece of news which the newspapers had failed to print.

The case of Amelia Earhart and the Hawaiian sugar interests who secretly paid her $10,000 to fly from Honolulu and then to say that Hawaii was an integral part of the United States (to help the fight against the quota on Hawaiian sugar) is only slightly less conclusive evidence that news is suppressed. The item about the $10,000, where it came from and through whom it was paid, did appear in the San Francisco Daily News. It was also mentioned by the Editor and Publisher itself in the course of an exposé of ballyhoo methods of obtaining publicity. Yet the New York Times, which ran Miss Earhart's exclusive story of the flight—including a sentence about "the alluring southwest corner of the United States"—never saw fit to print the story of the $10,000.

Lest it be charged that we are attempting to prove our case by making our own definition of news, we list below a few other instances in which facts affected with a public interest failed to make the grade as news in the key newspapers.

On July 31, 1935, at a hearing of the Senate Lobby Investigating Committee, it was revealed that Basil O'Connor, former law partner of the President of the United States, received $25,000 from the Associated Gas and Electric Company during its fight against the Wheeler-Rayburn holding-company bill. This item was of special interest to New Yorkers; it was of national interest because Basil O'Connor is the brother of John O'Connor, chairman of a House committee which was also investigating lobbies. The Times and the Herald Tribune failed to carry this item. In fairness it should be noted that the Post and the World-Telegram did carry it.

An incident which occurred during the same period reveals that even the Associated Press is not all that the Editor and Publisher implies it is. On the night of August 14, in the convivial company of B. B. Robinson, chief lobbyist against the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, a number of reporters discovered Amon G. Carter, newspaper publisher and ardent supporter of the Roosevelt Administration, L. W. Robert, Jr., Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and Marvin H. McIntyre, secretary to the President. We quote from Paul Ward, writing in The Nation:

To the Hearst press service's everlasting credit it promptly dispatched the tale. The United Press also put it on the wire, albeit not until long after midnight when it could not catch many papers. The Associated Press, however, suppressed the story and not until late the following day did it release the yarn. Even then it acted only under badgering from editors in various parts of the country, and, although one of its own men had witnessed the incident the Associated Press avoided responsibility and had the story sent out of New York in a form which represented it as an exclusive yarn dispatched to the New York Post by its Washington correspondent.

The suppression described in this paragraph is itself news, as well as the facts which were partially suppressed.

Neither Mr. Swope nor the Editor and Publisher would deny that especially in the cases of Mr. Biddle, Mr. O'Connor, and the Robinson party, the facts and their relation to each other were of genuine public importance; or that the Earhart item was at least of national interest. In the field of labor relations the powerful press represented by the Times and the Editor and Publisher would probably grant without much argument that The Nation prints news the dailies don't. They would advance what seems to them a valid argument—that this news is not of general interest and therefore deserves less attention than three-legged hens and Canadian quintuplets—despite the fact that the primary interest of the great mass of citizens is the job and its security. We should like to submit a few items which even by their standards would seem important enough to rate attention in the press and its services.

The hearings before the regional labor board in Philadelphia in the case brought by employees against the Freihofer Baking Company—the largest in Philadelphia—were sensational. They revealed a particularly sordid story of a company union organized through the use of labor spies, in violation of an agreement with the Bakery Drivers' Union. It was reported that the Philadelphia board was determined to make this case the beginning of a planned attack on company unions and labor spies, yet both the strike and the hearings, discussed in The Nation, were ignored by the Philadelphia press—and, of course, by the New York papers.

A few weeks ago Congressman Marcantonio made an attack upon the Associated Press in connection with the A. P.'s suit to restrain the National Labor Relations Board from passing on the discharge of Morris Watson; the A. P. held that the Wagner-Connery act was unconstitutional. As Mr. Brown pointed out in The Nation of February 5, it is the rarest thing in the world for a Congressman to criticize a great press association, but the Associated Press failed to send out in its service any account of the attack.

Every two weeks The Nation prints in its column, Facts for Consumers, damaging news and critical comment about the products of many of our best manufacturers. These facts are of vital interest to every consumer; yet Mr. Swope and the Editor and Publisher would scarcely deny that the most important among them run the least chance of being published in the daily press—and that this will continue to be true as long as the press lives on advertising.

We have noted here only a few examples to prove that The Nation prints news the dailies don't and won't print. Many others can be cited.—EDITORS THE NATION.

Why They Eat Garbage in Englewood

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

An editorial appearing in the December 12 issue of the Englewood News on the fact that hundreds of people are living on the refuse salvaged from the city dumps drew some caustic comments in The Nation for January 8.

As a fellow-member of this thing called the Fourth Estate, which is alleged to be predicated on the principle of accuracy, I know you will be interested to learn that your comments were based on erroneous deductions. People do not eat garbage in this city because "relief agencies are inadequate." The doors of Englewood's relief agencies have never been closed to anyone in need of food, clothing, or shelter. These human derelicts somehow have made themselves believe that "forbidden fruits" are buried in the garbage and ashes. They harbor a grudge against any kind of charity.

The entire condition is a sad commentary on the city's social pattern, but the responsibility does not lie at the doorstep of any relief agency. Those who grub for meat along with hungry dogs have already proved their eligibility for relief through a menu of blue-plate crumbs.

By way of contrast in this same city it is interesting to note that during the recent snow storm, when a call was issued for 150 WPA workers, only one man responded, proving that some of the loafers should be taken off relief and "put on the garbage."

Englewood, N. J., January 27

ROBERT H. GAMBLE,
Editor, Englewood News

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL W. WARD, a regular Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, contributes a weekly letter of Washington news to The Nation.

MARGARET BOURKE-WHITE is a photographer of national reputation.

DAVID SCHEYER is a labor journalist in New York.

JOHN R. CHAPLIN is Hollywood correspondent of the Federated Press.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN is the author of a life of Samuel Butler.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE contributes reviews and critical articles to various periodicals.

WILLIAM SEAGLE was formerly an associate editor of the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences. He is now at work on a history of law.

MILTON RUGOFF has taught English at the City College of New York and at Brooklyn College.

In an Early Issue

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

will report on the Presidential candidacy of Governor Talmadge of Georgia

At Last!
A Truly Authentic
Book on SEX, devoid of sensationalism, by the World's Foremost Authority

HAVELOCK ELLIS ON SEX

"One of the great scientific books of our time" in beautiful, easily understood language.

For the MENTALLY adult

Not a MEDICAL book, — yet physicians consult it as the authoritative reference work on sex, both normal and abnormal. The medical and legal treatment of abnormal gratification is brought up to date.

Not a "HOW" book, — yet it explains clearly the art of love and the technique of sex practice in marriage.

Not a PSYCHOLOGY BOOK, although it covers in detail the vital connections between the mental and sexual life, treating fully the nervous disorders caused by sexual maladjustment.

★ New and Challenging Conclusions regarding:

The Art of Love ■ Sex Life of Unmarried Adults ■ Sex in Marriage ■ Sexual Variations and Abnormalities ■ Sexual Adjustments ■ Substitutes for Sex ■ Age and the Sexual Impulse

FREE OFFER

Send this portion of this announcement to your bookseller or to Emerson Books, Inc., Dept. 336-N 333 Sixth Ave., New York

☐ Send me a copy of this 389-page book for free examination. I will deposit $3.00 plus a few cents delivery charge, when the book arrives. Full purchase price to be refunded, if returned within 5 days.

☐ Check here if you wish to enclose only $3.00 thus saving delivery charge. (Same money-back guarantee.)

BOOK MAILED IN PLAIN WRAPPER

389 PAGES — PRICE $3.00

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Labor and Industry

The Dressmakers' Strike

By DAVID SCHEYER

New York, February 10

TAKE the case of Jake Cohen, dress jobber—and to the legion of Cohens who are in the dress industry let me explain that the name but nothing else in this essay is fictitious.

Jake Cohen is a big business man, one of the seven hundred jobbers who form the apex of New York's dress industry with its annual production of nearly $400,000,000. Jake Cohen does about a million dollars' worth of that business—and he may do it with a capital as low as $50,000.

Cohen doesn't, you understand, hire many workers himself. He buys the materials, styles the garment, has it cut, and sells it. The actual sewing is done in one or another of the city's two thousand contracting shops, where four-fifths of the industry's hundred thousand dressmakers work. Jake Cohen has work enough for five contracting shops; but he employs fifteen contractors; he gives the great majority of his garments to the favored five and keeps the others in tow to beat down prices through the terrific competition in the industry which he himself helps to generate. You don't understand how the other ten contractors make a living? Well, many of them don't. A third of the contractors in New York go out of business every year.

Sometimes Jake Cohen will become reminiscent about the good old days before the general dress strike of 1933 lifted the dressmakers out of the sweatshops. Then Cohen and his contractors were able to hire workers for five and eight dollars a week, work them fifty hours or more a week, late at night, on Shabbas, any time. The strike abolished this idyllic state. Jake Cohen had to pay wage minimums, the thirty-five-hour week was strictly enforced, and, worst of all, the union business agents and accountants had the right to look at his books and the details of his business. He knew twenty-two ways to chisel on the collective agreement with the union, but it was becoming harder and harder to get away with it. In two years the union collected half a million dollars from the jobbers—money which had been stolen from the workers in the industry by false grading of dresses and other tricks.

In this state of industrial anarchy and fraud it was almost inevitable that robber barons should arise. Hard-faced gentry from bootlegging, white slavery, and the snatch racket came into the dress trade. They made sure that contractors who had promised a kick-back really gave it, silenced malcontents, dominated the manufacturers' associations. They had the strongest vested interest in maintaining the vicious evils of the jobber-contractor system, the most to fear from the extension of the union's strength.

Toward the end of 1935 Jake Cohen began to hear disturbing rumors. The agreement with the union was due to expire on January 31, 1936, and the New York Joint Board of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union had framed demands for its renewal that gave Mr. Cohen and his fellow-jobbers the jitters. The union was getting tired of chiseling jobbers, of the hoodlums who had invaded the trade, of the contractors who transmuted their burdens and losses into joblessness, insecurity, and misery for the workers.

The union was making three chief demands. The first was limitation of contractors: each jobber would be allowed to have, on the basis of his average volume of business, a certain number of contractors, but he couldn't have twice that number in order to be able to chisel prices by playing one contractor against another. The second demand was for the settlement of prices on the jobber's premises, to make sure that all contractors working for one jobber were paid the same rates and to fix the burden of violations on the responsible jobber. Third came the demand for the unit system, a device for setting piece rates based on time studies made by the union, providing a standard for measuring the amount of labor spent in creating a dress. These may seem strange demands from a union. They are not technicalities. Altogether they represent machinery for stabilizing the industry in the interests of better wages, assured employment, and tolerable working conditions.

The union raised this banner in October, 1935. For three months the jobbers' organization, the National Association of Dress Manufacturers, the United Dress Manufacturers, to which the contractors belonged, and the Affiliated, the association of "inside manufacturers" (who make dresses complete on their own premises)—all refused to meet with the union. So the I. L. G. W. U. went ahead with its strike preparations, secure in the knowledge that it had a defense fund of a million and a half dollars and the unswerving loyalty of a hundred thousand dressmakers. Never was a strike better organized than this. The four locals of the New York Joint Board mobilized shop chairmen and strike committee members so that the word "Down tools" could spread through the market on five minutes' notice. Julius Hochman, Joint Board manager, issued a pamphlet, "Why This Strike?" giving to the workers and the public a brilliant analysis of the factors involved.

With the expiration of the agreement at hand the union was ready to act. The jobbers and contractors suddenly began screaming in anguish as they saw a stoppage coming just at the peak of the season. They ran to Mayor LaGuardia. They ran to the newspapers. And finally they ran to the union to find out just how little they could give.

Meanwhile the three employers' associations have become five. The jobbers of cheap dresses left the National to form the Popular Price Association. Similarly the contractors in the low-priced line organized the Interstate Association. The old contractors' group, the United, is on its way out. At its last meeting, a meeting packed with strong-arm men hired from private detective agencies, with the platform guarded by a platoon of police, the elected officials were stripped of power and a clique organized as an "action committee" took over the affairs of the association.

For two weeks now the weary-eyed, tired-voiced committee of the union—Dubinsky, Hochman, Zimmerman, Antonini, and others—has been sitting through endless nights of conferences trying to discover some responsible group to bargain with. The disintegration, the clash of interests, and the sheer stupidity of the employers have made an agreement almost impossible—impossible, that is, without the purgative of a general strike. Many commercial gamblers in the industry want this strike. They have stored racks with thousands of dresses; a strike means a clean-up, an immediate agreement bankruptcy.

The Joint Board of the I. L. G. W. U. alone has shown a sense of responsibility in this maelstrom. It has sought every possible means to avoid a strike that would be tremendously costly not only to the workers but to New York's economic life as well. One thing it has not done and will not do—abate its demands for bringing a decent life to the dressmakers and order to the industry.

On February 3, when Dubinsky and Hochman reported to a meeting of five thousand shop chairmen at Manhattan Opera House, it seemed that some agreement might be reached, but negotiations broke down. The union then acted. On February 7 twenty thousand dressmakers in Madison Square Garden gave their mandate in the ceaseless chant, "We want a strike!" Hurriedly the employers renewed negotiations. It would be a good thing if the union demands could be won in conference, but if they cannot, the whirl of fifty thousand sewing machines will be stilled in the greatest strike New York has ever known.

Hollywood Goes Closed Shop

By JOHN R. CHAPLIN

Hollywood, January 29

THE Hollywood of this date line is vitally, fundamentally different from the Hollywood of a month or more ago. Since the first of the year the closed shop has hit the movie industry and has brought about a change of mentality, a new labor consciousness, which makes Hollywood a quite exciting place, one where, for the first time since the triple scare of the earthquake, the bank moratorium, and the wage cut of 1933, the glamor of stardom has actually been challenged as cynosure for the natives.

The closed shop in Hollywood is no smashing victory for labor. In fact, many persons think that the studios—or at least the labor-relations executive of the Hays office, Mr. Pat Casey—engineered the closed shop to avert more serious threats to producer autonomy, such as a strike at the termination of the union agreement this spring, or the industrial unionism foreshadowed by the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees.

This organization shall be known henceforward as the I. A. T. S. E., in distinction from the I. B. E. W., or International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. These two brotherhoods have for many years vied for supremacy in Hollywood. The sound-men's strike of 1933 gave the studios a chance to throw out the powerful I. A. T. S. E. and substitute the I. B. E. W. by building up union rivalry over the jurisdictional dispute. Now the I. B. E. W. is virtually out on its ear, and the I. A. T. S. E. is in control.

The so-called closed shop has within it not the seed of workers' power in Hollywood but the almost inevitably fertile seed of constant labor disputes. For instance, all electrical workers handling permanent installation belong to the I. B. E. W., while those handling temporary installation for the actual shooting of scenes are I. A. T. S. E. members. In addition to providing a supply of scab labor—in the event that one of the two unions should walk out without the other—this arrangement makes it necessary for two men of different unions to be employed side by side in many cases; for the I. A. T. S. E. man who may plug a light-cable into a permanent socket may not turn the permanent switch, which belongs to the I. B. E. W. men.

Mr. Pat Casey and the gentlemen he so nobly serves in his union-busting activities have plenty of imagination.

They throttle it, it is true, in the films they make, but they are positively ingenious in figuring out ways of beating the labor problem.

* * *

THE real gain from the closed-shop agreement is the courage and initiative it has given to unorganized or unrecognized groups. The Screen Actors' Guild, with nearly five thousand members, and the Screen Writers' Guild, with nearly a thousand, both in existence since 1933 but still unrecognized, now definitely plan a campaign for recognition. Needless to say, through their numbers, their wealth, and the prestige of their officers (what a persuasive union leader Robert Montgomery, Ann Harding, or Jimmy Cagney would be!) these two guilds, when recognized, will assume leadership of all labor elements in Hollywood. The Actors are already affiliated with the A. F. of L.; the Writers will probably soon follow suit.

In every branch of the industry organizations have sprung up. Hairdressers, make-up artists, first-aid attendants, and others have formed A. F. of L. locals; press agents and newspaper correspondents have their S. P. A. N. C. (Society of Press Agents and Newspaper Correspondents) and their Foreign Press Society. Only the office workers remain unorganized. And now, most amazing of all, comes the Screen Directors' Guild. Last mainstay of that ballyhooed company union known as the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, the directors, forty of them (96 per cent Academy members), have struck out on their own. King Vidor, Lewis Milestone, Frank Tuttle, William K. Howard, and John Ford are the officers. The board of directors is equally impressive. Word has leaked out that at one of the organizational meetings one of these $100,000-a-year men asked: "What's the difference whether you get a check for $25 a week or for $2,500? As long as you get a pay check, you're a laborer."

At the first meeting of the directors a man making $75,000 a year burst out: "To hell with arguing about whether or not you'll join the Federation of Labor! When you guys realize you've got to join it, I'll be back again." Meanwhile he is a member and using his weight to bring about affiliation.

The membership list has grown to nearly a hundred.

One hundred and twenty-five would mean more than 50 per cent of all directors, and would include all who are of any importance. Some 125 men make the pictures the producers know they can sell.

This directors' organization is of interest to the public, for when the directors make demands it will be not only for recognition but for different working conditions. And a change in their working conditions will mean a definite change in the type of films Hollywood is turning out. The directors want more say in the stories they shoot, more influence in the final cutting of the film. They want, too, a percentage of the profits. This would give them a partner's authority to challenge the whims of producers and those feeble-minded nephews of theirs known as supervisors.

WITH the directors threatening to show at last—for the first time, probably, since D. W. Griffith—something of their own minds in the films, the producers are searching for new "cycles" of money-makers. The G-man angle helped them to get around the edict of the Hays office against gangster films, and now they are on their way to a new "racket cycle." Dore Schary has done a story called "People Must Eat" which is said to expose the various food rackets. But the main impetus for the racket exposés comes from Martin Mooney, whose "Exclusive Story" has already exposed the "numbers" game, and whose "Bullets Versus Ballots," in which Edward G. Robinson terminates his stay at the Warner Brothers' factory, will expose the use of strong-arm men in election campaigns.

Mr. Mooney is at present in a New York jail, where he is serving a thirty-day sentence for having refused to state where he got his evidence in the racket exposé he wrote for the New York American. The Warner Brothers have stood by him nobly. They paid his plane fare to New York and are keeping him under contract. Each day he ships his writings to the studio, where another writer assembles them into screen form. The Warner Brothers can afford such largess, for they are reaping publicity from the fact that Mooney, in jail for refusing to state his sources, is now writing a film called "So You Won't Talk."

Although his exposés were done for a Hearst paper, Mr. Mooney is quite an engaging young man. Nor is he unused to having trouble with the authorities. Some four years ago Universal sent Martin Mooney and his partner, the late Patrick Kearney, to Boulder Dam to dig up a heroic scenario. The boys came back with a labor epic that took ten years off the life of Carl Laemmle and thoroughly upset the stomach of his general manager, Henry Henigson. One evening Mooney and Kearney went to the John Reed Club of Hollywood and gave a report on Boulder Dam which was impassioned, moving, and sincere. Unfortunately, so far as I know, their material belongs to Universal and has never been published. The conditions they reported, had they been made public, would doubtless have inconvenienced Senator Reed Smoot. The next day Mooney and Kearney were abruptly dismissed from the Universal lot. Mr. Henigson denied to the press that their dismissal had anything to do with their appearance at what he called the "Tom Reed Communistic Club." (Tom Reed is one of Hollywood's highest-priced scenarists.)

Mooney was not surprised. The night before, with a reverent nod toward San Quentin, he had said: "No one who bears my name can help realizing how dangerous it is, under this system, to try to right the wrongs of labor."

THE yearly award of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences will doubtless go this year to the "Informer," in which Victor McLaglen acted superbly under John Ford's direction. Unless the vote is swung to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer for its "Mutiny on the Bounty," the academy will award its prize to John Ford, one of the first movers in organizing the Directors' Guild. Ford says he can take no stand until the prize is offered to him, but his friends say he will refuse to accept it. This would doubtless prove the death-knell for the company union.

Hardly anyone but that forgotten man Mr. Conrad Nagel, strike-breaker and apologist for Hollywood, and prize-winning Mr. McLaglen, American patriot supreme and owner of the famous fascist lighthouse troop, would regret the academy. Its prizes have become meaningless. It now contains less than 5 per cent of writers and an even smaller percentage of actors, and the directors are deserting it in ever-growing numbers. On March 5 once more the hollow mockery of the award of the academy prizes will be the occasion for a Hollywood gala night. The producers will have to invite all of their many relatives lest their cherished company union find itself completely lost in the immensity of the Biltmore Bowl. The academy, like so many other "world-shaking" aspects of Hollywood, will become overnight but a memory of the days when actors, writers, and directors were still afraid to realize that their place was alongside their fellow-artisans in the ranks of labor.

Read what these authorities say—

Walter Duranty:

"Gunther is one of the outstanding correspondents in Europe."

Dorothy Thompson:

"Reading this book really gives you the feeling that you are on the inside."

Harold Nicolson:

"One of the most exciting—and educative—books I have read in years. A work that can be read as a romance. I cannot recommend it too warmly."

Frank Simonds

said: "I regard Gunther as one of the most valuable sources of European news."

"An invaluable addition to our knowledge of the present monstrous age in European politics."

—Vincent Sheean

INSIDE EUROPE

by

JOHN GUNTHER

Foreign Correspondent,
CHICAGO DAILY NEWS

A startling book about the men who are running Europe today, their plans and their policies—by a man who is in the thick of it.

180,000 words, $3.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

Books, Drama, Films

Patriot and Idealist

Lafayette. A Life. By Andreas Latzko. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

AT first glance Lafayette seems an ideal subject for a popular biography. Subsequent glances discover numerous difficulties. He was already famous in his teens, and his long life was packed with political and military incidents which require a day-to-day scrutiny of events in several countries over stretches of years and their integration with the international background. Some of these incidents were extremely involved, their underlying facts and motives hidden in diplomatic archives and private correspondence. Fulness of treatment would be cumbersome; selection requires extensive knowledge, penetration, and skill. Lafayette played an important part in three revolutions—the American, the French Revolution of 1789, and that of 1830. He was conditioned as an ardent lover of constitutional liberty by his early years in America. In his later years a certain pattern recurrently repeats itself, significant in its main outlines but made up of infinite factual details which easily become wearisome. Lafayette's life is, in fact, an extraordinary example of vital overstatement, the same personal equation being demonstrated again and again by his behavior on similar occasions. In the interests of biographers it seems that Providence, fate, or history, all of which Mr. Latzko is fond of invoking, should have managed the matter with greater economy. For this reason most writers on Lafayette have confined themselves to certain periods or aspects of his career.

Another difficulty is the fact that some, at least, of Lafayette's fame rests on assumptions which are disputable, as has recently been shown by Louis Gottschalk in his "Lafayette Comes to America." Dr. Gottschalk plays havoc with the legendary Lafayette material, though I believe that his interpretation of some of his discoveries is over-rigid. Lafayette, whether he loved liberty before he went to America or after, whether his motives in going were just what he afterward thought them or not, continues to shine as a man of unshakable courage and integrity in his lifelong devotion to an ideal. These traits, indeed, often saved him from the results of his extraordinary political naivete, which forbade him to join forces with such men as Mirabeau and Danton because he disapproved of their characters, and led to his being duped, with such appalling inevitability, by every reigning Bourbon. The flawlessness of his idealistic logic was the great flaw of his career as a French patriot. Too perfect for this world, it was no substitute for astuteness, and the belief that a monarch must keep his word could not produce a constitution. One further factor is pointed out by Gottschalk—Lafayette wrote copious memoirs, and his romanticized conception of himself has been the basis of most biographies.

Mr. Latzko accepts the older version of Lafayette's youthful idealism, while fully recognizing the peculiar limitations which caused this true friend of liberty at times to risk his head in bold defiance of absolutism, at times to appear to be its supporter, with the result that he incurred the bitter enmity of both factions. It is one of the most ironic of the many paradoxes of his life that he was immured for five years in Austrian and Prussian fortresses as a dangerous revolutionary while the Revolution would have none of him, and his wife, who shared his political views, barely escaped the guillotine to which her mother, grandmother, and sister succumbed.

It would be impossible for a professional writer of ability to narrate the life of Lafayette without contributing many pages of great interest, and there are many such in this book. It suffers as a whole from a disproportion in its parts; the narrative occasionally becomes bogged in political morasses. The style is sometimes unbearably flowery, with its appeal to abstractions apparently brooding over the life of our hero, its overemphasis on the dramatic and coincidental, its trite generalizations. To the author's credit he achieves an apparent impartiality, though one feels the struggle between his admiration and his judgment. He draws no formal conclusions, but he constantly implies them, and the final impression he gives of his subject is the true one of a romantic idealist, a "Don Quixote of constitutional liberty" whose sterling courage and truth were repeatedly betrayed by his credulousness, his respect for legality, and his lack of statesmanship.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

Subtle Artificer

Poems. By Robert Fitzgerald. Arrow Editions. $2.

"CRAFTSMAN" is by a shade too earthy a word for Mr. Fitzgerald; "artificer," which suggests the silversmith, the lace-maker, and the illusionist, is better. His first volume reveals a technique that is not equaled in subtlety and polish by any other of our younger poets. The magic of these poems springs from precision in the descriptive use of language, brilliance and intricacy of metaphor, and a mastery of elaborate patterns of sound.

Although this is not poetry that quickly yields all its treasures, the reader may well be convinced that here is a genuine and fresh talent when he comes upon lines like: "A clock's exquisite hands repose and wait"; "Leopards are in the city sniffing at corners"; and "The bells are swallowed gently underground." Mr. Fitzgerald can write a simple melodic line; he also achieves a denser and more complex type of musical progression which, until a more exact word is found, can be described as counterpoint. The use of this term has given offense, and understandably, for poetry is in an obvious sense unidimensional and homophonic, whereas music can have two dimensions and many voices. Yet such lines as these have an effect not vastly dissimilar to the interplay of subjects in polyphonic music:

Reflecting remote swords, chilled in the calm
And liquid darkness, lights on the esplanade
Prolong the night's edge downward all night long.

The syllable "re," after being twice stated, is modulated, by means of the closely following "o" in "remote," to become "or" in "swords," shaded to "ar" in "darkness," and inverted to "ro," which, by substitution of the related liquid consonant, becomes "lo" in the same word, "prolong"; and after a hint at the vowel in "down" the motif ends with a repetition of "ar" and "lo." Against this theme with variations is set another voice, running through the syllables "le," "ill," "li," "ligh," "nigh," and "nigh," with incidental embroidery such as the play of the palatals "ch" and "c" with the "l" in "chilled" and "calm." The versions of the two subjects are, of course, developed successively; nevertheless, the effect is partly one of concurrence as well as of alternation, for these reasons: first, the subjects are briefer than the usual musical subject and consequently can be more readily embraced within the "specious present" than is the case with two successively stated musical themes; secondly, there are cross-references and coincidences through the common use by the two themes of the consonant "l." If still a third motif is distinguished, consisting of the changes upon the vowel "a," this has references to the first theme. This analysis, tedious though it may be, is something of a simplification, and of course the passage can be dissected into different sets of units; it indicates, however, the skill, perhaps at times unconscious, with which the poet has woven his illusions.

The imagery in the foregoing passage, complicated as it is, can be grasped without great effort. Mr. Fitzgerald's metaphors are not always so successful:

A man walks, morose and beautiful
In his own mist, the taste of refuse
Of night like powder fallen in the street.

After some puzzling, it appears probable that the comparison between "refuse" and "powder" must consist in the facts that both are "fallen in the street" and that the refuse is palely tinted by the dawn; at first reading, however, one is more likely to take it that the two are alike in their "taste," with the resultant protest that one does not taste powder fallen in the street, or that, if one does, this is an unwarrantable instance of elucidating the familiar by the unfamiliar. The ambiguity lingers even when the passage is understood, and is an unpleasant example of one of Mr. Empson's seven types; together with the perverse syntax, it exemplifies one of the pitfalls into which Mr. Fitzgerald is inclined to stumble. It was not until about the twelfth reading that I thought I was able to understand the poem beginning "Death under the fingernails is unreal," and the false scents which I followed still interfere with my enjoyment of the poem.

This poetry has both the merits and the limitations of a mind that seems to be an isolated and a highly introspective one. Its materials are derived from personal experience and from an erudition that consists mainly of imaginative literature, with some fragments of scholastic metaphysics. Each poem opens

Doors upon interior data, shines
Engravings of antiquity . . .

One finds nevertheless, if not a contemporary intellect, at least a contemporary sensibility. Mr. Fitzgerald is perfectly at home in modern streets, and usually unruffled by them. The last poem in the volume, however, reveals an awareness, and along with it an emotional depth, for which the preceding poems have hardly prepared us. The poet comes down from his tower to stand

Under the flares and premonition of rifles:
The presses humming on the looms of night,
And news-sheets crumpled, howling in an alley
Of evil rising in the shade of war,
Such evil as in our time lives under us
Dissolving shining things . . . dissolving
The young men on their benches into death. . . .

Consequently this volume gives, along with old ways reverently and delicately trodden, promise of new departures.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Judging the Judges

Lawless Judges. By Louis P. Goldberg and Eleanor Levenson. With an Introduction by Morris R. Cohen. The Rand School Press. $2.50.

ABOUT five years ago Ernest Jerome Hopkins published a book called "Our Lawless Police." There now appears a companion volume, "Lawless Judges," which makes even more melancholy reading, for while we have almost come to expect that cops shall not be too scrupulous about legal proprieties, we have a convention that judges are impartial oracles of the law, and the present rehearsal of the conduct of judges with reference to labor disputes, civil liberties, and the review of constitutional issues does not seem to jibe well with that ideal. It is beginning to be realized that our judges have become virtually the dictators of our political life. Yet the present attack upon their prerogative is surprisingly ineffective. Indeed, it is extremely muddled and even a little naive.

Professor Cohen in his Introduction hints at the reason when he takes issue with the authors for denouncing many Supreme Court decisions as "lawless." The phraseology of the Constitution is so vague that it is usually pointless to appeal to its language. Thus while an opinion of the land's highest tribunal may be socially vicious, it is not necessarily lawless. But the same type of weakness is inherent in any argument concerning judicial "misinterpretations" of statutes. In such cases we are in the habit of speaking of the perversion of the legislative intention. But do several hundred men engaged in making laws really have a single intention? Moreover, the legislators may intend one thing and say another, and in that case the judges must violate either their intention or their specific command.

Wading in the quagmires of legislative intentions, the authors, for example, denounce the Supreme Court's application of the Sherman Act to labor. But the fault here was as much that of Congress as of the court. In his recent study of labor and the Sherman Act, Berman, after a careful survey of the evidence, is driven to conclude that while the intention of Congress was not to make the act apply to trade unions, it did use language which was susceptible of such an interpretation. Congress has itself too often been guilty of selling gold bricks to American labor to be taken as a model of purity of intention. Incidentally, in commenting on the subsequent perversion of the remedial Clayton Act, the authors indulge in a remarkable non sequitur: "Once more," they say, "the intention of Congress was unmistakable. It was to be, in the words of Gompers, 'labor's Magna Charta.'"

The authors are thus throughout engaged in legal quibbling. They have really centered the issue upon the extremely treacherous question, What is law?—which a lawyer would be hard put to answer even for a fee. Without insisting that legal rules and principles have no reality in relation to the judicial process, the fact still remains that in practice the law is usually far from definite and certain. Despite the fact that they are Socialists, and hence presumably Marxists, the authors really share the basic assumptions of the system which they are attacking. They believe apparently in the separation of powers. The legislators enact the law, and the judges need merely interpret it. However, the will of the legislators, who are full of benevolence, is perverted by the judges, who are villains. But it is hardly necessary to appeal to judicial decision to exhibit the economic bias of the legal system. It was Marx himself who once commented on the irony of speaking of impartial judges when the law itself is partial. Shall we speak of lawless legislators? The authors achieve the heights of absurdity when they complain of the manner in which judges have administered our laws against criminal syndicalism, anarchy, and sedition.

"Lawless Judges" is almost entirely a case study. The cases are typical enough, but the general problems they pose are left untouched. This is nowhere better illustrated than in the authors' final brief recommendation of remedies. They wish to introduce the judicial recall although they themselves point out that it has not worked in the states where it has been tried. They want judges impeached although they know that such procedure is cumbersome and rare. This alone would seem to show that the lawgivers do not look with displeasure on the activities of the judges. Finally they want to deprive all courts of the power to declare our laws unconstitutional. Perhaps this would help somewhat. Yet even then would democracy and justice triumph?

WILLIAM SEAGLE

Scotsman, Georgian, Cosmopolite

Never Say Die. By John Paton. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

Unending Battle. By H. C. Armstrong. Harper and Brothers. $3.

The Way of a Transgressor. By Negley Farson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

JOHN PATON traces his life from his birth in a Scottish slum until that day in his thirty-third year when he gave up proprietorship in a beauty shop to become a "professional agitator." In a series of balanced, carefully selected chapters Paton recalls his childhood days in Aberdeen, his meager schooling, his first job as a printer's devil in his thirteenth year, and then twenty years up and down Scotland as barber, baker, milkman, salesman of false teeth, and beauty-shop expert. But these details of a "proletarian pilgrimage," although sharply spiced with minor personal tragedies and a rare kind of dry, understanding humor, are only background for a mental development that was to make Paton a prominent member of the labor movement that produced Keir Hardie, Ramsay MacDonald, Snowden, and Maxton. For Paton, as he was compelled to turn from trade to trade, found support in each for his belief that under capitalism the entrepreneur only survives by cheating the consumer and victimizing his workers.

Even while the iron circumstance of poverty forced him to serve the purposes of Glasgow barbers and their fake rituals, milk concerns using short measures, and false-teeth makers with a really dangerous quackery, he was probing to the roots of these evils, turning to socialism and for a time even to anarchism. They stirred him to self-education and finally to complete devotion to the "movement." It was an avocation that developed into a life motive, an advocacy that earned him ostracism and blacklisting but recompensed him with a vivid purpose.

Paton's style, although efficient, is undistinguished, and occasionally too formal for the more robust and colorful aspects of the life he deals with. He includes several very interesting, if essentially anecdotal, portraits of Labor Party leaders. But the value of the book is in its picture of a man to whom a movement like early Scottish socialism, with its crusading, pamphleteering, soap-box vigor, its stubborn struggle against misrepresentation, mass apathy, and an infinity of lost elections, can become food and drink, better than sleep, the rival of his love.

As clearly motivated, to be sure, was the life of Leo Keresselidze, Georgian rebel leader, guerrilla, conspirator, and super-patriot. Mature it was not, for, if we may trust his biographer, General Keresselidze for the first forty-odd years of his life was almost exclusively engaged in murdering Russians—Czarist, white, and red indiscriminately—to satisfy what seems to have been a rather elementary lust for physical danger. Luckily this passion coincided with the struggle of Caucasian Georgia, his native state, for freedom from Russian domination. "Unending Battle," as biography, is too unrelieved a record of innumerable hairbreadth escapes, ambushes, banditry, exile-plotting, gun-running, and very successful assassination. Mr. Armstrong's imaginative reconstruction and embellishment of these happenings round out the account but make it taste unpleasantly like high-pressure adventure fiction.

"The Way of a Transgressor" is more difficult to deal with, not because of any profundity but simply because Farson has done too many things, and too many things without clear motive, to be able to tell his story in any orderly or connected way. His book contains literally hundreds of episodes and anecdotes from the experiences of a fishing, sailing New Jersey boy who became a famous college athlete, an engineer in England, spent years in Czarist Russia bribing his way into orders for war goods, served with the Royal Flying Corps in Egypt, lay in the hospitals of several nations, went native in British Columbia, returned to sensational auto-sales promoting, sailed 3,600 miles through Europe in a small boat, and then for ten years as a foreign correspondent dashed around to the trouble centers of a dozen countries. Add to this a refrain consisting of Russian women, heavy drinking, every variety of fishing, sailing, and sudden world-spanning journey, and you have a fair idea of this man's autobiography. He selects; but arbitrarily, without even suggesting the criteria for selection; and coherence consequently suffers at every turn.

Nor does there seem to be spiritual unity beneath the surface. Paton was a Socialist; Keresselidze a fighter for freedom; Farson, as the blurb suggests, "an amateur of life." His was an extrovert's unremitting flirtation with experience. He is not, to be sure, a Halliburton, for he seems to have found as much excitement in clinching a big business deal as in stunt-flying over the Pyramids. Only in the last section when, as special correspondent, he digs up adventures in Andalusia, Norway, and elsewhere, does the stuff of living become the concocted material of travelogues.

Nor is there too much consistency in opinion. In the long sections on Russia his laments for the passing of Czarist court life clash with his admiration for the new vitality of the Soviet masses; and his praises of communism show a strange admixture of contemptuous reference to its followers. He embraces John Reed and empedestals Lenin, but supports every white Russian he meets, and on one occasion is quite ready to join Denikin. In the end it amounts to what may charitably be called confusion.

All this does not alter the fact that "The Way of a Transgressor" contains a great many bizarre and a few fascinating or amazing reminiscences, and a concentrated if fragmentary vision of diverse aspects of European life since 1914. Stylistically Farson courts brevity, understatement, and a certain colloquial ease—all familiar to journalism—and these sometimes betray him into abruptness, omission, or a disagreeable combination of raciness and journalese.

MILTON RUGOFF

The Esoteric Science

Money. By Edwin Walter Kemmerer. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

MONEY, like medicine, is a science of which everyone possesses a smattering of knowledge. The two are also alike in that each breeds a vigorous crop of amateurs who are certain that their home-made remedies are superior to those proposed by professionals. To a certain extent the learned men of the respective professions are responsible for this state of affairs, since they have more or less consciously developed a language understandable only to initiates. In recent years the error of this course has become apparent, at least to the economists; and they are now making a deliberate effort to educate the public in the fundamentals of the science.

Dr. Kemmerer's latest book is not a primer for the women of the Thursday Afternoon Circle who ask for "something that will tell me all about money." "Kemmerer on Money," an earlier book, was an attempt to reach the none-too-bright public. The present volume is intended to present the basic principles of monetary science to those possessing some background in economics. Together with a second volume, scheduled to appear shortly, which will deal chiefly with banking, it should equip the educated layman with an adequate picture of the essential problems in the field.

Taken as a whole the book is as non-controversial as any discussion of money could possibly be in a period when its fundamental principles are in a state of flux. While the author's conservative bias is manifest in the selection of material, emphasis is placed on historical developments rather than on theory. The latter half of the book is given over entirely to a series of "case" studies covering a few of the leading experiments in heterodox monetary practice. Readers who are concerned about the possible effects of inflation in this country will be particularly interested in the chapters on the French assignats, the American greenbacks, and the German inflation. These sections should be required reading for Father Coughlin, and for certain of the "silver" Senators.

Yet despite his objectivity Dr. Kemmerer evidently looks upon the international gold standard as the most satisfactory monetary system. While his failure to stress the factors leading to the wholesale abandonment of gold during the past five years may merely indicate that this subject is deferred to the second volume, the amount of space devoted to gold and the terrible disasters which befell the countries which deserted gold suggest a tenacious loyalty to the prescription that he handed out to the thirteen governments which he served as financial adviser. The fundamental instability of gold as a standard of value and the tremendous social cost of seeking to maintain a rigid standard during times of stress receive scant treatment.

But perhaps the chief defect of the book as a guide for the layman is its failure to consider the problem of money in the larger setting of present-day economic developments. Money, after all, is little more than a device for facilitating the basic process of production and exchange. It has no independent function apart from that process. Dr. Kemmerer shows this very clearly when he discusses the limited uses of money in a primitive economy. He does not, however, show as clearly as he might how the gold standard was ideally adapted to the particular stage of laissez faire capitalism which existed prior to the World War. And there is scarcely a hint of the monetary problems created by the growing rigidities in that system, much less of those which are bound to be associated with the gradual development of a planned economy. It may be that he has merely deferred this analysis to his forthcoming volume, but from the standpoint of good pedagogy, one feels that there should have been at least some recognition of the dynamics of the science in the present book.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Shorter Notices

If I Have Four Apples. By Josephine Lawrence. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

Only the captious will take exception to Miss Lawrence's general contention here: two apples and two apples make four apples, and apples are not alligator pears. Nor does Miss Lawrence's insistence on this point come at all impertinently at a time when families like the Penter Hoes are congesting relief efforts throughout the nation, for no better cause than an error in simple addition. It is problematical, however, whether an unbalanced budget can in itself sustain the weight of a full-length novel—especially when, as in the present case, the issue is five times restated in terms of each of the five members of the Hoe household. When first defined in the opening chapters, the thesis is not without force and relevancy. There will be many who will discover in the fortunes of the Penter Hoes a counterpart of their own domestic dilemmas, and perhaps even a solution for these difficulties. But unless the reader is more than ordinarily absorbed in matters of budgetary readjustment, or is willing to accept the romantic stock in trade incidental to love amid the suburbs, Miss Lawrence's good intentions are likely to fall short of their mark through excess and overstatement. Miss Lawrence has a message to convey, and like all good proselytizers, she preaches by text and parable. It would be supererogatory to suggest that she has not given evidence here either of authentic acquaintance with the family of which she writes, or of an entirely genuine concern in their difficulties. Yet it is only by the very baldest effort of will that she manages to project the portraits of the family group, individually or as a composite. The book as a whole is written with great nervous tension. The author is continually betraying a damaging lack of rapport by magnifying simple reactions to simple situations to the point of grotesqueness. Miss Lawrence might have taken a lesson in repose from "Vanity Fair," where, in a handful of pages, Thackeray advised his nineteenth-century reader on how it might be possible for the resourceful to live as well as you please "on nothing a year."

Unsolved Problems of Science. By A. W. Haslett. The Macmillan Company. $2.

This book is a progress report of the attempt to unravel cosmic crimes committed in dim antiquity, with the fingerprints of the criminals almost obliterated and much of the evidence permanently destroyed. With a simplicity of language and a directness of approach that are far too often missing from popular scientific books, the author depicts the frontiers of science. The riddle of the origin of the universe and the various theories to explain it are stated so clearly and linked together so well that the reader will never realize how many data have been digested to present this simple picture. Other topics dealt with are methods of weather forecasting, the origin of man, the biological significance of sex, and atomic structure, to mention only a few. It all makes fascinating reading.

Poems, 1935. By F. L. Lucas. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

Among readers of English periodicals Mr. Lucas is widely known as the author of accomplished occasional verse of a satirical or mildly philosophical nature, and as a delicate translator from the classics and from the French. Introducing the present collection he rather archly invites comparison with past poets, hinting that the modern critic will find "Poems, 1935" an odd title, imagining 1835 to be nearer the mark. He clearly shows that his idea of tradition in literature is the production of negative, inoffensive filigree; he has no truck with Eliot's plea for assimilation or Day Lewis's conceit about "dead creators packed in close fiber." But his fable on the Reichstag trial has the touch of La Fontaine; his epigrams on Nazi Germany are the protest of a genuinely disillusioned liberalism:

In former, less enlightened ages
Men kept parrots shut in cages.
But times progress: in cage and pen
Parrots now imprison men.

Sick at heart, Mr. Lucas finds comfort in wearing it upon his sleeve, where it becomes not sick but stoic. "A smile of scorn" figures in the epitaph he would choose for himself. In his preface the author turns peevishly on his contemporaries, lashing out at "modern" poetry indiscriminately but with a febrile malice unsupported by alternative suggestions or by his own slight contributions. He is unwise to play the enfant terrible, for when time sifts out the best poems of "nibblers of moulded quips," the choicest epigrams and translations of Mr. Lucas may, with luck, survive with them.

Drama

The Follies Must Go On

WHEN the Shuberts undertook to maintain the tradition of the "Ziegfeld Follies" they actually succeeded in keeping alive something more than the name, and the edition now current at the Winter Garden is no unworthy successor to those which the great glorifier supervised. Fanny Brice herself is a noble tradition which goes back to 1916, and if the splendiferous Urban is no more, Vincente Minnelli (who also made the sets for "At Home Abroad") has created a style no less effective for being considerably less flamboyant. Fashions change and the Follies change with them, but to those expert in such matters there is at least a shade of continuous difference between the annual exhibitions staged by Mr. Ziegfeld's institution and the annual editions of other standard revues.

Mr. Ziegfeld, I suspect, owed his preeminence to the fact that he never forgot the good old rule: "Nothing succeeds like excess." He realized that conspicuous expenditure was one of the charms of the revue, and, indeed, legend has it that he used to discard fabulously expensive scenes just to prove to himself that he didn't give a hang for cost. But of course this wastefulness proved to be good business in the end. It gave his customers the feeling that nothing was too good—or at least too expensive—for them, and extravagance became the cachet of his style. Even if one was bored—as in truth one not infrequently was—one felt at least that money was being spent and that nothing was skimmed. The rule was to open with at least an hour more of spectacle than could possibly be presented in subsequent performances and, even after drastic eliminations, to leave at least half a dozen more girls in every scene than were really necessary to fill out the picture.

One reason why the revived "Follies" seems a real continuation is just that a good deal of this lavishness is maintained. But that is not all. Miss Brice is certainly one of the two or three really inspired comedians of the revue stage. She distills the absolute quintessence of vulgarity, but she is not herself vulgar for the simple reason that her performance is so obviously art rather than nature. What she may have been in that distant past when she began her career by appearing on an amateur night at a Brooklyn theater I do not know. Perhaps then she was funnier than she intended to be. But by now she is a consummate actress whose raucous vulgarity has been transmuted into satire.

If no other performer in the show has anything like Miss Brice's distinction, at least there are four or five others who do more or less conventional things with more than conventional expertness. Cherry and June Preusser are very youthful dancers with a style of their own; Harriet Hctor performs at least one interpretative dance—Night Flight—of unusual charm; and Josephine Baker exhibits her very limited repertory of orgiastic contortions. Next to Miss Brice, however, the real star of the evening is an extraordinary juggler named Stan Kavanagh, who uses only the simplest of accessories with such unbelievable skill that his one appearance very nearly stopped the show.

Perhaps it should be added that the reanimated Follies are also like the earlier editions in one unfortunate particular. However good individual scenes may be, there is little spontaneity in the whole. One never quite escapes the feeling that entertaining the public on this lavish scale is a serious business. But of course one can't have everything, and if the producers feel the weight of their responsibilities, that is only to be expected.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

YOU KNOW STUDS LONIGAN

—BUT HAVE YOU MET GAS-HOUSE MCGINTY

Another novel by JAMES T. FARRELL
The Only Novelist on "The Nation's" Honor Roll
364 pages. $2.50 At all bookstores Vanguard

A Book You Should Read

The GLANDS OF LIFE

By HERMAN H. RUBIN, M.D.

How the Ductless Glands regulate our Mental, Physical and Sexual Health, Personality and Behavior. The vital role they play in our daily life and their contribution to successful living. Vitality, Sexual Virility, Senility, Rejuvenation and many other important subjects are presented in clear, direct, non-technical language.

Packed with authoritative information, yet as readable as a novel.

Price $1.50

Postage 15c extra

B. B. BELLAIRE, PUBLISHER
489 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. Department N

THEATERS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by Dodie Smith

with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEATRE, 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:20
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:20

DINNER

THE THEATRE UNION ANNUAL DINNER

ALDINE CLUB, 200 FIFTH AVENUE

Tuesday Evening, February 18 at 7 P.M.

HEYWOOD BROWN, Chairman

Distinguished Speakers

JULIUS HOCHMAN, President Labor Stage
JOHN HOWARD LAWSON, SIDNEY KINGSLEY,
LILLIAN HELLMAN, JOSEPH FREEMAN, ARTURO GIOVANNITTI, distinguished Italian poet, SYLVIA FENINGSTON. Dinner $1.75. No Gratuities.

For reservations call M. E. Fitzgerald, WATKINS 9-2050

THEATRE UNION, 103 W. FOURTEENTH STREET

Films

Charlie Chaplin

THE great audience which had pushed into the Rivoli by nine o'clock on the morning of February 6 was there not so much to see "Modern Times" as to see the most famous actor in the world, and possibly the most famous man. A classic was on view, and there was every disposition not to be disappointed. Evidences of familiarity with the Chaplin tradition were constantly making themselves heard and felt. When Charlie put on roller skates in the department store, when he presented himself for a job as waiter in the cabaret where of course there were two kitchen doors marked "In" and "Out," whenever he had a corner to get around, and whenever a policeman was waiting for him around this corner, the audience showed by all the ancient signs that it knew what was coming. And what should have come did come. Charlie Chaplin was not disappointing. He was exactly as good as he had ever been before, and all of him was there; which is a way of saying that "Modern Times" is one of the most interesting spectacles to be seen in America today.

He has changed very little. His appearance has not changed at all—derby, mustache, eyes, mouth, pants, shoes, and walking stick are just the same. He has brought with him some of the old actors of Mack Sennett's day, notably Chester Conklin with his walrus mustache. He exploits the identical situations of five, ten, fifteen, twenty years ago, making familiar use of policemen, water hydrants, the waiter's tray, and the custard pie. His eye for persons and institutions to be parodied has not lost a single beam of its quickness; if the football game with a roast duck reminds anyone of Harpo Marx's baseball game in "A Night at the Opera," it should be remembered who came first in this genre; and if there has ever been a finer piece of fooling than the scene in the bathing suit I think I must have missed it. But more impressive still, he has continued to hold out against dialogue. The manager of the factory where Charlie works does, to be sure, give a few orders with his own voice—through a glass screen, by television; and Charlie goes so far on one occasion as to sing a song—in no language that may be identified, though it seems to represent a merger of French, Italian, and Rumanian. Beyond these heresies we hear nothing but mechanical noise; phonographs speak for salesmen, sirens indicate the approach of the law, and incidental music (composed by Chaplin himself) suggest the tenor of such remarks as the actors address to one another. The rest is pantomime, with Chaplin always the central figure and with nothing to inspire the wish in us to hear the words he obviously has no need for.

Chaplin has not changed. The little monkey who without seeming to know that he does so, or without wanting to belittle anybody or anything, makes a monkey out of the entire world still expresses himself, I think, in terms of the purest, the most disinterested comedy. The rumors and the advance assurances that he had this time taken sides in the class struggle—and taken, naturally, the right side—were not borne out by anything I saw with my own eyes. The girl waif with whom Charlie casts his lot is the orphan of an unemployed man shot down by the police, and as such she unquestionably has our sympathy. But then it is by the most grotesque of accidents that Charlie leads a labor parade; the red flag he waves is a rag of warning which a truck has jolted loose from its projecting cargo; and the well-meaning hero, waving it for the truck-driver to see, never knows that a column of demonstrators has marched up behind him and fallen in step.

Not that Chaplin is making fun of labor demonstrations; he is simply using one to further his own comic purposes. What he believes as a citizen seems to have nothing whatever to do with the way he behaves here. There is nothing that is not funny for him, or that cannot be made so. His line is laughter. And I for one am glad that he has kept to it. The relatively brief portion of "Modern Times" which deals with poor versus rich is as little a worker's tract as "Shoulder Arms" was a pacifist document, or "The Gold Rush" a discussion of the thirst for wealth, or "The Rink" an exposure of roller skating. The film as a whole means no more than Charlie Chaplin means. Nobody has ever been able to say what that is, but by the present showing it is something quite timeless and priceless, and more human than the best of alien words lugged in for definition.

MARK VAN DOREN

JEFFERSON AND/OR MUSSOLINI

by EZRA POUND

FASCISM! JEFFERSONISM!

What are they, and wherein do they really differ? In his distinctive and inimitable manner Ezra Pound presents a vivid and masterful analysis on the fundamentals of state organization as expounded by these great, political individualists!

Without advocating Fascism for America, Pound does not conceal his admiration for the accomplishments achieved by Mussolini for Italy! This most important and provocative book—timely and interesting—is further emphasized by the proximity of the national election. $2.00

LIVERIGHT, NEW YORK

HELP WANTED

The responsive employer and the intelligent applicant for employment read these columns.

Special Rates for Positions Wanted.
18 words for $1.50

Additional lines of six words, 62c each.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

CORtlandt 7-3330

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXLII

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1936

No. 3686

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS	233
EDITORIALS:
The TVA Decision—a Trojan Horse	236
Hitler Prepares	237
Armaments or Collective Law?	238
ISSUES AND MEN. ROOSEVELT BETRAYS NEUTRALITY. By Oswald Garrison Villard	239
CARTOON. By Fritz	240
DON'T ANNOY THE BIG SHOTS. By Emanuel H. Lavine	241
WASHINGTON WEEKLY. By Paul W. Ward	243
THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF PEACE. By Vera Micheles Dean	244
ARMS OVER EUROPE. AUSTRIA DAMS THE NAZI FLOOD. By Louis Fischer	246
PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITIES. COLONEL KNOX'S CAMPAIGN STRATEGY. By Raymond Gram Swing	248
MR. HEARST RESTORES ST. DONATS. By a Welsh Correspondent	250
CORRESPONDENCE	251
LABOR AND INDUSTRY:
Seattle Upholds Civil Liberty. By Cole Stevens	252
Loose Construction. By Heywood Broun	253
Facts for Consumers. By Ruth Brindze	254
BOOKS AND MUSIC:
Biography. By Abe Craddock Edmunds	255
Mr. Santayana's First Novel. By Henry Hazlitt	255
The Greatest of the Lowells. By Jacques Barzun	256
Coming of Age in New York. By Clara Gruening Stillman	256
The International Present. By Robert Lann	256
A Quest of the Spirit. By Samuel Sillen	258
Shorter Notices	258
Recorded Music. By Henry Simon	259

BOARD OF EDITORS

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

SUBSCRIPTION RATES—DOMESTIC: One Year $5; Two Years $8; Three years $11. CANADIAN: 50 cents a year additional. FOREIGN: $1 a year additional.

THREE WEEKS' NOTICE AND THE OLD ADDRESS AS WELL AS THE NEW ARE REQUIRED FOR CHANGE OF SUBSCRIBER'S ADDRESS.

THE NATION. Published weekly at 20 Vesey St., New York. Entered as second class matter December 13, 1897, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., and under the Act of March 3, 1879. Copyright, 1936, by the Nation, Inc.

Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager. Walter F. Gruening, Circulation Manager. Cable Address: Nation, New York.

BIRTHDAY SPEECHES (Senator Vandenberg's phrase is "natal celebrations") are rarely either funny or important, but when the subjects are Lincoln and Washington and a campaign is approaching they may easily be both. The Republican strategists feel of course that they have a vested interest in the two men. Lincoln's greatness and the triumph of Northern business enterprise in the Civil War gave the party a class base and the prestige of a name; and Washington, as a Federalist, was of course the Republican of his day. But the Democrats have control of Congress and were not to be excluded from the orgy of quotation-mongering on February 12. Senator Barkley (D.) of Kentucky, in an incredibly turgid and inconsequential speech, gave a complete genealogy of the Lincoln family. Representative Randolph of West Virginia (D.) quoted Arthur Brisbane in praise of Nancy Hanks, and read a poem by a constituent who said that if Lincoln were alive to talk over the radio he would not talk on public problems but would tell a funny story. Representative Dorsey of Pennsylvania (D.) quoted Kipling's "If" in full, and insisted that Lincoln was "the New Dealer of his day." The only Republican, Representative Reed of Illinois, eulogized Lincoln a conservative after whose death "the radicals and extremists obtained unrelenting control." But the important speeches were made outside Congress by the Republicans who are panting for the nomination. Senator Vandenberg spoke to a thousand resplendent Republican diners at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York and continued the indecent Republican flirtation with the so-called Jeffersonian Democrats. Mr. Hoover spoke to an equally large audience in Portland and reinforced his growing reputation for wit and epigram. Colonel Knox had to be content with a smaller but exclusive audience at the Middlesex Club in Boston.

THE RADIO HUMMED with Republican static and Republican hopes. It was also eloquent with the unspoken Republican despair that there was so little in Lincoln that could be used to advantage. First of all, Lincoln the man of the people could have little meaning to the diners at the Waldorf-Astoria, and despite a few half-hearted attempts on Mr. Hoover's part to identify the fight against the New Deal with the cause of the worker, no one really believes that the Republican Party stands for the common man. One quotation from Lincoln that was not given among all the quotation-mongering was that "the strongest bond of human sympathy, outside of the family relation, should be one uniting all working people, of all nations and tongues and kindreds." Secondly, it is difficult to fight a "Roosevelt dictatorship" with the name and memory of a man who assumed more arbitrary executive power in a national emergency than any other President, and who suspended the Constitution while he was fighting a war. Thirdly, it is difficult to defend the present Supreme Court with a man who at the time of the Dred Scott decision said the clearest and strongest words against accepting the decisions of a partisan court that have ever been spoken. From this point of view the best commemoration of Lincoln was Senator Norris's masterful attack on the Hoosac decision, made in the Senate on Lincoln's Birthday. About all the rest Lincoln (if he were alive to hear it) could only have said what he said of slavery—"I bite my lips and keep quiet."

THE UNPREDICTABLE character of the Supreme Court's action was again shown in two decisions which the court handed down. Both involved the New York State Milk Control Act, which among other provisions set a differential of one cent between the minimum prices that could be charged for advertised and non-advertised brands. In the Borden case the court by a five-to-four decision—the division being the same as in the earlier case of Nebbia vs. New York—upheld the differential. In the Mayflower Farms case, however, which involved the provision that this differential should not apply to firms which entered the field after April 10, 1933, the court by a six-to-three decision refused to uphold the provision. Both majority opinions were delivered by Justice Roberts. At first glance the two cases are bewildering. Two clauses of a statute, presumably embodying a similar degree of legislative wisdom, are treated differently by the court. In the Borden case the court approved of the legislative wisdom; in the Mayflower Farms case it disappeared. There are only two stable factors in the two opinions: one is that the court still arrogates to itself the right to pass final judgment on the wisdom of a legislative act; the second is that the court clings to a mechanical and archaic notion of the economic system—in Justice Roberts's words, "the natural laws of trade or industry." The consumer has learned to discard the notion of an automatic economic mechanism. He wants most to know whether the price-fixing in question is to save profits or whether it represents a genuine attempt to bring stability into a chaotic industry. But while it is legitimate for the consumer to ask this about the New York law, it was no concern of the judges. The only consistency is to be found in the three liberal justices, who in both cases took the stand that they have been taking ever since the fatal Schechter case—namely, that it is not the court's function to intrude its own notions of legislative policy where the action of the legislature can be held to be reasonable.

ON THE SAME DAY the freedom of the press was unanimously upheld in a ringing decision in the suit brought by thirteen Louisiana newspapers to defeat a tax laid upon them by the late Huey Long. The decision was in itself excellent, and while Justice Sutherland enunciated no new constitutional principle it is well to have on the record for future use in a fascist emergency such statements as "a free press stands as one of the great interpreters between the government and the people. To allow it to be fettered is to fetter ourselves." The context of the case is more doubtful. The freedom involved is indicated by the fact that Elisha Hanson was its advocate. His presence also foreshadows the uses to which the decision may be put. It was Elisha Hanson who defended Mr. Hearst when the Newspaper Guild attempted to curtail the freedom of the Hearst press to fire Dean Jennings merely for belonging to a union. A more recent example of what Mr. Hanson and his clients mean when they speak of freedom of the press is to be found in Mr. Hanson's speech at the annual convention of the Ohio Daily Newspaper Publishers' Association in Columbus. Any effort, said Mr. Hanson, "to control a newspaper's revenue through an attack on advertising or circulation constitutes a direct threat" against that freedom. By this definition any strike, not only against a publisher but against a business organization that advertised in his paper, would constitute a threat to the freedom of the press. In support of his thesis Mr. Hanson also attacked the Wagner Labor Relations Act and warned his audience not to submit to it; he denounced the thirty-hour-week bill, and he told publishers to oppose the Social Security Act and to pay only under protest the taxes it provides. Mr. Hanson seems to suggest that when an old lady in Dubuque accepts a government pension—if she gets a chance—she too will be endangering our free press.

THE PROSPECT OF WAR in the Far East seems to have diminished rather than increased as a result of the recent series of armed clashes along the Manchoukuo-Mongolian border. Despite the exodus of wealthy Chinese from the affected zones, neither Moscow nor Tokyo appears to be greatly disturbed. The influential Japanese Asahi (Tokyo) has even gone so far as to revive the proposal for a non-aggression pact, suggested by the Soviet Union in 1931 and hitherto strongly opposed by Japan. This paradoxical situation can only be explained by the firmness of the Soviet attitude and by the realization on the part of Japanese militarists that they dare not tackle the powerful Red Army single-handed. The sorties into Mongolian territory were doubtless made for the purpose of discovering whether Moscow would support its Mongolian ally. Vigorous counter-attacks by well-equipped Mongolian troops supplied the answer. The closing of the Soviet consulate at Mukden, cited as a harbinger of war, was merely a conciliatory gesture in the face of a Japanese demand that the number of consulates—which are accredited to Nanking—be reduced. Barring a sudden change in the European outlook, there is little reason to believe that the Japanese will deliberately provoke war at the present moment. With the incidents at Mukden and Shanghai in mind, however, one would be rash to predict what local militarists might try.

IT HAS BEEN many months since Europe has furnished news as encouraging for democracy as are the results of the Spanish elections. A year ago the progressive forces of Spain were prostrate before the brutal attacks of the fascist clique headed by Gil Robles. Thousands of Socialists and liberals were in prison, including the entire leadership of the Catalan left. Aided by the conservative influence of the church and the landowners, and by the backwardness of the Spanish masses, reaction appeared to be in complete control. Yet in spite of these seemingly overwhelming handicaps the left coalition has scored a spectacular triumph, sweeping Catalonia and Madrid and obtaining at least half of the total number of seats in the new Parliament. While a second election will be necessary in some districts before the final outcome can be determined, the present government is expected to resign without awaiting the ultimate verdict. There is, of course, a danger that Robles will attempt a coup rather than see the left once more come into power. But the post-election demonstrations demanding the release of all political prisoners indicate that the left parties have regained sufficient popular support to thwart any such attempt. With the memories of the Asturian massacres behind them, the Socialists are unlikely to allow a second opportunity for attaining power to slip from their grasp.

THE BRUTAL ASSAULT on Léon Blum by members of the royalist Action Française has served to revive fears of a sanguinary outbreak in connection with the coming elections in France. Although the Sarraut government acted with commendable promptness in hunting down the assailants and in dissolving the royalist organizations, the incident cannot but inflame passions on both sides. The attack symbolized the crude brutality of the French fascist movement. While the assault was clearly the work of undisciplined ruffians, it was provoked by men high in the royalist councils. That the attack has not been wholly negative in effect was indicated, however, by the vast popular demonstration of February 16 when over 100,000 persons—Radical Socialists, Socialists, and Communists—paraded through the Latin Quarter of Paris. Given continued unity and a chance for peaceful election, there is little doubt that the French public will deliver its final rebuke to irresponsible terrorism by an overwhelming left victory in May.

NOTHING COULD BE better calculated to rock the foundations of Chinese society than the denunciation of Chiang Kai-shek as "an enemy of the whole people" by his son, Chiang Chin-ko. Public disrespect for one's parents is the cardinal sin under China's code of ethics, a sin which cannot be extenuated. Yet Chiang Chin-ko, who was sent to Moscow by his father in 1926, not only attacks his parent as a reactionary for whom he is "ashamed before the Chinese people," but charges the elder Chiang with having driven his own mother to the grave with beatings and insults. Such charges of unfilial behavior, if openly aired in China, might very well suffice to drive Chiang from public life. The fundamental divergence of the son's outlook from that of his father may best be seen, however, when he declares that having attained "knowledge of . . . the method of liberating exploited, oppressed humanity," he could "never go home to drag out . . . a miserable existence as a timid weapon in the hands of a mountebank father." It is perhaps not wholly accidental that the only other important open family break in present-day China should also concern Chiang Kai-shek—the similar charge of the gross exploitation of China's millions leveled against him by his sister-in-law, Madam Sun Yat-sen. There is real hope for a new generation in China that refuses to be cowed by position, wealth, or the unbending traditions of a dead past.

WHILE WRATHFUL SENATORS threaten impeachment and indignant Assemblymen scurry around looking up regulations whereby a governor may be held for contempt, Governor Lehman stands by his guns in his attack on the honor of the "Honorable Bodies" at Albany. His charge that the influence of certain unnamed "powerful groups" was responsible for turning the state's lawmakers against the crime bills was doubtless sincerely felt by the Governor to be both justified and necessary. But its effect has been to stiffen the opposition to the bills and to becloud the basic issues by introducing the question of personal probity. While Governor Lehman unfortunately did not see fit to name names, it is entirely plausible that the force of organized racketeering is being exerted to defeat the bills. We commented last week on the fallacy of the premise underlying Governor Lehman's program—namely, that the failure of law enforcement can be cured by more law enforcement—and we commented also on the possible use of the crime bills against labor organization. We are none the less entirely behind Governor Lehman in his fight against the racketeering "big shots," and we are decidedly in favor of those elements of his crime program which represent the best thinking of criminologists and social workers. The Governor would be proceeding more realistically if he directed his efforts toward the elimination of corruption among police, magistrates, and prosecuting officers rather than toward increasing the rigor of the existing laws. From this standpoint it is encouraging that out of the travail produced by the Governor's statement there has emerged a proposal for an official investigation of the law-enforcing bodies of the state in order to locate the blame for the ineffectiveness of crime control.

PROTESTING WPA WORKERS got some excellent publicity in a good cause on February 15 when the New York City police broke up a demonstration 15,000 strong in Union Square and threw a young man into a patrol wagon head first. The young man turned out to be none other than Congressman Vito Marcantonio, which made a grand front-page story and gave Mayor LaGuardia another chance to be "unavailable for comment" on one of the persistent sore spots of his administration. The police department, it seems, had given permits for meetings in two different localities but had refused a permit for the demonstrators to march from one place to the other. When Mr. Marcantonio volunteered to lead the march regardless, he was promptly seized and arrested along with twelve other protestants. After being held for several hours in "protective custody," the group was unconditionally released. Whether or not this treatment was invented on the spot because of the uncomfortable fact that a member of Congress was being held a prisoner, the police have by now decided that it is a clever method of dealing with "agitators," and that in the future leaders of demonstrations will be similarly detained until the disturbance is over. Commissioner Valentine, in announcing this procedure, did not explain what particular statute or city ordinance gave him the right to issue such instructions, but he may well have been influenced by the intemperate statement of Victor F. Ridder, WPA administrator, on February 13 that "fewer than 10 per cent of the demonstrators were WPA employees." The WPA demonstration was one of a series of protests over low wages and the discharge of a number of workers. Mayor LaGuardia, who, when he was a fighting Congressman himself, introduced Mr. Marcantonio to the picket line in the dress strike in 1926, has consistently dismissed WPA complaints on the ground that they were instigated by professional agitators. It is a long way, evidently, from the picket line to City Hall.

MORE THAN 70,000 persons, we are told, have already purchased Sinclair Lewis's "It Can't Happen Here," which means that a good many other thousands have read it. This makes all the more preposterous the reported banning by the Hays office in Hollywood of the film version on the ground that it might cause international unpleasantness, particularly in the form of boycotts in those countries where fascism has already happened. Sidney Howard, who wrote the film script, reports that Mr. Hays was also worried about the reception of the picture with an election in prospect; he "certainly didn't intend," according to Mr. Howard, "to offend the Republicans." All this is categorically denied by the representatives of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. It is true, they aver, that the script had been accepted, that Lionel Barrymore had already been cast for the leading part, and that the filming had been scheduled to start almost immediately—not to mention the fact which Mr. Lewis averred for them that he has already been handsomely paid for the film rights. But it was discovered that the present script would be very costly, and the delay was occasioned by an effort to economize. If this is true, it is a pity that Mr. Hays did not make the announcement himself or that he did not pick another author to censor instead of Mr. Lewis, who, in addition to being a Nobel Prize winner, is a red-hot poker when he gets mad. Approval of the alleged censorship was expressed in both Rome and Berlin, which may convince Mr. Hays that from the standpoint of box-office receipts he was right. But if there is sufficient indignation over the refusal to film the story, Mr. Lewis, in his title and otherwise, is likely to have the last word.

The TVA Decision—a Trojan Horse

NO enacted drama could possibly be as theatrical as the Supreme Court's decision in the TVA case. While the judges deliberated for sixty days over the suit—studying briefs, debating conclusions, digging up precedent, making three different arguments march in three different directions on the same set of facts, the entire country was in a state of jitters, wondering whether the ax would fall, and when. The spectacle of a weekly hegira to the court, with half the legal and political potentates of the country showing up on successive Mondays on the chance that the oracle would finally speak, should delight anyone whose taste runs toward magic or the riddles of political psychology. Think of what a civilized Chinese would make of it by the side of the ritual and taboos of his own people, or some curious and detached anthropologist examining the folkways of this strange country.

The climax of the absurd mingled with the tragic came in the mad trading on the New York Stock Exchange. The word that Chief Justice Hughes was reading the decision of the court sent Commonwealth and Southern zooming to the news-ticker heavens, bearing with it a golden freightage. The word of what the Hughes decision was sent the same stock careening down again, to the dismay of those huddled around the big board. In the Tennessee Valley there was joy. The United Press reported that laborers on TVA projects "joyfully shouted the news from one crew to another." They were grateful, no doubt, that the court had not cut their livelihood from under them as it had done for the farmers—grateful with the gratitude of some surviving community around whom a hurricane has cut a wide circle and swept by. "Pitch in, fellows," one laborer cried, "it's too good to believe." All of which may make drama, but as a way of ordering the affairs of a nation it doesn't make sense.

The interesting thing of course is that even after the decision no one knows quite what to make of it. There will be many, no doubt, who will be so filled with rejoicing because the court was merciful that they will consider any critical analysis of the decision carping and ungrateful. But while such an attitude may be good emotion, it is not good thought. We have all burned our fingers so many times with wishful zeal over what seemed to be a new turn in the court's attitude that we owe it to the court to substitute questions for huzzahs. Suppose we examine what the TVA decision means in a series of questions.

What did the court decide? Merely that a particular contract made between the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Alabama Power Company could come before the Supreme Court for scrutiny, and that it was not unconstitutional. On the constitutional issue the court held that the federal government could construct the Wilson Dam—"a concrete monolith one hundred feet high and almost a mile long, containing two locks for navigation and eight installed generators"—under the power of Congress to provide for the national defense, and also the power to aid navigation which is part of its power to regulate interstate commerce. Having built the dam legally, the federal government had the power to dispose of the electric energy generated by it, under the power granted to Congress by the Constitution "to dispose of . . . property belonging to the United States." In order to dispose of this electricity effectively, it was not unreasonable for the TVA as a federal agency to purchase transmission lines from the Alabama Power Company as "a method of reaching a market." Like Poe's raven, the court said only this and nothing more. Chief Justice Hughes was very careful to emphasize the restricted character of the decision. It did not validate (or invalidate) the entire TVA. It did not pass upon the validity of the "yardstick" principle. It did not decide whether the government could go into the power business in competition with private utilities.

How did the court divide? Hard cases make complex divisions on the Supreme Court. The court split three ways, writing three opinions on two issues. The first issue was a jurisdictional one: Could the court even consider a suit in equity brought by a minority preferred stockholder who did not allege fraud? The second issue was a substantive one: Was the contract in question constitutional? Justices Hughes, speaking for Justices Van Devanter, Sutherland, Butler, and himself, answered yes to both questions. Justice Brandeis, speaking for Justices Stone, Roberts, Cardozo, and himself, answered no to the first, while not disagreeing with Justice Hughes on the second. Justice McReynolds answered yes to the first and no to the second. That made a vote of five to four on the first issue—enough to give the court jurisdiction—and eight to one on the second. It was probably the maneuverings of the three groups on the two issues that caused the unusual delay.

Why did the court decide as it did? This is largely a matter of conjecture, but important. In so far as the decision represents a turn toward a more liberal construction of federal power (the extent to which it does so is still terribly unclear) this may be due to two causes. One is the storm of protest and criticism which the processing-tax cases aroused in Congress and in the press, and the current proposals to limit the judicial power. It would be fantastic to think that the court is wholly insensitive to criticism, and quite reasonable to conclude that the majority saw it had overshot the mark in the Hoosac case and had strained the very broad limits of tolerance of the American people. The second reason is that it would have been extremely embarrassing to try to issue a judicial ukase against nature. Water flows over a dam and generates power. The Wilson Dam had become part of the landscape. It had become nature. To root it up and plug up the hole again would be a prospect formidable enough to give pause even to a judicial mind—or rather, to any judicial mind except the Draconian one of Justice McReynolds. Justice Hughes, who is especially notable for his statesmanship and strategy within the court, and his concern to keep the judicial power intact, must have played a considerable role in winning the other judges over to the view represented by the decision, and thus silencing criticism of an inflexible and partisan court. Justice Brandeis's concurring opinion was not given the press it deserved. It is a bold and masterful attempt to hold the court rigorously to a course of self-restraint from which it has so lamentably departed. It is in line with Justice Stone's dissent in the Hoosac case and Justice Cardozo's dissent in the Mayflower Farms case, and represents a common and consistent view of the judicial power. It seems to represent a departure from the more positive position of Justice Brandeis's earlier years, and an approach to the pure judicial tolerance of Justice Holmes. Justice Brandeis's insistence that the case should have been thrown out is especially important when applied to the approaching test of the public-utility holding-company act, where a somewhat similar stockholder's suit may be involved.

What of future decisions? Here we must all confess ourselves as baffled as the utility executives are today. The decisions of the court, after a solid reactionary interval, have again become capricious. To rationalize in constitutional terms the successive positions that Justice Hughes and Justice Roberts have taken would defy a master of rationalization. Are the other TVA dams constitutional? Are the dams at Bonneville and Grand Coulee constitutional? The Administration seems to think so, and is reported to be laying plans for the development and marketing of electric power in those areas. But if the issue of government competition with private utility companies is brought directly before the court, it is extremely doubtful that it would be upheld. And Justice Hughes's opinion presents too narrow a base on which to rest the judicial fate of the rest of the New Deal legislation.

We must not dance too joyfully around the TVA decision. It may turn out in the end to be a Trojan horse. The dominant issue before the country is still the omnipotence of the Supreme Court. The present decision will undoubtedly weaken the opposition to the court. But we would ourselves feel much more satisfied if Justice Hughes had accepted the Brandeis position. Failing that, the court's position in our economic system is as powerful as ever, although its menace has temporarily been diminished.

Hitler Prepares

THE news and propaganda now pouring out of Germany fit into an ominous pattern. There is no doubt that the fight Catholicism is making to keep its control over Catholic youth is seriously disturbing the regime. There may even be substantiation for the theory that the Catholics and the Communists have joined hands in a struggle with the powers of darkness against which every degree and kind of enlightenment, religious or non-religious, are necessarily united. But one need only isolate the issue in the present contest to come to the conclusion that the Catholics must lose their battle unless their strength, and the strength of any allies they have been able to enlist, is greater than we have been led to believe. The issue is the next war. The Nazi philosophy dictates that every child, male and female, shall be dedicated to militarism, and the Third Reich will wipe out every visible, tangible opposition to its all-consuming military dream.

The war machine in Germany is being burnished into a sleek and shining weapon. Such protuberances as the Catholic resistance are being smoothed off by means of wholesale arrests and suppressions. Now even such passivity toward Nazi "ideals" as may have existed heretofore in the highways and byways of the Third Reich has been corrected by a decree which gives the secret police complete power over the country. Henceforth the Gestapo supercedes local government in order that its "striking power shall be unhindered"—which means that a German's house is more than ever his prison.

At the same time the inflammation of German public opinion against all real or imaginary enemies continues. It is a necessary corollary to successful suppression on the scale now prevailing in Germany; and it provides the only compensation so far invented for the butter and egg deficiency in the German diet or for the terrific tax burden carried by the German citizen. (A recent Times dispatch revealed that a worker receiving a monthly wage corresponding to $64 loses one-fifth of it in taxes or mandatory contributions.) The Nazis had planned, to be sure, to suspend the more drastic forms of anti-Semitism during the Winter Olympics at Garmisch-Partenkirchen in order to prove to the world that there was no persecution of Jews in Germany. The Gustloff assassination upset this plan, and Hitler himself delivered a flamboyant anti-Semitic address at the funeral of the new Nazi "martyr." So far no other violence has occurred, but his speech was calculated to keep alive the fury of the party until February 16, when the Olympics would come to an end and "memorial services" for Gustloff begin.

The doctrine of destiny is the other main tenet of the Nazi religion. The lack of raw materials is an even better excuse for falling living standards than a plot by the Jews. Josef Goebbels wrote recently in the Angriff: "A day will come when we shall be obliged to demand colonies." He hastened to point out that this demand was in the interest not only of Germany but of the world. The rest of the world, he said, was bathed in abundance while Germany was penniless. While bemoaning Germany's poverty, Goebbels gloated over the reduction of food imports; and his reply to the possible complaint that there is no pork and that eggs are rare was a word of scorn for those who think only of eating. As for the Nazi party, he declared in words coming strangely from an "Aryan," "Let each member resolve not to eat pork." In the same speech he proved that, in rearming, Germany had rendered a service to the world, for "a disarmed Germany was for its neighbors a bait which constantly excited them." He took a thrust at Russia. It would be more to the point, he said, if the world should occupy itself with the armaments of "the international Jew" in the U. S. S. R. And he concluded with a warning to France. "I say that whoever treats with bolshevism will end by being devoured by it."

Outside Germany the Hitler regime is pushing its propaganda along the same lines. It is checking up on German citizens abroad; it is said to be blocking wherever possible any move to allow the colonization in hospitable countries of German refugees—at the same time that it is preparing to drive out the Jews who remain in Germany. Obviously it would prefer to have its enemies scattered. Meanwhile its demand for colonies is being put forward in diplomatic circles with increasing force.

With demoniac thoroughness Hitler is busy sharpening the cutting edge of the fanatic knife with which he hopes to carve out a Nazi empire. It is not surprising that Europe as a whole and France in particular should show all the symptoms of being locked in a house with an armed madman.

Armaments or Collective Law?

THE report of the League's committee of experts places the responsibility for prolonging the Italo-Ethiopian conflict directly at the door of the United States. After a careful study of all available data the committee concluded that an oil embargo, if universally applied, would be effective against Italy within three or three and a half months, which is another way of saying that if action had been taken last October, when Italy's supply of petroleum was much lower than at present, Mussolini might today be begging for peace—if, indeed, he were still in power. The committee also found that an oil sanction by the League alone could have little effect as long as the United States government was powerless to prevent unlimited exports to the aggressor. This does not mean that it would be necessary for this country to enforce a complete embargo; it would be sufficient to restrict sales to the pre-war level. The implications of these findings are challenging in the extreme.

Unlike Germany and Japan, the only other important powers refusing to cooperate with the League, the United States harbors no secret aggressive intentions. Its intransigence is the result of a widespread fear lest America be unwittingly entangled in another European conflict. There is a general feeling that the less this country has to do with other nations, the less the danger of its being involved in their disputes. This feeling has undoubtedly been accentuated by an increased recognition of the fact that collective action carries with it certain risks as well as heavy responsibilities. What is not seen is that the isolationist position involves vastly greater risks, with no prospect of building a warless world. The impracticability of isolation as a protection against war is ably discussed on another page of this issue by Vera Micheles Dean of the Foreign Policy Association. But in pleading for the United States to assume the responsibilities of its world position Mrs. Dean inadvertently adds to the prevailing confusion by suggesting that pacifists are inconsistent in demanding sanctions against an aggressor at the same time that they oppose increased armaments. Granting that the principle behind collective action presupposes the possibility of an ultimate recourse to force, it does not follow that unilateral rearmament is an aid to collective security. No one would care to imply, for instance, that pacifists should support the $573,000,000 War Department appropriation now before Congress on the ground that the army might, at some future date, be used to uphold international law. Where there is no mechanism for joint action, increasing armaments are an unmitigated danger; where there is a collective agreement, the threat is somewhat reduced.

But we would go farther and insist that growing national expenditures for war purposes cannot be reconciled under any circumstances with the principles of collective law. The British Tories are wholly inconsistent, if not actually insincere, in urging rearmament as a means of upholding the League. By definition, collective security involves the use of joint pressure against any potential law-breaker, and where collective pressure is exercised the contribution of any one country need not be nearly as great as if it were fighting a war alone. Under the anarchy of present-day nationalism, each country feels that its defense forces should be adequate to deal with any potential enemy or combination of enemies. This necessity would disappear if each nation felt that it could rely on the assistance of all other law-abiding powers.

It is no accident that inveterate isolationists such as William Randolph Hearst and the Chicago Tribune should be loudest in the demand for increased defense appropriations. If the United States is to renounce its responsibility for the creation and maintenance of an international system of law, it must be prepared to pay the price of anarchy. If it is unwilling to cooperate with the League in upholding the law against aggression, it may find itself, as in 1931, in the position of attempting to curb a specific case of aggression by itself. To meet such an emergency this country must have a navy and an air force second to none, and considerably larger than that of its most likely rival—Japan. The breakdown of the London naval conference, despite a minor agreement restricting the construction of heavy cruisers, indicates that the burden of maintaining an isolationist policy will be vastly more expensive than in the past.

At first glance the Administration's proposed Pan-American Peace Conference appears to be a healthy recognition of the impossibility of the hermit-like program which the opponents of collective action have mapped out for the United States. At least it recognizes certain national responsibilities in this hemisphere, responsibilities which are seen to conflict with the isolationist aspects of the proposed neutrality legislation. But the ill-concealed satisfaction with which the peace plan has been received at Rome suggests that once again the United States has inadvertently played into the hands of the war-mongers of Europe. Economically, culturally, and politically the world of today is indivisible. Any attempt, however well-intentioned, to divide it into segments tends to weaken the none-too-firm structure of international organization. A pan-American non-aggression pact, divorced from the League, would be fundamentally different from an Eastern Locarno or the present Franco-Soviet treaty of mutual assistance in that these latter are so drawn as to be within the framework of the League and are intended to implement the Covenant. There cannot be two systems of collective security.

Fortunately, no irreparable damage has been done. The espousal of the principles of collective security by the Sarraut government in France, as indicated by the impending ratification of the Franco-Soviet pact, has largely offset the damage wrought by Britain's uncertainty. Italy is already feeling the effects of the preliminary sanctions imposed on it as a violator of the Covenant. Should the League succeed in preventing Mussolini from profiting by his illegal invasion of Ethiopia, there would be at least a strong possibility that Germany and Japan might be stopped from similar adventures. An oil embargo would almost certainly turn the tide against Il Duce, but it will not be imposed unless Congress revives that part of the languishing neutrality bill which gives the President power to proclaim an embargo on materials of war. Essentially the choice is between profits for a few oil companies and an unbridled armament race.

Issues and Men

Roosevelt Betrays Neutrality

THE President has done nothing more incomprehensible than to abandon his own neutrality measures and to substitute therefor the bill which at this writing has been passed by the House and is now pending in the Senate. This extends the existing law until May 1, 1937, and adds to it a provision placing a ban on loans and credits and also one to clarify or define the status of the South American states. The very point in the Administration bill which the State Department especially desired, namely, the granting to the President of the power to place embargoes on certain materials if in his judgment it was wise to do so, has been deliberately jettisoned. The result could not be more unfortunate unless we were to abandon entirely the effort to keep the United States out of the next war. Italy is reported to be greatly cheered because of the collapse of our leadership in this matter, and the corresponding discouragement in London and Paris will be enhanced by the news of the latest Italian victories in Ethiopia.

But the international aspects of our policy are dealt with in another column. I wish to take this opportunity, after a visit to Washington, to put on record my belief that the reason for the lamentable legislative situation is not what is being put forth by friends of the Administration in and out of office. It is not true that the bulk of the Senators have yielded to pressure brought by the cotton, oil, steel, and shipping groups. That representatives of these industries have been in Washington in large numbers is correct. But the simple fact is that it was the Administration that hauled down the flag. If it is an open secret that Senator Pittman never cared for the bill which he sponsored and that Senator Robinson could hardly be called enthusiastic about it, they would none the less have brought it on to the floor of the Senate, as it would have been brought out in the House, had the President declared it a "must measure" and said that he could not afford, and they could not afford, to go before the people next fall without showing increased safeguards along the lines suggested by the State Department itself. Why was it that Secretary Hull and his assistants spent the greater part of a month testifying before the responsible committees of Congress in support of this bill? Just to waste time? Certainly not.

But the reply always is that Senator Johnson threatened a filibuster and that so many Senators had yielded to the industrial lobbies that there was nothing else to do. This observers without number absolutely deny, notably the twenty-one Senators who came together on February 14 resolved to make a last-ditch fight for the Administration's neutrality measure, which they had generously accepted even though many of them preferred the Nye-Clark bill. If it is the lobbies which have won this fight, why would not a brave champion of peace in the White House come right straight out and say so? Failing that, would not a real fighter have insisted on a poll in the House and Senate and then pointed to the men who voted against the Administration measure as the ones who had put their political welfare, or their fear of the "interests," above their duty to the whole country? But no, it was the Administration itself that told the key men in both houses to abandon the real bill and substitute this compromise, the purpose of which is to throw the whole issue over until after the election.

What makes this surrender the more censurable is that the mass of people in this country have given overwhelming testimony to their desire for a neutrality law with teeth in it. Admiral Sims asserted before the Economic Club in New York City recently that in all his experience he had never seen audiences so determined upon the country's being kept out of war and upon having a real neutrality measure as on his recent speaking trip in the South and Southwest. He declared that he could not speak on any subject without having to talk about neutrality before the evening was over. I had exactly the same experience on a long speaking trip last fall, and Congressman Maury Maverick also told the Economic Club that after speaking in twenty-four states during the recess of Congress he could uphold Admiral Sims's statement at every point. It is a first-class political blunder for the White House, and it will not be concealed by putting the blame on certain industries—and on the peace movement.

Yes, on the peace movement. Amazing as it seems, the responsibility for this débâcle is shared in the eyes of the Administration by the peace organizations and the big-business lobbies! A government official assured me that the peace organizations were responsible because they had not organized all the states and roused public opinion to such an extent that the outpourings of protest would have offset the lobbies on the other side. I have heard many charges brought against the peace movement, but I give a prize to this one. It is one of the strangest and most unmerited yet. That official showed that he was unaware of the fact that some of the organizations had done the very thing he wished. Why had not a certain society moved? he inquired. He insisted that he had not heard from it, but when he spoke a letter from him acknowledging receipt of its expression of opinion was on file in the society's office.

Well, if this sort of weakness continues; if everything is to be sacrificed to playing politics between now and the election, and to the President's desire to get Congress out of the legislative trenches and on its way home by the first of May, we may see the Roosevelt stock drop still lower. One hears in Washington astounding tales of the slump in Roosevelt sentiment in various states. They may or may not be true, but the fact is undeniable that it is the President himself who is jeopardizing his chances for reelection. No one else, not the Republicans, not the Al Smiths, not the Liberty League, but just the man in the White House—and this despite the rising tide of prosperity.

Bruce Garrison Villard

"Po-po-police! There is a r-r-red under my bed!"

Don't Annoy the Big Shots

By EMANUEL H. LAVINE

WHEN a police chief wants to hit the front page of every newspaper in his city there is always one sure-fire announcement which will bring him into the right-hand column. The perennial favorite is: "Orders to muss up all known gangsters and racketeers were issued last night by Chief of Police Gwatchel in a surprise move to rid the city of vicious malefactors involved in recent gangland depredations and slayings." That any actual racketeer or gangster of any standing in his business will be so much as touched is not imagined for a moment, even by the police chief who gives the order. All he wants to do is to throw a bone to the dogs barking to get action after a dozen or so men have been slaughtered in restaurants or barbershops, in front of dignified museums, or in similar highly public spots.

As for the cops who receive the chief's orders, they wouldn't know a racketeer if one came up and asked them for a match. "All I know about racketeers is what I read in the newspapers," is the way a truthful, strictly honest cop put it. Even the cop who accepts fat pay-offs doesn't know the chief racketeers, for these deal only with the big shots, working on the simple theory that if you want something done with efficiency and dispatch, always see the boss. Any school of business administration teaches that simple maxim.

What happens, then, when the public clamor for action on the part of the police has to be appeased? The chief issues his front-page order to "muss 'em up" and "nab 'em on sight," and the cops have to dig up some results for him. Each detective is given a quota of "known criminals" to round up—four or six or a dozen. Since the enactment of so-called "public-enemy" laws in many communities, the cops haven't had much difficulty in filling their quotas, as the laws state that a man with a record may be arrested "for consorting with known criminals," and every poolroom, cheap restaurant, bar, and corner lunchroom has its hangers-on with a prison record. The cops round the ex-convicts up in droves and take them to headquarters, and the chief can announce hundreds of arrests. He points with pride to the round-up figures, emphasizing the efficiency with which his department operates. But he will not bother to remind the police reporters of what they already know, that twenty major arrests have been made by his department every day for the past ten years. It is the normal average of major arrests. Since there is a big anti-crime campaign on, the twenty arrests are played up in the newspapers as something unusual, for newspapers must cater to the public appetite.

Actually the round-up has netted several hundred "punks" with reformatory or other prison records. Some of them may have been going as straight as is humanly possible after leaving a penal institution, yet they are dragged in. The cops don't give a damn whether these men lose their jobs. Some of them, ashamed of being in the clutches of the police again even though it is through no fault of their own, fear to communicate with families or friends. Some may be on parole or probation, and these are easy prey for shakedown cops, who for a sum will straighten matters out.

Cops are able to show fat records of arrests during round-ups not only by their use of the public-enemy laws but by a neat system which they have evolved whereby they buy and pay for their victims. They must bring in known criminals, though many detectives wouldn't know a Big House graduate if they tripped over him in the middle of an empty ballroom. So they go to their favorite stool pigeon. "I need five refs and one pen," the detective says, handing over $15. At $2 each for the five "refs"—reformatory graduates—and $5 for a "pen"—penitentiary graduate—he can obtain six prisoners. The money goes to the graduates, who rent themselves out for the pinches. A "Big House," or Sing Sing, graduate gets from $8 to $10 for renting himself out as a pinch.

During the life of the public-enemy laws no big-shot racketeer has ever been nabbed through their agency. It has always been the small-time offenders, the punks. In one city, after the new laws had been dynamited through the legislature without anyone knowing exactly what their provisions were, the police did try to make a test case of two notorious racketeers. The two men were picked up at a swank night club by a pair of detectives, who said gently, "You boys will have to go into the can for the tryout." The big shots were surprised and a little pained because they had always put their dough on the line without demurring. They couldn't afford to take the rap at that particular moment owing to the disorganized state of their finances, particularly with reference to state and federal income taxes. Furthermore, they had been rough on some of their "clients," who, if they discovered the racketeers were actually in jail, might decide it was a good time to squeal and keep them there. So the arrested big shots "propositioned" the proper police officials. The police proposition called for a cool hundred thousand; the racketeering gentry whined and cried that they could pay only twenty grand. A compromise was reached at thirty. Instead of being thrust into a cell, the prisoners were taken to a midtown hotel with two police lieutenants as escorts. They stayed in the hotel for four days while their henchmen scurried around and collected the thirty grand in real money. They were even allowed to ask the advice of their lawyers, who said, "Put it on the line. It's the only out you have."

After the money was paid, the question arose of what to do about a test case. In that city there had been a particularly loud hue and cry to have the public-enemy laws enacted; a test case was badly needed. In consequence, twenty-four hours after the big shots were released, six punks sat dejectedly behind the bars. They had been picked up in the outlying sections of the city. All had police records; all had been shooting craps in a cheap little saloon. They were immediately labeled public enemies one to six, and the police chief, with unctuous phrases, issued a statement to reporters. Soon the newspapers headlined the information: "Public-Enemy Laws Clamp Down on Racketland. Six Convicted Under New Statute."

On January 6 the Court of Appeals in Albany rendered the Brownell public-enemy law virtually toothless by a six-to-one decision in which it reversed the convictions of a dozen underworld characters. The law was not declared unconstitutional, but the judges stressed the absence of a breach of the peace. The majority opinion declared:

Persons who have been convicted of crime and served the sentence imposed are not hereafter barred from society or intercourse with other human beings; they are not outcasts, nor to be treated as such. The legislature did not intend to close the doors to reformation, repentance, or a new try at life. Whom is a man to talk to if he cannot talk to the friends and acquaintances his position in life has thrown him with?

There is hardly a malefactor in the land who could not be apprehended and convicted through exercise of intelligent, careful, and thorough detective work. A racketeer can always be picked up when he is wanted for a shakedown, though he is seldom picked up for the purpose of a conviction. That is why investigations of rackets and racketeers are a waste of public funds, especially when such investigations are accompanied by deluges of publicity. You can't throw a surprise party if you tip off the honored guest in advance. A big shot has never been arrested in any city of the United States who has not known beforehand the exact moment when the arrest was to be made. He wouldn't be a big shot if he didn't know things like that. He has paid big money to find them out.

All big-shot racketeers must operate through an influential political guardian angel. Payments to all concerned are made on a regular schedule depending on the income of the particular enterprise. The big shot, being a thorough business man, is willing to pay if he is not molested. He wants his machinery to function smoothly and with precision and he is willing to give plenty of lubrication. An accidental "knock-off" or arrest and seizure may upset his organization and cause a tremendous financial loss.

An important deterrent to crime would be the enactment of a law authorizing and compelling police captains or lieutenants to take an iron-clad affidavit from complainants, complaining witnesses, and witnesses in a serious felony. The information obtained should be specific and direct. "Is that the man who assaulted you? Why did he assault you? Where did he assault you? What kind of weapon did he use?" The witnesses should be required to corroborate the complainant. If at the arraignment or trial the complainant or witness attempts to alter his testimony, he should be promptly arrested and prosecuted on a perjury charge. If he was positive of his identification at the time of the occurrence, when the thing was fresh in his mind, why should he be hesitant about it months later? That precaution would prevent bribery and intimidation of witnesses. If witnesses disappear, they should be indicted and bench warrants should be issued for their arrest. If they are not apprehended in time for the trial, the affidavit should be introduced as evidence.

Police should be severely punished if they obtain careless or slipshod affidavits that permit legal loopholes. Upper-grade detectives should be obliged to do some hard work occasionally. The present tendency is to permit the lower-grade sleuths, who receive no extra compensation for being in the bureau, to do all the hard "tailing," or following, and "planting," or watching, after which the swanky sleuths with guardian angels grab the credit for the arrests.

In compliance with Commissioner Valentine's recent order to "muss up" all tough and vicious thieves and gangsters, the New York police on November 23 administered an unmerciful beating to six safe burglars arrested while attempting to break into the upper floors of the Jewelers' Exchange at 82 Bowery. Although the papers stated that the thieves were attempting a $2,000,000 jewelry haul, they could have got only between $75,000 and $100,000 if they had jimmied every safe on the upper floors. Jewelers who rent stalls always keep their valuables in the large burglar-proof safe on the main floor, which is in full view of the street.

When the prisoners appeared for arraignment, their faces were black and blue and so puffed and swollen that their eyes were scarcely visible. The arresting officers appeared without a blemish on their hands or faces. They showed no evidence of having had a struggle in subduing their prisoners. Edward J. Reilly, attorney for the safe-crackers, when asked to comment on the condition of the prisoners, said: "It's tough. The boys look as if they had tripped over a traffic light and fallen to the pavement."

A very different affair was the arrest of Martin ("Bugsy") Goldstein and Harry ("Pittsburgh Phil") Strauss, two notorious racketeers and killers, charged with the murder of Joseph Amberg and Morris Kessler, who had been stood up against a wall in a Brooklyn garage and shot down with machine-guns on September 30, 1934. Goldstein and Strauss appeared at the line-up dressed like fashion plates, their faces freshly shaved and powdered and bearing no signs of a "mussing up." They were bored, annoyed, and contemptuous. In a facetious manner they explained that they were just a couple of hard-working cigar salesmen attempting to earn an honest living. "Murder charge?" they exclaimed. "That is too messy—a fellow might get his hands soiled."

The examination at the line-up ran as follows:

"You boys knew you were wanted for those murders!" bellowed Captain Zwirz.

"I believe I read something about it in the newspapers, but one can't always believe everything one reads," Strauss replied icily.

"Where have you been since September 30, the day of the murder?" the Captain continued.

"Here and there. A cigar salesman has to hustle around to make a living," replied "Bugsy," as he adjusted his necktie with meticulous care.

"Bugsy" strenuously objected to Zwirz's rating him Public Enemy Number 6. "That," he snapped, "is too low a rating. I hope you will give me a better one in the near future. It really injures a man's professional standing."

Although the police had been seeking them through general alarms, they gave themselves up in company with their counsel, Alderman Walter R. Hart, a Brooklyn Democrat. They were discharged in Homicide Court because the police failed to produce even a shred of evidence connecting them with the two murders. Having been informed by the police that Commissioner Valentine had issued instructions to annoy them, the pair left on December 12 for their winter vacation in Florida. "Bugsy" and "Pittsburgh Phil" didn't mind the cops annoying them when they were awake, but when telephone calls before noon disturbed their slumber, they showed their resentment by going away for a few weeks. All of which proves that if you belong to the burglars' union you don't get mussed up.

Washington Weekly

By PAUL W. WARD

Washington, February 16

MUCKRAKING, that lost art of American journalism, will enjoy a vigorous revival if Washington has any more weeks like the one now ending. While the Senate laboriously reenacted the AAA in a disguised version stripped of all social controls save God's and the conscience of Henry Wallace, and while the House steam-rolled to passage a record-breaking grant of funds to the War Department—despite statistical proof offered by Representative Luckey of Nebraska that the United States, with no one to fight, is piling up armaments faster than any other world power and has been ever since 1919—the following things happened elsewhere in the national capital:

1. The second and third ranking officers of the Commerce Department's Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection were suspended and threatened with dismissal for "insubordination." Their alleged insubordination consisted in believing that the interests of the ship operators and the political overlords of the Commerce Department were subordinate to those of the public welfare. More specifically, it consisted in acting upon that belief by seeing that a resolution adopted by a conference of steamboat inspectors escaped from departmental censors and attained publicity. The suspended men, Frederick L. Adams and H. McCoy Jones, are also suspected by the department's high command of having encouraged the publication of press dispatches impugning the sincerity of Secretary Roper's advocacy of safety-at-sea legislation and suggesting that, unless outside pressure is brought to bear, Roper, out of deference to his pals in the shipping business, will see to it that the legislation is sidetracked.

2. The supposedly non-partisan Bureau of Agricultural Economics was caught doctoring a supposedly scientific report on the cotton situation in order not to embarrass the Administration's efforts to get the new AAA bill through Congress. Credit for the disclosure belongs to John W. Hazard of the Wall Street Journal's Washington bureau, who, undaunted by a rebuke from Secretary Wallace for having suggested two weeks ago that the report had been doctored, ferreted out a copy of the report originally written and a copy of an AAA memorandum objecting to sections of the report as inimical to continuance of the crop-reduction program. Comparison of these with the report finally made public showed that the objectionable passages had been deleted and comments in line with AAA policy substituted for them.

3. The Federal Communications Commission completed its investigation of its radio division and issued a statement that was highly contradictory but that had the effect of whitewashing the division, whose operations in the licensing and relicensing of broadcasting stations have given rise to many evil rumors. The complete record of the investigation was withheld, although two days earlier four of the five members of the investigating committee had voted to make the whole docket public. The excuse given for its suppression was that J. Edgar Hoover, chief of the G-men, refused to let his contributions to the docket be made public. At the moment there is a move under way to have the lid pried off by Congressional action. Meanwhile, all that is definitely known of what happened in the investigation is that Anning S. Prall, commission chairman, refused to appear before the investigators—his colleagues—for questioning. Mr. Prall admits that.

4. Representatives of the men and women in most direct contact with the nation's millions of unemployed, meeting here for the 1936 conference of the American Association of Social Workers, piled up a mass of eyewitness testimony that impugned Harry Hopkins's sincerity by demolishing his persistent contention that under the $4,000,000,000 work-relief program the millions on relief are better off this winter than they were under the old FERA; that the great majority of WPA projects are useful ones in which the workers themselves take pride; and that the WPA meets the heterogeneous employment needs of the millions of non-mechanical workers on relief, and therefore is superior to the PWA. None of these things are true according to the social workers, who filed ghastly reports of the actual conditions in all parts of the country. To their demands for resumption of federal aid for direct relief, a genuine public-employment program, and a complete divorce between work and relief the best that Aubrey Williams, Hopkins's chief deputy, could reply was a warning that the social workers were "flirting with the forces of reaction."

5. The NLRB was shown to have on its pay roll as a trial examiner a wondrous gentleman by the name of Alfonse G. Eberle. "Wondrous" because, in an investigation of the Brown Shoe Company of Salem, Illinois, he absolved the company of "unfair labor practices" though he found that it had hired a candy butcher as a labor spy, and an "industrial-relations counselor" who warned its workers the company had had seven strikes but never recognized a union; that one of its foremen circulated an anti-union petition; and that the Salem police descended en masse upon the plant and broke up the picket lines shortly after company officials informed a citizens' committee (which had subscribed $125,000 to bring the plant to Salem) that if it were not for the strike the company could operate at capacity.

6. Shortly after Senator Tydings announced the withdrawal of his support from the Tydings-McCormack "military-disaffection" bill, the discovery was made that the admirals had put a fast one over on Secretary of War Dern to obtain his signature in support of the measure. It was an encouraging discovery, confirming other evidence that the unobtrusive Mr. Dern has sound instincts and faith in the ability of the army's officers and men to decide for themselves what things they should read, see, or listen to. He has recently communicated that point of view in vigorous terms to members of the House Military Affairs Committee. He has done it privately in order not to embarrass his colleague, Secretary Swanson, who still is dominated by a little red-baiting clique in the Navy Department led by Captain W. D. Puleston, chief of the intelligence division and a gentleman of nightmarish mind. It seems that Dern's original letter in support of the bill was written by an underling at the dictation of the navy clique, who told him Dern had promised Swanson to support the bill. It seems also that Dern signed the letter as a routine document, without noting its contents, and ever since has been seeking a quiet escape from the commitment. Tydings's withdrawal was predicated on Dern's and suggested that the Senator had never favored the measure. He omitted reference to the vigorous speech he had made in its support and to the thousands of letters he had received demanding that he reverse that stand.

7. The housing program got its neck twisted again. Secretary Morgenthau came out of a White House conference on housing, saying he knew Senator Wagner would make public the results because he had heard the President agree with Wagner on what the press should be told. Then, Wagner came out and said the President had authorized him to introduce a bill committing the federal government to an annual outlay of $250,000,000 to $400,000,000 for slum clearance and low-cost housing under a system of federal loans and grants to local housing authorities. Peter Grimm, the high-powered New York realtor who has set up shop in the Treasury, nodded confirmation as Wagner made the announcement. The following morning, at his press conference, Roosevelt said no decision had been reached and all housing plans were still in the discussion stage.

8. Some twenty Senators have rallied their forces for a fight this week to make the Administration accept its own permanent neutrality bill and thus defeat its effort to appease the cotton, oil, copper, and wheat interests by accepting with pretended reluctance an extension of the temporary neutrality resolution adopted last year. High officials of state admitted gravely that the Administration's position was dictated by business pressure. Publicly they depicted that position as a "plight" resulting from division of opinion among the proponents of permanent legislation, though the United Peace Movement has rallied behind the Administration's bill. Similarly it was admitted in private that Senator Pittman's jingoistic speech on the Japanese situation, though not written by the State Department, fairly represented its views and was enjoyed there. Secret testimony given by high army officers before the House Appropriations Committee supported the belief that Pittman's speech also reflected the attitude of the White House.

The Responsibilities of Peace

By VERA MICHELES DEAN

DISCUSSION of neutrality and collective action since the outbreak of the Ethiopian war has produced confusion of tongues. Pacifists who once paid lip service to international collaboration plead as eloquently as the most rabid jingoes for American neutrality; advocates of maximum sanctions against an aggressor oppose armaments which may ultimately be needed to insure their effectiveness; isolationists, while demanding that the United States withdraw from this iniquitous world, do not hesitate to instruct other countries how to set their house in order; supporters of neutrality, with tears in their eyes, assert their readiness to support the League, provided it is composed not of fallible flesh-and-blood states but of self-denying Utopias. The average reader, lost in this wonderland of mutually destructive ideas, finds it difficult to grasp the essence of collective action against an aggressor.

It should be admitted at the outset that professional pacifists have done more than professional patriots to becloud the issue. With unflagging energy they have preached peace—which most of us normally prefer to war—but have spent little time in discovering how to translate this universal desire into effective action. By talking in terms of abstract ideals, they have created the myth of a non-existent League functioning in a rarefied atmosphere unpolluted by human compromise. Their exaggerated claims in behalf of international organization have caused both friends and foes of the League to measure its activities with a yardstick of perfection seldom applied to domestic politics. Little progress can be made toward collective security unless it is recognized that sentimental devotion to peace, unsupported by hard-headed thinking, jeopardizes the cause it professes to serve.

No analysis of collective action can overstress the fact that there is no such entity as a League above or apart from the states composing the world community. These states, on entering the League, do not by some magical transmutation divest themselves of national interests. Their failure to shed prestige and ambition in the Geneva atmosphere is often offered as evidence that collective action cannot be achieved until nationalism, putative child of capitalism, has disappeared from the face of the earth. To wait for this millennium is to relinquish all hope of collective security. Nor is it a foregone conclusion that once all countries have simultaneously adopted a non-capitalist economy they will forthwith discard national aspirations. For practical purposes, organization of a collective system need not be postponed until the era of universal self-denial. What is essential to the success of this system is not that every state should be purged of nationalism, but that it should become convinced by experience that collective action serves its national interests; should learn to cooperate not from disinterested motives—as rare in nations as in individuals—but from a selfish desire to achieve political and economic security. International cooperation, like revolutions, cannot be carried in suitcases. Only when the demand for collective action springs from within the state—and is not injected from without by wishful thinkers—will it become a factor in international relations.

For this reason it is irrelevant whether Britain's championship of the League in the Ethiopian crisis is due to imperialist concern regarding trade routes and the future of Egypt or to popular faith in the ideals of Geneva. What is obvious—and important—is that the British people for various, often contradictory, motives now find it to their national interest to act through the League. The task of those who believe in collective security is not to eradicate these motives but to divert them from the channels of national into those of international action.

If there is to be effective collective action, there must also be collective responsibility. No member of the international community which expects mutual assistance should involve others in crises without prior consultation. Where Britain departed from the collective concept—and committed a fundamental error which paved the way for the Hoare-Laval deal—was by mobilizing its fleet last September, before the League had invoked Article XVI of the Covenant, providing for sanctions and mutual assistance in case of retaliation by the aggressor. In launching this mobilization Britain acted on a primordial instinct of preparing for single-handed defense of its threatened interests. It thereby created the danger that its potential opponent might accept the challenge. When this danger became fully apparent, Britain—which had hitherto refused to underwrite European security outside the League Covenant and the Locarno treaties—sought an ironclad pledge of naval assistance from France. The French government, which since 1919 had advocated creation of an international army capable of implementing League verdicts, declared its readiness to assist Britain only on condition that Italy's reprisals were provoked by action taken not on British initiative alone but on that of all League members. This may have sounded like disloyal quibbling at a time when the British had staked their navy on the outcome of the League's first drive against an aggressor. Actually it represented a sound appreciation of the nature of collective security. If every member of the international community is free to mobilize whenever its interests seem to be in danger, then collective responsibility for security becomes illusory, and the world returns to pre-League conditions, with everyone for himself and the devil take the hindmost.

If collective action presupposes collective responsibility for its application, it also presupposes the ultimate possibility of resort to force. Many pacifists have done grave disservice to their cause, on the one hand by demanding maximum penalties against the aggressor, and on the other by vigorously opposing armaments. If sanctions are to stop war, and not merely localize it as in Ethiopia, they must be both prompt and effective. The greater their effectiveness and the more they threaten to rob the aggressor of potential gains, the more likely they are to provoke reprisals which may enlarge the area of conflict. This risk unquestionably exists, and the League, if it is to survive, must be equipped to meet it. Yet the stronger the collective system becomes, the more it will diminish the risk of war and increase the prospect that the aggressor, faced with overwhelming odds, will either come to terms or suffer prompt defeat. Here is the kernel of the whole problem. Collective security does not, as some pacifists have implied, offer a 100 per cent insurance against war. What it does offer is a method of reducing and sharing the risk, as well as limiting the consequent damage. This method is now on trial for the first time in history. Its success or failure depends not on some magic quality of the League but on the willingness of all members of the world community—whether they belong to the League or not—to give it a fair test, either by direct collaboration or by avoidance of obstructive measures.

The argument is frequently made that collective action against an aggressor is purely negative and solves none of the problems which provoke aggression. This is true; and no collective system will succeed which, in addition to checking war, does not seek to remove or alleviate its causes. Our problem today, however, is that of peaceful citizens confronted by burglary or murder, whose first objective is to stop the illegal act and restrain the criminal. Once this police task has been accomplished, we must inquire without delay into the causes of the crime, and remove or correct them whenever this can be done without injury to society. To argue that League powers, because they have hitherto failed to revise peace treaties or meet the "legitimate" grievances of aggressors are consequently estopped from checking aggression is to state only part of the syllogism. International adjustment is necessarily slow and halting. No simple generalizations about redistribution of raw materials and colonies or wholesale revision of frontiers will solve problems of the highest complexity. Nor is it certain that territorial changes sufficient to satisfy potential aggressors would redound to the benefit of the international community as a whole. One thing seems clear: such remedies as can ultimately be found must be applied collectively if they are to bring about permanent relief.

What is the position of the United States with respect to collective action? The country has just been swept by a desire to find refuge from the next conflict in water-tight neutrality and war-time isolation. Neutrality advocates, if they are sincere, should logically demand isolation not only in time of war but in time of peace. If American history between 1914 and 1917 proves anything—and it has recently been used to prove almost everything—it is that at the outbreak of war the United States had a substantial economic, cultural, and sentimental stake in European affairs. A debtor country, it was under obligation to repay its indebtedness in the form of goods. A melting-pot of European nationalities, it was bound by innumerable ties to its various mother countries. Easily swayed by sentiment and addicted to moral judgments, the American people were not neutral on August 1, 1914; they had already formed impressions and opinions which, no matter how false they may now appear in the light of historical research, profoundly affected this country's policy.

Such impressions and opinions are being shaped today and may prove equally decisive tomorrow. The only way to eliminate our stake in international affairs is to sever relations with the rest of the world while it is still at peace; otherwise it will be too late. The choice which confronts us is not this or that form of neutrality, but whether we wish to remain in touch with a world of which, for better or worse, we permanently form a part, or keep our drawbridge raised against all contacts, in fair weather as well as foul. If we want isolation, we must abandon our inveterate inclination to improve the rest of mankind less by example than by precept. Our political leaders must once and for all forget oppressed Mexicans and downtrodden German Jews, must shut their eyes to the misdeeds of foreign dictatorships. We must not only scrap our export trade but turn off radios with European wave lengths, recall our foreign correspondents, sever all communications which, in the next conflict, might incline us to favor one side as against another.

But desirable as isolation may seem, it was already impracticable in 1812. It is even less practicable today. Isolation represents a policy of defeatism which does not correspond to the American temper. The world has lived through far greater crises than the one we are witnessing today; yet in every generation there have been men and women courageous enough to see that the easiest way is not always in the long run the most constructive. To admit that we are unable to cope with the issues raised by war and peace and must await the passing of the cyclone in a national storm-cellar is to believe that mankind has reached the end of its intellectual resources and is incapable of further venture. Such a belief would justify not only isolation but national suicide. The United States is a great power—great not merely in territory and natural resources but in the energies of a vigorous people. It has not only rights but responsibilities, and it cannot evade them without permanent injury to itself. The fact that participation in the League is today politically impracticable does not close the door to other forms of international collaboration. Those who urge neutrality imply that war is around the corner. If it is, then we must use our best minds not to devise a paper neutrality which will lull the country into a false sense of security, only to be swept off the statute books by the next wave of popular emotion, but to discover ways and means of cooperating with other peoples in the search for workable collective security. That this search is long and arduous should be not a deterrent but a challenge. No institution of lasting value has been evolved overnight. If we fear war, we must, in our own selfish interests, give a fair trial to the only method which offers an alternative.

Arms over Europe

Austria Dams the Nazi Flood

By LOUIS FISCHER

Vienna, January 27

LITTLE Austria is the bung of a vinegar barrel. The vinegar is German fascism. If the bung should be forced out, the vinegar would begin pouring over southeastern Europe. The vinegar, to be sure, has eaten into the bung; Austria is itself a fascist country. But as long as the liquid is held in check some people bless the bung.

In effect, they are blessing Mussolini. Austrian independence is Mussolini's contribution to European peace. Mussolini does not want Austria. But he wants to make sure that Germany will not absorb it and then look down menacingly on Italy from the Brenner Pass, which would thus become the common frontier of the two fascist states.

Austria, with fewer inhabitants than London or New York, is the key to central Europe and the Balkans. If Germany acquired Austria, whether by inspiring and aiding a domestic Nazi coup d'état or by more direct means, the whole map of Europe might collapse. The map of Europe is a miserable, troublesome hodge-podge. The bitterest anti-Versailles phrases do not condemn it sufficiently. Yet move any European frontier twenty kilometers and you court war. Every borderline on this crazy continent is a militant vested interest not only of the two states on either side of it but of their neighbors as well. This applies especially to the Austrian republic because it has such a central position.

The best frontier is three thousand miles of ocean. Even powerful England has consistently vetoed the project of a tunnel under the English channel—despite its engineering and economic practicability—simply because of the supposed military danger. It would bring France a few minutes nearer the British coast.

A frontier is a nuisance. It has to be guarded. Modern rivalries being what they are, it has to be barricaded with tariff hurdles. Most frontiers have no natural geographical raison d'être; they are merely dotted lines on colored paper. On the other side of this flimsy demarcation an enemy may lurk. The fewer neighbors a country has, the better off it is likely to be. Austria has six—Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Italy, and Switzerland. Austria and Hungary are on good terms, and this frontier therefore presents no difficulties. But Austria is Italy's only highway to Hungary, and Italy is interested in Hungary. Austria's contiguity with Hungary accordingly complicates its relations with Italy. On July 25, 1934, when Chancellor Dollfuss was killed and the Nazis threatened to seize the power in Vienna, Mussolini, ostensibly to save Austria, was poised for an invasion of its borders. Yugoslavia saw a danger in this development and weighed the desirability of marching in, too. Austria might have become the battlefield of a European war. An armed conflict between Austria and Czecho-Slovakia, its northern neighbor, is unlikely. Yet if Germany decided to attack Czecho-Slovakia it might prefer to occupy Austria first; if it dealt with Czecho-Slovakia first, Austria would inevitably fall into its lap. Thus every frontier is a problem even if there is a friend on the other side.

Austria's key position makes its territorial integrity a matter of serious concern to all its neighbors and, equally, to the distant great powers, which see in the unfortunate European status quo the best guaranty of world peace. The Soviet Union, for instance, is hundreds of miles removed from Austria. If Germany, however, should violate Austria it could later dominate the Balkans as far as Rumania—and that would affect Russia. For the same reason Turkey would be concerned. Anything which determines the fate of so many nations and which may bring on a war cannot leave England and France indifferent. They are far away, but the Austrian problem is near to them. Japan too is involved, though it seems to belong to another world. If Austria became a German province, the German menace to Russia would grow more real. That would interest Japan, might even shape Japanese policy. What interests Japan is also worthy of America's attention. Austria in itself may be nothing more than an overgrown uneconomical capital with a lot of skiing hills attached to it. Yet all eyes are upon it. In like manner Poland or Yugoslavia or Czecho-Slovakia is everybody's business. A struggle with Serbia ignited the first World War. Who thought that Abyssinia would take the center of the world stage? The world is indivisible; and war and peace are indivisible.

"Austrian independence." That is the central thesis within Austria and in Europe generally. Italy, France, England, and the Little Entente are committed to it in varying degree; only Germany, despite numerous insistent requests, has refused to acquiesce. Yet Austria was never so dependent as it is today. Its internal politics and its financial and economic policies are often foreign-made. Austrians, therefore, smile sarcastically when they hear impassioned pleas for Austrian independence from Chancellor Schuschnigg or Vice-Chancellor Starhemberg. "And who armed you?" they ask. "And who instructs you how to deal with domestic political parties?"

Nobody doubts that Mussolini was responsible for the bombardment of the splendid homes of Vienna workmen in February, 1934. During the spring of 1933 the Austrian Nazis made considerable headway. The Dollfuss government felt uncertain. The Socialists were alarmed. In June, 1933, President Miklas, Dr. Dollfuss, and Karl Renner, a right-wing Social Democrat, were brought together under foreign auspices to discuss a coalition between Christian Socialists and Social Democrats. They agreed on the terms. It was understood, for instance, that Otto Bauer and Julius Deutsch, who were regarded as radicals, would be eliminated from Socialist leadership, at least temporarily. Dollfuss, however, asked six weeks for deliberation. After he went to see Mussolini at Riccione in August he rejected the agreement. Dollfuss often went to Mussolini for advice, and Prince Starhemberg prides himself on being the Duce's pupil. Mussolini sometimes outlined their strategic plans. Dollfuss believed it wise to combine with the left against the right. Mussolini preferred the destruction of the left, to be followed, if possible, by the smashing of the right and the erection on their ruins of an authoritarian state. Critics and supporters of the present Austrian regime declare with certainty that Morreale, Mussolini's agent in Vienna, inspired the events which precipitated the Socialist uprising of February, 1934, and its ruthless suppression.

When Mussolini's mobilization on the Brenner scotched the poorly prepared Nazi Putsch of July, 1934, his Austrian strategy was complete, but what remains is not an authoritarian state. It is a state without authority. One-third of Austria, good observers estimate, is Socialist and Communist, one-third Christian Socialist, and 30 per cent Nazi; the rest, perhaps 2 or 3 per cent of the total, would vote Schuschnigg, if they could vote. The Schuschnigg Cabinet is backed by the bayonets of Prince Starhemberg's Heimwehr, a paramilitary formation. These bayonets were paid for either by Starhemberg, who is a big landlord, or from the profits of Italian arms shipments to Hungary. Mussolini naturally dislikes Socialists, and when the Austrian Socialists began to interfere with the Italian-Hungarian arms traffic they committed suicide as a legal party. Today, accordingly, Austria has no parliament, no political parties, no popular backing of the regime, no free press, and no trade unions. It has, however, a terror, which ranges from long prison sentences to the opening of foreign tourists' mail.

Austria's political "independence" finds a complement in its economic "independence." Austria's great industries are skiing, musical festivals, and, at present, sanctions-breaking. No one expected Starhemberg or Schuschnigg to be unpleasant to Mussolini. But sales to Italy are limited by Italy's capacity to pay. Austria can send timber and wood pulp, which it has in abundance. It cannot, however, go on importing raw materials for gold and sell to Italy for lire or oranges. In effect, this amounts to Austrian credits for Italy and a loss of solid currency backing which Austria can ill afford. Soon Italy will be applying sanctions to itself. Nevertheless, revenue from Czech and German transit trade with Italy has been considerable in recent months, and so too has been the income from Austria's failure to impose League sanctions. The year 1935 saw obvious economic improvement, most of it superficial. Official unemployment figures are unreliable. Destitution stalks the streets of Vienna, and official posters call on the citizenry to feed starving children and adults. Hemmed in as it is on a small territory by a chain of customs mountains, Austria faces an economic future neither normal nor bright.

Against this stark background Viennese politicians are playing a frivolous and comic game. They toy with the idea of Hapsburg restoration in the hope that it will prevent the union with Germany. Many believe it would hasten that event. But this is less important than the Little Entente's unalterable opposition, backed probably by France, to a return of Otto or any other prince or king. Italy has not always obstructed Austrian monarchist tendencies. This intensifies Czecho-Slovakian and Yugoslav hostility to Hapsburg legitimism, for these states foresee, first, a possible joint Italian-Hapsburg attempt to tear Croatia from Yugoslavia; second, a union between Austria and Hungary which would weaken the Little Entente—they are all anti-Hungarian because Hungary wants the territory it ceded to them under the peace treaties; and, third, in any case, Hapsburg intrigues and subversive propaganda among dissident or embittered groups in all three of the Little Entente states—Rumania, Yugoslavia, and Czecho-Slovakia. The Little Entente is even more adamant against Hapsburg restoration than against Austrian Anschluss with Germany, and it is determined to prevent both. Denied their Otto, the stranded kaiserliche und königliche aristocracy and the decrepit bureaucratic vestiges persuade communities to pass resolutions electing him their honorary citizen—a thousand communities have taken that formal step—and, for the rest, they hope because they have nothing else to do. Starhemberg, however, only thirty-six years old, handsome, and ambitious, entertains another idea. He could become regent for the Hapsburgs. That would not necessarily mean that the regent would ever cease warming the seat and yield it to a royal prince; Horthy has been regenting for many years. A vice-chancellor can go. A regent, presumably, enjoys life tenure. This development is possible. The Little Entente could interpose no objection.

One must not be too severe with today's rulers of Austria. Since they refuse to broaden the narrow base of their political structure they must at least be allowed the pleasure of imagining how it would look with a crown on top of it. Tragic, perhaps even dangerous, childishness! The only way in which Austria could offer resistance to Italian as well as German fascism and thus give real content to the present empty slogan of Austrian independence would be to set up a democratic government. The Little Entente favors this solution and has worked for it. The Vatican too might approve of it, for the Holy See fears German anti-Catholic predominance in the only remaining papal country of central Europe.

The dictatorship is Austria's weakness. It exposes the country to outside dictatorships before which it is helpless. Austria's safety in recent years has lain partly in the rivalry between the two fascisms. But now Italy is preoccupied in Abyssinia and the Mediterranean. Why does not Germany take advantage of this situation to annex Austria? Actually, the Austrian and German Nazis have been relatively inactive in Austria. They seem to be retiring from the field, although Mussolini has lately hinted, to frighten France and England, perhaps, that he would connive at Germany's conquest of Austria. Germany's present passivity vis-a-vis Austria is an astounding and major fact in European affairs. It is the strongest impression one gains in Austria, though it may be reversed at any time in response to larger changes in the relations between the great powers. For the time being Germany's inaction when the conditions would seem to encourage action is taken to reflect Hitler's difficult internal position. Hitler knows that Austria is a match which would start a European conflagration. He wisely refrains from striking it.

While Germany is revealing less interest, England is displaying more. Central and southeastern Europe are beginning to look with increasing frequency to London for leadership. These countries have not deserted France, rather they are afraid that France has deserted or is inclined to desert them. But British or Czecho-Slovak influence cannot rest on a firm basis and foreign financial investments cannot be safe until the internal political regime conforms more to national needs and popular wishes.

Presidential Possibilities Colonel Knox's Campaign Strategy

By RAYMOND GRAM SWING

IN weighing the candidacy of Colonel Frank Knox, it is essential to note that he is attacking Roosevelt and not the Democratic Party. Many of his recent speeches could be said to be built on the Democratic platform, and the chief charge against Roosevelt is his broken platform pledges. This may be more significant than appears on the surface. It may mean that Colonel Knox is consciously appealing to conservative Democrats, and would follow through with a logical plan of cooperation. He has said nothing specific to justify this conclusion. But would it not be feasible for him, if nominated, to announce that he would take office only for one term, that he would clean up "the New Deal mess" on a non-partisan basis, redeem the pledges of both platforms as to economy and sound currency, invite leading conservative Democrats into the Cabinet, and thus be assured of votes enough in the Senate to put through the program? If there is a "crisis" at Washington, a coalition would be a familiar political recourse. Even British democracy has not been able to manage without one.

This is my own guess, but it is the only hypothesis which explains to me Colonel Knox's confusing campaign. It makes his vitriol-throwing at Roosevelt more than mere pique. It might be the reason for his emphasis on platform pledges, which otherwise is ingenuous, in view of the general shattering of platforms in American history. It also would be a reason for not stressing his own doctrines. To be a coalition candidate he would need to simplify his program. To appeal to conservatives of both parties he would have to soft-pedal his progressivism of 1912. The less said the better about his having, as a reform country editor in Michigan, fought the "interests"—the Michigan Central in particular—managed Governor Osborne's campaign, and thus prepared for the first heavy taxation on that railroad. And if he is to appeal to conservative Republicans he must admit that it was a mistake that he, more than anyone else, dragged Theodore Roosevelt into the 1912 campaign, which according to an article about him in Fortune he now does admit. Far better to refer to his strong fight in New Hampshire against a state income tax. Better, too, to decry the Wagner act for introducing "coercion" into the American system of "vol-untarism," and for not exacting from employers and workers equal fulfilment of contracts. Thus, too, one can understand the fervor for states' rights, remarkable just now among Illinois Republicans, and the quotation from the platform of Lincoln pledging "the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the states, and especially the right of each state to order and control its own domestic institutions."

This line, at any rate, has made Colonel Knox one of the leading Republican aspirants. He has been helped, too, by the assumption that he will have the Illinois Republican organization behind him, thus being assured of strength in the Middle West. He has the indorsement of the Cook County Republican Committee and the Republican State Committee. The latter was unprecedented, but it really does not mean much, since Illinois selects its convention delegates by primary and they are not legally bound to support any candidate. The state committee can give a lead, not much more. And in Illinois there is factionalism, which may cause the Colonel trouble. In the last gubernatorial campaign the Daily News fought Governor Len Small, as was to have been expected. Small, however, was helpful in getting the state committee to indorse Knox, and the Colonel, when in the neighborhood of Small's home, paid him an appreciative visit. According to an account in the Tribune, Small, at this meeting, talked about having $125,000 to spend and hinted about making a comeback. Knox denies that either topic was mentioned in the conversation, or that his visit was more than a courtesy call. The Tribune, in publishing this account, certainly was not trying to be helpful, and an important point about the report is that it throws light on the disposition toward Knox of Colonel Bert McCormick, its publisher. Obviously he is piqued to have the publisher of the Daily News, only four years in Chicago, blossom as a favorite son.

Colonel Knox is in difficulty the moment he starts to play politics in Chicago. To rebuild the local Republican organization he can hardly avoid beginning with the fragments of the old Thompson machine. As this was unspeakably unsavory, it brings him into relations with men with whom the publisher of a respectable newspaper would not associate. Again according to the Tribune, Colonel Knox has been recently seen in public with an arm over the shoulder of Alderman William V. Pacelli, a symbol of the exigencies of politics in Cook County. But he had mixed in local politics before his candidacy crossed his mind. This was last year when he thought something must be done to create an opposition to Mayor Kelly. It was a mistake, as many of his friends told him at the time. The Kelly machine owned too many Republican precinct committeemen, and Knox failed ignominiously. Now, however, these new associates are clambering aboard his band-wagon, though how sincerely may be questioned. It is to their interest to boost Knox if he is a winner and if in that way they can rid themselves of the enmity of the Daily News. If Colonel McCormick began showing power enough to checkmate Knox, they might want to swing over to McCormick. So at this stage of the drama one can't be sure how strong Colonel Knox is in Chicago, and how loyal his Illinois delegates will be.

I have drawn a distinction between the private and public Knox. The public Knox, as I heard him in Chicago addressing a luncheon of men and women party organizers, confined himself to castigating Roosevelt, without uttering a constructive syllable. He enumerated the Roosevelt pledges, then the violations, all in the most relentless, prosecuting-attorney method. "And now I ask you," he cried in a metallic-voiced climax, "would any of you again believe Franklin Delano Roosevelt?" His audience shouted back a lusty "no." Trustworthiness in Office is the title of this and similar addresses. Another high spot in it is the citation of the letter written by the President when the Guffey bill was before the Senate, in which he urged that doubts as to its constitutionality should not be allowed to block its passage. Knox solemnly and slowly reads the oath of office, stressing the pledge to preserve the Constitution. Then as slowly he quotes Lincoln: "I could not take office without taking the oath, nor was it my view that I might take the oath in order to get power and then break the oath in using the power." This goes down well, the average American not knowing that Lincoln was hardly an impeccable constitutionalist, or that he refused to let the United States marshal serve a summons upon a prison official, cited for contempt of the Supreme Court, who had ignored a writ of habeas corpus. Colonel Knox may know it, and brush the incident aside as having occurred in war time, but he would hunt in vain for mention of war in Lincoln's oath.

Another favorite device in recent speeches is to make a forecast of certain planks in the Democratic platform of 1936, based on Roosevelt's policies. Then he springs it on the audience that he is quoting from the Socialist platform in the last campaign. He selects nine planks for this ruse; public ownership and democratic control of utilities, communication, and transportation; steeply increased inheritance and income taxes; government ownership of grain elevators, stockyards, and packing-houses; agricultural planning on a national scale; abolition of the power of the Supreme Court to nullify Congressional laws; amendment to the Constitution authorizing federal social insurance and the power to own and operate manufacture, banking, commerce, communication, transportation, and utilities; encouragement of trade with Soviet Russia; entrance of the United States into the World Court; and a five-billion-dollar appropriation for public works, roads, reforestation, and slum clearance. It is of course absurd to say that Roosevelt wants government ownership and operation of manufacture and commerce—the only socialism in these nine planks—but in a partisan atmosphere it is a smart trick.

The appeal to disgruntled Democrats is clearly recognizable. Knox enumerates six planks from the Democratic platform of 1932, and urges that they be incorporated in the Republican platform of 1936. These are immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditure, maintenance of national credit by a federal budget annually balanced, sound currency, unemployment and old-age insurance under state laws (Knox's italics), strict enforcement of anti-trust laws, and opposition to the unsound policy of restricting agricultural production. Roosevelt, he likes to say, "has gone too far to the left toward radicalism" to live up to these pledges.

But he stumbles when it comes to agriculture. He believes its future lies in producing raw materials for industry as well as food, and in reviving the "old Yankee trading spirit" (in reality, as he explains, subsidies for dumping farm products abroad) so as to restore foreign markets. But like other Republicans he is searching for something that maintains farmers' incomes without looking like "regimentation."

Knox has taken his candidacy seriously enough to establish Chicago headquarters in the La Salle hotel—this in part to keep personal politics out of the Daily News office—and he travels regularly between Chicago and Washington. At the La Salle one can meet former Commander Hayes and Phil Collins, one of the king-makers of the American Legion, also LeRoy T. Vernon, former Daily News correspondent in Washington, who fits comfortably in the present Knox campaign though he fought zealously on the Taft side when Knox was Bull-Moosing in 1912. Here one may ask what has become of the once liberal Knox and be told that he has not changed, but only seems to have, because Roosevelt has moved so far to the left. This is argued with conviction. No doubt it is what the local business "giants" say in Room 100 in the Chicago Club, where Knox has been admitted as a member of this industrial House of Lords of the Middle West. They and the upper few thousand in Chicago are even more rabid on the topic of Roosevelt than is the Wall Street district of New York.

Candidate Knox might be nominated with the help of their kind, but the upper few thousand could not elect him. To win he would have to poll at least some farmers and workers. The only mass support he now can look forward to is in the ranks of the Legion. Labor he has recklessly affronted with his opposition to the Wagner law, despite his long record of dealing with unions without a strike. He contends that there is no labor problem because he personally has not encountered one. That workers have the right of collective bargaining under a ruling of the Supreme Court which they cannot enforce without legislation he refuses to see. He is satisfied that there need be no law simply because, as an employer, he has never had a strike. The reasoning satisfies Knox and big employers alike. And it serves, I should say, as the intellectual yardstick of Colonel Knox in both his personalities, as publisher and candidate.

[The first part of Mr. Swing's article on Colonel Knox appeared last week. Next week Benjamin Stolberg will discuss Governor Talmadge as a "Presidential possibility."]

Mr. Hearst Restores St. Donats

By A WELSH CORRESPONDENT

IN South Wales, squeezed between the coal mines and the sea, was the ancient Norman castle of St. Donats. It rose sheer from the brown and oily waters of the Bristol Channel. Like many other buildings of great antiquity it had been extensively restored, but unlike many it had been fortunate in its restorer. The character of the place remained. There was nothing pseudo-Norman about it; what was solid and usable was left, and what obviously could not be genuine made no pretense of being so. Inside it had been furnished with all the comforts of modern civilization; outside it remained the same. The garden fell in terraces to the sandy bay a quarter of a mile from the house; the barracks of the Norman soldiers on the second terrace remained untouched and "unrestored." Roses grew in tangled masses over the walls and roof. An ancient tortoise groped in and out of the herbaceous border. White pigeons flapped round the keep.

The march of progress had made the blue and glittering sea of Norman times odoriferous and oily; it had built rows of squalid red brick cottages right up to the gate house, had reared gaunt cranes and pithead machinery within sight of the keep, and turned the little village of serfs' cottages, called the Hamlet of St. Donats, into the filthy and altogether unattractive township of Llantwit Major. This made no difference to the castle. Once within its precincts it was possible to keep the illusion of older and more romantic times—times when the oil descended from the keep on the heads of the attacking foe instead of rising from the sea and depositing itself on the rocks and shingle, and on the persons of those foolish enough to bathe; times when the barracks were full of men sharpening their axes, and when the tilting yard rang with the cheers of the crowd as the combatants entered the lists. St. Donats was a link with the past.

But now all that is changed. Nine hundred years after the followers of William the Norman had conquered the Welsh and built their fortress came another intruder. He came from the West instead of the East, but he too came armed—not with ax and sword but with the most potent weapon of modern times, money. Money can do almost more in our time than spears and lances in the time of the Normans, and by its aid William Randolph Hearst accomplished a bloodless invasion of Glamorgan and acquired for his own St. Donats Castle.

Mr. Hearst's descent on Wales came at a time when he was feeling peevish. He had suffered the indignity of being expelled from France. Wales was not so fastidious; if not welcome, Mr. Hearst was at least permitted entrance. What was his object in buying St. Donats one can only surmise. Certainly not to use it as a residence. He is seldom there for as long as a fortnight in the year. Even more certainly not as a residence for his wife, for that lady, having learned with shocked surprise that the only entrance was under the keep, and that the servants had to use it as well as herself, refused point-blank to set foot inside the place. In addition, she was heard to remark that it was a nice little place, but not big enough for entertaining. One can only suppose that Mr. Hearst's motives were ones of pure snobbery; St. Donats was unique, therefore Mr. Hearst must own it.

But if St. Donats was unique before Mr. Hearst acquired it, how much more strikingly so is it now! Nothing about the place, it appears, was right for him. Decorating firms vied with each other in their zeal to "improve" and modernize the interior. Mr. Hearst is thoughtful for his guests, and perhaps he realized that young Hollywood is not at its ease away from a cocktail bar and solid marble bathrooms in becoming shades. But one wonders whose idea were the bow windows. If Mr. Hearst hankered after bow windows, why did he not buy a villa at Bournemouth or Swansea? Bow windows at St. Donats are fantastic. They look like pimples on the gray face of the castle. Right through the ten-foot walls and curtain wall they have been pushed. It is without parallel in vandalism that St. Donats should have been so mocked. Do not imagine, however, that Mr. Hearst has no tenderness for antiquity. He shows off with great pride a pair of grubby bedroom slippers that may have belonged to Henry VIII, and rushes lie on the flagged floor—cheek by jowl with the green marble of the bathrooms.

If he has made havoc inside, what of outdoors? That, if possible, is worse. The barracks on the second terrace have been pulled down and entirely rebuilt to provide accommodation for fifty bachelors. Five bachelors one can believe in, even fifteen, but fifty all together under one roof stretches the imagination too far. The tilting yard, the sole remaining one in the country, has been made into a luxurious swimming pool. Altogether Mr. Hearst has made St. Donats at last fit to live in, and fit for his Hollywood friends to visit him in. Special trains bring them down from London and after the party is over return them whence they came.

For fifty weeks in the year the swimming pool is deserted. For a fortnight platinum blondes lie in rows on the terrace in a minimum of clothing and a maximum of make-up. Among them strolls Elinor Glyn with her vivid red hair and her whimsical smile. The sandy bay echoes with the sound of Middle Western voices. In the evening the local pubs are gratified by the sight of the young ladies of Hollywood in their beach pajamas consuming gin and whiskey and brandy and vermouth in staggering quantities. The young ladies' legs are not always as strong as their heads, and occasionally they have to be carried or wheeled in a barrow back to the castle. Mr. Hearst himself is a teetotaler, but his friends are not. Their contempt for the licensing laws of Great Britain is enormous. "Oh, gee, baby," they say to the scandalized innkeeper when he points out that it is closing time, "that's a lot of hooley. Mr. Hearst'll buy up your joint in the morning." Quite useless to point out that even if Mr. Hearst should "buy up the joint" the licensing laws would apply to him just as much as to Trefor Jones or David Lewis.

In just one respect Mr. Hearst may be looked upon as a benefactor—he gives everyone in Glamorgan plenty to laugh at and gossip about. For example, he appeared to distribute the prizes at a small agricultural show followed by a bevy of beauties in sun-bathing suits and platinum curls. The Welsh yokels were agog, they stared till their eyes popped, and one old farmer was heard to remark to his neighbor, "Indeed, it is a harem he has, look you." The platinum blondes created an equal diversion among the startled cows, while Mr. Hearst himself quarreled with his neighbor, Sir Rhys Williams, on the subject of cream. Altogether a most successful show.

As a joke, Mr. Hearst is an asset no doubt, but his value as a figure of fun cannot compensate for the damage to St. Donats. Even the ghost has left St. Donats now, and the ancient tortoise, seneschal of the high terrace, has died of disgust.

Correspondence

Harlem Hospitals

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard's article on Harlem in your issue of January 22 calls for some correction.

Under Hospitals and Health Mr. Villard says: "The central fact remains that Harlem has been served by only one public hospital of 325 beds for a population of over 200,000." Mr. Villard does not say that some weeks before the publication of his article the normal capacity of Harlem Hospital was increased from 325 beds and bassinettes to 607 beds and 114 bassinettes.

Mr. Villard says further that "what makes the situation worse from the Negro point of view is the constant discrimination against colored members of the medical staff of the Harlem Hospital." I do not believe that Mr. Villard would have made such a statement if he had taken the trouble to inform himself of the facts. To the best of my knowledge and belief promotions to senior positions are now being made on a merit basis without regard to race or political affiliation.

When the present administration took office, the Medical Board of Harlem Hospital, comprising the Senior Visitings, included only one Negro member; now there are three. In the recent organization of the Queens General Hospital, a new department unit, places were found for five Negro physicians. I have just promoted a Negro physician to the position of full attending physician at Sea View Hospital. Out of 181 Negro physicians practicing in New York State, about half are associated with the New York City Department of Hospitals.

S. S. GOLDWATER, M. D., Commissioner
New York, January 28

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

In regard to Dr. Goldwater's letter, a reference to the new wing was inadvertently omitted from my article, but I am unable to see that the opening of the wing has any bearing upon the facts set forth as to the past. Dr. Goldwater will hardly deny that for four years all work on this wing was stopped, although the need for it was overwhelming.

As to the racial discrimination referred to in my article, that was based upon the facts laid before the Mayor's Commission, which does not agree with Dr. Goldwater's view.

New York, February 5 OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

TEMPO

IN THE

U. S. S. R.

STAKHANOV

Alexei Stakhanov, a coal miner in the Donbas, recently began a movement that has vibrated through all the sinews of the new Soviet industry and agriculture. It has meant a vast increase in productivity and promises huge rewards in happy living for the 170 millions in the Soviet Union. The Europe-bound traveler can scarcely afford to omit a visit to Moscow, Leningrad, Kharkov, Kiev and Odessa (or down the Volga and to the Caucasus) to witness at first hand the great progress being made in a sixth of the world. Easy connections with more western cities are made by air, boat or express. Rates in dollars (not increased for four years) on an all-inclusive basis make travel inexpensive. Write to Intourist for information and for booklet NA-2.

ANY TRAVEL AGENT WILL BOOK YOU

INTOURIST, INC.

545 FIFTH AVENUE

NEW YORK

VISIT THE SOVIET UNION

SAFEGUARD PRODUCTIVE CAPITAL

Bank credit deflected from production of goods and employment of labor by recurrently inflating ground rent and heavy taxation.—Credit thus piles up abnormally.—Interest rates fall and credit goes into stock speculation.—Real issue today is productive capitalism vs. finance capitalism.—Can be dealt with only by transferring taxation from industry and improvements to ground values.—No exploitation of labor by capital in absence of ground monopoly.

Minneapolis Tribune: "A sensible suggestion at a time when big business and small business as well is crying for relief from heavy taxation. . . . Seems to fit the picture of what industry needs today."

A new approach to the business problem, by LOUIS WALLIS, author of "The Struggle for Justice" and other volumes dealing with economic forces in world history.

75¢

All booksellers

Published by DOUBLEDAY, DORAN, Garden City, N. Y.

Labor and Industry

Seattle Upholds Civil Liberty

By COLE STEVENS

Seattle, February 5

THE way to fight fascism is to fight fascism—to tackle it here and now, instead of letting it grow from a trend to a reality. Acting on this logical but often ignored theory, Seattle liberals and radicals have twice made news in the past month—once when veterans raided a workers' school and found themselves in court as a result, and again when William Randolph Hearst attacked academic freedom and civil liberties and was excoriated in the public press by fifty-odd university teachers two days later.

The first story goes back to late December, when Seattle Communist organizations announced that they were opening a Marxist "social-science school" such as they have conducted periodically for years. This time, however, the American Legion Americanization Committee and the Hearst Post-Intelligencer were on the job. They protested to Mayor Charles L. Smith—the little man who led a gas attack on maritime pickets in the 1934 strike and who tried to turn the recent Fisher Flouring Mill strike into a red-baiting spree. Smith admitted he could find no law prohibiting sessions of the school, but his police chief bragged to the Post-Intelligencer that "the day the radical school opens we'll back the patrol wagon up to the curb and give the faculty a free ride to jail."

Apparently the Communists wanted a showdown, for they set the date of the school's opening for January 7 and sent a letter to the Mayor demanding police protection. The police "protection" arrived—the red squad—and arrested five persons at the opening session, including Morris Raport, Communist district organizer, and Robert Stephens, Machinists' Union member and delegate to the Central Labor Council.

Wesley Randall, organizer of the school, took Raport's place on the platform when the police left, but within a few minutes a carefully timed attack was made by some forty valorous veterans, who no doubt are still proud that they helped make the country "safe for democracy." These thugs in overseas caps started a free-for-all which resulted in injuries to both sides. Reporters from the Post-Intelligencer and Times were on hand to get pictures. Police were called, but they reported later that they found only some veterans standing around talking.

Seattle has always been a liberal town; now labor and liberals were outraged. The boilermakers sent a delegation to the jail demanding the release of the prisoners, who were being held incommunicado, without charges. The Mayor's telephone rang all that night. Early the next morning Jack Cluck and Rollo Houghton, attorneys for the American Civil Liberties Union, appeared in court with a writ of habeas corpus. Since there was no legal ground for holding the men, all were released. To prevent a repetition of such police lawlessness, charges of false arrest were preferred against Police Chief W. B. Kirtley.

Then the heavens fell on the veterans. Incredible as it may seem, five of them were identified by Wesley Randall, and warrants were issued for their arrest on a charge of unlawful assembly by Deputy Prosecutor Paul Coughlin, who said, "The investigation indicated that the veterans intended to conduct themselves so as to cause almost inevitably a serious disturbance, and that they had come prepared to fight. A severe battle followed. Such actions by private citizens are opposed to the long tradition of American civil liberties and are contrary to law." On the same day Randall demanded police protection for the next meeting of the workers' school.

The five men arrested turned out to be prominent members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. The leader of the raid, C. R. Christie, was a past junior vice-commander of the national organization, and two others were commanders, past and present, of local posts. The state commander predicted a fight to the finish for the culprits, and several prominent veteran lawyers volunteered to defend them. The Chamber of Commerce apologized for the veterans and condemned the prosecutor's office. The Hearst Post-Intelligencer printed the expected sob story telling how the men were "cheerfully unrepentant over their part in breaking up the first session of the Seattle Communist College." But the raiders were arraigned and forced to post bond, and a jury trial was set for March 21.

The second incident was also stirred up by the Hearst paper, and ended even more surprisingly. The Civic Auditorium was rented for a speech by Harry F. Ward, chairman of the American League Against War and Fascism and president of the A. C. L. U. On January 30 the ever-alert Post-Intelligencer carried the headline "Ward Talk Under Legion Probe," and asserted that the use of two halls had been refused to Ward earlier, and that the Legion Subversive Activities Committee was investigating the affair. On Sunday, February 2, appeared the headline "U. Faculty Men Listed as Backing Ward." The names of four University of Washington teachers had been found among the sponsoring committee of twenty-six. Emphasis was laid on the fact that Ward opposed teachers' loyalty oaths, to which Washington teachers are subject. The charges were accompanied by distortions of items taken from the Hearst morgue: that Professor Richard G. Taylor had been "active in various so-called 'liberal' movements [technocracy] and recently was deposed as dean of the college of engineering"; that Professor F. B. Farquharson "last year sat on the platform with Communists during a local meeting of the League Against War and Fascism"; and that Selden Menefee, sociology teacher, was the "author of articles in radical magazines [The Nation]." Hugh DeLacy, English teacher, had no such black record but had merely sponsored Ward. The D. A. R. said the Post-Intelligencer had joined the investigation.

The university faculty acted immediately. A group of liberals, some of them members of the local American Federation of Teachers' union, which has some eighty members on the campus, drew up the following statement:

The publicity in the Hearst press for the lecture by Harry F. Ward, scheduled for February 6 at the Civic Auditorium, displays the typical Hearst animus against civil liberties, particularly against the constitutional right of freedom of assembly.

Dr. Ward is a professor at Union Theological Seminary, author of several distinguished books, and secretary of the Methodist Federation for Social Service. Dr. Ward has spoken on the university campus in past years.

As a speaker for peace and democracy he has the right to a fair hearing. Any attack on a speaker or his sponsors because he stands for civil liberties is in itself evidence that those liberties are in danger.

As the Seattle Star said on January 23, in response to Hearst's attack on the peace movement in the churches, "The case at issue is that of Hearst against Almost Everybody . . . what America needs right now is not protection from Communists but from William Randolph Hearst."

By Tuesday fifty-eight teachers had signed this letter pledging their support to the sponsoring committee. Many prominent faculty members, including the chairmen of the Instructors' Association and of the Teachers' Union, were included. The evening Star, whose liberal editor, Rodney Brink, has been blasting Hearst recently, gave the story a front-page spread and strong editorial support. The impossible had happened—a large group of "cloistered" college professors had come down out of their ivory towers to strike a real blow against Hearst and fascism!

The Hearst paper, probably fearing the rage of the czar of San Simeon, managed to get a statement out of President Lee Paul Sieg of the university, who was imported two years ago from Pittsburgh, the Mellon university recently black-listed by the American Association of University Professors. Sieg "deplored" the faculty members' action, saying that "faculty members should be too busy attending to their educational duties to find time to enter into a controversy off the campus." The Star retorted: "Dr. Sieg surely can see that compliance with such a formula would also keep his professors too busy to go fishing or to a movie show—or to vote on election day . . . we feel sure that the head of a great American university [should] actually urge his entire faculty to 'take sides' where the American right of freedom of speech and the very Constitution itself are in jeopardy."

This tremendous build-up assured the success of the Ward meeting. Six thousand persons filled the auditorium and applauded Dr. Ward's clear analysis of current trends toward fascism and the need for a united front to curb those trends. The incident undoubtedly pleased the sixty-two instructors involved. And the Star was the recipient of a large number of subscriptions as a result of an informal movement among liberals. So everyone was happy—except, perhaps, Mr. Hearst and Mr. Sieg; the latter's stand on the civil rights of teachers has enabled his faculty to know what to expect of him hereafter.

One more thing in the fight for civil liberties remains to be reported. As a reaction to the veterans' case related above, a committee representing liberals and radicals of all shades, together with the rank and file of labor, has entered a mayoralty candidate in the current campaign. Tom E. Smith, the candidate, has a perfect progressive labor record in the state legislature. The Washington Commonwealth Federation, a coalition of technocrats and other liberal groups, is swinging its precinct organizations into action for him. With the conservatives divided several ways, he may win office. Whether he does or not, the campaign promises to be one that will set the pace for "peoples' fronts" in other cities.

Loose Construction

By HEYWOOD BROWN

FRANK KNOX seeks the Republican nomination and he also runs the Chicago Daily News. His dual role as publisher and Presidential aspirant has some embarrassing features. An organizer for the American Newspaper Guild reported that it was difficult to talk to men on the News because they were frightened off by the publisher's opposition. This has not manifested itself in any overt act, but a newspaper shop is a whispering gallery. "It was learned on good authority," as the phrase goes, that anybody on the Knox paper who joined the guild would find such action bad medicine.

The National Executive Board of the guild felt that as a Presidential candidate Colonel Knox would be glad to make some open statement in regard to his position on collective bargaining, and a communication was sent to him. He did not seem very glad or very open. Of course he has "had a long and amiable contact with organized labor," but he hazards the guess that the reason for the guild's failure to make faster progress in Chicago is "that the hard-boiled, individualistic, and realistic men who staff the Chicago papers don't see the benefits." The Colonel's hint to his staff is a broad one. One needs to be no master of realism to translate the Knox note accurately enough. The Colonel is saying that on his own paper he believes in rugged individualism and that he is against organized labor. What could be simpler?

■ * ■

FOR a short period I thought I had a notion which might revolutionize the reporting of news from Washington. It was all on account of something the taxi-driver said. He was talking of the fact that in the course of a day he carried many famous men to the House or the Senate or the White House itself. "And a lot of them seem to forget," he added, "that down here in Washington there isn't any glass between the driver and the passenger."

There flashed into my head the notion of a service to be called "Taxi Tips, Inc.—The Inside of the Inside of Washington News."

"Only yesterday," the driver continued, "I had Carter Glass and a friend in my cab."

"Was it that very slippery day?" I inquired hopefully.

But seemingly there had been no mishap, for the taxi man continued, "That old Senator was talking about a man named Eccles. He was saying all sorts of things about him just as if I didn't have an ear in my head."

"What did he say?" I asked eagerly, my journalistic fervor aroused. "What did Carter Glass say about Eccles?"

"He said he didn't like him," replied the driver. I have decided not to organize Taxi Tips, Inc., after all.

■ * ■

THE secrecy which surrounds all the activities of the Supreme Court save its public announcements is supposed to add to its dignity and sanctity. But of late its reputation has been impaired by rumor. One is so persistent that the court in all fairness to itself should issue an affirmation or a denial. To be sure the justices cannot be expected to take heed of every tale which goes around concerning the manner in which they arrived at some particular decision. Newspapermen themselves pay little attention to those ropes conjured out of thin air. But a number of reliable correspondents are convinced that the story of the switch of Chief Justice Hughes on the AAA case is true. According to this very persistent rumor Chief Justice Hughes had been inclined to vote with Stone, Brandeis, and Cardozo in upholding the act. Finding himself in the minority he switched over in order to make the invalidating decision go by six to three.

A RECENT issue of Time was a great deal less than fair to John L. Lewis. At the top of the page the magazine printed a picture of a pleasant old house in Alexandria, Virginia, of Lewis reclining in a chair, and of a corner of the handsome office of the president of the United Mine Workers of America in the Tower Building in Washington. In a footnote the office was referred to as "moderne." The intention was obvious and probably successful with some. I ran into a couple of old dowagers in Washington who had been receptive to the idea. They were chattering away in their circle about how terrible it was that a labor leader should have a palace in which to live and an elaborate office, while other men were working deep underground. Now even the most bitter foes of Lewis would hardly deny the enormous energy he puts into his job. His salary of $12,000 a year makes him among the lower-paid labor leaders although he is the president of the largest union. John L. Lewis is probably the greatest authority from all possible angles on coal in this country today. Alexandria is of course a suburb of Washington, and its rents are low. Lewis does not own the house in which he lives.

I believe he smokes pretty good cigars, but I have never come across any other luxury in which he indulges himself. And as far as his tactics and his objectives go he need not apologize to anyone for being "moderne."

Facts for Consumers

AS instructive a bit of information for consumers as has ever been published is contained in a letter written by Representative Thomas R. Amlie of Wisconsin to the Secretary of State and reprinted in the Congressional Record. Primarily the letter was a protest against the recent reciprocal tariff agreement with Canada, which among other things lowered the duty on Canadian cheese; but in explaining why the arrangement was unfair to his constituents Mr. Amlie gave some interesting information about process cheese (natural cheese heated to the melting-point with flavoring and other ingredients added) and the business methods and quality standards of such large producers as Kraft-Phenix.

The cheapest and most inferior cheese on the market is bought by the processors and used as a base for their product. Flavor, one of the characteristics of all good cheese, is not desired by the processors, for they can add flavor in the processing. Adequate moisture content, another characteristic of good-quality natural cheese, is also not desired. The processors are now reported to be playing the domestic cheese-makers against those across the border by threatening to buy only Canadian cheese unless the domestic cheese-makers will cut the moisture content of their product to 33 per cent, which, according to Amlie, will make a most unpalatable cheese.

The cheese-makers of Wisconsin, writes Amlie, object to this debasement of quality. But even pride in the art of cheese-making must bow to the demands of the market. "It is regrettable," says Amlie, "that the American consuming public does not appreciate what constitutes good cheese." Thus good-quality natural cheese must compete in price with the well-advertised packaged products. Not only do the cheese-makers suffer from this commercial disadvantage, but they are precluded from directly competing with the processors because the patents to the processing methods are the property of Kraft-Phenix and other large corporations.

Back in 1923 the United States Department of Agriculture established grades for American cheddar, which includes two-thirds of all cheese produced in the country. After thirteen years only one pound of every hundred produced is graded. The two top grades are United States Extra Fancy and United States Fancy. The government buys nothing below the third grade, known as U. S. No. 1. Ungraded cheese, much of it of fourth and fifth quality, is regularly sold to the buying public.

Several months ago the Food and Drug Administration's notices of judgment listed a seizure of Kraft-Phenix Velveeta. Velveeta was alleged to be misbranded because the statement on the label that it contained "43 per cent butter fat" was, according to the Food and Drug Administration, false; and because other statements on the package tended to mislead the purchaser into believing that "the article was essentially cheese." The seized shipment of Velveeta was released to Kraft-Phenix under bond on condition that the labels be corrected. Subsequently the decree was amended to permit the product to be dehydrated and reworked.

THE dull routine of service in the Food Administration has been enlivened for Wendell Vincent, chief of the Western district, by an attempted lynching and more recently by a suit for malicious persecution brought by an irate business man whose products had been seized on three occasions. The attempted lynching was an incident in the spray-residue war on the West Coast a few years ago; the suit for malicious persecution, the first of its kind to be brought against a food-and-drug inspector, is now pending. The first trial, before Municipal Judge A. J. Fritz of San Francisco, ended with a hung jury, eight to four in favor of the plaintiff. Whether Ira D. Cardiff, president of the Washington Dehydrated Food Company, will continue to prosecute or whether he believes that his near victory will sufficiently impress Vincent and other inspectors remains to be seen. Policemen are occasionally sued on such charges, but the effect of making administration inspectors personally liable for the performance of their official duties has given the administration heads something new to worry about. How zealous will men in the field be when they know they may have to pay out of their own pocket for keeping adulterated and poisonous food off the market?

ONE of the easiest ways of shortweighting is to decrease the size of a standard package. Bakers, for example, have met with little consumer resistance when they have effected an increase in bread prices by reducing the size of the loaf. Meat packers and others in the food industries have followed the same general procedure. New York City's Commissioner of Markets has now called a halt to this form of cheating in the sale of packaged bacon. By agreement with representatives of the large packers, bacon packaged for distribution in New York after February 29 will weigh a full half-pound, not the six ounces which have come to be accepted as the standard size. Consumers in other parts of the country will do well to note whether a "half-pound" of bacon really weighs eight ounces.

RUTH BRINDZE

Books and Music

Biography

By ABE CRADDOCK EDMUNDS

When time's theft
Of all that once was magical and rare
By ■ slow garnering had left
No further hint of wonder there:
Death wrote his name upon her face
As carelessly as in an earlier day
He bent the limbs of some Greek girl
And put away her groves and temples.

Mr. Santayana's First Novel

The Last Puritan. By George Santayana. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

BY one of those ironies not infrequent in literary history, George Santayana, one of the subtlest and richest minds of our or any other day, and one of the great artists in English prose, who has been quietly turning out philosophic masterpieces for half a century, has come into popular acclaim at last, in his seventy-third year, with what is technically the least expert and what is in some respects the most intellectually attenuated of his works. And all because that work is his first "novel."

As ■ novel, its faults, according to conventional standards, are numerous. The pace is slow; the structure is not neat and climactical, but almost as rambling, as up-and-downish and full of tedious interludes as life. There are some ordinarily melodramatic incidents—two murders, ■ suspicious death at sea, ■ suicide—but instead of any effort on the author's part to extract the full drama latent in these, there seems almost ■ deliberate effort to muffle it. The physical background of events is sometimes touched off graphically but more often ignored. The protagonist's three years at Williams College, surely formative ones, are dismissed in a few vague sentences. The characters are seen only from certain aspects, and are seldom physically vivid. And the dialogue is like none heard in the novel for a generation. It is an exchange of soliloquies or finished essays; it is full of unblushing self-explanation or exposition, not for the benefit of the person ostensibly addressed, but of the reader; and nearly always it is much too intelligent and clairvoyant.

But the merits of the book make up for everything, and sweep all its faults before them. And are they really faults? As for the structure, we must remember that this is not simply ■ novel, but "a memoir in the form of ■ novel." Oliver Alden, the hero, we are to understand from the prologue and epilogue, was ■ real person; he was "the most gifted" of Santayana's pupils in the philosopher's last days at Harvard. And if Oliver is real, then presumably the other characters are real, or at least idealizations of real characters. In that case our proper standards of structure would be those of biography rather than of fiction—were it not that the author assumes the fiction writer's prerogative of overhearing all conversations and divining his characters' unspoken thoughts. As for the dialogue, after our first shock at its apparent amateurishness, we accept and finally welcome it as a convention. These long, explicit, uninterrupted speeches are a device of compression: we come to assume that what is said in one long speech by a character is the meat of what he really said over the course of a whole evening or ■ week; and the unnatural intelligence and articulateness of everyone is a refreshing relief from the current convention of laconic obtuseness or incoherent streams of consciousness.

And if the characters are not seen from all sides, their minds, at least, are seen profoundly and thoroughly. Nowhere else in fiction has the latter-day puritan New England soul been so profoundly plumbed, so unsparingly dissected. Unsparingly, and yet sympathetically. For Oliver Alden is defeated, in the end, not because he is a hypocrite but because he is sincere.

We begin with his ancestors: his grasping grandfather, who accumulated the family fortune and died by violence; his frigid Uncle Nathaniel, like ■ character out of Dickens; his father, whose life was wrecked because he accidentally killed a man when ■ student at Harvard, and who spends his days wandering aimlessly over the world in his yacht, learned, humorous, amiable, but weary and joyless, who takes to drugs and finally does away with himself; his mother, infuriatingly smug, conventional, and bigoted. Oliver himself comes into the world apparently with everything in his favor. He inherits a strong body, money, social position; he is brought up by an intelligent and enthusiastic German governess saturated in the romantic tradition of Goethe. At school he quickly assumes leadership both in his studies and in sports. But soon we become aware that there is something wrong here. His parents' marriage is a loveless one; there is no warmth or affection in his home, and there is no warmth or gusto in him. He becomes a prude and a prig, sure of his own integrity and rightness. But what is worse, he is incapable of a healthy, animal acceptance of life: what he does, even his football and his rowing, is done not for pleasure but from a sense of duty.

When he comes of age, he takes his fortune ascetically and sadly. "I remain unhappy, I remain desolate. But if the world is desolate, why make believe it is gay and beautiful? I'd rather be desolate than drunk: and that's the alternative." Does the fault, the reader asks, lie in Oliver's bodily chemistry, or is it really in the barren tradition in which he has been raised? Though a puritan, he is even without ■ mission. "I would gladly devote my life to religion, if there were a religion that was true." And when at length he convinces himself, on puritan grounds, that it is wrong to be a puritan, he remains a puritan notwithstanding. His few attempts at love-making are clumsy and cold; the two women to whom he proposes reject him in spite of his wealth and generosity, and perhaps because of his rather formidable virtue, his icy integrity. He is a failure even in death, for though he enlists half-heartedly in the war, he is killed three days after the Armistice—in ■ motor accident.

This modern Hamlet, this later Henry Adams, is more than an individual; he is ■ symbol of ■ whole race, a whole philosophy. The characters that are contrasted with him—his friend Jim Darnley, fleshly and sensual; his cousin Mario, gilded, merry, cultured, Latin and Catholic; Darnley's pious father—are also symbols; and it is right that they should state so articulately the attitudes for which they stand. For Santayana has turned out, after all, one more book of philosophy, and if the argument is somewhat more attenuated than in previous volumes, it is, by compensation, much more dramatic. And through it are generously sprinkled those aphorisms that fall so easily from his pen: "Emerson is Goethe served in ice water."—"What is love-making but a recurring decimal, always identical in form and always diminishing in value?"—"We've got to change the truth a little in order to remember it." Since Henry James there has been no American novel so rich in thought and analysis.

HENRY HAZLITT

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

The Greatest of the Lowells

Biography of Percival Lowell. By A. Lawrence Lowell. The Macmillan Company. $3.

BEGINNING with a reminiscent chapter on the home where the author, one-time president of Harvard, spent his youth with Amy, the poet, and Percival, the subject of the biography, this memoir of America's greatest astronomer rises from the familiar to the picturesque and from the picturesque to the grandiose. The picturesque phase of Percival Lowell's life was passed in the Far East between 1883 and 1893. As one of the first sympathetic observers of Japan and the unique adviser to the King of Korea, Lowell had the opportunity of becoming, while still very young, an important figure in the world of international politics. But something already evident in his books on the East turned him aside from that brilliant path. It was the passion for observing phenomena. That passion, nurtured in patience, supported by ample means, and crowned with the creative imagination, brought forth his two epochal contributions to astrophysics: the description of Mars, with an explanation of its canals, and the calculation of an undiscovered planet's orbit beyond Neptune. The planet, which he called X, Lowell never saw, but on his birthday, fourteen years after his death, its presence was reported to the world by his former associates at the observatory he had founded.

To the historian of thought the significance of Lowell's work lies in the productive effect of the doctrine of evolution. Both in his work on Mars and in his search for X—now Pluto—it was evolutionary analogy from Lyell and Darwin that animated and directed the tireless observer. The same world-view was latent in his earlier work on Shintoism, just as in "The Soul of the East" something of the pseudo-biological simplification of a Taine or Gobineau was visible. But whereas in society the analogy has produced only prejudice and discord, in science it led once again to a search for just those facts which enabled an imaginative investigator to embrace in a closer formulation the workings of the universe.

President Lowell has recorded his brother's life with sure tact and satisfactory fulness. His task was to write the history of a mind engrossed in problems difficult to popularize, and with the single exception of a misleading remark about the astronomical meaning of opposition, he has achieved perfect clarity without condescension. What is more, one feels throughout, in both biographer and subject, that admirable respect for humankind which is the apanage, not always of mere intelligence, but of aristocratic intelligence, that last fruit of culture, enhancing its noblest accomplishments.

JACQUES BARZUN

Coming of Age in New York

From the Kingdom of Necessity. By Isidor Schneider. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

THIS autobiographical novel out of the East Side contains a wide range of experience sensitively interpreted, a great variety of persons and situations, a close integration between backgrounds and characters. But too often the wealth of material overflows the form, clogs the narrative. There is far too much illustrative matter in the shape of reported speeches, personal outpourings, documentations of points the author has already made in the actions and casual conversations of his characters and in his own often illuminating comments. Here is an organic story, presented with beauty and brilliance, with humor and passion, which by its own vitality disentangles itself from the mass of adipose commentary and remains sharp in outline and vivid in detail after the book is read. The acuteness of a poet's vision contributes to this effect, but there is also the fact that this is a picture of world tendencies and events as they have expressed themselves in New York in the past thirty years, seen from a certain angle which slowly widens with the passage of time and the accumulation of perceptions to include every kind of experience in which the hero can be involved. Time and movement are important in the two main currents, which are constantly touching and separating: the migratory economic life of the family—their many changes of occupation and locality in search of "prosperity"; and the inner development of the hero, alien to his family in every impulse and attitude, constantly struggling to rise out of the morass of poverty, grossness, and dishonesty that surrounds him into a world where he can exist with self-respect and self-fulfilment. And just as the family, in its frantic effort to rise materially, is always tied to an economic evolution it suffers from and struggles with but cannot understand, so Isaac, the son, in his struggle to develop as a man and a writer is constantly confused and frustrated by a crushing sense of weakness, inferiority, and loneliness.

The family, the school, religion, the job, the "better" young people, all have nothing to give him and those like him. In the world as it is now every human impulse is cheapened and vitiated. This is especially true of love and sex, which run like a painful bewildered motif through the adolescent life, where there is no privacy, no beauty, no understanding, and where frustrations or hasty marriages are the least hideous solutions. Isaac at last achieves a happy married life and devotes his gifts as a writer to the liberation of his class.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

The International Present

England Made Me. By Graham Greene. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

GRAHAM GREENE'S latest novel, his sixth, falls into the category of fiction depicting the sickness of modern society. It is not to be confused with those novels which go on to imply or state a remedy, be it communism or Anglo-Catholicism or nudism; the two types are entirely distinct. Greene, like a good many others among our writers, is content to limn his despair and let it go at that.

And yet "England Made Me" is, within its limitations, a good piece of work. It revolves about the thoughts and actions of an English brother and sister in the employ of a Swedish magnate named Krogh (is Kreuger implied?); the brother is the great man's bodyguard, the sister is his secretary and mistress. The story moves easily and smoothly through its three hundred short pages, without fumbling of incident, without any incompetent or irrelevant writing. Greene is a skilful craftsman. He sets off in effective, unlabored relief the immorality of big business and the uneasy petty grafting of those who are the hangers-on of high finance.

The two complementary themes of the book intersect in the mind of the Englishman, Anthony Farrant. Anthony is impregnated with the moral convictions of his father; he believes in the creeds of nineteenth-century England, in prudence and propriety and the absolute moral law. But the security which nourished those comfortable creeds is gone, and Anthony is perforce an economic parasite, going always from job to job, mildly dishonest, accustomed to dishonesty as the typical and normal method of subsistence. He is unwilling that his sister should be Krogh's mistress, and engaged to marry Krogh, when

By EDUARD C. LINDEMAN

Wealth and Culture

A study of 100 great foundations and community trusts—their organization, nature and activities with special reference to their cultural effect.

From the Author's Preface: "My first surprise was to discover that those who managed foundations and trusts did not wish to have these instruments investigated. Had it occurred to me that it would require eight years persistent inquiry at a wholly disproportionate cost to disclose even the basic quantitative facts desired, I am sure that the study would have been promptly abandoned. . . . But in this instance the very resistance and barriers . . . only served to enhance my determination to go forward. Now I am at last prepared to publish an initial report." With tables, graphs, charts, $3.00

By SAMUEL YELLEN

American Labor Struggles

This full, unbiased study of ten labor struggles, which are of great importance in the story of labor in the basic industries, constitutes a major work of American economic history. The ten struggles dealt with are: 1877 THE RAILROAD UPRISINGS; 1887 HAY-MARKET; 1892 THE HOMESTEAD LOCKOUT; 1894 STRIKE AT PULLMAN; 1902 ANTHRACITE; 1912 THE LAWRENCE STRIKE; 1913 BLOODY LUDLOW; 1919 STEEL; 1929 SOUTHERN TEXTILE STRIKES; 1934 SAN FRANCISCO GENERAL STRIKE.

Illustrated with linecuts and halftones. $3.50

New Biographies

NEGLEY FARSON

The Way of a Transgressor

The life story of a remarkable American, who has, as rover, munitions salesman in Russia, newspaper correspondent in Europe and Asia, been embroiled in the chaotic events of two decades. "Nowhere," wrote Frank L. Simonds, "have I encountered a more vivid or more absorbing record of how people actually felt in moments which will one day be reduced to dry historical proportions. . . . Duranty called his book 'I Write as I Please.' Farson should have called his 'I Write What I Have Lived.'" 602 pages, $3.00

HENRY W. NEVINSON Fire of Life

WITH A PREFACE BY JOHN MASEFIELD. The three volumes of "Changes and Chances," the autobiography of this great war correspondent, condensed and arranged in one book. It is the moving record of a great life lived at the forefront of world events over the last fifty years. Already a modern classic of autobiography, it "furnishes to all the one indispensable interpretation of the period closed by the World War."—George W. Kirchwey, The Nation. $2.75

LAURA NORSWORTHY

The Lady of Bleeding Heart Yard

(LADY ELIZABETH HATTON, 1578-1646)

This biography of a great Elizabethan lady is a volume of such scholarship and vital quality as to rank with those recent books, THOMAS MORE by R. W. Chambers and J. E. Neale's QUEEN ELIZABETH. Lady Elizabeth Hatton, married against her will to Attorney-General Edward Coke, shone in the courts of Elizabeth, James I, and Charles I, and died a Roundhead. She shone equally in the courts of law, in disputes with her famous husband. She fought four bishops of Ely and was jailed for resisting the last. A glamorous and brilliant character, her story is a richly revealing picture of Elizabethan life and times. Illustrated. $3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY, 383 Madison Ave., New York

she does not love him; but he has no objection to blackmailing Krogh, and he is prevented only by his own lack of appropriate daring. Krogh himself, the swindler with coolness and nerve enough to be successful, feels his life to be empty and profitless, futile with the need for wariness against his fellows. Kate Farrant is better adjusted to her environment than the two men; but she too is nervous and weary with the unending strain of adjustment.

It is a fine technical device of the novelist to make the private thoughts of his characters dwell almost exclusively among old memories, the circumstances of a world which at least in retrospect shows coherence and stability and decency. In the minds of all of them is the constant collision, the impact of a raw unworthy present upon the mellow remembered past. "Deliberately she [Kate] turned away from the thought that there had been a straightness about the poor national past which the international present did without . . . in their class at any rate there had been gentleness and kindness once."

Graham Greene's social philosophy is inconclusive and unsatisfying. Constantly repulsed by the sterility and futility of modern upper-class existence, his characters cannot turn wholeheartedly even to the memory of their past—for the suspicion always obtrudes that the Victorian past was not nearly so gracious and meaningful as it sought to appear. And the future, it goes without saying, is for them only a prospect of infinitely extended futility. Mr. Greene neither hopes nor expects: that which is, is, and there is nothing to be done about it. But he does accomplish as much as he attempts in "England Made Me"; the book is a compelling image of corruption and decay. Greene never surmounts the immediate fact of a ruling class which lacks both personal ideals and historical purpose; he sees nothing that may restore meaning and direction to the lives of men; but he does reproduce, with clarity and conviction, a segment of the poisoned present and its sugar-coated memories of a poisoned past.

ROBERT LANN

A Quest of the Spirit

Autobiography. By John Cournos. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.75.

THE contradictions and digressions of life spun out in a world of disorder created in Mr. Cournos the need to discover a significant pattern. His "Autobiography," in spite of its studied informality, is the chronicle of a quest for spiritual order. Tormented by the cruelty and folly of the little men who strutted over the Western world of his day, Mr. Cournos sought to establish an inner peace which might enable him to transcend the futile gesturings of his contemporaries.

As a boy haunted by pogroms in Russia, as a young man bending before the machine in America, as a mature novelist bewildered by war madness in England, he tried to define his faith in a universe of eternally fixed values existing independently of ugly accidents. Though these values appeared to conflict with the mechanized world in which men were losing their way, Mr. Cournos chose to reject machinery rather than love and beauty and truth. He turned his back on materialism: "I had come into a world from which the last unity was going, the last authority, synthesis, and God Himself going. And there were coming into their place scatteredness, chaos, multiplicity, specialization, anarchy, no one God but every man a god-unto-himself, a fanatical irreligion with devotees dancing around the Machine."

The machine is the villain of this history; the spirit is the hero. It is the conflict, as Mr. Cournos sees it, between Wells and Yeats, Picasso and Gauguin. He despises behaviorists and technocrats and efficiency experts; it is not difficult to imagine his reaction to Stakhanovism. To the capitalists and to the Communists he cries, "A plague on both your houses." What religion is to the Communists, Mr. Cournos remarks, the machine is to him. He might have added that what, in his opinion, the machine is to the Communists, religion—the worship of what he calls "the eternal verities"—is to him. This accounts for his attraction to Hassidism, the Sermon on the Mount, the poetry of Yeats, and the personality of Gordon Craig. And it accounts, too, one may suppose, for the sense of frustration with which this book may leave many readers. For it is overwhelmingly clear that, compared to the difficulty of scrapping the machine, the problem of humanizing it through social control, great as this may be, is infinitesimal. Mr. Cournos's lifelong protest against the monsters of mechanism suggests the ineffectual flapping of Shelleyan wings. This protest is more than noble; it is tragic, for it anticipates death. The fate of older men, Mr. Cournos remarks, is to straddle generations which are in many respects poles apart. It is melancholy to reflect that youth is inclined to find Mr. Cournos's precarious balance a trifle ridiculous. The machine can't be bucked; it must be bossed. John Cournos's significant pattern is an interesting personal phenomenon which illuminates a phase of history. On the present and immediate future it throws only a murky light.

SAMUEL SILLEN

Shorter Notices

Mark Twain's Notebook. Prepared for Publication with Comments by Albert Bigelow Paine. Harper and Brothers. $4.

Mr. Paine's "Life" of Mark Twain, the "Autobiography," and the "Letters" have made the temper of the present volume so much a matter of common knowledge that its publication at this late date can bring few novelties to light, and comes as something of an anticlimax. The volume is interesting, nevertheless, as showing its author's private mind over a period of forty years, from 1865 to 1905; and as showing how little difference there was between this mind and his public one. The "heresies" are rare and mild, at least as far as their content is concerned; their style is another thing, since it often grows incandescent with rage or sorrow or triumph, and since it marks a number of passages here as among the best the man ever wrote. The "Notebook" will have to take its place, if a minor one, along with the three works mentioned above in any Mark Twain collection pretending to be complete.

The Four Georges. By Sir Charles Petrie. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.75.

In a book remarkable for witty insight and wise concision Sir Charles Petrie has set forth a "reevaluation" of the eighteenth century. Unlike the average historian Sir Charles does not regard the revolutionary years of George III's time as marking a distinctive break with the past, and sees fit, therefore, to continue the century to the death of George IV. There are a number of other things which he does not regard in the usual manner. He sees the failure of the Jacobite movement as an encouragement for mishandling the Enclosure Acts and as an aid in the establishment of the "religion of property," with Parliament subsequently becoming an organ of the rich. Incidentally he throws some new light upon the activities of William Shippen, the first modern "opposition leader." These early chapters establish the point of departure for a new thesis. With the advent of the age of reason (bourgeois variety) the author turns to the new urban influences which were accentuated by the prior ruin of agriculture. The textbook myth of industrialism ruining agriculture by causing landless folk to flock to the cities he explodes. He lays considerable emphasis on the cleavage of East and West in London and on the trends which would eventually help to create social-reform pleas and Victorian humanitarianism. Excellent material is included on related subjects, literary, dramatic, artistic, and "modish." A fine chapter on "the struggle for existence" is followed by a brilliant treatment of "the coming of the machine," 1760-96. This the author links with the decline of classicism and the emanation of romanticism—individualism reasserting itself against the new universalism. Alluding to nineteenth-century humanitarianism, Sir Charles adumbrates the background of those laboring conditions which strangely escaped the notice of the Society for the Abolition of Negro Slavery. His sympathies throughout are with the workers, the creators, against the stodgy, self-satisfied mercantile and industrial interests.

Mottke the Thief. By Sholem Asch. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

Mr. Asch's novel has very little in common with most of the fiction being written today: not only is it closer to ancient racial traditions than to contemporary attitudes, but it possesses qualities of vigor and naivete not generally associated with the novel as we have come to know it. And one may search in vain for modern prototypes of Mr. Asch's hero. Drawn almost casually, without benefit of analysis or social viewpoint, he yet emerges as a vivid and full-sized human being, capable of enlisting our sympathies even while he is doing his utmost to antagonize us. Mottke is a liar, a bully, and a thief; he brings shame on his father, breaks his mother's heart, kills his rival, deserts his girl, and lives off women—yet the reader is continually drawn to him, continually on edge lest he be caught, and suffers with him at the end when, betrayed by his fiancée into the hands of the police, he would seem to be getting only his just deserts. To create so sympathetic a character out of such antipathetic material—and to do so, moreover, with such apparent ease—requires talent of a high order. But this is not all: "Mottke the Thief" is further to be valued for its humor, which again is like nothing in the modern world, being of a distinctly peasant flavor—at once bold and sly, naive and worldly-wise, coarsely farcical and profoundly sympathetic, and always cropping up in odd places, like the touch of nature that it is. "Mottke the Thief" is not a great novel; for all its vitality it is slight in substance, and none of the other characters attain to quite the bulk and stature of the hero. But Mr. Asch's touch is so sure, his imagination so robust, and his attitude toward life so seasoned that this picaresque tale of the last century seems far closer to reality than many a novel of the contemporary scene.

Recorded Music

IT has become a commonplace of musical reviewing to praise Arthur Schnabel's playing of Beethoven, to say that here we are given Beethoven without the interpreter's getting in the way of the music, to call Schnabel in this sense the Toscanini of the keyboard, the virtuoso who has too much musicianship to play like one. It may, then, be enough to record the fact that the series of five concertos is completed by him this month with the recording of No. 2 in B flat. It was the first composed of the five, and though labeled Opus 19, is in style and content far nearer Haydn and Mozart than the Opus 18 quartets. That is how it is played. The rondo movement comes out as the merriest of tripping tunes and could be easily taken for even early Haydn.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by Dodie Smith
with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE

MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A Comedy by S. N. BEHRMAN with
INA CLAIRE OSGOOD PERKINS

GUILD THEA., 52nd St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30

• • • • ANOTHER NEW THEATRE NIGHT... presenting COMPOSERS' COLLECTIVE

IN A PROGRAM OF OLD
NEW COMPOSITIONS

✓ SUNDAY Feb. 23
EVE. 8:30
at the NEW SCHOOL
For SOCIAL RESEARCH
66 W. 12 St. Tickets 35c
$1.10 at Worker's Bookshops.

Elie Siegmeister, Pianist; New Singers, Chorus; Ian Adomian, Conductor; Marc Blitzstein, Pianist; The Gross String Quartet; Andre Cibulski, Tenor; Norman Cazden, Pianist.

New Theatre League Benefit

SUNDAY MAR. 1 CIVIC REPERTORY
EVENING MAR. 1 THEATRE, 14 St. & Ave.

THE THEATRE OF ACTION IN
"THE CRIME"
A New Play by Michael Blankfort
"THE LITTLE GREEN BUNDLE" By Paul Peters

Seats Now at Box Office and New Theatre League, 55 West 44th St. and all Worker's Bookshops 35c to $1.55

For those not yet convinced!

The HENRI BARBUSSE
MEMORIAL COMMITTEE
presents an expose—

JOHN L.
SPIVAK
Returning from Europe

ROGER N.
BALDWIN

Director, Civil Liberties Union
Rev. Wm. L. Spofford, Chmn.
ADMISSION $1.10 and .83
Tickets at Committee Office,
156 Fifth Ave. CHelsea 3-4739

FASCISM

"I Saw It There!"

"I See It Here!"

MARCH 4

Wednesday Eve., 8:15
PYTHIAN 135 W.
AUDITORIUM 70th St.

DEPRESSION ISLAND

By Upton Sinclair

A "kidding" of the troubles of America. Three men cast ashore on a tropical island, who come near starving to death because they produce too many fish and cocoanuts.

Theodore Dreiser writes: "Depression Island is marvelous satire; really, it is riotous."

Cloth $1, paper 60 cents, postpaid.

Upton Sinclair, Station A, Pasadena, Calif.

Next Week

The Nation inaugurates three permanent improvements

—the addition of at least four pages

—lively caricatures and satirical drawings

—new format and more legible typography

As usual we welcome the comments of our readers.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION 20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for one year for $5. ☐ I enclose my check
OR ☐ I will pay in thirty days. ☐ 2 years for $8 ☐ 3 years for $11.

Name _____

Address _____

2-26-36

Astonishing progress has been made recently in the process of recording, and no piano concerto published even two years ago can compare with this one in faithfulness of reproduction. Yet one could wish either that Mr. Schnabel had used a better piano or that the microphone had been more advantageously placed. Certain notes in the region of an octave and a half above middle C ring out as if a piece of metal had been used in place of the piano strings, while the different registers sound almost as if they belonged to different pianos. These defects, though, are minor matters in this authoritative and beautiful playing of the most infrequently performed of the concertos.

Almost flawless piano reproduction may be heard on the two records that comprise the Bach-Busoni Toccata in C major played by Arthur Rubinstein, a pianist heard too seldom in this country. The fugue is a lesson in clear articulation; and while purists may have some fault to find with some of the pedaling in the intermezzo, there is, after all, nothing completely pure to purists.

The London Philharmonic, conducted by Malcolm Sargent, accompanies the whole series of Beethoven concertos previously mentioned. This same organization, under Serge Koussevitzky, is represented this month by the Mozart G minor symphony. Again on account of mechanical progress, this often played symphony has never sounded so well on records. The delicate balancing of choirs in the second movement is particularly noteworthy. Too often, in less inspired hands, this movement seems to be only a dull prelude to the most satisfactory of all Mozart minuets. Indeed, the very excellence of the recording is a drawback to some extent, in that the woodwinds of the orchestra are shown up to be inferior to the strings in attack if not in tone quality. However, this is an unimportant fault and will take careful listening to detect. The orchestra is good, but it is not the equal of Mr. Koussevitzky's own Bostonians, who under the name of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra and under the direction of Max Fiedler have turned in the best orchestral recordings of recent months. You may be somewhat tired of the compositions, but for sheer brilliance of performance and reproduction try this organization's "Dance of the Hours" or Handel's Largo.

Almost invariably the recitalist in the concert hall requires the better part of the first group to warm up and to establish rapport with the audience. In a studio-recorded recital this difficulty is obviated; and so one may enjoy Lotte Lehman's album of Lieder from beginning to end without the nervous hope that she will surely soon reach her well-loved best. This recital includes two Lieder each by Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, and Wolf, and three by Brahms. With the possible exceptions of "Ungeduld" and "Anacreons Grab," all are un-hackneyed. The skilful accompaniments by Erno Balogh are kept in the background with almost tenacious modesty.

At its finest one could want no better Lieder singing than Lotte Lehman's—witness her performance of the Schumann and the Wolf songs. Conscience demands the report that heavy breathing and an occasional operatic attack on certain phrases of Mozart's "Die Verschweigung" and Brahms's "Meine Liebe ist grün" do not help the line of the melody. But the volume as a whole is recommended for the drama and intelligence of the interpretations and for the beauty of Frau Lehman's voice.

All records mentioned in this review are Victor records.

HENRY SIMON

[Mr. Simon's comments on new records will appear every other week.]

Correction

In The Nation for February 5 the price of "The Handbook of Marxism," by Emile Burns, was given as $1.75. The correct price is $3.

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · MARCH 4, 1936

NUMBER 3687

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

HAVE FAITH IN THE COMMON MAN	264
THE TAX DEBACLE	265
SPAIN MOVES LEFT	266
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	267
BUZZ WINDRIP—GOVERNOR OF GEORGIA by Benjamin Stolberg	269
THE BRITISH ARMS INQUIRY by Harold J. Laski	272
WHERE DOES THE SUPREME COURT STAND? by Max Lerner	273
A NOTE ON LITERARY CRITICISM by James T. Farrell	276
NO SOAP-BOXES IN HOLLYWOOD by Morrie Ryskind	278
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	279
BROUN'S PAGE	280
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
ON THE DIFFICULTY OF MODERN POETRY by Joseph Wood Krutch	283
TO THE DETRACTORS by Archibald MacLeish	284
EUROPE AS PORTRAITURE by Raymond Gram Swing	285
NECROPOLIS by Louis Kronenberger	286
BEAUTY AND THE BEAST by Mark Van Doren	286
REVOLUTIONARY MYTHOLOGY by Sidney Hook	288
SHORTER NOTICES	290
DRAMA: SYMPOSIUM by Joseph Wood Krutch	291
FILMS: THE MISUNDERSTOOD by Mark Van Doren	292
DRAWINGS: by George Schreiber, William Gropper, and Mabel Dwight

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

THE CHANGES WHICH APPEAR IN THIS ISSUE of The Nation should speak for themselves. We hope that the physical changes will produce the effect that was intended, namely, one of clarity, vigor, and legibility. The form was designed by Joseph Blumenthal in consultation with all the persons who help to produce The Nation. New features and extra pages have been added to meet the necessities of an expanding weekly. It is with particular pleasure and confidence that the editors announce the formation of a board of Editorial Associates comprising Heywood Broun, Alvin Johnson, and our former Editor and recent Contributing Editor, Oswald Garrison Villard. This board will advise on policy and planning and will bring to our editorial councils the varied social and political experience of its three members.

*

BATTLE LINES ARE DRAWING CLOSER IN THE industrial-craft-union fight whose outcome will decide the future form and strength of the American labor movement. William Green, with what seems more like bad temper than good strategy, sent out on February 21 an ultimatum to all labor bodies affiliated with the American Federation of Labor ordering them to have nothing to do with the Committee for Industrial Organization. "The Executive Council," reads the letter, "cannot and will not permit division and discord to divide the forces of the American Federation of Labor. . . ." There was no hint in Mr. Green's pronouncement that the question should be or will be decided by the rank and file. The truth is of course that the rank and file are massed behind the opposing line. The C. I. O. gave Mr. Green not one but three answers. It replied that the C. I. O. is seeking to remove the roots of dualism by making it possible for millions of mass-production workers to enter the A. F. of L. on the only basis they will accept—industrial unions. On the same day the committee announced its support of 30,000 radio workers who recently rejected the executive council's proposal that they become Class B members in the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. A day later the C. I. O. issued its third and strongest answer to Mr. Green. The eight unions represented on it proposed to him an immediate campaign to organize steel. They offered as their contribution trained organizers and $500,000, but they stipulated (1) that organization must be along industrial lines, and (2) that leadership must be such as to inspire confidence of success.

spire confidence of success. In the face of this terrifying offer Mr. Green at once scurried to cover. It will be referred, he said, to the executive council meeting in May.

*

IN THE NAME OF SOIL CONSERVATION, WHICH is apparently constitutional, the new farm bill manages to give the Secretary of Agriculture powers over farm output as broad as the AAA. It is provided that eventually the states shall take over the task of agricultural regulation; but until that time Secretary Wallace will remain the guardian and manipulator of farm prosperity. He is no longer permitted to enter into contracts with farmers to pay them cash rewards for not producing certain crops, but he may offer cash inducements on a voluntary basis to farmers who are willing to help build up the soil and promote its economic use by withdrawing land from cultivation, preventing its erosion, or improving its fertility. At the same time he is given the task of providing and maintaining a continuous and adequate supply of farm commodities at prices fair to both producers and consumers. The meaning of conservation was even stretched to include a provision in the House bill which directs the restoration of the pre-war purchasing-power parity between agricultural and non-agricultural "net incomes." Those farmers who have benefited from the AAA will no doubt welcome the new bill, and the Administration, by obtaining its passage, will not only maintain farm income but will prevent serious erosion in the Democratic vote. But to the tenants and share-croppers, who comprise two-thirds of the farm population of the South but whose vote, when they exercise it, is controlled by the landlords, the new bill may prove even more disastrous than the old. To be sure, two amendments protecting their interests were inserted in the House bill, but they are no stronger than Section 7 of the AAA contract, and it is quite possible that even these safeguards will be removed in conference.

*

AS FOR THE REST OF THE FARM BILL, TWO experts on the tenant problem, Professor H. Clarence Nixon and Professor Charles S. Johnson, have pointed out in a statement prepared for the Southern Policy Committee that it threatens even greater discriminations against tenants than the AAA. To anyone familiar with the workings of the AAA in the South, the measured words of the committee indicate all too vividly the unmeasured misery in which the cropper may expect to continue.

The changes in husbandry anticipated by the new farm bill [reads the statement] will inevitably reduce the requirement for farm laborers and displace more tenants. . . . It is possible for landlords . . . to divide their lands in such a manner that tenants will grow cash cotton crops without benefits, while owners grow the feed, seed, and soil-improvement crops which require less labor and yet bring government benefits.

"Is there no voice in Congress," concludes the statement, "to insist upon a sounder agricultural economy in the South?" On the contrary, Chairman Smith of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, when he rose in all his wrath against the House amendment, exclaimed: "What kind of fool thing is this they have adopted? The tenant and the share-cropper get it all now. They are given their share of the crop with no strings on it, while the landowner has to pay taxes and the cost of production, housing, implements, and repairs." Chairman Smith is almost correct. There is only one string on the cropper's share: it is exactly the same kind of string that small boys attach to empty purses on April Fool's day.

*

SECRETARY ICKES, WHO SEVERAL WEEKS AGO declared himself "the most enjoined man in America," has one injunction the less now and a good deal of cause for rejoicing. The United States Circuit Court of Appeals has decided that the PWA had the right to make a grant to Greenwood County, South Carolina, for the construction of a hydroelectric plant. The grounds of the decision are clear: the county has the power to construct such a project, and Mr. Ickes has the right to lend the county money for doing what it has the power to do. It should be difficult for even a hostile majority on the Supreme Court to find a way of torturing so clear a construction of the Constitution. Less clear is the decision in the Public Utility Holding Company case, appealed from Judge William C. Coleman's narrow ruling several months ago—a ruling amazingly partisan even for a conservative district judge. While the Circuit Court holds that the company's activities are intra-state (despite the fact that its subsidiaries sell electric power and water to consumers from Indiana to California), Judge Coleman's sweeping declaration that the entire Holding Company Act is unconstitutional is overruled by the Circuit Court. This still leaves the situation ambiguous. The clearest thing for the Supreme Court to do would be to throw out the entire case on the jurisdictional issue pushed by Justice Brandeis in the TVA case, and address itself to the more direct issue presented by the Electric Bond and Share suit.

*

THE COMING STRUGGLE FOR POWER HAS BEEN converted from a cliché into a present reality—and the power in question is electric power. Despite the fact that the associations of utility executives and investors are insisting that the TVA decision is strictly limited and may prove a Pyrrhic victory for the government (and there is much substance in their contentions), they are none the less terrified at the future. The prospect of a Mississippi Valley Authority, a Columbia Valley Authority, a Red River Authority haunts the waking and sleeping thoughts of those who fear for private enterprise in giant power. And it is true that the figures about the federal dams now under construction are formidable. There are thirty-seven of them, of which nineteen will produce power. The government investment in these dams is approximately a billion dollars, and it is estimated that 6,000,000 horse-power will be produced. The utility executives should be advised that the crucial problem is not the issuing of public statements but the struggle over the administration of the power projects. Already that struggle has begun among the legislators from the Northwest in the discussion of plans for administering the Grand Coulee and Bonneville dams. Among the competing plans are a state compact authority and a unified federal authority like the TVA. If only the publicity experts of the utilities could wipe out the efficiency with which the TVA has been administered, both in its construction and its operations, half their battle would be won.

*

FURTHER LIGHT ON THE ASSISTANCE BEING given Mussolini by American business interests is available in the January trade figures just issued by the Department of Commerce. Oil exports to Italy jumped to $1,238,500 as compared with a monthly average of $505,000 in 1934, an increase of 140 per cent; sales of iron and steel scrap were valued at $700,000 as against $186,000, an increase of 325 per cent; and shipments of automobiles, parts, and accessories rose from $61,000 to $127,000, an advance of more than 100 per cent. Since none of these items has yet been embargoed by the League, American sales can scarcely be said to be directly undermining international law. The same cannot be claimed, however, for the growing trade in contravention of the League sanctions. The growth in American imports from Italy from $2,764,000 in January, 1935, to $3,157,000 in January, 1936, tends to offset, to a certain extent, the loss of Italian markets in League countries. Even more ominous is the appearance, for the first time, of substantial American exports of the commodities explicitly barred from Italy by League action. Included under this category are shipments of crude rubber, of which none was exported in 1934, and greatly increased sales of nickel and ferro-alloying metals and ores. Meanwhile, our total exports to Ethiopia declined from $7,454 in January of last year to $866 in January, 1936. Neutrality, apparently, has not changed much since 1914-17.

*

ALTHOUGH THE SENSATIONAL REPORTS OF A new Triple Alliance of Germany, Italy, and Austria against the League powers appear to have been unfounded, there is evidence that Nazi statesmen are working overtime to find an escape from the isolation which the ratification of the Franco-Soviet and the Soviet-Czecho-Slovakian pacts will impose. Göring went on another of his hunting trips in Poland, and the Polish and German Ambassadors at Rome were both unaccountably summoned home. Renato Ricci, Italian Secretary of State for Education, has been talking with German officials at the Winter Olympics, and Colonel Beck, the Polish Foreign Minister, is scheduled to visit Brussels in the hope of influencing certain anti-French Flemish groups. Despite this frenzied activity the chance of a strong anti-League bloc of the Central Powers seems extremely remote. Poland, though desiring to keep on good terms with Germany, does not care to alienate either France or the Soviet Union. Personal animosities as well as fundamental rivalry over Austria are almost certain to stand in the way of a close agreement between Hitler and Mussolini. A Japanese-German alliance against the Soviet Union, which would not necessarily antagonize France and Great Britain, remains the primary danger. The recent raids on Outer Mongolia are believed to have been fomented by Germany in an effort to forestall the ratification of the Franco-Soviet alliance. Any apprehension that they may have aroused in Paris has been more than offset, however, by the glowing reports of the efficiency of the Red Army.

*

THE JAPANESE ELECTIONS ARE NOTEWORTHY chiefly for what happened to the minority parties. No startling upsets and no sweeping victories looking to a pronounced change in policy occurred, but certain small, unexpected gains and losses indicate that Japan has ventured a timid step toward liberalism and away from the reactionary chauvinism that has dominated the country since 1931. Five out of its twenty seats were lost by the party nearest to fascism, three independents representing the military super-patriots were defeated, and the Social Masses Party returned eighteen members instead of the three it had previously had. Industrial labor has become better organized and more class-conscious since the last national election four years ago, and farm labor has been in acute distress. It was inevitable, therefore, that the labor party should have made some gains. That they were as large as they were is attributable not so much to the proletariat's advance in influence as to the "pure-election" rules restricting the use of campaign funds, which helped to equalize the chances of minority and big-party candidates, and to popular disillusionment with the major parties. Otherwise the election was every bit the stalemate it was expected to be. Japan is left with the same rulers as before and with the real issues untouched.

*

THE PROCESSES OF JUSTICE WORK SO SLOWLY for Negroes that if justice is ever won by them it is more a matter of miracle than of retribution. The decision of the United States Supreme Court on February 17 in the case of Yank Ellington, Ed Brown, and Henry Shields caps a whole succession of miracles. The three boys were accused of the murder of a white man, strung up and whipped in order that a confession might be extracted from them, and convicted. Here the first miracle happened. One of the four lawyers who had been assigned by the court to defend them turned out to be a very able and humane white Southerner by the name of John A. Clark, who set for himself the task of compensating by his own humanity and energy for all the wrongs which his fellow-whites had inflicted on the Negroes. The second miracle was Associate Justice Griffiths of the Mississippi Supreme Court, who, even when the majority had denied the appeal of the boys from their conviction, read a magnificent dissenting opinion in which the entire story of the torture of the defendants and the forced confession was set down. The climax of the case has now come in an opinion by Chief Justice Hughes in which he sets aside the convictions. The editors of The Nation are proud to have printed an article in the issue of December 11, 1935, by Robert W. Horton, which told the story and helped arouse interest in the case.

*

A THOROUGHGOING INVESTIGATION INTO the activities of the Townsend plan was voted in the House of Representatives on February 19. It will be salutary to correct, if possible, the widespread fallacy, with which Dr. Townsend's aged followers console themselves, that the plan is designed to give them a stipend of $200 a month. The bill introduced by Representative McGroarty on April 1, 1935, provided for "a maximum of $200 a month." Anything short of this, down to ten cents, would be clearly within the intent of the act. Yet despite the gross deception practiced on millions of old people throughout the country, it is interesting to compare the Townsend plan with the National Social Security Act. The latter imposes a 6 per cent tax on pay rolls in order to provide for an average of $25 per month to about 50 per cent of the persons over sixty-five, or 3,750,000 pensioners. A group of economists who have recently quite properly criticized the Townsend plan for its absurd claim to be able to provide $200 a month estimate, nevertheless, that under the 2 per cent transaction tax proposed by Dr. Townsend 7,000,000 persons over sixty could probably be given $75 a month. The most important fact that the investigation could bring out would obviously be that necessary and just security to the aged should be financed not by a general sales tax, as in the Townsend plan, or by a tax on wage-earners, as in the present Social Security Act, but by a sharp tax on incomes.

*

THE NEW YORK TIMES, WHICH ADVERTISES its reputation for integrity, published on Sunday, February 23, a Madrid dispatch which was Hearstian in its combination of misinformation and distortion. It said that "bolshivism has been trying a new weapon in Spain," the united front; that "the united front has put Spain at the mercy of 3,000,000 Socialists, Anarchists, Syndicalists, and Communists, some of whose leaders and organizations are reported to be paid and subsidized from Moscow"; that "instead of opposing socialism, red agents throughout the world have been instructed to work with it." A reactionary newspaper is then quoted as an authority; the list of subsidies to Soviet agents is credited to "well-informed quarters in Madrid"; and finally, running out of authorities, the dispatch concludes with sensations whose source is merely "it was also said." The dishonesty of hiding behind "well-informed quarters" is only equaled by the distortion of raising the Moscow flag on a spontaneous mass uprising which anyone who knows Spain realizes was long overdue. The fact that the dispatch is signed by G. Ward Price, correspondent of the London Daily Mail, makes publication by the Times all the more reprehensible. No paper in England has been more notoriously pro-fascist.

Have Faith in the Common Man

ONCE every four years progressives in America find themselves thinking politics. And once every four years they find themselves tempted to believe that the choice of the lesser evil is still their best realistic choice. Why is it that there is no strong framework for building a united party of farmers, workers, technicians, and professional people—a party of the common man? This question comes all the more sharply in a political campaign like the present one, with a temporizing liberal arrayed against consistent reactionaries. We may follow John Morley in thinking that compromise is the heart of politics, and we may finally accept compromise. But that does not mean that we must confuse compromise with betrayal.

Many of our readers will remember the muckraking movement of a quarter-century back—a movement which ended only in feverish disclosures of the more revolting aspects of business enterprise. More of our readers will remember the thinned-out sequel of that movement in the period of Mencken and his followers, who used all their spleen and energy and talent in muckraking the American people. We are still tasting the dregs of the latter period. For that reason it is heartening to recite some recent events, picked almost at random, that may help us to rediscover a faith in the common man.

There are the new beginnings in the militant labor movement, represented by the efforts for industrial organization, the rank-and-file spirit, the leadership of such men as Lewis, Hillman, Dubinsky, Gorman, Howard, and Bridges. There has been a new strength and skill displayed in the management of recent strikes, notably the dress-makers' strike in New York, the general strikes at Terre Haute and Pekin, the marble workers' strike at Rutland, and the strike of the Newspaper Guild in Milwaukee. For the first time in American life newspapermen and college teachers and other professional workers have shown an understanding of what it is that gives them a common stake in building and retaining a culture. There are stirrings toward organization even among the share-croppers and tenant farmers of the South. There is, finally, a widespread insistence of the common people on peace and neutrality, a new understanding of what sends a country into war and what produces fascism, even a dawning recognition that the sanctity of the Constitution rests on the personal judgment of nine men.

These are only beginnings. They are, moreover, only the credit side of the ledger, and the debit items are legion. As beginnings they may not compare with the strength of the Labor Party in England, the recent victory of the left forces in Spain, the vigorous development of a common front in France. Yet they are enough to serve as an earnest of more to come, and enough to indicate that the landscape of American life is not as bleak and stripped as The Nation has at various times been tempted to view it.

Moreover, these recent developments are not isolated outcroppings but a natural and continuous growth from our past. If we examine our history we shall find that our culture rests not—as Mr. Morgan would have it—on the leisure class but on the common man. He has kept the predatory course of business enterprise from turning our culture into a shambles or a mining camp. He has insisted on free schools, free worship, free thought, and a free press. He has taken the "American dream," which business enterprise was making wholly an individualistic dream, and given it whatever collective stamp it has had. If his behavior in the present depression has shown a humility and a tendency to accept sheer defeat, it has also shown a heroic capacity for suffering. No successful movements of the common man are ever based on a human material which lacks positive qualities of strength and heroism. And there is no such lack in the American people.

When we have been weak, it is because we have been tied hand and foot to the slavery of those who make our shoddy ideals as they make our shoddy wares. We must now break not merely the economic monopolies that shut us off from making a living but also the monopoly of opinion that shuts us off from making a culture.

We have one thing that will stand us in very good stead in the long run. That is the tradition of progressive and democratic movements since the days of Jefferson. At times it has seemed that these movements have been wearisome repetitions of the same theme, retreading old ground in a familiar and exhausted way. And yet, carefully examined, the course of American progressive thought has not always swung back on itself. When it has come back it has been on a new plane. The popular movements of Jefferson, of Jackson, of Bryan, and of Debs have been the four high points in the life-history of American democracy. We have had successively middle-class democratic movements, the democracy of the frontier, the movements of the agrarians and populists, and finally the militant labor movement. Our task now is not to retreat from these but to find a way of combining them.

We are in a period of synthesis, when forces are at work making for a union between these various groups. Obviously, it will be hard to get started. For the common man has not yet learned that the identity of interest between him and his fellows is greater than the conflict of interest, and that the conflict of interest between him and the owning classes is greater than the identity of interest. It will take time and ever greater pain than he has suffered so far to teach him this. But he will learn in the end. He will learn that the liberalism of the T. R.-Wilson tradition from which the present Roosevelt descends is thin and pallid, and that whatever Republican liberalism exists is thinner still. He will learn finally that while organization is the essential condition of political action, more is required before he can take over the responsibility of governing America. And that additional factor is the detailed and realistic knowledge of how the going system works and what can be done to make it work better.

Have faith in the common man. But faith in him will not be enough. We must also help him to equip himself with organization and knowledge.

The Tax Debacle

REPORTS from Washington on the tax situation continue to be vague and unrewarding. One day it is rumored that the Administration will meet the growing apprehension regarding the budget by levying additional income taxes. The next we are assured that it will do nothing of the kind, but will confine itself to a reimposition of the processing taxes. These statements are so evidently trial balloons that we may be sure no comprehensive tax program will emerge unless public opinion demands it.

The incessant conservative outcries against the New Deal have served to conceal the fact that no Administration since the World War has followed such a dangerous and reactionary tax policy as the present one. It is true that the President pushed through substantial increases in inheritance and income-tax rates on persons of great wealth. But as The Nation pointed out at the time, these changes were of little practical importance to our general tax structure. At most it was estimated that the increase in revenue from the new rates would not exceed $250,000,000, which is insignificant compared with the billions obtained from the masses in taxes, direct and indirect, on articles of everyday use. In the last fiscal year the United States government obtained only about a third of its total revenue from graduated taxes, such as the income, inheritance, and gift levies. The amount derived from the stamp tax on tobacco alone was 40 per cent of that obtained from the income tax. Processing taxes, which are little more than glorified sales taxes on the necessities of life, brought in half as much as the income levy, while customs receipts were a third as large. For every dollar extracted amid painful protests from the well-to-do, the government has been quietly appropriating two from those least able to afford it. Although it is true that the rich are also consumers and as such bear part of the levies on consumers' goods, the relative amount of their income devoted to living expenses is much less than that of individuals in the lower-income brackets.

The Roosevelt Administration cannot be held entirely accountable for this unsound tax structure. The greater part of it was inherited from the Republicans, who achieved no noticeable reforms in the twelve years that they were in power. Nevertheless, the two primary tax measures enacted under the present Administration have gone farther toward redistributing wealth from the bottom to the top than anything adopted in the heyday of Republican rule. The processing taxes, for example, represented an extremely heavy impost on articles of which the poor alone are heavy purchasers—flour, bread, pork, lard, cotton goods, and, under the Warren Act, potatoes. The processing taxes are relatively unimportant, however, as compared with the enormous pay-roll levies imposed by the Social Security Act. At the outset, in 1936, this tax amounts only to $228,000,000, but it increases rapidly until it reaches the staggering sum of $2,783,000,000 in 1950, of which at least $1,000,000,000 will be borne directly by the workers, while the remainder, theoretically levied on the employers, will be passed on to the consumers in the form of increased prices. A more effective method of forcing the poor to shoulder the burdens of capitalist insecurity could scarcely have been devised.

If these vast sums were immediately to be redistributed among the working class, the net effect on the economic system would not be harmful. But apart from small appropriations, totaling $94,000,000 in 1936, made as grants-in-aid to the states for old-age assistance, child welfare, and public health, regular benefits will not be paid on the old-age pensions until 1942 or on unemployment insurance until 1939. The aggregate payments of old-age benefits will not equal the aggregate receipts in any year until after 1966, by which time there will be an accumulated reserve of nearly $40,000,000,000. According to the law, this tremendous reserve can only be used for the retirement of the national debt. Thus the final outcome of the Social Security Act will be to relieve taxation on the wealthy and to accentuate the maldistribution of wealth which lies at the root of economic instability.

Quite apart from the question of justice, it is evident that something must be done to reverse the present trends in taxation if the United States is to escape a repetition of the disasters of the past few years. The studies of the Brookings Institution have shown that the tendency toward oversaving underlies many of our economic difficulties, and that two-thirds of the savings in the country are accumulated by the fortunate few who have incomes of more than $10,000 annually. The indecently rich—those with incomes above a million—are fairly heavily taxed under the present laws, but there remains a great class with incomes ranging from $5,000 to $100,000 who pay a very inadequate tax. If this group were forced to assume a fair share of the burden, there would be no need to look elsewhere for a source of new revenue.

Spain Moves Left

THE Spanish workers and peasants have again repudiated the blood-and-hunger rule of feudal landlords who, minus a king, attempted to duplicate the old regime in the name of God, the army, and St. Ignatius Loyola. Given unity among the left group, such a result was practically inevitable in view of the relative strength of the organized parties, which were recently officially given as follows:

Socialists: dues-paying members.....	1,444,474
Syndicalists and Anarcho-Syndicalists.....	1,577,547
Communists	133,266
Rightist organizations, total membership....	549,946

The total population of Spain is around twenty-three million. Of these about three-fifths are agricultural laborers, share-croppers, and tenant farmers. Most of the land is owned in large estates, held by a tiny minority. There is only a very small number of solvent small landowners; all the rest are hopelessly mortgaged to usurers and on familiar terms with starvation. All the non-owning land workers are, according to the story-books, conservative royalists and pious Catholics; but direct conversation with them reveals that the most conservative are Azaña republicans, and they are exceptions. As a rule they are Anarchists, Socialists, or Communists, in that order.

The rest of the country groups into an industrial proletariat of about six million, perhaps one or two million petty bourgeois and professionals, and at most a half-million prosperous, upper-middle-class landowners and aristocracy. The six million proletariat are all leftist. The petty bourgeois are republicans, with a strong tendency towards anti-clericalism and anti-militarism. The conservatives, including royalists, fascists, and Gil Robles clerico-fascists, number at most one million. They were able to enter the government at all, during the elections of 1933, because the left parties all ran separate tickets and because the petty-bourgeois radicals (Lerroux) united with them. Spain's electoral law requires majority votes in each district, which means that an organized minority can and often does defeat several disorganized majorities.

In the recent elections three very important factors swung Spain to the left. First, there were only two sides to take—the labor parties and left-wing republicans on an anti-fascist program, or the right of church and army. The "center" was a complete fiction comprising government officials, the Lerroux party having disappeared in the ooze of dozens of "Teapot Domes." Second, there were 30,000 political prisoners, which led Anarcho-Syndicalists to vote for the second time in their lives. Third, attempts to introduce a kind of Dollfuss fascism had been met, a year ago, with insurgent resistance on a heroic scale; and that insurrection was the beginning of new revolutionary strength.

Let no one deceive himself as to the meaning of an Azaña republican Cabinet under these circumstances. It is a government that exists and governs entirely by virtue of labor support, specifically Socialist. The truth is that there is a split in the Socialist Party over the question of taking power. It is the Prieto wing, the reformist republican faction, that backs Azaña with real enthusiasm. To the others the present Cabinet is a temporary expedient, a power only because none of the labor parties so far have the strength, or the boldness, to take the power directly. None dares take it by itself, and the united-front councils are not yet strong enough nationally to assume leadership. The reason for that is the strong anti-revolutionary pull within the Socialist Party, and the strong anti-Socialist pull in Anarcho-Syndicalist ranks.

All the leaders are, however, suffering enormous pressure leftwards. The country is bankrupt, unemployment increases steadily, and in most peasants' and workers' homes the question of food is a daily problem. The demands for lasting relief, for jobs, for the merest necessities will either force Azaña to undertake revolutionary reforms, or force him out. In any case the position of the Azaña Cabinet, because it is composed mainly of the same timid men who dodged the job of land and labor reform five years ago, is extremely precarious. Except for the personalities involved, the Kerensky-October analogy has a good deal of truth in it.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, February 23

THIS dispatch might be captioned Bastardy in the Public Works program, for it is to deal chiefly with one of those projects that keep Administrator Ickes shouting, "It's not my baby! It's not my baby!"

There are a lot of projects that are not Honest Harold's "babies" even though he is both Public Works Administrator and chairman of the President's Advisory Committee on allotments out of the $4,000,000,000 work-relief fund. There are projects that no self-respecting man would want to claim as his own. The whole nation has heard about some of them—the Passamaquoddy tidal-power project and the trans-Florida ship canal, for example—but only a few of its citizens have heard about the one that seems to me the worst of all. I refer to the $30,000,000 Thomas Jefferson Memorial project at St. Louis.

The story begins back in 1934. St. Louis having elected a Democratic mayor, Bernard F. Dickmann, ex-head of the city's real-estate exchange, it occurred to a bunch of the boys that here was an excellent opportunity to unload upon the federal government some thirty-seven blocks of loft buildings and the like along the municipality's river front. They proposed to raze the buildings, park the area, erect in its center a Taj-Mahal-like structure, and call the result a memorial to the President who arranged the Louisiana Purchase. To that end, they had a resolution introduced in Congress appropriating $30,000,000 for the memorial.

It was an audacious request. St. Louis already had one memorial to Jefferson, a large stone building erected in Forest Park at the time of the World's Fair. Secondly, it involved asking approval for a memorial at St. Louis from a Congress that for years has been haggling fruitlessly over plans to build a Jefferson memorial in the nation's capital. Then, too, there was the breath-taking magnitude of the proposition; the Washington monument had cost about $1,000,000, the Lincoln Memorial about $10,000,000. The proposed Jefferson memorial was to surpass them and rival Bonneville Dam and Passamaquoddy. And there was yet another factor to be considered—the project's sponsors proposed to sell back to the government at $325,000 an acre land that the government had bought in 1803 for four cents an acre and sold to settlers at $1.25.

The resolution never got out of committee. Convinced that there was no chance of its being adopted, its sponsors had substituted for it a resolution creating the "United States Territorial Expansion Commission." It would have called for a "Thomas Jefferson Memorial Commission" had not Congress nine years earlier set up just such a commission for a memorial here, and at its last session given it a working fund of $15,000. Senator Clark slipped the "Territorial Expansion Commission" resolution through the Senate without effort. It encountered difficulties in the House, where members of the Thomas Jefferson Memorial Commission assailed the resolution for just what it subsequently turned out to be—an opening wedge for the $30,000,000 memorial project at St. Louis.

Farley the Fixer

However, when the resolution was brought up at a night session of the House in June, 1934, its backers there vigorously denied that the proposed commission would come back to Congress with requests for federal funds. They denied that the resolution was an "opening wedge," and they pointed out that it contained a provision specifically prohibiting the commission from incurring any expense to the federal government.

So the resolution was passed by a vote of 115 to 15, and the commission later brought forth its plan. After months of meditation it had decided that there should be a $30,000,000 Jefferson memorial project covering thirty-seven blocks of St. Louis's waterfront. The next step was to get the Missouri Legislature to pass an act enabling St. Louis to float $7,500,000 in bonds to help the federal government pay for the project. The act specified that St. Louis could issue the bonds when, as, and if the federal government agreed to put up $3 for every $1 put up by the city.

On August 15 last the commission applied to the PWA for $22,500,000, the federal share of the project's cost. Then, on September 12, St. Louis held its mandatory referendum on the bond issue. Although the PWA had made no commitment, the project's sponsors for weeks before the election closed their eyes to that fact. In huge advertisements urging the voters to approve the bond issue they asserted that "actual work [on the project] can start ten days after the bond issue is approved." These advertisements also said "the memorial will become part of the national-parks system and will be maintained by the federal government forever without any cost to the city." The chief argument advanced in behalf of the bond issue was that the project would at once create 5,000 new jobs.

Even so, the ballot boxes apparently had to be stuffed to carry the election for the bond issue. The vote went against it in the residential wards. It was the vote in the machine wards that carried the day, with 95 per cent of the registered vote being cast in some of their precincts and more than 100 per cent in others. Shacks without a single bed turned out to be the residences of from fifty to a hundred voters. The only organized opposition to the project came from the fur, feather, and wool traders and the other manufacturers located in the buildings to be razed to make room for the memorial. They objected to the expense of having to move into higher-cost areas.

With the bond issue approved, the project's sponsors put pressure on Washington for favorable action on their $22,500,000 application. September and October passed without such action resulting, and in November a delegation came to Washington from St. Louis to force results. At the White House on November 18 they were met with a five-page opinion from Attorney General Cummings that caused some of them actually to weep and all of them to go scurrying home. The opinion was in the form of a letter to the President. It said Mr. Roosevelt had sent to the Attorney General for scrutiny an executive order under which, on receipt of $7,500,000 from St. Louis under the terms of the state enabling act, the federal government would take over and construct the Jefferson memorial project. Mr. Cummings noted that the order did not say that the federal government would put up $22,500,000, but he said it meant the same thing.

He also said that under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 Mr. Roosevelt had power to issue such an order—if he had $22,500,000 to spend in its fulfillment. But, said the Attorney General, the President did not have $22,500,000 to spend on such a project, and his order therefore was illegal, because he could not commit the government to spending funds that had not yet been appropriated by Congress.

Then, in December, Mayor Dickmann came back to Washington alone and announced that he intended to remain until he got the project money he was after. He went to see Forbes Morgan of the Democratic National Committee. He went to see Jim Farley and Homer Cummings. He also saw Roosevelt. And he did a great deal of desk-pounding to force home his point that, if the Administration proposed to carry St. Louis next November, it would have to help Mayor Dickmann fulfil the promises made to the electorate there at the time of the bond election. The Mayor panicked them all, with the result that Harry W. Blair, an Assistant Attorney General, was put to work to find a way around the Attorney General's November 18 opinion. Mr. Blair, a Missourian and the husband of Emily Newell Blair, turned up the Historic Sites Act, passed last August, declaring the preservation of historic sites and buildings to be a national policy.

Cummings Said No

It then devolved upon the Interior Department to discover reasons why those thirty-seven blocks of waterfront property in St. Louis were historic. The Interior Department turned not to the standard historians but to the brochure of the project's sponsors, and on December 21 there issued from the White House an executive order finding that the St. Louis project came under the Historic Sites Act. Mr. Roosevelt gave nine reasons why the site was historic and ought to be preserved. Six of those reasons dealt with buildings. Four of the buildings no longer exist. Of the remaining two, one is a Catholic cathedral, the other a courthouse deeded to the city for use solely as a court house. (It is the house in which the Dred Scott case was tried.) The other three reasons had to do with events. At this site, said the President, the Lewis and Clark expedition "outfitted," and here the Santa Fé and Oregon trails "originated." The standard authorities on these last three happenings place them at sites from 20 to 250 miles away from St. Louis.

The story does not end at this point, for Roosevelt had to do more than find that the thirty-seven blocks were historic. He also had to find funds. To accommodate him, the size of the project was scaled down temporarily to $9,000,000, just as the $30,000,000 Passamaquoddy project had been scaled down to $7,000,000 for a starter and the $200,000,000 Florida ship canal was pared down to $5,200,000. It was agreed that St. Louis would put up only $2,250,000 at the beginning and that the federal government would match this on a three-to-one basis as the enabling act required. But the terms under which the PWA operates did not permit it to put up all of the $6,750,000 federal share. So the PWA's outlay was limited to $3,450,000. Mr. Roosevelt dipped into the WPA's funds for the $3,300,000 balance.

There are a number of other details that remain to be mentioned. One is that in order to scrape up the $6,750,000 for the boys in St. Louis Mr. Roosevelt had to cancel a commensurate amount of allotments to bona fide works projects in various parts of the country. Another is that the manufacturers resident in the project area are contesting the bond issue's validity, with the result that the whole project is tied up in the courts. A third is that straight across the memorial site there runs an elevated railway which is to be regarded as "a fixed and permanent realty" according to the instructions given architects submitting designs for the memorial.

Finally, there is the fact that five blocks from the project site is St. Louis's "Hooverville," a river-front community in which some four hundred unemployed families live in packing cases and similarly improvised shelters, denied decent housing by city, state, and federal administrations that have millions to spare for memorials to the dead, the enrichment of real-estate speculators, and the furtherance of their own petty ambitions.

Buzz Windrip—Governor of Georgia

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

WHEN I first met His Excellency he seemed curiously familiar. Then I remembered. I had seen his look in the illustrations of the Java or Cro-Magnon man in the history books, that queer gaze—wistful, calm, yet puzzled—which the artist always so miraculously conjures up from a prehistoric tibia, two molars, and a knee cap. His Excellency's face is round, dark, almost coffee-colored, flattened with a suggestion of Stone Age concavity. The mouth is wide, fleshy, firm, upturned at the corners. The nose is short and flat. The Indian hair is straggly. But the main thing is the eyes. They peer through thick glasses, cold and cruel, yet somehow groping for horizons beyond their reach. When in repose His Excellency looks withdrawn and dimly thoughtful. But when shaken by his deeply reactionary passions he turns ferocious.

After you get to know the Governor a little better—and talk to folks who know him plenty—it dawns on you that he is not really reactionary, say, like Mr. Hoover or Colonel Knox. He is fanatically atavistic. His bigotries are all primitive. His views actually are those of the Stone Age man. He really believes that there should be no relief a-tall—"Let 'em starve!" This does not mean that His Excellency has the simple integrity of his prototype, for his political set-up is like nothing so much as the rigged slot machine in a third-rate saloon. It is vulgar, shabby, and transparent. But none the less Eugene Talmadge honestly believes that Jeffersonian democracy, the perversion of which is his guiding star and his main source of income, presupposes a cave-man economy.

His demagoguery too is primitive, not cynical. It is a straight appeal to political sadism and economic brutality. Gene Talmadge is incapable of fooling people with a Share Our Wealth scheme. He could no more think up a crackbrained EPIC or Townsend or technocratic plan than could Caliban. He thinks not in plans but in bigotries. He hates the New Deal not critically but blindly. This, of course, may have something to do with the callousness of a federal administration which threw even as high a dignitary as one of the Governor's Cabinet members off the relief rolls, not to mention various lesser lights. This alone would have made the New Deal "communistic." Still, one must give him credit for disliking it on more philosophical grounds. He hates the New Deal because it takes a formally educated bureaucracy to get lost in its mazes. And he is violently anti-intellectual. The very thought of the Brain Trust makes him apoplectic. His ideal statesman is a dirt farmer, striding toward dictatorship with "grist in his gizzard" and manure squashing in his shoes. Eugene Talmadge is proud of the Georgia chain gang. He believes in treating every Negro as a perpetual helot and potential rapist. He insists on paying no more than five cents an hour to common labor and ten cents an hour to skilled labor under the State Relief Administration, which gives out no relief whatever. He paroled three prisoners to take jobs as strike-breakers. He is politically affiliated, on the quiet if possible and in the open if necessary, with all the leading vigilante organizations in the state.

To Gene Talmadge the New Deal is another Reconstruction, if not another Sherman's March through Georgia, and its officials are just a lot of carpetbaggers. Of course, he will also make a speech in memory of Lincoln in Springfield, Illinois. But that's because, in this cockeyed world, Northern Republicans, unlike their forbears in the 1860's, will help defray expenses toward a Cracker dictatorship in the darkest South.

II

His Excellency made himself comfortable in his favorite armchair. He stretched his legs, he licked and lighted a cigar and puffed a while. Then he proceeded to lose himself in thought. At last he pensively observed: "What Ah'll never foh'give Franklin Roosevelt is that he killed religion in the hahts of the American people."

It was obviously my move next. "Develop that idea, Governor," I suggested.

"Well," His Excellency continued, "Take Mrs. Talmadge there. She was always helpin' fohks. There wasn't a man, woman, or chile—white or culled—but what she'd take care of them." Two illustrations of Mrs. Talmadge's loving kindness followed. "But now," and for a fleeting moment the armchair rose into a stump, "now that every loafer has the guvment suppoht him and his fam'ly, Mrs. Talmadge and thousands like her need no longer exercise the chah'ty in their hahts." The stump once more became the philosopher's armchair. "Yassuh, the New Deal killed chah'ty. And chah'ty is all there is to religion, at least mah way of thinking. Roosevelt made a bunch of bums of the American people."

After this amazing syllogism, it seemed best to come down to earth. "What did you think of Huey Long?" I asked. The mention of the late Kingfish pleases Mr. Talmadge. For part of Huey Long—the able, daring, magnetic part—reminds him strongly of himself. It gives him the chance to sketch the outline, in a few swift strokes, of his self-image.

"Huey and Ah were mighty good friends," he began without fear of contradiction. And, indeed, Huey had helped Gene to the tune of 15,000 electoral dollars; had even made a vague deal with him to place him as running-mate on a possible third ticket, before he finally decided, toward his very end, that Gene was "too dumb for his ambition."

"Ah lahked Huey because he was able, fearless, had a lot of hoh'se sense and believed in doin' things." The process of psychological identification with the political genius of the dead dictator was almost visible. But, in his own eyes, Talmadge is far deeper than the Kingfish. He is also a political philosopher. "Of coh'se," he continues, "you must realize that Huey and Ah were at the opposite pole in our poh-litical philosophy. Huey believed in doin' ever'thing foh the people. That's bound to weaken their fiber. Ah b'lieve the less guv'ment the bettah."

In short, to himself Eugene Talmadge is a modern Andrew Jackson, combining the best features of the opportunistic talents of the Louisiana dictator with the Democratic libertarianism of Thomas Jefferson. It is as a model Jacksonian that he broke the textile strike in 1934—for an advance "campaign contribution" paid in cash to a go-between, of which more later. It is as a modern Jeffersonian that he put hundreds of workers into an open concentration camp by the use of an illegally executed martial law, which has never been rescinded, and which to this day makes it a crime in Georgia to picket within "a radius of 500 feet" of any national guardsman, no matter where he may chance to be. It is as a Jeffersonian Democrat that he advocates week after week the whole program of the Liberty League in the Statesman, a sheet of which "The People" is the editor and Eugene Talmadge merely the associate editor. And it is especially in the spirit of the sage of Monticello that he would "abolish all relief."

"But, Governor," I interrupted while he was getting excited about his favorite theme of "no relief whatever," "what would you do for the millions of unemployed? In New York City we have about a million and a quarter people on relief or WPA work. Without either they would literally starve."

"Let 'em starve!" His Excellency roared. "Any man can find a job if he really wants to work. Besides, there will be all the jobs we need if we cut out all this coddling and boondoggling for which American business is made to foot the bills, and which keeps us from recovery. Industry will go up exactly as we cut down on this taxation and let it alone. What you need in New York is not LaGuardia but Mussolini. A little castor oil would go a long ways toward starting the wheels of industry goin' again."

III

Nationally, Talmadge is losing steadily. He is a small central Georgia politician with delusions of grandeur. He lacks the crazed afflatus and the hysterical talents of the effective modern dictator. His imagination is not neurotic but just feeble. He overreaches himself not only in the long run but with every other step. And his fight with the national Democracy has killed his chances of succeeding Russell in the Senate. Not Talmadge but Roosevelt, Georgia's "adopted son," controls the state in its national orientation.

Within the state Talmadge is by no means dead. A rotten-borough system which enables each of the 159 counties to vote through an electoral college makes it difficult to defeat a demagogue once he is in, for the smallest and most backward county can always match three votes against the six of Fulton County (Atlanta). In his last campaign Talmadge lost only three counties, the big city counties. He may run, and may be reelected for a third term, though the constitutionality of this is challengeable, for recently Georgia changed the two-year gubernatorial term to four and excluded reelection. But he can go no farther than the governorship, especially if he is foolish enough to oppose Roosevelt in a preferential primary in March. He would be snowed under.

Yet for all his decreasing personal importance Talmadge is socially significant. He is even nationally significant as a symptom of regional infection. These next few years may grow a crop of such black-belt Windrips in the New South, Klansmen without the name, appealing to the lowest social passions, to racial and religious hatreds, and to the proliferating vigilante movements. These new Tillmans and Vardamans and Heflins represent essentially the same social forces they always did, but with a difference. They have learned from fascism. They integrate their bigotries with legal violence. A number of such Cracker governments with coalescing tendencies is quite possible. Indeed, the rising reactionary forces in the New South are pressing in this direction.

The New South has been "new" ever since Reconstruction. For, after all, the Civil War was fought to force the South into an expanding industrial economy against its own tradition. And this conflict between two civilizations, the native but collapsing culture of chattel feudalism and the imposed but necessarily victorious forces of modern capitalism, has been raging below the Mason and Dixon Line ever since. What really happened in the South during the last sixty-five years was that it was allowed the full autonomy of its indigenous bigotries but was colonized economically. That was the great compromise. But this compromise, far from healing, has kept on splitting Southern society. And the World War finally dislocated its entire class structure. The New South is "new" in that the split in its culture has ripped apart its ancient semi-feudal class relations.

The old ruling class, the plantation aristocracy, in whose name Southern culture still parades before the world, literally exists no longer. Not that it is run-down, shabby-genteel. It is dead and rotting; its corpse has never been removed by history. The descendants of the Southern aristocracy, in so far as they have not been assimilated to the American empire, are the petty Babbitts, the small half-educated professional and business and land-owning fry, with a White Womanhood to match. The Southern plantation of Stark Young's and Allen Tate's nostalgic imagination is in reality a Babbitt warren. The members of the quondam aristocracy form today the upper layer, especially psychologically, of the "poor white trash," and keep its racial obsessions alive. It is the pressure from this anti-proletarian top layer of the white masses which serves to exacerbate regional chauvinism and to deepen mass bigotry.

Of course there are thousands of civilized people in the South. But be they Southern-born or not, they are the products of the imperialist process which has colonized the South. The ruling class in the South today is just big business, Northern-controlled, and its personnel comes from everywhere. And both the ruling and the educated classes are now what they are by virtue of having come in contact with Northern industry and finance, Northern labor, Northern reaction or radicalism, and Northern education. Only their accent is Southern. Even the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, whose feeble efforts are so splendidly publicized, is Northern-financed and run. At last the spirit of Thaddeus Stevens has conquered the South. But, alas, this same spirit has gone Liberty League, which is encouraging and subsidizing the revival of the Ku Klux Klan under other names.

The situation, however, is far more complicated. As in masses will free themselves from their racial barbed-wire entanglements and develop an authentic radicalism which may yet astound the world.

In the meantime, however, the new demagogue is busily at work. He is the political pimp of the economic and social realignments and confusions, worse confounded by the economic crisis. He is the barker for the rising regional bigotries—hence his vulgarity. He appeals to the growing rural pauperism and disaffection—hence his fake radicalism. And he invariably sells his following, either for power or money or both, to the big Northern-controlled interests in the city—hence his corruption.

Of all these latter-day demagogues Huey Long was the all contemporary colonial countries a reverse process of profound radicalization is also going on. For while, in general, the Southern mill worker, the tenant farmer, the share-cropper are poor and ignorant, they have not been spoiled by the corrupting forces of Northern industrialism. The Southern worker who exchanges Tobacco Road for the mill village has not been emasculated by half a century of "pure and simple" trade unionism. And the Southern poor farmer has not been completely middle-classed by the politicians of the Northern granges. The Southern masses today are literally backward colonial masses, with all the cultural disadvantages but also with the awakening radicalism of their kind. When traveling in the South one is torn by a sense of hopelessness at its cultural backwardness but also by the conflicting sense of an almost revolutionary atmosphere. In the coming decade either this growing restlessness will be defeated by petty regional demagogue-dictators in the pay of big business or the white and black most brilliant and dangerous because he exercised the widest appeal by giving a good deal to the masses, so that when he finally got ready to cash in on his influence, toward the very end of his life, he was beginning to command his own price in terms of national power. Talmadge is the most brazen and cheapest of these post-war demagogues, and hence the most transparent. In Huey's case it was hard to tell, even for himself, just where his lower-middle-class radicalism left off and where his demagoguery started. In Talmadge's case his "radicalism" began and ended with a fake three-dollar automobile-license tax. This is why he has no machine and no mass prestige worth very much. This is why his recent "Grass Roots Democratic Convention" was worth just about $5,000 to Wall Street.

In the next section I shall try to show how Eugene Talmadge rose to power, and what for.

[Mr. Stolberg's article on Governor Talmadge will be concluded in next week's issue.]

The British Arms Inquiry

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, February 8

THE Nye committee had profound repercussions in England, and almost from its inception the demand was urgent for a similar inquiry here. But the response was of a kind to be expected from a man of Mr. MacDonald's temper and outlook. He set up a Royal Commission, but its personnel was both tame and old. It did not, for example, contain a single Socialist representative; its terms of reference were limited; it had no compulsory power to call for documents; and it was unaccompanied by any such investigation of the archives of the munitions firms as would prove the basis for an adequate examination.

The result is what might have been expected. The critics of the system of private ownership have presented a persuasive case, mainly based either on general principles or on such scattered materials as have leaked out in the last thirty years. It has been well done. The critics have showed ability, directness, a coherent point of view. But inevitably, from the absence of investigation, the case they have been able to make has lacked a wide basis of detailed fact such as would have dramatized the inquiry for the general public.

The commission has heard a good deal of evidence from the main munitions firms—Vickers, Hadfields, the Imperial Chemicals Industry, the aviation companies. But very little decisive material has been elicited from them. That is due to two factors. In the first place, since the archives of the munitions firms have not been opened, the commission's questions have been limited by ignorance of their inner activities; and in the second place they have been able to claim that whatever they did, whether in the realm of sales or of research, was done with the knowledge and approval of the British government. Two or three of the members of the commission—notably the war correspondent, Sir Philip Gibbs—have in a gentlemanly way questioned the witnesses with some closeness on matters of general principle. But I think it is a fair summary of nine months' work to say that things are much where they were before the commission began.

No doubt it is clear that the interlocking interests of Vickers with foreign armament makers is proved; no doubt the aviation companies sell planes to our foreign rivals; one company admits that its best anti-aircraft gun—which the British government has refused to buy—is largely sold abroad; there is admission that indirect bribery may take place, that certain agents of the companies have also, for periods of time, been correspondents of the leading British newspaper, that an occasional large subscription is made to one or another of the militarist organizations. It is true that Mr. Noel-Baker stated brilliantly the case for the nationalization of the munitions industry, and that the case against it was handled very feebly by the representatives of the armament companies. But it is almost certain that the commission will not report in favor of nationalization. If it did, this government would hardly interfere in the existing organization of the industry.

I have always been associated with those who were opposed to any arms inquiry set up by this government. It was bound to be an inquiry intended to whitewash the munitions firms. Except Sir Philip Gibbs, and he only in a very general way, none of the members had any special knowledge of the problem. The chairman is a very old judge, long retired from the bench; there are a distinguished professor of comparative law, a cooperator now well over seventy, a liberal ex-editor nearly eighty years of age, Dame Rachel Crowdy, who is an ex-official of the League, and some miscellaneous members of the type we usually put on a government inquiry. With no power to call for documents and no experts to cross-examine the witnesses, a session of the commission is a quiet and genial interchange of views from which the essential background is wanting. When it is over, the left will, quite rightly, say that the government prevented any real examination of the problem, and the government, with equal truth, will say that a most highly respected body of men and women have found that the munitions business in England—unlike, of course, that in other countries—has a clean bill of health.

We shall have to wait until after the next war to get at the facts. Until then nothing will appear to suggest that, in a general way, the munition makers do not act like gentlemen. They are all for peace, even though, as their leader explained, they do not think that war is the worst of evils; and they do nothing of which the British government does not approve. What is specially moving is their anxiety that this country should always have arms proportionate to the problems it confronts; the expensive research they under-

Courtesy of the Downtown Gallery
Merchants of Death by Mabel Dwight take is to insure that this shall be the case. Their patriotism is beyond suspicion, and any tendency to internationalism they may display is always limited by their acceptance of the license system imposed by the Board of Trade. They are, in short, a band of angels, almost careless of profit, who happen to traffic in dangerous materials. They sell their commodity just like other trades, but they are far more limited than other trades in the freedom they enjoy. That is the picture they paint of themselves, and in a general way I do not doubt that they believe it. I do not doubt, either, that the majority of the commission, when it reports, will believe it too.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SUPREME COURT

Where Does the Supreme Court Stand?

BY MAX LERNER

WHERE does the Supreme Court stand in this year of grace 1936, after exactly three years of the Roosevelt Administration? The headlong rush of the New Deal down the steep decline that leads to the judicial lethal chamber has for the time been interrupted by the TVA decision. The new role of the court seems mystifying and even a bit capricious to both sides. Wendell L. Willkie and his cohorts of public-utility executives seem dazed, like someone suffering from the trauma of a harrowing experience. It seems unaccountable and even a bit ungrateful for the Supreme Court, which they have been so warmly defending, to turn against its defenders. And the liberals, unaccustomed to such judicial tolerance, quite naturally smell a rat. While their joy over the continuance of the TVA, which has always been their fondest experiment in social planning, abates their zeal against the court, they dare not lap themselves in too deep a security about the future. They know that every Monday during the Supreme Court term the Constitution is refashioned.

This may be dramatic, but it is the worst possible psychological medium within which to carry on the business of state and the government of industry. It is the worst possible medium in which to attempt some sort of mastery over our economic drift. One of the arguments that has always been advanced to justify the judicial power is that it stabilizes the conditions under which American business enterprise is carried on and gives a certainty to the law. But this becomes very questionable in the light of the recent gyrations of the court. Neither the public-utility executives nor the social planners feel any certainty at all, any more than do the farmers or the workers or the holding-company executives. The Supreme Court is in a real sense an unsettling force in American life.

I do not mean to underestimate the importance of the TVA decision, and especially of the basic economic issues that were implicit in the case, although not passed upon by the court. Those issues went to the core of collective control of natural resources, and there are few issues more important than that today. But the irony of the situation is that the very importance of the issues was adequate reason for not raising them. An amazing amount of skill was expended in the government brief and in the oral argument of government counsel to prove that nothing very much was involved and that the case was no great shakes after all. And wisely so, for in legal terms it would have been suicide for the government to admit the social implications of the TVA program. Government counsel insisted on shutting their eyes to them. Chief Justice Hughes agreed, and said that all he could see was a specific contract and a specific case. Justice Brandeis went farther and insisted that try as hard as he would, he could not even see a case. Only James Beck and Forney Johnston and Wendell Willkie and other public-utility lawyers and executives had eyesight of undiminished sharpness. And Justice McReynolds saw with them. The implications of the TVA experiment haunted them like a nightmare. They even saw in what Mr. Lilienthal and his colleagues were doing in the Tennessee Valley a complete revolution in government.

The judicial fate of the remaining New Deal legislation is far from settled by the recent decision. If the liberals hope that the court is moving toward a broad construction of social legislation they are doing some wishful thinking. A single TVA swallow does not make a New Deal summer. What happens to the Guffey Coal Act, the Labor Relations Board, the Securities Exchange Commission, and the Social Security Act will turn on constitutional issues which either did not come up before the court in the TVA case or were deliberately avoided in the decision. Prediction is therefore difficult, especially in the light of the almost unbelievable about-face from the drastic Hoosac decision to the tolerant TVA decision.

Nevertheless, the abyss between the two decisions can be bridged, although the span that is thrown across is not a strictly constitutional span but one that depends chiefly on the logic of social realities. Quite aside from the fact that the Wilson Dam had been built through powers specifically granted to Congress, whereas the AAA involved more indefinite, implied powers; and aside also from the fact that the court saw it might look foolish seeking to undo what had already become a part of nature, there is the more elusive question of the social role of the court. When it invalidated the AAA program, which, whatever the benefits to the farmers themselves, was generally regarded as a plowing under of material resources and a form of social waste, it could pose as being on the side of the angels. But there was no social waste involved in the TVA program. On the contrary, its chief danger to the vested interests lay in the fact that it was a planned development and use of natural resources at the lowest cost for the consumer. If the court had dared decree against it, the judges would have found themselves this time on the side of social waste.

Thus even in the erratic course of the court's decisions some sort of logic can be traced, although it is not the logic that the judges give so much as the one that gives them away. In the light of such a non-constitutional logic how do the future decisions on the New Deal loom up? Failing a drastic change in the composition of the court, we may count upon the continued hostility of the majority of the judges to the social purposes, the economic premises, and the political personnel of the New Deal. That means that unless they are forced into a tolerant attitude by a growing popular feeling against the court or by some compulsion of the facts themselves, as in the TVA case, they are likely to construe every possible constitutional doubt against the government.

The constitutional doubts will turn on three questions which have thus far only partially been settled by the court. Two of them—the commerce power of Congress and its taxing and spending power—I have already discussed in the second article of this series. The commerce power, while it took a serious setback from the court in the Railroad Retirement and Schechter cases, is not yet beyond redemption. Moreover, the taxing power under the general-welfare clause, and the Congressional power of making appropriations are—given a favorable court—in a better position than the commerce power. Even the Hoosac decision did not actually decide the general-welfare clause out of existence. One of the impressive things about Justice Stone's dissent was the way in which he underscored the fact that the majority had made no actual decision about the taxing power. There was to be no doubt about that going on the record. The taxing power may still be rescued—given willing rescuers.

The third important constitutional issue, which might have been discussed in the Hoosac decision but was not, is that of the delegation of powers. To what extent can Congress delegate its powers to the Executive and to the administrative agencies working with the Executive? Although it cropped up sporadically, this did not become a basic judicial issue until the New Deal. In the Panama Hot Oil case the court for the first time in its history, with Justice Cardozo as the sole dissenter, decided that Congress had gone beyond its proper scope in delegating its powers to Secretary Ickes as oil administrator, and accordingly it threw that portion of the National Recovery Act out of the window. The court unanimously threw out the rest of the act after it in the Schechter decision, on the same issue of delegation as applied to the code authorities. A good part of the briefs in the Hoosac case were devoted to the issue of the delegation of arbitrary power to the Secretary of Agriculture, but the court did not consider the issue. It will crop up again prominently in passing on the power given to the Securities Exchange Commission in the administration of the Public Utility Holding Company Act. The basic questions that are always raised about delegation of power are whether Congress has given the agency so broad a discretion as to amount to legislative powers in itself and whether it has set up standards clear enough so that the agency can carry out the legislative will without making arbitrary decisions.

It is an interesting query as to why the Supreme Court has seen fit to revive the slumbering doctrine of delegation of powers just in this period of crisis. Perhaps the justices had grown to identify a concentration of power in the Executive with the threat of fascism. Perhaps some of them were more sharply influenced by a jealous concern for their own right to apportion powers among the departments of the government. Or perhaps both reasons operated to rationalize a deeper antipathy to the legislation in question. The convenience of the doctrine from the standpoint of the judicial veto is that thereby an act can be invalidated because of its administrative features even when the power exercised is within the scope of Congress.

The important legislation soon to come before the court falls roughly into four or five groups. The first deals with the remaining cases that concern the generation and marketing of power. Undoubtedly new cases will be brought to the court involving aspects of the TVA that have not yet been settled, but there is every reason to believe that the court will apply to the other dams the logic of the TVA. The only point at which the court is likely to limit the TVA program would be when the government sought to extend its activities in serious competition with the existing utilities. Since the attempts of the rural-electricification program to bring electric power to rural communities would not seriously damage the existing vested interests, there is a chance of their validation. The right of the Federal Power Commission to supervise the accounts and rates of companies leasing government dam-sites seems clearly constitutional as a consequence of the government's right to dispose of its property. There remains the problem of whether the PWA can constitutionally make loans to the municipalities for building their own power plants. The Circuit Court decision in favor of the government in the Duke Power Company case seems clear enough for the Supreme Court to follow.

In an uncertain world nothing seems more certain than that the Guffey Coal Act will be declared unconstitutional. This case will bring to judicial attention the attempt to cartelize a chaotic industry in which the interests of operators, workers, and consumers have been jeopardized by the maddest sort of cutthroat competition. The constitutional issues involved are those of the commerce power and the taxing power. There is no need for the court to rule that the mining of coal like the selling of chickens is not an interstate concern, but there is considerable likelihood that it will do so. For if the crucial character of the coal industry in the national economy and the consequent need for industrial peace in it gives the industry an interstate character the same might be held to apply later to steel, oil, rubber, automobiles, and other mining industries. And the court has in the past shown itself extremely sensitive to fears about the ultimate consequences of its decisions—what Professor Powell has termed “the parade of the imaginary horrors.” But an even more serious defect in the Guffey Act relates to its rather crude use of the device of the prohibitive tax as in the child-labor tax case.

The fate of the Wagner-Connery Act will concern labor. That also turns upon the commerce power. Despite the great solicitude with which the act limits the scope of the National Labor Relations Board to those problems of collective bargaining which concern industries engaged in interstate commerce, and despite the Congressional finding that strikes resulting from lack of collective bargaining “have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce,” it is doubtful whether the court will pay much heed either to a Congressional declaration of intention or to a Congressional finding of fact. This case would turn upon the “odd man” in the court, and there is little reason to believe that Justice Roberts, in the light of his recent record with respect to the federal power, would see fit to validate its power to establish collective bargaining. Of equally great moment to labor throughout the country is the fate of the Social Security Act. Two devices are used here—that of federal aid to states and that of the tax-credit scheme in the pay-roll tax for those states which provide adequate plans for unemployment insurance. The first would seem to be clearly constitutional under the federal power of appropriation. The second is more doubtful, and while it is a much more ingenious device than the tax scheme in the Guffey Act, it is not beyond the possibility of judicial veto. Its great strength is its similarity to the tax-credit feature of the federal estates tax: in form at least it may be construed as a method for avoiding double taxation rather than as a false-face for federal regulation. The chances are that the widespread labor unrest which would follow a veto of the social-security measures might be a consideration helping to turn the court toward a favorable attitude.

Finally, there is the problem of the Public Utility Holding Company Act. This involves both the commerce power and the delegation of powers. The struggle over it, as well as over the Securities Exchange Commission as a whole, will undoubtedly evoke the deepest tensions in our economic life. In these cases the known abuses of the holding-company device may be so flagrant and so persuasive as to cause the court to follow the more liberal tradition of interpreting the commerce act. This depends, however, entirely on the temper of the court. Whether it will hold that financial organization is something that transcends state lines will probably depend not so much on constitutional doctrine as on whether the judges are more responsive to the interests of the holding companies themselves or to the popular feeling against such a concentration of financial power. As regards the issue of delegation of powers, the court will have to settle whether arbitrary power has been delegated by Congress to the Securities Exchange Commission. Even the holding-company executives agree privately that immense talent was shown in the legislative drafting of the act. Moreover, the government contends that, given the amazing intricacy and refinements of holding-company finance, the standards Congress has set up for the commission are almost over-rigid.

Beyond the question of whether the New Deal is constitutional is the more far-reaching question: Is a controlled economy constitutional? I think it is clear that any system of genuine economic control would have to give Congress power over transportation and communications, the basic heavy industries, giant power, agriculture, corporation and holding-company finance, and finally currency and banking. This is a good deal to ask but thus far there is no indication that anything less drastic has a chance of success. Such control can be accomplished through a variety of procedures and expedients, including the government-owned corporation, the mixed corporation with government members, the device of federal incorporation, and commission control. Whatever the form, control has to extend to the important sectors along the economic battle-front, and it has to involve basic decisions on prices, wages, production, and social security. The very statement of the problem is a sufficient answer in the light of our analysis of the pending legislation.

In addition to the inherent difficulties of planning in a capitalist system, the court is the final obstacle. Thus far the forces which have sought to obstruct the shaping of adequate controls over our economy have worked largely through the medium of so-called constitutional law. Thus all our talk about an economy of abundance is futile in the face of the cordon sanitaire which the court has flung around us. For the immediate future at least we must conclude that a controlled economy is not constitutional.

The court has often been defended even by those who admit its economic bias as a guardian of civil liberties and a bulwark against fascism. This is the liberal counterpart of the conservative view which sees the court as the most stable force in our political system—something tough and enduring, something to oppose to the frivolous and the temporary and the passionate, something that is in the deepest sense part of our traditional pattern. But if the problem is one of finding social stability, it should be pointed out that the judicial power introduces a reckless and incalculable element into our governmental system and leaves the entire economic structure at the mercy of the judges' will. If the question is one not of stability but of freedom, the case is just as clear against the judicial power. If fascism ever dangerously threatens America, it will be not because of too strong an Executive but because of the economic chaos due to lack of planning, and because of a conviction on the part of the owning groups that they can hold on only by fascist techniques to a power that is slipping from them. A court that has been responsive throughout its history to the needs of business enterprise would scarcely cease to be so in a fascist crisis. If fascism ever comes that close, then heaven help us if we have to depend upon the court to ward it off.

[This is the third article in Mr. Lerner's series. The first two appeared in the issues of January 29 and February 19. The last article will appear two weeks hence.]

A Note on Literary Criticism

BY JAMES T. FARRELL

LITERATURE is to be viewed both as a branch of the fine arts and as an instrument of social influence. As a consequence there arises a duality which produces unresolved problems in literary criticism. For purposes of understanding and convenience we may divide human experience into two general categories, the aesthetic and the functional. The aesthetic aspect of human experience is revealed in the pleasure or the elation which we derive from things, from qualities, and from intellectual, emotional, or physiological states for their own sake. Experience in its functional aspect is concerned with objects and actions in terms of their use values. I use the phrase "aspects of experience" because I do not wish to establish a polarization of categories. Any complete divorcement of categories leads to over-simplification—and both in the practice and the theory of aesthetics and of literary criticism we have seen all too clearly the confusion growing out of such divisions and simplifications.

Generally speaking, aesthetic experience is a by-product of functional activity. Thus happiness and pleasure are the by-products of action and living. Pure aestheticism, however, reverses this relationship, and by making aesthetic satisfaction a primary consideration tends to detach it from the functional activities which generate it. Because of the sterility of this view and the extremism with which it has been advocated, the theory of art for art's sake has merited most of its present disrepute. Nevertheless, criticism of this point of view has also been carried to unnecessary extremes. The result has been a slurring over or an ignoring of the genuine problems of aesthetics; and at the same time criticism has developed a tendency to derogate aesthetic sensibilities.

One form of functional extremism is that of the Catholics who demand that literature and aesthetics become the handmaiden of Catholic theology, Catholic moral codes, and, recently, of Catholic Action. On the opposite side of the political fence is a group which indulges in a functional extremism of another but equally grievous sort. In this group are to be found the revolutionary critics who may be described as "leftist."

The Marxist approach to literature is largely genetic. Basically, it is a highly revealing method of probing into backgrounds, and of indicating the social origins and ideological relationships between the content and material of a literary work and the society which it springs from. Various Marxists, however, in pushing forward and interpreting the meaning of such slogans as "Literature is a weapon in the class struggle," and "All art is propaganda," have been guilty of the type of functional extremism to which I have referred. One of the results has been to give substance to the notion that such slogans exhaustively describe the role and define the functions of literature. As for the obstacles which invariably present themselves once this attitude is assumed in literary criticism, our revolutionary critics have for the most part overcome them by ignoring them or by minimizing their importance.

The nature of these obstacles can best be indicated by the manner in which the literature of the past is dealt with by the exponents of this brand of criticism. One young revolutionary writer declared in a speech that Shakespeare was a propagandist, citing as "proof" of this statement that Shakespeare defended British imperialism. Are we to understand from this that plays like "Macbeth" and "Hamlet" are, like the Singapore naval base, part of the defenses of the British Empire? And must we therefore discard the idea, deeply held through many centuries, that "Macbeth" continues to be relevant and "useful" because it is a profound dramatization of the phenomenon of the human ambition for power and glory, or that, similarly, "Hamlet" has value for us because it is a moving dramatic representation of man's disillusionment and indecision?

At this point it might even be worth while to consider a phenomenon which is well known except perhaps to the young revolutionary writer who discovered that Shakespeare was a propagandist. This is the phenomenon of recurrence in human experience. Even our critic of Shakespeare would admit that there is a recurrence in the experience of Occidental man. There are men among us today, glutted with the power characteristic of this stage of the world's development, who have felt as Macbeth felt when his cards were trumped; men of the present generation have experienced emotions similar to those to which Hamlet gave perhaps the most superb expression. Surely one of the values of these two plays is that they manage to express in dramatic and timeless language emotional experience which is recurrent in the life of Western man. And these values would still persist even if it could be proved that Shakespeare was an imperial propagandist.

In the same way Dickens has been cited as an illustration of the formula that all art is propaganda. Yet the truth is that the propagandist aspect of Dickens is not the aspect which interests us most. To discover Dickens the propagandist is not to exhaust the value of Dickens the artist. Today much of his propaganda is stale; we read him because we obtain from his books a sense of the life of his time. He created characters who exist in their own right; his work possesses also a pictorial quality, the result of his extraordinary talent for describing scenes and objects so vividly that we are aware of their contours and of their actual "feel." It is such qualities as these, which are indubitably aesthetic, that explain why Dickens still survives as a living imaginative force.

If these contentions be granted, a conclusion is suggested. Certain works of literature possess a value over and above their significance in relation to the material conditions and the actual society out of which they were created, a value which persists in time and in human experience. In other words, a work of art may have a relative objective validity.

How do these conclusions square with Marx and Marxism? We have explicit evidence that Marx recognized this aspect of art. In the final notes in his "A Critique of Political Economy" he wrote: "It is well known that certain periods of highest development in art stand in no direct connection with the general development of society, nor with the material basis and the skeleton structure of its organization." Marx then asks the question: Does Greek art not exert an eternal charm on us? And the mere fact that he asked this question indicates that Marx recognized that an objective validity may reside in a work of art. He goes on, in his note, to offer the suggestion that the Greeks were "normal children," that they represent the most nearly perfect development of the social childhood of mankind, and that just as individuals look back on a normal childhood with pleasure, so as a race we look back with enjoyment on the social childhood of the human race and the art that it produced. Yet it is apparent that our enjoyment of that art has no important direct and immediate value to us in the solution of the issues with which Marx, for instance, was primarily concerned. We, like Marx, derive an experience from the consideration and contemplation of Greek art and culture which is at least in part aesthetic. Greek art, in other words, has an objective validity which persists to the present day.

A further suggestion presents itself. There is a noticeable tendency for works of philosophy which are also works of art to retain only their aesthetic value in a succeeding era. Plato is a case in point. In previous periods Plato was a stronger intellectual force than he is today. He was a primary thinker who set the problems and tone of philosophical thought. Today he exerts influence not as a thinker and philosopher but as a poet and dramatist who used ideas rather than characters. The value of his work is largely aesthetic rather than functional; the dialogues are dramas of ideas rather than a body of working tools for the organization of knowledge and the changing of the world.

Proceeding, there are certain statements consistent with a Marxian hypothesis which can be usefully applied to artistic creation. The creation of art and literature is not an independent process taking place in a vacuum. This is a truism. It is another matter, however, to attempt to specify in any particular case the manner in which objective situations control and delimit thought. The relationship between end products in a society, such as art and thought, and the basic material relationships is not equal and even. It cannot be graphed in a straight line or expressed in a simple equation. To make such an attempt is to practice determinism of the sort which Engels drastically criticized in Feuerbach. For a writer to insist that economic factors have a direct, equal, and coordinate effect, and are an evenly casual factor in all situations, is to reduce the world to a most unrealistic simplicity. Neither Marx nor Engels permitted himself this easy intellectual luxury. When they stressed economic factors, it was not to exclude other factors that influence social ideals, culture, and art. Their writings must be taken in relation to their purposes and their times. German philosophers were concerned with such questions as "What is the basis of the universe?" Their answer was "spirit." Spirit meant an extra-experiential force; it was a new word for an old God, and by implication spirit was the motive force in the universe. Marx's materialism was a revolt from this doctrine; instead of indulging in metaphysical speculations or supernatural conclusions, he investigated the forces that operate in the material world. He discovered that a basic and preponderant force was economic relationships. Since he was writing at a time when philosophical dualism prevailed, it was necessary for him to underline his emphasis on economics. But this does not mean that he considered economics to be the sole factor. He conceived society as in the making, and he perceived that there is always present in social relationships the factor of change. The effects of one set of relationships therefore may well become the causes of the next set, and there is an ever-evolving network of influences. Hence cultural manifestations, such as formal thought, art, and literature, which are directly related to the basic material relationships upon which a society is founded in one era, depart from that set of relationships as the process unfolds in the passage of time, and in turn become causal factors in the general stream of social tendencies. Thus, for instance, the philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas is today a social influence. So, too, is that of Spinoza. And just as the creative literature of past epochs has survived into the present, at least some of the art of the present may be expected to retain validity after the processes of history have washed aside or solved the problems created by the needs and the conditions of capitalist democracy.

What then becomes of the terms "bourgeois" and "proletarian" in their application to art and thought? With some critics and reviewers it has been sufficient to apply either of these terms to a work of literature in order to arrive at a judgment upon it. Others have attempted to analyze the differences between "bourgeois" literature and "proletarian" literature, and have predicted what proletarian literature would be, how some day it would develop proletarian Prousts greater than Proust.

And then shortly afterward they have treated their prophecies as if they were fact, and compared the "bourgeois" literature that has been produced with the "proletarian" literature that they hoped to see produced, as if both were actually existent. A more important task of critics and commentators is, it seems to me, to study proletarian literature in the present, to evaluate it, to perceive the manner in which it is influenced by bourgeois literature.

[A continuation of this discussion by Mr. Farrell will appear next week.]

No Soap-Boxes in Hollywood

BY MORRIE RYSKIND

Hollywood, February 21]

THERE are two fair indictments to be brought against Hollywood: one is, to use the industry's favorite adjective, its colossal ignorance of current political happenings; the other is the shocking cowardice to be found in high places. What I hope to do in this article is explain the first of these, for which there is a reason; and to argue against the second, for which there is no reason at all.

Let me start by telling you there are no soap-boxes in Hollywood. That is a significant and dismaying fact to a born New Yorker, whose first wails do not interrupt the political argument between the doctor who is delivering him and the attending nurse; who grows up watching the crowd heckling the Socialist speaker at the corner; who, in his maturer years, can get a hot discussion on the merits of Tammany from his lawyer, his broker, his barber, and his wife. I do not contend, mind you, that any of this talk has any intrinsic merit, but I do contend that it is better than no talk at all.

Not—heaven knows!—that you can't get talk in Hollywood. Everybody can tell you what "Mutiny on the Bounty" did in its third week in New York; and anybody can tell you who is to be the new head of Paramount now that Lubitsch is out; further, if you're interested, everybody has a good tip on the races. Well, not a good tip exactly, but a tip. But, very definitely, Hollywood is not politically minded. Of current events it knows practically nothing. It knows that the Prince of Wales is now Edward VIII, and that Italy and Ethiopia are at war; that, however, about sums it up. Mention the California criminal-syndicalism act, the pending Tydings-McCormack disaffection bill, or the Kramer sedition bill (the latter introduced by California's own contribution to Washington), and you will get nothing but a blank look. Not even a dirty look—just plain blank. Once—this was before I had learned—I mentioned the Scottsboro case to my hostess, and she wanted to know who was playing in it.

Now there's an explanation for this, and it isn't the old, convenient bromide that Hollywood is made up of morons. I have met directors, writers, stars, supervisors, producers, and even song writers whose intelligence is not to be questioned. But they're in Hollywood. And Hollywood is essentially a summer resort—an all-year summer resort.

You know what happens in a summer resort. People check their thinking caps and go in for some fun. They relax. Everybody relaxes—even strict Marxians, I am reliably informed, relax at summer resorts. Walter Lippmann relaxes. The editors of The Nation relax—and a pretty sight it is, too, they tell me. Even Morris Ernst relaxes. If such people can't help relaxing, how can Hollywood avoid succumbing to its climate? Especially when it is compelled, against nature, to produce an enormous number of pictures for the public? From nine to five writers write against time, directors direct against time, producers produce against budgets. If you're a writer under contract to turn out six scripts a year, or a director who gets on the set at eight in the morning, or an actor who has to be made up by the same time, or a producer who has to worry about six pictures at once, you do not at the end of the working day rush to find out how the ship of state is faring. You go home and take a shower, you have a cocktail and eat your dinner, and you are ready for an evening of intensive relaxation.

The only chance you would have to get any news would be from the newspapers. But the newspapers here are small-time, summer-resort newspapers. There are three that are important—the two Hearst papers and the Los Angeles Times. I can describe their editorial policies only by telling you that, compared to them, the New York Herald Tribune is edited by Mike Gold, and the New York Sun by John Strachey. I find them invaluable when I decide to look at the stock market. For my daily news I get, three days late, the New York Times and Herald Tribune.

So, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, I hope I have made it clear to you why Hollywood is not politically minded.

I had another point. About the people who do read the news and therefore know what's going on. Ever so many of them will discuss things with you and then add, "Of course, you won't quote me." If you ask them to serve on a committee for a cause they profess to be devoutly interested in, they hastily beg off. They are afraid.

I am constantly amazed that people earning between $25,000 and $100,000 yearly can be afraid. I can understand the poor devil with just enough each day to pay for his meals and his roof being afraid for his job. The thing I cannot understand is cringing and cowardice from people who have enough and more than enough; but if ever I met a wage slave, it was not in the lodging-houses of the poorly paid but in the luxurious palaces of Beverly Hills.

And the pity of it is that their fear is so unnecessary. They are not only cowardly but stupid in their fear of a fascism that doesn't exist. Hollywood is so unpolitically minded that the boss doesn't give a damn what you think as long as you do your work. If Irving Thalberg ever fires Groucho Marx, it won't be because Groucho subscribes to The Nation, but because that next picture isn't a money-maker.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE latest news from Germany proves that there is to be no let-up in the torture of the Jews, whatever the soft-pedaling of their persecutors for the moment because of the Olympic games. Fortunately, the killing of the Nazi propaganda chief in Switzerland, Wilhelm Gustloff, by a young Jew has not as yet had the serious effects at first feared; these may come later. But if this incident is not exploited to the full, other things will be; it is the easiest thing in the world to stage an "atrocious." Meanwhile the mental and spiritual and physical degradation of the Jews goes on. The publication of the vile and obscene Stürmer and its posting in the most conspicuous places offer positive proof of the willingness of Hitler to have his government identified with a persecution which for calculated brutality and fiendishness surpasses anything in modern history—the pogroms of the Czar were more merciful since they usually killed outright or maimed and then passed by.

The cowardice of the Hitler policy is beyond words. I have already pointed out that the whole persecution is a confession of the superior ability of the German Jews. There were never more than 625,000 Jews in Germany, and if from these the sick, the paupers, the imprisoned, the aged, and the children are excluded, there certainly cannot remain more than 450,000 able-bodied adults, men and women; yet Hitler would have us believe that these 450,000 led his "great and heroic" people by the nose, degraded their literature, befouled their public life, made the World War, made the treaty of peace, stabbed the army in the back, and were responsible for every ill which Germany has encountered. That all this is the gravest reflection on the German nation Hitler and his associates cannot see. And now he declares that the last Jew must be driven out of Germany because the Germans are so susceptible to the poisoned virus of the Jew that Germany will not be safe from cultural and moral degradation as long as one of the race remains on German soil! Was there ever anything so preposterous? Hitler and his associates declare that they are the reincarnation of the legendary German heroes. If they were they would certainly never take advantage of their overwhelming power to abuse and maltreat and degrade a small minority group among 62,000,000 people, a group which cannot strike back, cannot defend itself, and is gradually being reduced to the point where its members cannot even earn a decent living as they are excluded from all the professions, from the trades, and from the labor unions.

To me this is so dreadful a happening that if all the rest of the Hitler regime commended itself to sane and liberal men, I should never for a moment forgive it. The poisoning of the lives of the Jewish children is not the gravest count in the indictment. Even worse is the poisoning of the souls of the rest of the German youth by the inculcation of hatred, prejudice, and sadistic cruelty. What is the use of having Hitler youth movements to teach the German youth manliness, consideration for others, kindliness, and nobility of mind and conduct? All that is offset by telling these children that there is at least one group in the community upon which they can wreak their wills as sadistically as they please, to be applauded therefor by everybody from the Führer down. Of course the Jews are not the only group that is beyond the pale. The Communists, too, are fair game for anybody who wishes to denounce them or attack them. Only they are not so clearly marked a group. It isn't so easy to single them out and to stick barbs into their souls and bodies. One can't get from them the same exquisite pleasure as from watching a child wince while one makes him acquainted with the fact that he is the scum of the earth, that his blood is tainted, and that his touch defiles everybody with whom he comes in contact.

Well, I hear it asked, what is the use of rehearsing this horror? The use is that as long as these things go on there must be protests against them if we are to keep our self-respect. If there is no criticism, these horrors will spread; they are already well under way in Poland. More than that, we are getting reflexes in the United States. I know that Archibald MacLeish has written encouragingly in Fortune about the American situation; still there are plenty of signs of underhand and insidious propaganda. I have on my desk a pamphlet, widely circulated here, which solemnly asserts that the blood of the Jew turns yellow when it is spilled—curious that that phenomenon wasn't noticed in the World War. I confess my dismay that there is so little indignant reaction to the growing anti-Semitism here. It makes me want to get out on the street corner on a soap-box and beg my fellow-countrymen to realize that to go on with this sort of thing will pollute and befoul their souls.

Perhaps when I use such words as "pollute" and "befoul" I shall be charged with writing immoderately. I had an ancestor who was denounced for using violent language about human slavery and advised to be less severe. He replied: "On this subject I do not wish to think, or speak, or write with moderation. No! no! Tell a man whose house is on fire to give a moderate alarm; tell him to moderately rescue his wife from the hands of the ravisher; tell the mother to gradually extricate her babe from the fire into which it has fallen; but urge me not to use moderation in a cause like the present." I echo these words when it comes to the persecution of any group and today, especially, the Jews.

BROUN'S PAGE

THEY held a Congress of Artists in New York a few days ago and it started with a lot of speeches in Town Hall. I made one of them. Of course, I got into an Artists' Congress merely as a fellow-traveler. They told me to talk about the possibility of painters coming together along trade-union lines.

Now the detail of that might present many difficulties, and yet it seems to me that art in America must go left or continue to stand and dwindle resolutely in the same spot. This is said all the more sincerely because it is in part an apology. I wrote a column in a newspaper announcing in that dogmatic way which newspaper columnists assume that there had never been a painter of any consequence in America, and that in all probability there never would be.

It just doesn't seem to be a natural form of expression north of the Rio Grande. But once you get into Mexico you see some old Indian who never took a lesson in his life or read a single article by Royal Cortissoz hammering away at silver and sticking in turquoise at appropriate places in a most magnificent manner. Even when the blanket he wants to sell you is a fake, he had at least the artistic sense to buy the best the chain store had to offer. And once you get to a Mexican public building which has a blank wall to offer, you will find a dozen masters struggling to express themselves in color. There are at least three Mexican painters who do not need to doff their hats to any of the dead.

But I am informed, and probably correctly, that this surge of form and color across the border is not justly attributed to native genius alone. It is a response, an artistic liberation, which comes out of the very economic fermentation of Mexico. The worker has begun to get some sense of his own world beneath his feet. And so it would be here, once the ice jam broke. One log leaps free and the rest begin to dance.

Yes, I think that's true because painting has been fed in America upon a wine which is rare and also watery. The vintage is called taste. It has been accepted as valuable merely because there has been so little of it. Sometimes it is accompanied by emotion, but mostly not. Mr. Morgan the elder used to buy old masters in wholesale lots. The younger head of the house seemed to have aesthetic yearnings when he was investigated in Washington. But they may have been lightly rooted. The reigning Mr. Morgan does not necessarily become a poet because he spoke of the color of the heather in Scotland. Nor should he be elevated to the ranks of critics on the mere strength of the fact that he has from time to time bought a picture.

It would be silly, I'll admit, to contend that all the products of what Upton Sinclair called "Mammon Art" are necessarily bad. Under the patronage of the church there did emerge some men of genius. But even the church had a much broader base than a little group of private collectors. The successful sculptor or painter today must land one or two big fish or perish. And if he does land them he will probably perish spiritually in any case. Nobody can do a good job if he carries constantly with him the idea, "This must be the sort of picture that Mrs. Beamish likes or Junior won't be able to get to college next year."

I am aware that there are portrait painters who pretend a great arrogance to their prospective sitters. They will boast of the manner in which they turned down a commission or left a job in the middle because the lady of the house endeavored to get hoity-toity. Such things have happened, but they are not the rule. When a successful painter takes up his kit of tools and goes home in a high dudgeon it is not the tallest tower which he quits but one of the lesser mansions standing well below the great white house on the hill.

If we are to have better painters we must have better audiences and much bigger ones. There will have to be a contact between those capable of feeling excitement and those capable of creating it. To be specific, I think it would be an excellent idea if the United Mine Workers of America gave a prize at their convention two years hence for the best painting of a mine or miners. The prize could be any kind of laurel you please. I honestly think that sort of award might well be the proudest possession a painter could win.

It may be argued that as a rule trade-union members have not had the chance to study art forms, and that they wouldn't be interested. The study of art forms does not seem to me a necessary background, and whenever you get seventeen hundred up-and-coming men gathered together you have a reservoir of emotion which makes the taste of one or two connoisseurs seem pretty fragile. A roar of welcome from seventeen hundred workers ought to put more energy back into the marrow of any painter than a well-modulated "interesting color" dropped over his right shoulder.

Painting must be about something. It must be done by people who are hot and burning and very much bothered. You can't get art from contented cows, and you can't even give it to an equally bovine audience. Of course the same thing is true of writing and acting. No theater of any consequence can be built upon audiences which don't care much one way or the other about anything. Naturally I am not contending that everything which goes under the name of "proletarian art" is good. Some of it is terrible. But it is the beginning of wisdom. Even in the lesser crafts this is true. I'm getting a little bit tired of having people say to me, "You do your best columns when you're mad." The answer is, "Who doesn't?" In a burning world anybody who has any pretensions to any kind of artistic expression must make his choice. He can be either a fireman or a fiddler.

HEYWOOD BROUN

COLSTON WARNE

President

JAMES GILMAN

Vice President

FRANK PALMER

Secretary

ADELAIDE SCHULKIND

Treasurer

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

ROBERT BRADY
HEYWOOD BROWN
OSMOND K. FRAENKEL
A. J. ISSERMAN
ARTHUR KALLET
CHARLES A. MARLIES
DEWEY PALMER
A. PHILIP RANDOLPH
BERNARD REIS
ROSE SCHNEIDERMAN

the Officers and a staff representative

ARTHUR KALLET

Director

DEWEY PALMER

Technical Supervisor

SPONSORS

ROBERT S. ALLEN
WILLARD E. ATKINS
JACOB BAKER
SAM BAKON
EDWARD BERMAN
PAUL BLANSHARD
S. JOHN BLOCK
LOUIS BOUDIN
LEROY E. BOWMAN
LEONARD BRIGHT
MRS. JAMES CAMPBELL
WINIFRED CHAPPELL
MALCOLM COWLEY
MARY WARE DENNETT
CARL DREHER
ROBERT DUNN
WALTER FRANK VARIAN FRY
MRS. KATE CRANE GARTZ
ELISABETH GILMAN
ABRAHAM GOLDFORB
FRANCIS GORMAN
MRS. J. C. GUGGENHEIMER
LOUIS M. HACKER
MATHILDE HADER
HERBERT C. HANSON
HENRY HARAP
ABRAM L. HARRIS
BENJAMIN HARROW
ALBION HARTWELL
ALINE DAVIS HAYS
ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS
JULIUS HOCHMAN
DARLINGTON HOOPES
QUINCY HOWE
RABBY EDWARD ISRAEL
GARDNER JACKSON
ALVIN JOHNSON
MATTHEW JOSEPHSON
HORACE M. KALLEN
ELLEN KENNAN
HAROLD LOEB
GRACE LUMPKIN
ROBERT S. LYND
ERNEST L. MEYER
CLYDE MILLER
GARDNER MURPHY
VINCENT J. MURPHY
WILLIAM J. MURPHY
THEODORE NEWCOMB
WILLIAM NUNN
HARRY A. OVERSTREET
PAUL PETERSON
EVELYN PRESTON
LESLIE PRESTON
MRS. JACOB RIIS
I. M. RUBINOW
GEORGE SELDES
THEODORE SHEDLOVSKY
MRS. DATUS C. SMITH
A. W. SOPER
ANNA LOUISE STRONG
CLINTON J. TAFT
LEWIS M. TERMAN
MAX TRUMPER
MARION S. VAN LIEW
HAROLD WARD
GOODWIN WATSON
HELEN WOODWARD
LEANE ZUGSMITH

Announcing A NEW CONSUMER ORGANIZATION

CONSUMERS UNION OF UNITED STATES, INC.

FORMED in response to a nationwide demand for a democratically-controlled, pro-labor consumer service, the CONSUMERS UNION of United States has been organized on a non-profit, membership basis:

1. To provide information in simple, usable form, on consumers' goods, covering quality, price and, wherever possible, labor conditions surrounding the production of such goods.
2. To work with cooperatives, other consumer groups and trade unions in advancing the welfare of consumers.
3. To aid consumers in all matters relating to the expenditure of income.

The establishment of CONSUMERS UNION was initiated by the Association of Consumers' Research Subscribers. Originally formed to attempt a fair settlement of the strike at Consumers' Research, the Association turned its attention to a new organization when it became clear that there was no hope of bringing about its original purposes through appeal to the director of Consumers' Research. The strike emphasized the need which already existed for a pro-labor consumer organization, functioning on a broad social base, democratically controlled, and serving especially the worker, the low-salaried employee, and the housewife.

For over a month a staff of fourteen former CR strikers—experts in their fields—have been at work conducting and supervising technical research and preparing material for the first of CONSUMERS UNION's publications, to be ready for members in the latter part of March.

CONSUMERS UNION needs, and believes it deserves, the support of every progressive and liberal-minded person. To build a first-rate consumers' organization from the ground up; to establish a permanent consumers' laboratory; to reach the thousands of people who heretofore have had no access to consumer information, but to whom the unwise spending of even one penny out of an inadequate income is a serious matter—to do all this takes money. The initial support for this enterprise must come from those who are already convinced of the need for it.

Membership in CONSUMERS UNION entitles you to a vote in the control of the organization, and to one of the following services:

$3 A full service giving reports on essential commodities, such as food, clothing, shelter and medicine, and in addition information and reports on a wide range of higher-priced goods, such as automobiles, mechanical refrigerators, etc. This service will consist of a monthly magazine and a yearly buying guide. Members who pay a fee of $3.00 a year will receive this service.

$1 A limited service primarily intended for group memberships and for persons whose income restricts their purchases to low-priced products. This service will concentrate on essential commodities. It will consist of a monthly bulletin and a compact available-when-shopping, yearly buying guide. Members paying a fee of $1.00 a year will receive this service.

Both of these services will provide advice and information on medical and other health questions, and, in so far as possible, will give general financial and legal advice. They will also include investigations on sales taxes, legislation affecting consumers, low-cost housing and related subjects.

CONSUMERS UNION will make every effort to provide information usable at the point of purchase; it will not content itself merely with analyses, but will endeavor at every point to show the consumer how to protect himself and how to obtain the best value for his money.

By means of the coupon below, show your approval NOW of this effort to build for all consumers a service which is honestly disinterested, technically competent, and democratically controlled.

To: CONSUMERS UNION of United States, Inc.

ROOM 1435 : : 22 EAST 17th STREET : : NEW YORK CITY

I hereby apply for membership in the CONSUMERS UNION of UNITED STATES and inclose $..... for one year's membership. I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

- ☐ $3 for one year's membership and subscription to the full service.
- ☐ $1 for one year's membership and subscription to the limited service.
- ☐ $1 for one year's membership and subscription to the full service plus a contribution to the promotion of the organization.
- ☐ $10 or $25 for one year's membership and subscription to the full service plus a contribution toward a permanent consumers' laboratory.

Signature

Address

Occupation and present connection.....

"Quite apart from the fact that the Consumers Union is an outgrowth of the strike and will give employment to many of the strikers, we hope that it will receive wide support, for it promises a service that is greatly needed."

THE NEW REPUBLIC,
February 12, 1936

"We wish it all success."

THE NATION,
February 12, 1936

A HISTORY OF EUROPE

H. A. L. FISHER

"HERE is the real thing with a vengeance . . . It would be difficult to find a greater theme, and it would be impossible to find a surer guide."—Philip Guedalla.

EUROPE'S entire history from the earliest times to the present day, condensed into three lucid, and brilliant volumes that are a pleasure to read and essential to an understanding of the contemporary world. Each $4.00

"HE seems to see his history as a tapestry, no part of which ever escapes his glance . . . Emphatically, it is a book for the general reader. Nowhere in historical literature in English has there been a more skillful and interesting weaving together of the complex strands of the eventful centuries which created modern civilization."—Henry Seidel Canby

Doctor Morath

MAX HENE HESSE

"Breathtaking in its fascination . . . Recalls Zola and Stendahl. We find here the same passion for truth, the same keen vision."—New York Times $2.50

Fighting the Underworld

PHILIP S. VAN CISE

Organized crime can be suppressed. This thrilling account of a young district attorney's fight against a nation-wide gang of "con men" shows how it has been done; how it can be done. Illus. $3.00

The Four Georges

SIR CHARLES PETRIE

The author of "The Stuart Pretenders," reinterprets and revalues that picturesque and violent period, 1714 to 1830, from which emerged a modern nation. Ill. $3.50

The Destructive Element

STEPHEN SPENDER

Stephen Spender, best known as a poet, studies the work of Henry James, T. S. Eliot, W. B. Yeats, and D. H. Lawrence, and touches brilliantly on many other contemporary writers. $2.00

BOOKS and the ARTS

ON THE DIFFICULTY OF MODERN POETRY

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MODERN poetry is difficult. The fact is sometimes denied by our poets themselves and by critics or readers who have specialized in the idioms and methods of contemporary verse, but it is pretty generally accepted by the vast majority of those who devour novels and plays, so that the audience of many poets well known to their fellows is limited to a group too small to exhaust an edition of five hundred copies.

It is true that several notable exceptions spring immediately to mind. Mrs. Wylie, Miss Millay, Mr. Robinson, and Mr. Frost are not, in any special sense, difficult poets. If they must sometimes be read with an intensity of attention greater than is ordinarily required by either narrative or expository prose, they are not different in this respect from at least a considerable number of the poets of the past who were commonly called great. On the other hand, there certainly is a very special sense in which many of their contemporaries are difficult, and anyone who doubts the fact may read the critical reviews published, for example, in The Nation itself.

By way of illustration I will choose almost at random "Theory of Flight" by Muriel Rukeyser, which Philip Blair Rice reviewed in our issue for January 29. There he called the work "one of those rare first volumes which impress by their achievement more than by their promise," and after complaining that not all of the author's metaphors were "chromium clear," he cited as "about as pure and as poetical as any lines being written today":

Never forget in legendary darkness
the ways of the hands' turning and the mouth's ways,
wander in the fields of change and not remember
a voice and many voices and the evening's burning.

If anyone be inclined to remark that to find any difficulty in this strophe—deliberately chosen as conspicuously well realized—is to confess illiteracy, let him turn to another review by the same critic in the issue for February 19. In this, after praising Robert Fitzgerald for "a technique that is not equaled in subtlety and polish by any other of our younger poets," he remarks that "it was not until about the twelfth reading that I thought I was able to understand the poem beginning 'Death under the fingernails is unreal,'" and adds—with what may seem to some excessive mildness—"the false scents which I followed still interfere with my enjoyment of the poem."

For the moment I am not concerned with the possible justification for difficulties of this sort, but only with two facts—first, that the difficulties exist; and, second, that in many quarters they are taken for granted as inevitable from the very nature of poetry itself. Yet if this attitude is justifiable, it must at least be admitted that the inevitability is one which has developed within a generation, since the whole corpus of English poetry does not contain 1 per cent of lines anything like so difficult in any comparable manner. It is true that Donne and his fellow "metaphysical poets" afford the closest parallel. It is also true that some of the Jacobean dramatists have their crabbed passages. But even they are seldom so involved or so elliptic; and it is hardly necessary to insist that what was once accepted as the major tradition of English poetry from Chaucer to Swinburne is almost continuously and easily comprehensible on at least one level of its meaning. Shakespeare wrote one "difficult" poem, "The Phoenix and the Turtle," which, I seem to remember, Mr. Eliot called his best work. But whatever perplexities Shakespeare's sonnets may afford are usually due simply to personal references which we have lost, and nine-tenths of what he wrote is, like nine-tenths of what the other great English poets wrote, very easily comprehensible so far as the surface aspects of what he is saying are concerned.

It may be perfectly true that these surface aspects have little to do with his real greatness. Both the soul of his meaning and the soul of his poetic feeling may be quite as difficult to reach as those in the lines which Mr. Rice was compelled to read twelve times. But if this is true, then the fact certainly reveals a fundamental difference between his method and the method of the modern poets. His esoteric meaning is derived in conjunction with an exoteric one and runs parallel with it. From the very beginning and with the greatest ease one understands something; and from this easy beginning one is led on to penetrate as deeply as one can into the hidden beauties of thought or to appreciate as fully as one is able the subtleties of the expression.

And what is true of Shakespeare is true of most of the great English poets. When one fails to comprehend them, it is for a reason exactly opposite to the reason why one often fails to comprehend certain modern poets. In the latter case one simply fails to penetrate the tangled web of words, which produce no effect beyond that of an incantation; in the former one fails to understand because one has understood too readily a surface statement—understood, that is to say, only what the grammar-school pupil understands when he translates Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale" into prose for purposes of an examination paper. Yet the fact remains that, fortunately or unfortunately, the vast majority of great English poems are built upon a framework of clear statement which can be reduced to prose, while many of the most characteristic modern poems are so written that only after the greatest effort would it be possible to say in this simple sense "what they are about."

And it is for this reason that the failure of many modern readers to "understand" modern poetry is different from and more absolute than the failure of many persons in the past to "understand" their poets. It is perfectly true that Wordsworth was long unappreciated and in some sense not understood by the majority of readers. But that does not mean that they did not understand, on the surface, what he was saying. It means that they failed to understand why he was saying it, or that they failed to understand the nature of the emotion with which the saying was invested. Yet the bitterest of Wordsworth's detractors understood him in a sense in which even Mr. Rice found it difficult to understand certain of Mr. Fitzgerald's lines, and in which many, many readers fail to understand a whole conspicuous school of modern poets. For one thing, the syntax was simple. So also were his descriptions of the local habitations and names which he was giving to his ideas and emotions.

I am not unaware that the tendency to avoid what I have called a prose framework is both deliberate and based upon certain aesthetic convictions. The modern poet has set himself desperately against the palpably erroneous idea that a poem can be translated into prose, or even that what it is, in the truest sense, "about" can be stated in any form other than that of the poem itself. "Rose is a rose is a rose." A poem means the poem. To state that meaning in any other way is to violate it. And recognizing this fact, he is loath to employ as a framework anything which could be stated with even illusory clarity in prose. He wants his poetry to be pure in the sense that it is nothing but poetry, and he would, I suppose, insist that, let me say, the "Ode to a Grecian Urn" is impure just to the extent that a prose statement apparently stating the subject matter can easily be extracted from it.

Certainly I should not want to deny his fundamental premise. When one has said that the "Ode to a Grecian Urn" is about a man who saw an ancient urn carved with certain figures and who was led to feel that these carved figures were more enviable than human beings because they would always exist in this moment of grace and ecstasy, one has said little which gives a clue to the significance of the poem so far as the qualities which made it a poem are concerned. And yet I am not entirely convinced that the presence of the easily comprehensible prose framework serves no useful purpose, or that most of the great poets of the past were unwise to write their poetry around a prose core to which the reader could cling and about which he could orient himself. It is easier, as it were, to "take off" with him if one knows to begin with what he is "taking off" from.

The situation is not unlike that in which many modern painters have found themselves. Looking at a Renaissance painting they have no difficulty in pointing out that its beauty lies not in the realistic representation of the Holy Family, but in the fact that certain masses and certain colors are placed in certain two-dimensional patterns and certain plastic arrangements. By this discovery they are tempted to create pictures which are merely abstract arrangements of color and form. But the question is at least open whether or not these abstract arrangements are really as readily comprehensible and richly satisfying as the work of the Renaissance master; whether or not the greatest painter is not one who succeeds in achieving a representation while, at the same time, he manages to achieve also, within the limitations which representation sets, the abstract pattern.

I realize of course that there are other reasons for the difficulty of modern poetry. It is sometimes said, for example, that our sensibility is of a sort which demands more intricate expression. It may also be true that our poets, like our abstract painters, are struggling with problems of meaning so difficult to express that they do not dare complicate the problem by any effort to meet two different demands. But I cannot but suspect that when specifically modern poetry—if there is such a thing—actually achieves classical expression, it will be in forms which are difficult only in the sense that most poetry has always been difficult.

Speech to the Detractors

BY ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

What should a man do but love excellence
Whether of earth or art
Whether the hare's leap or the heart's recklessness?

What honor has any man but with eagerness
Valuing wasteless things
To praise the great and speak the unpraise meagerly?

Because the heroes with the swords have vanished
Leaving us nearer by Actual life and the more human manhood—

Because the common face: the anonymous figure:
The nameless and mortal man:
Is our time's birth to bear and to be big with—

Because the captains and the kings are dust—
Need we deny our hearts
Their natural duty and the thing they must do?

Not to the wearers of wreaths but those who bring them
Coming with heaped-up arms
Is fame the noble and ennobling thing.

Bequeathers of praise the unnamed numberless peoples
Leave on the lasting earth
Not fame but their hearts' love of fame for keeping

They raise not alone memorial monuments:
Outlasting these
They raise their need to give the great-one honor.

The ignorant and rabble rain erasing
Dates and the dead man's kind
Still leaves the blindness of the stones that praised him.

Why then must this time of ours be envious?
 Why must the great man now Sealed from the mouths of worms be sucked by men's mouths?

Refusing ribbons that the rest have clowned for—
 Dying and wishing peace—
 The best are eaten by the envy round them.

When Lawrence died the hate was at his bier.
 Fearing there might have lived
 A man really noble; really superior—

Fearing that worth had lived and had been modest—
 Men of envious minds
 Ate with venom his new buried body.

We cheat ourselves in cheating worth of wonder.
 Not the unwitting dead
 But we who leave their praise unsaid are plundered.

BOOKS

Europe as Portraiture

INSIDE EUROPE. By John Gunther. Harper and Brothers.
 $3.50.

THIS is the day of the foreign correspondents. Not alone as experts in an infinitely complex subject but as interesting persons in their own right they now occupy a special row of seats on the literary platform. Vincent Sheean, Walter Duranty, and Negley Farson win acclaim with autobiographies, and Edgar Mowrer, H. R. Knickerbocker, Dorothy Thompson, Paul Scott Mowrer (though since he became editor, without title, of the Chicago Daily News he has slipped into the background), and John Gunther have national status. It is one of the minor signs that the United States is growing up. I remember back to 1913 and 1914 when Paul Mowrer in Paris and I in Berlin kept writing mail articles for the Chicago Daily News predicting the coming war—judgments of this nature could not be cabled in those days—and Charles H. Dennis, our editor, threw them into the wastebasket in the belief that his "young men" in Europe had lost their balance and were converted to foolishness. Knickerbocker and Dorothy Thompson were in the now defunct foreign service of the Philadelphia Public Ledger; the Mowrer brothers, Gunther, and Farson were with the Chicago Daily News. With the exception of Duranty, none of those mentioned became nationally known through their daily journalism. They had to make their reputations through magazine writing or books.

The richness of the experience of the foreign correspondent is revealed in John Gunther's closely packed volume, as is also his tingling talent. There is not a dull patch in it, because he himself detests the dull considerations. His approach to events is excited. What captures his interest is people, and the incidents that throw light on prominent men. By all odds this is the best way to make Europe come alive in an account of it. Here is a comprehensive, highly instructive work about contemporary Europe, made vivid and breath-taking by John Gunther's predilection for explaining events in terms of personalities. To be sure it is not quite satisfactory as history. Certain dramas in Europe, like the overthrow of Sir Samuel Hoare—which occurred too late, I assume, to be handled adequately—and even the Nazi revolution in Germany, are not to be understood in the language of political leadership alone. Particularly the Nazi revolution is a deeper movement than the bizarre and revolting incidents it throws up would indicate. But Mr. Gunther acknowledges in his preface that he is content to limit himself.

Mr. Gunther is a novelist. His "Red Pavilion," written before he became a foreign correspondent, showed his clear perception of characteristic externals and his felicity of direct communication, which now have come into full use in this volume. For this book is first of all a superb piece of communication. Mr. Gunther's vocabulary is rich, but he never throws the choice words around. He enters the mind of his reader using the direct, colloquial gusto of conversation. (Duranty, Dorothy Thompson, Knickerbocker, Gunther, and Farson are all great conversationalists, though the art is supposed to be dead.) Now and again Mr. Gunther's treatment carries him too far, as when he writes that Hitler has "an Oedipus complex as big as a house." Probably he doesn't care; he would rather be electric whatever the price in prosaic respectability.

The first value of this book is that persons who feel that they would like to catch up in their reading about Europe can inform themselves while experiencing rare delight. In other words, it is the best flower of journalism, what reporting ought to be, absorbing, revealing, alive. Furthermore, it is authentic. Mr. Gunther knows most of his people and situations at first hand and about the others he has assiduously informed himself. He writes without inhibitions, and tells what would be said in private conversation. He is anecdotal; he makes a point of including the little stories that go the rounds in Europe. The pattern of the book is a number of full-length portraits of the outstanding figures supplemented with thumbnail sketches of the lesser men. Between these are interspersed much germane material, such as admirable accounts of the June purge in Germany, the Reichstag fire, the death of Dollfuss. The best portraits are of Mussolini, Stalin, and Baldwin. I thought the portrait of Hitler, indeed of most of the Nazi leaders, less convincing. The material is there, every scrap of knowledge about Hitler is assembled; but the details do not fit into a whole. Gunther does not quite understand Hitler, not even with the help of psychoanalysis, and perhaps no one can. (He is mistaken in saying that Göring reintroduced the use of the ax in German executions; that ancient instrument has been used for many years and was not even abolished under the Weimar constitution.)

I was surprised by his roster of the "inner circle" of Britain. He lists Lord Dawson of Penn, a physician with more influence than is commonly known but hardly enough to warrant his inclusion. He also names Sir Maurice Hankey, who of course is there and invaluable, though not as a senior statesman, and he omits Lord Hailsham and Lord Salisbury, who certainly are more frequently consulted on grave matters of state than the other two. I should not have included Geoffrey Dawson, editor of the Times, and should have nominated Sir Josiah Stamp. His sketch of MacDonald is cruel, judging an entire life and contribution by the folly and failure of its last years, which no doubt reflects the current opinion in London. But even in such cruelty, and in the distinctly malicious sketches of the Nazis, he is both accurate and entertaining, while the more balanced portraits are convincingly creative. The vigor and almost impudent candor of this book mark it as distinctly American; that is, I cannot imagine a man of any other nationality writing it. It deserves a wide public.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING

Necropolis

PREFACE TO THE PAST. By James Branch Cabell. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

CABELL'S name today calls back, rather than any particular books, a period in time and an attitude in thinking. For better or worse, we have arbitrarily set an end to the age preceding our own, which died equally of the depression and the rise to assertiveness of a new literary generation; and we cannot help regarding certain figures of the '20's as historically as we regard the Romantic poets or the Restoration dramatists. In expression and outlook these people seem set apart by a kind of "period" uniqueness, and their personalities seem no less dated than their philosophy. It is no more than a truism to assert that the generation of Cabell, Hergesheimer, Mencken, Rascoe, Boyd, Van Vechten, and Frances Newman, whatever its former importance may have been, is lacking now in influence and weight.

That generation had in one sense a difficult, but in another sense a miraculously easy, rise to success. In so far as it was "advanced," as it cut across the bias of orthodox American puritanism and provincialism, shocking the genteel, insulting the stupid, exposing the mediocre, it met with opposition from its elders and its inferiors. On the other hand, it was born into an era extremely favorable toward any talent at all. We were without good writers, hence unprejudiced as to what constituted good writing; we were liberated from the worst of our bondage to Mrs. Grundy by the war; were at the stage of wooing culture but of still having trouble with our French. The moment was ripe for self-conscious barbarians to go to school to self-conscious sophisticates. Cabell and his contemporaries came upon the scene, rapidly dominated it, and preached a flattering gospel—the gospel, in brief, of the civilized minority. We were invited to be, above everything else, mellow, aloof, urbane, and to believe in nothing but the comic senselessness of existence.

No group ever went harder to work to demonstrate, by a priori methods, that life was a pointless comedy. They were deeply pained, I think, every time they discovered dignity, merit, or reasonableness existing among their fellow-creatures. It upset their theory, it assaulted their ego; they wanted to show man up as foolish, pretentious, and incurably adolescent—someone who might be pitied but never admired except as he too imitated the laughter of the gods.

In their hands all this failed to be nourishing because it became less and less honestly skeptical and more and more gaudily cynical. In the end, far from showing the tender laughter of the eyes, they simply sneered, they simply cast out responsibility. ("I burn with generous indignation over this world's pig-headedness and injustice," said Cabell, "at no time whatever.") It was much less the nature of their philosophy than the frivolous way in which they practiced it that dated and disfigured their attitude. But it had also its ironical side, for while they were registering amusement over the pretensions of man, proud man, one got the feeling that Cabell came at one, willy-nilly, wearing the mantle of Montaigne, Boyd wearing the mantle of Dr. Bentley, Hergesheimer wearing the mantle of Pater, Mencken wearing the mantle of Juvenal. They all became intolerably uppish. Cant, which can hide behind laughter as well as tears, crept into their sophistication and urbanity. Their aloofness grew snobbish, their snobbishness smug. They seemed to exclaim, "I have a vast comic vision!" with all the naive rapture of Emma Bovary exclaiming, "J'ai un amant!"

They had their merits, of course; even if they now seem superficial and a little bogus, we must remember that they replaced far worse writers and knew how, on occasion, to be amusing and fluent and polished. Further, they protested against the stuffiness and philistinism that still dominated American culture. But once they had opened our eyes to what was wrong, not only had they served their purpose, but they had also opened our eyes to what was wrong with them. They were slain in their own crusade.

The present book, which the publishers intimate is a kind of literary autobiography, is actually no more than a series of papers describing the gestation and birth of Cabell's many books. The work of a man who is interested in and talks about nobody but himself, it is tedious and garrulous to the point of absurdity. The only interest I can find in these solemn footnotes to Cabell's novels is a clue to the misconception through which Cabell overreached himself as a writer. For it is not that he was originally without taste or talent. But he had the taste and talent of the dilettante along with the aspirations and pretensions of a great genius, and so nothing would satisfy him short of creating, like Balzac, a vast and many-volumed cosmos. The courage this required was admirable, but it might better have been traded for an equal amount of artistic self-knowledge. For Cabell as a major artist has been plainly a failure, and the Biography of Manuel—scattered though it may be with brief felicities—is already a necropolis. LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Beauty and the Beast

THE WHITE HORSES OF VIENNA AND OTHER STORIES. By Kay Boyle. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

ACTOR'S BLOOD. By Ben Hecht. Covici-Friede. $2.

LIKE most volumes of short stories, these two miss the particular literary virtues which we are in the habit of calling, for lack of better terms, reality and solidity. In their different ways they succeed in being almost completely insubstantial. They can be read more easily than they can be believed, and if they can be believed they are scarcely to be remembered. In each case the matter is very much modified by a manner—in the first case, modulated to a point just this side of death, and in the second case, exaggerated until contact is lost with any life we know. The only resemblance, indeed, between two books which sound and look so little like each other grows out of their common preoccupation with style. But in the long run that resemblance will seem of more consequence than the differences which it is so fascinating at the moment to define.

By style I mean here not so much a way of handling words as a way of telling stories. Miss Boyle's admirers will insist upon the importance and indeed the preciousness of her words, but there is more to her than that—or, if it is true that her triumph is of the negative sort I have indicated, there is less. Considered verbally, her style is far from perfect; it is sometimes obscure, it can be needlessly infantile, and here and there it is bad.

She stood very close, casting sharp looks at Dr. Heine, watching his slender, delicate hands at work, seeing the dark, silky hairs that grew on the backs of them and the black hair brushed smooth on his head. Even the joints of his tall, elegant frame seemed to be oiled with some special, suave lubricant that was evil as the Orient to their clean, Nordic hearts.

In six lines she has written, if my count is right, five pairs of adjectives. No, the significant item here is her mention of the hairs that grew on the back of Dr. Heine's hand. Miss Boyle never lets a hero go without a description of the hairs on the back of his hand, or on his forearm, or on the side of his face

The Truth about Food and Drugs

American Chamber of Horrors

by RUTH deFOREST LAMB

The inside story of the government's fight to protect consumers against dangers to health, life and pocketbook.

Illustrated, $2.50

A Footnote to Folly

REMINISCENCES OF
Mary Heaton Vorse

"Like Vincent Sheean, she is a journalist who takes sides. She has written a book to be read along with Lincoln Steffens' Autobiography and the other great documents of liberal America."—New York Times. 407 pages, $3.00

THE Jewish Caravan

EDITED BY Leo W. Schwarz

A magnificent treasure chest of the literary riches of ■ great people accumulated over a period of 3,000 years. Selections from the best Jewish writers. "One of the most remarkable books of many years. It should make every Jew proud of his race."—George H. Doran. 768 pages, $3.75

Public Speech

by Archibald MacLeish

Twenty new poems which show ■ deepening power in the work of this important American poet. The autographed edition, limited to 249 copies, leather bound and boxed, will be $7.50. The regular edition, cloth bound, will be $1.00.

The new $1.25 edition of the Great Classic of Soviet Humor

The Little Golden Calf

BY Ilya Ilf AND Eugene Petrov

"The rich, unflagging variety of the invention suggests Don Quixote and would be sufficient by itself to make the book one of the great comic romances."—Joseph Wood Krutch. 402 pages, now only $1.25.

THE NEW book of revelations Roosevelt Revealed

by JAMES C. YOUNG

A vivid account of what really happened in this country in the last three years . . . not one author's personal opinion but the co-ordination of recorded fact. Now that the evidence is all in, do you realize its significance? This book reveals the truth, . . . and leaves you to draw your own conclusions. $2.50

BEHIND THE TOOLS OF INDUSTRY

WITH EVERY TURN of the giant lathe, this cylinder increases in value. As unworked metal, it is worth only a few cents a pound. But shaped, finished, as part of an automobile, a refrigerator, or a plumbing fixture, it becomes useful and valuable. Machine tools convert metal into products indispensable to you.

In factories, all over the world, G-E motors drive intricate machines. G-E apparatus controls their operation. The machines are shaping necessities for industry and for the home.

Carboloy tools, a G-E development, cut metal with unprecedented speed. Electric gauges touch polished surfaces and accurately measure dimensions less than one ten-thousandth of an inch. Copper brazing and atomic-hydrogen welding join metal parts into a useful whole. X-rays, from tubes developed in the G-E Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, N. Y., probe the inner secrets of metals and point the way to improvements in material and design.

Such advances in manufacturing, made possible, in part, by G-E research, come home to you in better quality and lower cost in the machine-made products that are part of your daily life. Not only the electrical industry but every field of endeavor benefits by G-E research—research that has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric.

96-206H

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

which happens to be turned into the narrow, brilliant beam of her style. Sometimes they are golden, sometimes they are silver-white; but they are always noted, and often they are the biggest thing we are allowed to know concerning the man in question. Not his ideas, his motives, his character, the whole outline of his flesh and spirit; merely this or some other image which flies from him as we look and which Miss Boyle plays with through twenty or thirty skilful pages. She is willing to work out such an image to the stage of exhaustion—and to let an emotion go undetermined. It was "insolence, or gentleness, or love," she says; it was "whiskey, or madness, or love," she says a hundred and fifty pages later. She is being a poet, I suppose. But poetry is a cruder, a plainer, a more important thing than this. And if that is true, Miss Boyle is altogether too fine for her job. I like to read her; I like the foxes and swans, the horses and wild birds she relies on to fill her pages with the motion she cannot find in man. But just because her people are motionless, like frost-people on a pane of glass, I deny that they are interesting in the way that men and women in stories can be interesting.

Using what seems at first blush to be a director and more virile method, the method of the newspaper reporter, Mr. Hecht gets in the end an even less credible result. Certainly he cannot be accused of the delicate touch. He is so far from being obsessed by swans and foxes that he can say of the murdered actress's room in his first story: "All in all it looked as if Marcia had been done to death by a herd of bison." Another actress is "a vest-pocket edition of Duse"; somebody's house is now his "roost" and now his "bailiwick"; a simple departure is of course a "hegira"; and the disposal of evidence after a crime becomes "post crime evidence disposal." That is how fine Mr. Hecht's style is, considered verbally. Considered in terms of narrative art it is still less fine. The people are not permitted to show themselves in action until several pages of fireworks—debased Menckenesque—have been set off in the attempt to place them for us, morally and socially. Then the action begins; and it is always so swollen with overemphasis, so chromo in its coloring, so bearlike in its morality, so smoky with the cigars of imagination, so obviously forced, so grossly felt, that we do not believe a word we have heard. Mr. Hecht is sometimes witty, and I really rather like the elephantine way in which he steams up; but at best his stories are feature stories which will be forgotten on Monday. Coming to him after Miss Boyle's diet of the thinnest and crispest Continental wafers I thought I would eat good plain American bread. But it was baker's bread, less nourishing than advertised.

MARK VAN DOREN

Revolutionary Mythology

INTRODUCTION TO DIALECTICAL MATERIALISM.

By August Thalheimer. Translated by Simpson and Weltner. Covici-Friede. $2.

THE philosophy of dialectical materialism has always been the great doctrinal mystery of Marxism. It has received more varied interpretation, in an extensive foreign literature, than any other aspect of Marx's thought. The present account is an elementary but creditable version of the "orthodox" brand, and although he was repudiated by the Communist International for trivial political differences, the author easily outranks the official philosophical spokesmen. The translators have done, on the whole, a good job.

The very simplicity and fidelity of Thalheimer's exposition throw into glaring focus the weaknesses of this monistic orthodox world view which holds that since everything is "dialectically interrelated" every theory of being entails a theory of politics and vice versa. Applied to the history of philosophy, this leads to some shocking over-simplifications; applied to problems of philosophy, it produces multiple ambiguities and basic errors.

Practically the sole methodical principle that Thalheimer brings to the study of philosophy is the view that every system is to be "explained" in terms of the mode of production prevalent in its time, and that no problem of philosophy is so recalcitrant that it cannot be "ultimately" traced to some issue in the class struggle. This involves a systematic neglect of proximate causes and a failure to distinguish between two questions: what determines the genesis of an idea, and what determines the social acceptance of an idea. The result of this confusion leads to the attempt to explain the differences between philosophers in terms of the social conditions they share in common, and encourages the use of grandiose formulas as a substitute for analysis. For example, in discussing ancient philosophy Thalheimer writes: "All the fundamental ideas in Heraclitus are determined, are conditioned [which is it? Or do these terms mean the same?] by the characteristic class relations of his time." More particularly, he adds, Heraclitus was a member of the Ephesian aristocracy. Well, Thales and Parmenides, Anaxagoras and Democritus, like practically all Greek philosophers, were members of their municipal aristocracies, and the class relations were the same for all of them. How, then, account for the differences between them, even for the simple division which Thalheimer draws between the materialists and idealists?

Nor does the author fare more happily when he comes to modern philosophy. With no great regard for consistency he admits that other factors besides class relations enter into play, but asserts that "in spite of great temporal and local differences between particular schools the universal counter-revolutionary and reactionary class character of the modern American and European bourgeoisie expresses itself in a host of characteristics which are common to all schools of bourgeois philosophy." The only two common characteristics listed are opposition to materialism and irrationalism. To assert that these two features characterize all schools of "bourgeois" philosophy is to reveal scandalous ignorance. Simplistic formulas enable one to economize not only on thought but on knowledge.

The analytic difficulties of orthodox monistic dialectical materialism are, if anything, even graver. For it is questionable whether the basic notions with which it operates—the unity and penetration of opposites, development by contradiction—are meaningful, especially when applied to natural phenomena. To begin with, the terms contradiction, opposition, and antagonism, which Thalheimer lumps together, are sharply distinguished by most modern philosophers. Things cannot contradict each other; only propositions (or judgments) can be contradictory, and these are not natural facts in the sense in which things in space and time are. Nor do things struggle with one another except in an obviously metaphorical sense. Struggle is an attribute of living behavior. Hegel, believing that nature is an objective expression of consciousness, consistently asserted that all natural development can be conceived as a struggle of opposites, but it is logically impossible for a materialist to subscribe to this. Yet not only is Thalheimer committed to this view; like his orthodox brethren he affirms that the universe is dialectically interrelated and that its changes are necessarily progressive, particularly in the social realm. The upshot is a cosmic evolutionary optimism according to which the dialectic processes in nature and society make the

Important Books for People Who Do Their Own Thinking

The Twilight of the Supreme Court

By EDWARD S. CORWIN

"The best history and analysis of our judicial doctrines."—Max Lerner. A distinguished authority on American constitutional law gives a "timely and enlightening contribution to an effective evaluation of the current status of the Supreme Court and the policies of the New Deal."—Boston Transcript. $2.50

Sweden

THE MIDDLE WAY

By MARQUIS W. CHILDS

The story of a controlled capitalism that works in a system that has provided successful cooperatives, excellent cheap housing conditions, low utility rates and other amazing conditions. "When Al Smith goes for his walk next summer he might well take it in Sweden."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. Illustrated. 3rd large printing. $2.50

The Symbols of Government

By THURMAN W. ARNOLD

An original and amusing work which scrutinizes the amazing discrepancies existing in our legal and judicial systems, punctures many well-established beliefs, and suggests methods of improvement. $2.50

American Neutrality 1914-1917

By CHARLES SEYMOUR

A timely discussion of the causes of American intervention in the World War, with an analysis of the complex problems of neutrality, exposing the futility of isolationist "peace legislation." . . . $2.00

Theory of Flight AND OTHER POEMS

By MURIEL RUKEYSER

A new poet of great promise appears. Her work, as the American Mercury points out "is revolutionary in the best sense. She has something vital to say. Has not only more promise but more power than the combined first books of Spender, Auden and Day Lewis." $2.00

At All Booksellers

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS

New Haven, Conn.

WHAT IS THE WAY OUT?

Here is the Communist answer

B MR. ROWDER, Secretary of the Communist Party, U. S. A., is its authorized spokesman. In this direct and straightforward volume he clears up many current misconceptions regarding the Communist attitude toward the use of force, toward the family, religion, the "united front," etc. Moreover, Mr. Browder discusses the compelling political and economic issues of the day from the Communist point of view.

WHAT IS COMMUNISM?

By EARL BROWDER

Secretary, Communist Party, U. S. A.

$2.00 At All Bookstores

VANGUARD, 424 Madison Ave., New York

8th Printing!

SEX HABITS

A VITAL FACTOR IN WELL-BEING

By A. Buschke, M.D. and
F. Jacobsohn, M.D.

Foreword by
Gerard L. Moench, M.D.

Specializing Physicians to the Great
Continental Rudolf-Virchow
Hospital

Associate Professor of Gynecology,
New York Post-graduate Hospital,
Columbia University

11 Full Pages of Photographs

SUBJECTS EMBRACED

THE SEX ORGANS (Male, Female)
SEX INTERCOURSE (Analysis, Nature,
Methods, Frequency)
SEX DIFFICULTIES (Adjustment, Technique)
MARRIAGE (Sex Aspects, Instruction)
VALUE OF REGULAR SEX INTER-
COURSE
SEX HYGIENE (Precautions, Directions)
THE SEX IMPULSE (Contrasted: In Men, In Women)
SEX VARIATION (Physical, Psychological)
VARYING SEX PRACTICES
SEXUAL SHORTCOMINGS (Impotence,
Frigidity, Sterility, etc.)
SEX DANGERS (Coitus Interruptus,
Reservatus, etc.)
SEX ABNORMALITIES (Perversion,
Sadism, Masochism, Fetishism, Ex-
hibitionism, Homosexuality, Her-
maphroditism, etc.)
REPRODUCTION, FERTILIZATION,
HEREDITY, EUGENICS
THIRTY ILLUSTRATIONS
THE SEX ORGANS OF MEN (4
plates,* 15 illustrations)
THE SEX ORGANS OF WOMEN (3
plates,* 6 illustrations)
THE PROCESS OF REPRODUCTION
(1 plate,* 3 illustrations)
FERTILIZATION AND DEVELOP-
MENT (1 plate,* 2 illustrations)
DEVELOPMENT BEFORE BIRTH (2
plates,* 4 illustrations)

PRESS COMMENTS

"Most individuals will profit immensely by reading every word in this book, because it is based on a thorough understanding of the sex life of both men and women."—Journal of the American Medical Assn.

"This work on the sex life, a collaboration by two outstanding specialists, gives admirably and simply the facts necessary for a practical understanding of the sex impulse, the sex organs and the sex act. It contains a valuable and beautiful collection of photographs."—
Private Hospitals.

"... The sanest and most practical views of sexology and sexual hygiene that can be found. A clear conception of the male and female reproductive organs can be obtained. The description is accompanied by a set of beautiful photographs of the various organs. A finer set could not be found in any anatomy book..."—Glasgow University Publication.

"... gives those facts essential to a correct understanding of sex and a very accurate and scientific account
... and has the added advantage of being illustrated."—Medical Times (London).

*The membership of the A. M. A. consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

realization of communism inevitable. Oddly enough, such a philosophy reveals the two characteristics which, according to Thalheimer, all forms of bourgeois philosophy possess today, namely, idealism, in the assumption that the universe is friendly, and irrationalism, in the assumption that unconscious processes are purposive. Such a variety of antithetical elements enter into this philosophy that it is possible for Thalheimer to defend three mutually incompatible theories of truth at once—the Hegelian coherence theory, a crude form of the correspondence theory, and a still cruder form of the predictive theory.

Properly understood, dialectical materialism is a form of historical, experimental naturalism which stresses the role of human activity, under determinate conditions, in transforming the social world. The fatal weakness of orthodox dialectical materialism is that although it recognizes the important, even if limited, function of human intelligence and activity in transforming the world, it stresses metaphysical dogmas according to which intelligence is either unnecessary or impossible.

SIDNEY HOOK

Shorter Notices

THE IRON LAND. By Stanley Burnshaw. Philadelphia: The Centaur Press. $2.

What reputation Stanley Burnshaw has as a poet he has obtained by writing unpretentious lyrics which are authentic and effective. As a lyric poet Burnshaw has been chiefly concerned up to this time with creating a mood out of quick impulses and fragile decorations, of which love, evening flowers, and bird-inhabited landscapes were the essential materials. In this new book, however, he has attempted poetry of a very different genre, more direct and realistic. "The Iron Land" is made up of groupings of poems which work into a narrative of a sort that gives the reactions of a white-collar worker to life within a "typical steel mill." Here and there throughout the book are poems which according to Mr. Burnshaw's note to the reader are not an integral part of his story, but which convey his "personal doubts, deliberations, escapes into a New World directive." Whatever the function of these particular poems, they are the best in the book, and probably will be remembered some time after the sequence is forgotten.

BELOMOR. By Maxim Gorki. Harrison Smith and Robert Haas. $3.

First of the links to be built in Russia's new system of inland waterways was the Baltic-White Sea Canal. It was built in twenty months between 1931-33. It is over 140 miles long and was constructed by thousands of prisoners, male and female, political and criminal, under the supervision of the G.P.U.
Because the prisoners had to learn the building trades necessary to accomplish the work and because the construction was part of the Five-Year Plan, the enterprise was officially launched as a rehabilitation scheme; the prisoners were not doing forced labor, they were being "reforged." They also received commuted sentences and decorations. So praiseworthy and unique was the venture considered that some thirty of the most prominent Russian writers were sent from Moscow to write it up conjointly. The result is a startlingly uniform series of naively inflated sales talks to launch required occupational therapy, a book that for all its recomposed case-histories, technical reports, and wall-newspaper columns, leaves much unanswered.
Namely, why should an American reader who condemns the method by which roadbuilders are trained on Georgia chain gangs be expected to admire the method that built Belomor?

*Full page.

Price $2.50 (postage 15c extra)

EMERSON BOOKS (Dept. 355-N) 333 SIXTH AVE., N. Y. C.

DRAMA

Symposium

THERE are always those who rise to remark that the best of talk cannot make a play. I have, indeed, known certain persons so fanatically devoted to this particular dogma that they would doubtless invoke it even in the case of "The End of Summer," now happily current at the Guild Theater. To such as they I will, however, not deign a reply for the simple reason that the excellence of Mr. Behrman's talk has the effect which any particular excellence always has—provided, of course, that it is really excellent. It makes one forget, for the moment at least, whatever other kinds the universe may afford and becomes for the time all anyone could ask. Listening to such talking as his characters achieve, one is inclined to exclaim, as Anthony once did on a quite different occasion and apropos a quite different activity:

The nobleness of life
Is to do thus: when such a mutual pair
And such a twain can do 't.

In the new play, as in the last two before it, Mr. Behrman has lifted his talkers and their themes straight out of the world around him. Once more Miss Ina Claire, sparkling as ever, is cast in the role of an indulged and indulgent woman, and once more she is surrounded by a group of passionate men whose verbal bombs—often hurled at one another with the most vicious intent—somehow burst harmlessly over her head like so much fireworks. Anxious only to be loved, she is equally willing to endow a hospital for the sinister psychoanalyst—played with diabolical suavity by Osgood Perkins—or to finance a radical magazine for the two nice college boys determined to put an end to her and her kind. And while the world rocks around her—or at least while the other characters assure her that it does—her only contribution to the solution of world problems is the brilliant suggestion that calamities are on twice the scale they used to be simply because the women (who make up one-half of the population, remember) insist on taking part in them now instead of staying quietly at home as they used to do.

What these personages talk about is precisely what everybody talks about today: the blessing or the curse of wealth, the problem of unemployment, the brave new world which either is or isn't about to emerge. And the conclusions they reach are no more conclusive than those being achieved in a thousand drawing-rooms at precisely the same moment. Indeed, the conclusion of the play finds everybody very much as they were found at the beginning. There was never much doubt that the daughter of wealth would end by taking the young radical suitor and hoping for the best. If the Machiavellian psychoanalyst does make one serious mistake, he is merely convinced that he will not make it again; and Miss Claire, of course, is beyond the reach of argument or fact. Whatever fate—and it is all still dark—the others may meet, one is certain that her invincible triviality will carry her through. Hers is the last word; for at the end of the play she is developing a lively personal interest in the second of the young radicals. It is true that, for the moment, she doubts the propriety of financing an enterprise whose chief aim is the destruction of her and her world. But the eager editor explains that to do so would only be, after all, to "anticipate the inevi-

Consider The LIVING WORLD!

Today, with the pace of social change more rapid than ever before, intelligent travel is increasingly interesting and valuable. EDUTRAVEL was created to plan your travel as a constructive cultural adventure . . . to direct your eyes upon the living world.

The following two Field Courses illustrate the wide range of special EDUTRAVEL projects. Send for booklets.

CONTEMPORARY ART AND ARCHITECTURE

Interviews with leading artists in England, France, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Austria and the Soviet Union. Auspices of New School for Social Research.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT ABROAD

Study of delinquency and reform under Joseph F. Fishman, sponsored by The New School for Social Research. Discussions with prominent penologists in 5 countries.

If you are interested in travel to specific countries or in other specialized fields, write stating your needs. The EDUTRAVEL program may include just what you want . . . or we will gladly plan independent tours. Address Dept. NA-3.

EDUTRAVEL

An Institute for Educational Travel

535 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK, N. Y.

Land tours in Europe in conjunction with Amerop Travel Service Inc. (in U.S.S.R., in cooperation with Intourist, Inc.).

THE NEW FEDERAL AND STATE PROGRAMS FOR SOCIAL SECURITY will necessitate special knowledge on the part of social workers for integrating public and private social work.

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK offers graduate professional curricula for the acquisition of the necessary knowledge and skills, leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees.

For information about requirements for admission, scholarships and fellowships, write to

DR. M. J. KARPFF, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

Defender of Democracy
—ex-President Masaryk of Czechoslovakia

DEFENDER OF DEMOCRACY

Masaryk of Czechoslovakia

A Distinguished New Biography

By EMIL LUDWIG

In a world where chaos and expediency govern the political relations between countries, one great statesman stands impressively alone—Thomas Masaryk, founder and ex-president of Czechoslovakia. In this book a master biographer, who knows and understands the undercurrent of politics as well as human motives, presents the dramatic life story of one of the great men of our times. $3.00

Robert M. McBride & Co., 116 E. 16th St., New York

PREFACE TO THE PAST

"Sprightly... trenchant...
amusing..."

$2.50 —N. Y. Sun

BY JAMES BRANCH CABELL

✓ YOU KNOW STUDS LONIGAN

—BUT HAVE YOU MET

GAS-HOUSE MCGINTY

Another novel by JAMES T. FARRELL

The Only Novelist on "The Nation's" Honor Roll
364 pages. $2.50 At all bookstores Vanguard

They Brought Christianity—and Degradation In 1796, a small band of missionaries, having heard glowing accounts of the South Sea paradises, set sail for Tahiti, determined to bring Christianity to the natives. They, and their successors, brought to the contented islanders not only religion but bloody wars, disease and moral ruin. Telling the complete story in an unbiased and lively manner, Louis B. Wright and Mary Isabel Fry have conveyed all the mingled pathos and humor of an ironic chapter in history. Ill. $3.00.

HENRY HOLT & CO. N. Y. C.

PURITANS IN THE SOUTH SEAS

table," and upon her bright exclamation, "Now wouldn't that be clever of me," the curtain goes down.

Among other things "The End of Summer" is a brilliant example of the way in which Mr. Behrman has solved the problem of writing pure comedy in an atmosphere which so many are ready to say makes pure comedy either impossible or at least impertinent. After his first play, "The Second Man," he obviously concluded that he did not wish to continue to deal merely with the timeless themes which have served for the whole tradition of artificial comedy, and there was the period to which "Meteor" belongs, during which it seemed possible that he might sacrifice his particular gift to the conviction that he must be "important" in a way that comedy of his sort cannot possibly be. A less sure instinct than his would either have followed this false lead or in some other way perverted his genius for a kind of wit which is essentially a pure and disinterested illumination. He might, for example, have turned to tendentious satire, for which he is temperamentally too skeptical and too balanced; or he might, on the other hand, have fallen into a merely cynical nihilism equally foreign to his urbane and generous spirit. Instead, however, he happily invented a novel kind of comedy which deals in no merely trivial fashion with controversial issues and yet affords full play to his essentially critical and skeptical mind. It is, that is to say, a kind of comedy in which the protagonists of various points of view, each equally endowed with eloquence and intelligence and wit, state their cases and expose the weakness of their adversaries while the spectator stands by, not so much cynically enjoying the discomfiture of each as delighting in the insights which are afforded into both the problems themselves and the characters of those who are trying to solve them. Such comedies are neither tendentious on the one hand nor trivial on the other. They are comedies of illumination. They turn to the uses of the moment the most valuable of comedy's gifts—the gift of disinterested insight. In "The End of Summer" the conversation is infinitely varied. Sometimes it bubbles, sometimes it rises to eloquence, sometimes it explodes into sky-rockets of wit. But it is always delightful and always illuminating.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

The Misunderstood

NO STORY can be more interesting than the story of a person who is underestimated or misunderstood. There is no anxiety like that which we feel as we watch a victim of human error—a virtuous victim, preferably, though our sympathies can be touched in a cause not noble. All we need to know about the hero is something which his enemies do not know; or his friends, or his superiors, or the world in general. Then we are ready for the tale of how he is scorned, despised, and wrongfully accused; then we are ready to sit in a theater and behold the slow stages by which he attains to recognition. The sense of justice is probably the most dramatic sense we have, and by the same token the recognition scene is the most powerful scene of which drama is capable. It can be, in fact, almost intolerable. It is then that we weep.

Perhaps any good story has somewhere in it a touch of the Cinderella theme, but two current films have more than that; they build themselves entirely around it, they depend for their whole success upon our known inability to resist it. The first of them, "The Prisoner of Shark Island" (Center Theater), comes perilously near to overusing it, with the result that an hour of the film is painful; but the pleasure which comes with the hero's vindication at last is enough to save what has gone before, and enough to prove that there is no such thing as excess in the drama of misunderstanding. The hero, Dr. Samuel Mudd (Warner Baxter), is taken, as it happens, from history, for he is the Dr. Mudd of Maryland who set John Wilkes Booth's broken leg after the assassination of Lincoln and who served four years on Shark Island in the Gulf of Mexico for the "crime."

I put the word in quotation marks because we of the audience know that Dr. Mudd was innocent. We know it because we see him on the fatal evening of 1865 when Booth knocked at his door and begged for relief from pain. We know how innocent he was of any knowledge concerning his patient's identity, and we approve of him as the charitable and reasonable man we are made to see. But the soldiers who came down from Washington did not know of his innocence, nor when they found Booth's boot in the house could they believe Dr. Mudd to be anything but a conniving villain; nor would the American public be satisfied with anything less than the conviction of every last person connected even by accusation with the "conspiracy"; nor did the military court mind in the least committing judicial murder. What we are treated to then is a series of tortures, beginning with the trial at Washington and ending with the antics of a sadist sergeant on Shark Island, which we alone know to be unjustified by any fact. The historian who studies the case may have his reasons for supposing Dr. Mudd innocent. But we know. And it is on that knowledge that the story-teller builds his case, keeping us in suspense for as long as he thinks we can bear it, and rewarding us at the end with a glimpse of the good doctor returning to his front door. The film takes every advantage of its theme, and takes advantage also of the fact that the Civil War is still the richest background available to America story. I have seen few pictures, this year or any other, more completely interesting than "The Prisoner of Shark Island."

"The Story of Louis Pasteur" (Strand) is less interesting only because the elements from which it extracts its irony are less simple and visible. They are not a leg, a boot, a knock at the door in the night; they are the bacilli of anthrax and hydrophobia. The hero, in other words, is a Scientist, and so there is a good deal of hocus-pocus intended to give us the illusion that we know what Pasteur (Paul Muni) saw when he looked into his microscope; and there is the usual romancing about Science with which we are already too familiar. But it does not matter much in a story which has such a man for its hero. Here again we have the drama of the underrated; we have the ignorant scorn of academic doctors, we have the struggling genius in his laboratory and his home, and better yet we have the famous incidents of the Arbois sheep and the hydrophobia cases from Russia. The director, William Dieterle, has wisely placed his emphasis upon these incidents—particularly upon the one at Arbois, where Pasteur's recognition by the great Lister provides the first and best of a series of climaxes culminating in the ovation at the Academy. And the scornful doctors, Charbonnet, Rossignol, Radisse, are skilfully used as lighting for the triumphs when they come. A series of triumphs is doubtless less dramatic than a single big one toward which everything has tended; but that is merely another way of saying that "The Story of Louis Pasteur" is not quite so sustained a success-story as "The Prisoner of Shark Island."

MARK VAN DOREN

THEATERS—DEBATES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

END OF SUMMER

A comedy by S. N. SHERMAN with
INA CLAIRE and OSGOOD PERKINS
GUILD THEA., 52nd St., W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
 Matinees, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
 in association with Lee Ephraim

CALL IT A DAY

A Comedy by Dodie Smith
 with GLADYS COOPER and PHILIP MERIVALE
MOROSCO THEA., 45th St. W. of B'way. Evgs. 8:30
 Matinees, Wednesday, Thursday and Saturday at 2:30. Extra Matinee Wednesday

A

New Theatre League Benefit

SUNDAY EVENING MAR. 1 CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, 14 ST. & 4 AVE.

The Theatre of Action in
"THE CRIME"
 A New Play by Michael Blankfort
"THE LITTLE GREEN BUNDLE" By Paul Peters

Seats Now at Box Office and New Theatre League. 55 West 45th St. and all Worker's Bookshops 35c to $1.65

FASCISM

an exposé
 Former foreign correspondent International News Service—returning from Europe.
John L. SPIVAK
 "I Saw It There!"
 Director—American Civil Liberties Union—back from mid-west tour.
BALDWIN
 "I See It Here!"
 Exec. Sec. Church League for Industrial Democracy.
Rev. Wm. L., Chairman
SPOFFORD
 Adm. $1.10 .83—Tickets at Office of Committee—156 Fifth Av. Chelsea 3-4739 and at Box Office.

The HENRI BARBUSSE MEMORIAL COMMITTEE presents three distinguished men who prefer answering questions to making speeches.

WED. EVE. at 8:15
MARCH 4
PYTHIAN AUDITORIUM
 135 W. 70th Street

IMPORTANT DEBATE!
 Sponsored by The Book and Magazine Guild of America
LEWIS COREY vs. ALFRED BINGHAM
 "WHAT FUTURE FOR THE INTELLECTUAL WORKER?"
 Roger Baldwin, Chairman
 John Chamberlain, Selden Rodman, Louis M. Hacker and William Browder, will lead the discussion.
 Tickets may be purchased at the door, or in advance from Harold Strauss, 405 East 54th Street, New York City.

Wednesday, MARCH 11, 1936 at 8:15 p. m. sharp
 RAND SCHOOL AUDITORIUM
 7 East 15th St. New York City
 Admission 50 cents
 General Public Invited

With this issue the Labor section is dropped because the subject-matter, more than ever before, is too closely integrated with the whole content of The Nation to be dealt with separately. We shall devote more and not less space to labor and related subjects. Forthcoming issues will contain articles by Louis Adamic, Benjamin Stolberg, Carleton Beals, Lillian Symes, and others.

EDITORIAL CONTEST

For College Students

The Foreign Policy Association and The Nation, joint sponsors of the contest announced in The Nation of February 5, present this list of

SUGGESTED READING

BOOKS

- Bradley, Phillips. Can We Stay Out of War? Norton. $2.75.
 Dulles, A. W., and Armstrong, H. F. Can We Be Neutral? Harper & Brothers. $1.50.
 Jessup, P. C., and Deak, Francis. Neutrality: Its History, Economics and Law, 4 vol., Columbia University Press. $3.75 each.
 Millis, Walter. The Road to War, Houghton Mifflin. $3.
 Seymour, Charles. American Neutrality, 1914-1917. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1935. $2.
 Young, Eugene J. Powerful America, Frederick Stokes. $3.

PAMPHLETS

- Goslin, R. A., Editor. War Tomorrow—Will We Keep Out? Foreign Policy Association (Headline Books) 35c; paper 25c.
 Wright, Quincy. The United States and Neutrality, University of Chicago Press. (Public Policy Pamphlet) 25c.

MAGAZINES

- Beard, C. A. Keeping America Out of War, Current History, Dec. 1935.
 Briggs, H. W. and Buell, R. L. American Neutrality in a Future War, *Foreign Policy Report, April 10, 1935, 25c.
 Buell, R. L. American Neutrality and Collective Security, *Geneva Special Studies, No. 6, 1935, 35c.
The Dangerous Year, *Foreign Policy Pamphlet, No. 2.
The New American Neutrality, *Foreign Policy Report, Jan. 15, 1936, 25c.
Can We Be Neutral? The Nation, Feb. 12, 1936.
 Dean, V. M. The Case for Collective Action, The Nation, Feb. 26, 1936.
 Millis, Walter. Morgan, Money and War, The Nation, Jan. 22, 1936.
What Does Neutrality Mean? The Nation, Jan. 29, 1936.
Sanctions or War? The Nation, September 4, 1935.
Sanctions Under Neutrality, The Nation, Nov. 13, 1935.
 Sims, W. S. Freedom of the Seas, Forum, Jan. 1936.
 Stimson, H. L. Neutrality and War Prevention, International Conciliation, Sept. 1935.
The Illusion of Neutrality, Forum, Nov. 1935.
 Stone, W. T. Neutrality by Statute, New Republic, Aug. 7, 1935.
Strengthening the Neutrality Act, The Nation, Jan. 8, 1936.
 Swing, R. G. and Detzer, Dorothy. Sanctions vs. Neutrality, The Nation, Dec. 4, 1935.
 Warren, Charles. Prepare for Neutrality, Yale Review, Mar. 1935.
Safeguards to Neutrality, Foreign Affairs, Jan. 1936.
Troubles of a Neutral, Foreign Affairs, April 1934.
 de Wilde, J. C. Testing League Sanctions, *Foreign Policy Report, Dec. 4, 1935, 25c.

*Published by the Foreign Policy Association, 11 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.

CONTEST CLOSING MARCH 15

Joseph Wood Krutch says:

BOY MEETS GIRL. Cort Theater. Rough and ready satire on Hollywood, but probably the funniest thing of its kind since "Once in a Lifetime."

DEAD END. Belasco Theater. A play about gangsters in the making on an East River waterfront. More a good show than a great drama, but a very good show indeed.

ETHAN FROME. National Theater. The apparently impossible task of dramatization of Edith Wharton's novel achieved with conspicuous success. Outstanding performances by Pauline Lord, Ruth Gordon, and Raymond Massey.

JUMBO. Hippodrome. Paul Whiteman, Jimmy Durante, and a remarkable clown named A. Robbins surrounded by acrobats and animals. Literally better than a circus.

LIBEL. Henry Miller Theater. Exciting English courtroom play. Surprisingly probable for this sort of thing and superbly acted.

PARADISE LOST. Longacre Theater. Clifford Odets's complicated picture of a family composed exclusively of pathological futilitarians. He calls it a picture of the middle class but it strikes me as somewhat less than typical.

PRIDE AND PREJUDICE. Plymouth Theater. Amazingly successful adaptation, brilliantly staged and acted. A thoroughly delightful evening in the theater.

VICTORIA REGINA. Broadhurst Theater. Delightful series of scenes from Laurence Housman's drama stunningly acted by Helen Hayes and others. Fairer to the matron queen than Strachey but funny nevertheless and charming besides.

Mark Van Doren says:

AH, WILDERNESS. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Eugene O'Neill's touching and searching comedy of high-school days translated into a film which charms by its own right. Full of recognitions for the middle-aged.

A NIGHT AT THE OPERA. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. The Marx Brothers in their best picture to date. Hilarious and brilliant.

ANNIE OAKLEY. R.K.O. A minor American masterpiece based on the life of Buffalo Bill's best-loved sharpshooter. Barbara Stanwyck as Annie Oakley divides the honors with Sitting Bull.

MODERN TIMES. Charles Chaplin. Charlie Chaplin returns to the screen disguised as his old self and fulfils every expectation. Should be seen by everyone—and heard, for he has sound effects.

MUTINY ON THE BOUNTY. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. A long and noisy film, elaborated tirelessly from the famous books by Nordhoff and Hall; but distinguished by the great acting of Charles Laughton as Captain Bligh.

THE GHOST GOES WEST. Alexander Korda. René Clair's first film in English, with scenes in Scotland and the United States. Clever, satirical, and fanciful, but without the master touch.

WAY DOWN EAST. Fox. D. W. Griffith told the story better and more simply, but it remains a good story for movie purposes, and pictorially this version is very fine.

Letters to the Editors

THE LOS ANGELES BORDER PATROL

Dear Sirs: The border patrol which has been carrying on in California is still important news to the public. My husband and I have just returned from a trip to Blythe, California, from there to Quartzsite, Arizona, then to Yuma, Arizona. We have observed and analyzed this move on the part of the Los Angeles police, and it seems to us one more very serious stab at our civil liberties.

We were in Blythe four years ago and met a number of the citizens there. At that time there was an active Socialist local. The merchants were tolerant, approachable people. This time we found almost no independent merchants. All liberal groups had disintegrated. The chain stores have moved in and the local Chamber of Commerce is now the dominant organization. The day before we arrived that group had entertained a speaker from the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, under whose influence they had sent a letter heartily indorsing Chief of Police Davis of Los Angeles for protecting their town from those criminals who are trying to enter California. Blythe has no railroad and is about three miles from the state line. Los Angeles has eight fully armed policemen at every entrance of a highway into the state.

One family from Oklahoma had put all their possessions into a Ford car and started for California, where they had relatives and sought a milder winter climate. They were found with only ten dollars and were turned back with this small amount of money facing two hundred miles of desert highway before reaching a town of any size where they could expect to get aid.

In Yuma we went to see the sheriff, who seemed rather disinterested. He said that before Los Angeles took it upon itself the town was driving the hobos out of the "jungle," but now it let them alone. He suggested we go to the "jungle" and see what we could find. The inhabitants were very bitter, had no feeling of hope or responsibility toward society; they could plainly see there was little chance of justice for them. They told us of several persons who, trying to pass the border, had been beaten and badly abused, but this we were not able to verify. One man was making coffee in a large tin can. That morning he had done a family washing for which he was paid fifteen cents and had spent it for coffee for the crowd.

We took two young men, twenty-two and twenty-five years of age, to dinner. They had not eaten for three days. Both had had a high-school education and one could boast of two years of college. He wanted very much to study law. They were both staunch Republicans, well mannered and evidently from good homes. They believed that the NRA was a great infringement on people's rights. On their arrival at the state line they were met with the questions, "Any money? any work? Well, this is as far west as you go, young man."

We had an interview with the Los Angeles officer on the highway bridge, who was also patrolling the railroad bridge by flashing a light down between the cars as the freight train passed slowly by. He first denied that his instructions were to finger-print the travelers. When Mr. Packard took the instructions out of his pocket, the officer's eyes grew large with amazement. He said that they were only finger-printing the ones who looked like criminals. When I asked him if he did not know that these people had a constitutional right to travel where they pleased, he answered me with, "What do you mean? We are down here at the orders of the chief of police of Los Angeles."

These policemen at the border are drawing pay for full time but are given ten days out of the month to go home in police cars to see their families. This shows what a great cost it is to the taxpayer.

ROSE MARIE PACKARD

Pasadena, February 10

EMANCIPATOR

Dear Sirs: It is hard to believe that what I have always looked upon as one of America's outstanding clean magazines, presenting and discussing correctly matters of nation-wide importance and of interest to all readers who can afford the purchase price, would stoop so low as to publish such a slanderous, disgusting full-page cartoon of Dr. Francis E. Townsend as that appearing on page 36 of the issue of January 8.

Gentlemen, you should be ashamed of yourselves, one and all, for you must know that you have slandered one of America's outstanding citizens, one of the most widely discussed men in public life today, a man who has kindled a ray of hope in the hearts of millions of America's aged, downtrodden, and neglected citizens. He has a clear vision of the nation's needs which, up to the present time, no one has disputed except a few crooked politicians, high-salaried brain-trusters, Congressmen and Senators, and some nit-wit editors and specialty writers who should be confined in some institution for the feeble-minded.

Dr. Francis E. Townsend is an outstanding humanitarian, also a Christian, a believer in the Ten Commandments and the Golden Rule. He is a man whose name will be venerated and honored in the pages of American history as another great emancipator.

G. H. YOUNG

Walhalla, Mich., February 18

HUNGARIAN PRISON

Dear Sirs: After my eight and a half years' confinement in Hungarian prisons, allow me to call your attention to the crime of the Hungarian juridical authorities who, disregarding all dictates of humanity and acting contrary to legal requirements, are trying finally to break down and even to kill Mathias Rakosi, the former People's Commissar of the Hungarian Soviet Republic.

Solitary confinement means that the prisoner is locked in a cell never exceeding eighteen cubic meters in size, where even in summer not a ray of sunlight ever enters. The damp walls of this cell are white and yellow from saltpeter, and the prisoner must wear winter clothing even in summer owing to the cold. With the exception of the guard, conversation with whom is forbidden, the prisoner never sees anybody. Food, in any case scanty, is reduced by a third. Better food at one's own expense, visits by relatives, books, paper, and writing materials are not allowed.

According to the law, solitary confinement can extend only for one-third of the sentence, not exceeding one year for sentences of up to five years, two years for sentences of up to ten years, and three years as the absolute limit in case of higher sentences. In addition the law provides that strict solitary confinement may be carried out only where the health of the prisoner permits. After the prisoner has served the first half of his sentence or after ten years in the case of prisoners serving life sentences, strict solitary confinement is forbidden.

How then do the fascist juridical despots of Hungary deal with Mathias Rakosi? Rakosi was arrested for his political activity in 1925 and sentenced to eight and a half years' imprisonment. During these eight and a half years he was held more than seven years in solitary confinement, not to mention the many disciplinary punishments which he had to suffer on account of his desperate struggles against the inhuman prison regime.

At the end of his sentence, that is, in 1934, Rakosi was not released; a charge was brought against him connected with his participation in the government of the Soviet Republic in Hungary in 1919, a charge for which the bill of indictment had been prepared fifteen years before but which, despite the request of Rakosi's defending counsel, had not been dealt with. On the termination of his first sentence the court sentenced Rakosi for the second time—this time to life imprisonment.

Rakosi's counsel requested that the two sentences should run concurrently, since the charges in the second trial referred to an earlier time (1919) than those of the first trial (1925). The court did not grant this request, but vindictively brought a charge against Rakosi's counsel because he accused the public prosecutor of breaking the law. Rakosi was brought to the Szeged Prison and despite his ten years' previous imprisonment without a break, is now treated as a "new prisoner." He is condemned to three years' solitary confinement; all the privileges allowed by law are withdrawn from him. The fascist juridical bureaucrats refuse to recognize the fact that Rakosi has been in strict solitary confinement almost without a break ever since 1925, not only in defiance of the law, but in spite of the fact that he is broken in health.

The fascist rulers of Hungary do this because they want to get rid of Rakosi, they want to kill him, in order to rob the Hungarian proletariat of one of its best front-rank fighters. All cultured people, all who have a spark of human feeling in them, must unanimously protest against this new barbarism of the fascist regime in Hungary.

LETTAU SANTO

Moscow, January 15

WRITE A LETTER TO CALIFORNIA!

Dear Sirs: Herbert Solow mentioned in his letter in your issue of February 5 that the California Board of Prison Terms and Paroles would not be meeting again for four months. Technically this is correct; actually the board meets this month. There is nothing to hinder it from reviewing the cases of the criminal-syndicalism prisoners now serving indeterminate sentences of from one to fourteen years in California state prisons, and setting their sentences. In the absence of widespread expressions of opinion, the board is the more likely to take a definite step now, and the sentences may be expected to be the maximum.

The agricultural interests in California feel that their terroristic methods, labor camps, vigilante action, and anti-union propaganda have effectively put a stop to further protests from the migratory workers or their representatives. It is extremely important, therefore, that those who wish to see these young fighters for the rights of labor and of free expression of opinion in America freed from prison should write without delay asking that their sentences be set at the minimum. Address letters to the Honorable Frank C. Sykes, California Board of Prison Terms and Paroles, Kohl Building, San Francisco.

ELLA WINTER

Carmel, Cal., February 16

Contributors

BENJAMIN STOLBERG, author with Warren Vinton of "The Economic Consequences of the New Deal," is perhaps America's leading controversial journalist. His analysis of the Socialist Party let loose in the columns of The Nation a deluge of correspondence, mostly denunciatory. His estimate of Huey Long was no less lively, though its subject had fewer champions among the letter-writers. Within a few weeks Mr. Stolberg will contribute a definitive appraisal of John L. Lewis, particularly in his role as the leader of the coming American labor movement.

HAROLD J. LASKI, who spent four years teaching politics in American universities, mainly Harvard, has been since 1926 professor of political science at the University of London. The list of his works is impressive both for length and content: among them are "The Foundations of Sovereignty," "Democracy in Crisis," and "The State in Theory and Practice." Mr. Laski will shortly arrive in the United States and will lecture on the European situation at the New School for Social Research in New York.

MORRIE RYSKIND has for some time been earnestly occupied in exposing the follies of politics in such works as "Of Thee I Sing" and "Let 'Em Eat Cake," of which, with George S. Kaufman, he was coauthor. He is now in Hollywood, where he will act as The Nation's spy and correspondent.

JAMES T. FARRELL is the author of the "Studs Lonigan" trilogy, that devastating account of a boy's life on the Chicago streets. His projects for the future comprise twenty-four more volumes dealing with various of the "Studs Lonigan" characters.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING has been Berlin correspondent of the Chicago Daily News and London correspondent of the Philadelphia Public Ledger and the New York Evening Post. He was an editor and the Washington correspondent of The Nation during 1934 and 1935. He is now devoting a large part of his time to radio broadcasting on politics from Washington.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER has been for some time a regular reviewer for the New York Times and The Nation. He is the editor of "An Anthology of Light Verse" and "An Eighteenth Century Miscellany," which covers English literature from Swift to Blake.

MARK VAN DOREN is the author of several volumes of poetry, the latest being "A Winter Diary and Other Poems," of one novel, "The Transients," and of many critical articles in The Nation and elsewhere. His official occupation is associate professor of English at Columbia University.

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH is another poet who makes his living by doing something else. Perhaps Mr. MacLeish's best-known volumes are "The Hamlet of A. MacLeish" and "Conquistador." When he is not writing poetry he is being an editor of Fortune—and vice versa.

SIDNEY HOOK is chairman of the Department of Philosophy at New York University. He has written "The Meaning of Marx" and "Towards the Understanding of Karl Marx."

THE Nation

VOLUME CXLII

NEW YORK · WEDNESDAY · MARCH 11, 1936

NUMBER 3688

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

297

EDITORIALS:

THREE YEARS OF ROOSEVELT	300
JAPANESE FASCISM MISSES FIRE	301
TOWARD NEGRO UNITY	302
WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward	303
NOT NOW, MAYBE LATER by Maury Maverick	305
BEWARE OF INFLATION! by Maxwell S. Stewart	306
DEATH RATTLE IN AKRON by Frank Robertson	309
GERMANY PREPARES FOR WAR by Louis Fischer	311
A NOTE ON LITERARY CRITICISM. II by James T. Farrell	314
BUZZ WINDRIP—GOVERNOR OF GEORGIA. II by Benjamin Stolberg	316
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	319
BROUN'S PAGE	320
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
GATEWAY TO VEBLEN'S WORLD by Max Lerner	321
ACTORS, APOLOGISTS, AND A CRITIC by Lindsay Rogers	322
GOD WOT by Mark Van Doren	324
"CREATURE OF AIR AND FLAME" by J. Salwyn Schapiro	325
MINORITY REPORT by Mary McCarthy	326
SHORTER NOTICES	327
DRAMA: EMPIRE GOODS by Joseph Wood Krutch	329
RECORDS: by Henry Simon	330
DRAWINGS: by George Schreiber and George Grosz

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART
DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

The Shape of Things

*

THE DECISION OF THE SANCTIONS COMMITTEE of the League to impose an oil embargo on Italy if Mussolini does not agree to discuss peace terms within a week is the type of statesmanship for which the world has been waiting. For weeks it has looked as if Italy would be allowed to obtain the full fruits of its aggression while the United States and the League were engaged in passing the buck. One of the most frequently quoted excuses for America's failure to impose an embargo on the shipment of raw materials to belligerents has been that the League has not held up its share of the burden by imposing effective sanctions. At Geneva, on the other hand, the postponement of oil sanctions has been justified on the ground that no action could be successful as long as the United States refused to cooperate. The President's renewed appeal to American business interests not to profit from war, issued when he signed the new Neutrality Act, showed that the Administration is willing to go much farther than Congress in collective action against war. If the League acts, the burden of responsibility for the continuation of the war will be placed directly at the door of the United States. Some action will then become imperative. Pious appeals to business to forgo profits will no longer have even political significance. The Administration will be forced to exercise some of the same leadership and statesmanship which the British government has shown or go into the election with the stigma of an accomplice in one of the gravest crimes of recent years. After the experiences of 1917 it is difficult to believe that the American people will allow today's war profiteers to determine the national policy.

*

ON THE SAME DAY THAT THE PRESS CARRIED the cheerful news that the stock market had advanced for the eleventh consecutive month, the American Federation of Labor reported that unemployment had increased by 1,229,000 during January, bringing the total to 12,626,000. A seasonal decline in employment is to be expected after the holidays, but this year's drop is the largest in the past five years. The United States Bureau of Labor Statistics had previously indicated a decline of more than 5 per cent from December in the aggregate weekly pay rolls. Industrial production was somewhat less than in the previous month, but the contraction was by no means as great as the drop in employment and pay rolls. At least part of labor's loss appears to be due, as the A. F. of L. suggests, to a lengthening of the hours of labor. According to a recent report by the Federal Contract Division of the NRA, approximately two-fifths of the firms engaged on government contracts increased hours and a similar number reduced wages after the invalidation of the NRA. The average work week in industry was lengthened approximately three hours during the last half of 1935. Spurred by profits which in several instances exceed those of 1929, a number of business establishments have announced extensive plans for reconditioning and expanding their plants. As far as the immediate future is concerned, this optimism may be well founded, but the 20's have shown the danger of rapid expansion as long as labor income fails to keep pace with production.

★

IN AN EFFORT TO SAVE THE RAILROADS IN spite of themselves, and against the stubborn resistance of some of the Eastern roads, the Interstate Commerce Commission has ordered a reduction of passenger fares to a two-cents-a-mile maximum (three cents in the case of Pullman travel). The ground of the decision was that rates must be lowered if revenues are to increase. In its report the commission points to the steady decline in passenger traffic and revenue from a peak of 47,000,000 passenger miles in 1920 to 16,000,000 in 1933. It points also to the experience of the Western and Southern roads, which, operating respectively on a two-cent and one-and-a-half-cent basis have increased traffic and revenue. There can of course be no complete certainty that rate reduction will have the results intended. The uncalculable elements are the extent to which the reduced rates will lure traffic from the autobuses and privately owned automobiles. Nevertheless, the decision seems to be based on an excellent factual survey made by the commission's examiner, and to proceed by sound economic reasoning from actual experience. Unlike the decisions of the Supreme Court, those of the commission are made on factual economic grounds by men chosen for their expertness in railroad economics. The contention of several of the minority commissioners that through the decision the commission is "invading the field of management" seems beside the point. By its inherent nature railroad regulation must be comprehensive and must involve the making of most of the crucial decisions by the commission. That is the best argument for government operation of railroads.

★

AT PRESENT WRITING THE ELEVATOR STRIKE in New York City is giving a foretaste of the full extent of labor's power. Although the men are only partially organized and were called out gradually, the city wore the aspect of a state of siege and Mayor LaGuardia proclaimed an emergency. The basic issues of the strike were uniform wage scales and recognition of the union. The employers' organization, calling itself the Realty Advisory Board on Labor Relations, has mustered the usual resources of strike-breakers, even stooping so far as to employ Pearl Bergoff's notorious and nauseating services. Still more sinister was the request made of the Bureau of Appointments at Columbia for students as strike-breakers, and happily refused. This is too reminiscent of the use of student vigilantes in breaking strikes on the Pacific Coast to be merely disturbing. No better education in the making of fascists could be imagined. Mayor LaGuardia's action in using the health ordinances to proclaim a state of emergency, and offering to send the operatives of the fire and health departments where it was necessary to maintain the essential services, cannot yet be estimated. It is calculated to forestall a sense of public panic, and thus avert the anti-strike hysteria which that might lead to. It can, however, also be used to break the strike. All depends on the execution of the order.

★

A WEEK AFTER HIS STATEMENT TO POLICE Commissioner Valentine that nine out of ten of New York relief protestants were "outside agitators," Victor F. Ridder, WPA Administrator, urges the formation of "anti-red" unions to counteract "Communist leadership" in the relief organization. Mr. Ridder appeals to the WPA workers who believe "in God, the family, and our government" to organize as peace-loving workers in combating those elements whose "only interest is to pull down the WPA." He would especially like to see the members of the American Legion and the Catholic and Methodist churches in this new union movement. What the Baptists and Presbyterians will say to this we do not know, but the position of the American Legion has on more than one occasion been made excessively clear. Shortly before Mr. Ridder's announcement, indeed, representatives of the Legion had already organized themselves to stamp out communism in the WPA. Somehow this does not sound quite like union organization; on the other hand, Mr. Ridder's proposal for the New York WPA smacks of a company union. He seems to be employing the time-honored formula of the big-business executive: if you are having trouble with the help, encourage them to form a club and make them think they are helping to run the shop. It should be established once for all that relief workers, like any other employees, have the right to form labor unions of their own choosing, to bargain collectively, and if necessary to protest, picket, and strike. Finally, Mr. Ridder should realize that a worker who wishes to occupy himself in any of these ways may be a church member, a good family man, and a member of the Democratic Party. There is no natural law which identifies union pickets with anti-Christ.

★

CIVIL LIBERTIES ARE BEING FRESHLY ATTACKED on several fronts. The Post Office Department is sponsoring the Dobbins bill, which would try the sender of unmailable matter at the point of receipt or deposit instead of merely at the point of mailing, as is done at present. This is a simple device to obtain convictions in the mailing of allegedly obscene or seditious matter. Owing to the temper of the New York courts and to the state of public opinion in this part of the country, convictions are hard to get. It is obvious that they would be obtained more readily in, say, the South or the far West. In Massachusetts, following hard on the suppression of "The Children's Hour," Representative Dorgan introduced a bill "prohibiting theatrical productions of low moral standard or employing subversive propaganda." This is an old trick to mix censorship of obscenity—the bill specifically bans "subject matter pertaining to homosexuality, incest, the portrayal of a moral pervert or sex degenerate"—with an attack on freedom of political opinion. Finally, the New Jersey Assembly has been edified by the introduction of three bills of which one declares any child who refuses to salute the flag to be a juvenile delinquent, another compels teachers and school administrators to lead the flag salute at stated intervals, and a third calls it a misdemeanor for any person or society to attempt "to influence any pupil against the salute to the flag."

*

SENATOR GUFFEY HAS INTRODUCED A BILL designed to carry out the ship-subsidy proposals of President Roosevelt as set forth in a special message to Congress on March 4 of last year. At that time the President asked for direct subsidies in place of the present mail contracts, and for restrictive measures to put an end to the swindling of the government unearthed by the Black committee. If one accepts the theory that the shipping interests deserve direct subsidies—that is, cash hand-outs—the Guffey bill is by and large a good one. It represents the inevitable New Deal "compromise" in that it seeks to resolve the deadlocked under-cover fight on shipping legislation that since Congress convened has been going on between Senator Copeland and the Department of Commerce on the one hand and Senator Black and the Post Office Department on the other. But it leans a good deal farther toward the position of Senator Black than it does toward that of Copeland and Secretary Roper. The bill would limit profits of subsidized lines to 10 per cent, with half of any profits above that amount "recaptured" by the government (Black asked a straight 6 per cent limitation with full recapture of additional profits); it would limit the profits of shipbuilders to 10 per cent on each vessel whose construction the government has subsidized; and would limit the salaries of officials of subsidized lines to $25,000. For shipbuilding the subsidies are an outright gift of one-third the cost of the vessel and a loan of one-third; for operation they are an outright gift to balance the vague differential between foreign and domestic operating costs. The worst feature of the bill is that the mail contracts would not be canceled until the end of this year, and the contractors would have the right to sue the government in the Court of Claims if their new subsidies did not please them.

*

HAVING TOLD THE WORLD'S BEST SKIERS AND skaters that there was no anti-Semitism at Garmisch-Partenkirchen during the Winter Olympics, the Third Reich is now pressing its cultural campaign elsewhere. No greater insult could have been administered to the "non-Aryans" who make up by far the largest and most devoted section of the audiences of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society concerts than the appointment of Wilhelm Furtwängler, cultural ambassador of Hitler, as conductor. The fact that the new conductor succeeds Arturo Toscanini, who denounced the fascist dictatorship in Italy some years ago and has since then indicated his opinion of the Jewish persecutions by agreeing to conduct the Palestine Symphony Orchestra at Tel-Aviv, makes the contrast all the sharper. Mr. Furtwängler, unlike his fellow-conductors of similar rank, including Bruno Walter, has not only found it possible to live and work in Nazi Germany, aside from a brief eclipse when he defended the works of Hindemith; when he lifts the baton at Carnegie Hall he will bear also the official title of director-general and chief conductor of the Berlin State Operas and of the Berlin Philharmonic. The other outstanding Nazi project is a fete at Heidelberg University to celebrate the 550th anniversary of that ancient institution. The date set, June 30, coincides with another historic date in Nazi culture, the purge of June 30, 1934. Columbia University, Vassar, Harvard, and Cornell have shown the bad taste of accepting the invitation to send representatives. The British universities, on the other hand, have refused with such unanimity that the rector of Heidelberg has now withdrawn the invitations sent to Great Britain. Add Nazi cultural notes: The population of the German concentration camps, according to a recent estimate, is now 119,000.

*

AS LATE AS 1934 FOOD PACKAGES WERE BEING mailed into the Soviet Union. Now the Russians take pride in the fact that they are sending parcels to foreign countries. This applies especially to private shipments of butter and fats from various cities of the U.S.S.R. and from the German Volga district to the German Reich. Such shipments have increased appreciably in the last few months. The Soviet authorities allow them since the supply of these commodities is plentiful and continually rising. Moreover, it is the best kind of anti-fascist propaganda. When Soviet citizens were pulling in their belts in 1931, 1932, and 1933, they knew they were doing it to build basic industries which would soon bear fruit in the shape of the "good life"; the "good life" has now arrived. But the Germans are being asked to forgo necessities in order to produce cannons and submarines and military aeroplanes, which mean not prosperity but war.

*

THE CONVENTION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF Superintendence of the National Education Association, held in St. Louis during the last week of February, was a historic educational meeting. From the curtain-raising session of the John Dewey Society for the Study of Education and Culture, which preceded the convention proper, through to the end there was refreshing eagerness to face realities and to act on them. Invasions of academic freedom were condemned in unmistakable language. The executive committee indorsed the Sisson bill to repeal the ridiculous ban against the teaching of communism in the schools of Washington, D. C. The convention denounced political rule in education following a thorough airing of what amounted to the dismissal by Governor Curley of Dr. Payson Smith from the post of Commissioner of Education in Massachusetts. It applauded Norman Thomas when he completely outdid Senator Barkley of Kentucky and former Governor Henry J. Allen of Kansas in a three-cornered debate on current national issues from the standpoints of their respective parties. Charles A. Beard, between sessions, took time to send a telegram to Governor Alf M. Landon to ask if he was "proud to be sponsored by William Randolph Hearst." Dr. George S. Counts of Columbia University bracketed Hearst, former American Legion Commander Belgrano, Father Coughlin, Alfred E. Smith, the American Liberty League, and the D.A.R. as the leading subversive forces in the United States. All in all, it was a meeting which indicates that school teachers will not take fascism lying down.

Three Years of Roosevelt

THE Roosevelt wheel has now come three-quarters turn. If political campaigns were ever genuinely fought on the record instead of through slogans and distortion, this would be a good time for scanning the ledger of the national achievement and striking a trial balance.

Looking backward over the three years we are struck again by the amazing capacity of the President to be several people at once. We know that he is master of the technique of the split personality—a technique always invaluable in the repertory of a politician, and especially so at a time when class differences are too acute to be glossed over but not so sharp that the political struggle can be frankly fought in terms of them. Much of the present confusion is best explained in terms of the successive unfolding of Mr. Roosevelt's policies. The history of the New Deal falls into six discernible although overlapping stages—and added all together they make a rather meager total.

The first stage was marked by the appearance of the "man of action" in a great emergency. In the banking crisis Mr. Roosevelt was able to transform the country's hysteria from actionless panic into a hysterical emphasis on action for action's sake. The second stage gave promise of a sustained policy and a new administrative structure, both of which, somewhat prematurely, came to be called the New Deal. Ideas seemed to pour into Washington on every incoming train, and from every idea—as from the teeth that Cadmus once sowed—there sprang up a full-grown administrative agency. Zeal and pep abounded, and phrases reminiscent at once of a holy crusade and a high-pressure salesmanship campaign shot like lightning through the sky. The next stage saw the crack-up of this entire emotional and administrative structure. The class interests which had banded themselves together into partnership for the public interest now dissolved again in a struggle for supremacy in which the business groups won out with a terrifying certainty. The best administrators found themselves baffled as to what they were meant to do and blocked whenever they sought to do it. Given this collapse, the fourth stage in Mr. Roosevelt's tenure of office was his heroic attempt to substitute his own political adroitness for a program that no longer existed. The country was treated to the somewhat indecent spectacle of a seductive figure who was using all the lightning shifts of his personality to conceal the fact that he had no sustained plan. The fifth stage was the constitutional fiasco—the coup de grâce administered to Mr. Roosevelt's immediate efforts in the name of the eternal legalities. Now finally we are in the sixth stage—that of the New Deal in the midst of a campaign, when "practical politics" dictates that every surviving principle be subordinated to the struggle for votes.

What of the actual record of accomplishment? In the most important area, that of industrial control, the record is far from a heartening one. The most vigorous approach has been in the field of public utilities. The Wheeler-Rayburn Holding Company Act stands out as a measure the President has fought for with the sustained power of a great leader. The achievement in the Tennessee Valley and in the construction or projected construction of other dams is a considerable one. But the corporate profits which furnish the drive toward the creation of holding companies continue undiminished at a pre-depression level. In the control of the stock market we are plagued by half-hearted measures, the result of which may only be to intensify the fabricated boom and leave investors lapped in a false belief that the government, like some sedulous god, is really watching over them. In agriculture, the Administration has done something a little short of its best to repair the fences torn up by the Supreme Court cyclone. In manufacturing, the unlamented NRA with its cartelization has been replaced by nothing except the Guffey Coal Act. The Administration's tax policy, as we have often pointed out, has been on the whole regressive rather than progressive. The housing and public-works programs have been in a sense the most tragic failures of all, since in both cases precious and unparalleled opportunities were lost for meeting the depression in a socially constructive way. To labor itself the Administration has under pressure given an equivocal support, which in some cases degenerated into the run-around; in the diminished form of the Wagner-Connery act this policy is still hanging constitutional fire. The administration of relief and the social-security program have at least the merit of a recognition of two basic duties on the part of the government. But in execution the story has been different. Relief amounts have been cut to a minimum, and relief policy has been treacherous in its vacillations. And in its scope, its tax provisions, and the amount of its benefit payments the security program is woefully inadequate.

This is not a perfectionist appraisal. No one expected the Roosevelt Administration to strike twelve all at once. But the distressing thing is that this record of fragmentary achievement is not restricted to the area of industrial control. In his evasion of the clear issue of the power of the Supreme Court and his abandonment of the chance to achieve a vigorous peace policy, the President has traced the same pattern. That pattern is emerging ever more clearly. The President generally gets off to a brave and vigorous start, with the impulsiveness of a man who has a genius for making starts and who acts on every fresh accession of energy. He continues with a series of dramatic and Promethean confrontings—chiefly oral—of the massed forces of reaction. But he seems to have no stamina for the long continuity or the sustained attack. Eventually, under the pressure of business and political interests, bureaucratic rivalries, and sheer fatigue, he gives way with a "compromise" that scraps most of what was intended.

So often has this pattern been repeated that we must ask ourselves what there is in Mr. Roosevelt's life and personality that dictates it. He is, first of all, a patrician squire torn from his Dutchess County estate to wrestle with the problems of an urban industrial economy in collapse. Intrinsicly he has no taste for such problems and little grasp of them. He has undoubtedly a better mastery of practical politics than anyone else on the Democratic or Republican horizon. But he has been visited by the drastic fate of having to spend his entire term of office in the shadow of capitalist crisis. And he seems to have learned relatively little from his experience.

Under other conditions Mr. Roosevelt might have been a great and not merely an astute President. But given our present economic agony his shortcomings stand out. To say he is better than any Republican candidate now on the horizon is not to say very much. If, as Mr. Farley predicts, it is likely to be a dirty campaign, then it will be dirty without being exciting. There is a real decay of political faith noticeable in both parties, very much like the decay of religious authority that Marx noted in Europe during the Crimean War. We have the curious spectacle of a country grown tired of Mr. Roosevelt but too well taught by six years of depression to place much stock in even the most expert build-up of the new Republican Presidential striplings. There can be no doubt that the twilight of the two old parties has set in. And there can be no doubt also that the economic situation is shaping eventually toward a new party alignment in which a labor party will be a genuine force. It is toward such an event that our efforts must be directed.

Japanese Fascism Misses Fire

THE dramatic reappearance of Premier Okada three days after his reported assassination symbolizes the almost complete failure of Tokyo's military revolt. While it is still too early to estimate with any certainty the effect of the uprising on Japanese foreign and domestic policy, the indications are that it will be relatively small. That the young reactionaries should flounder with success almost in their grasp is highly significant. A year or two ago everyone was convinced that the military clique could stage a successful coup d'état whenever it pleased. From almost every angle the situation seemed ripe for a fascist dictatorship. There was widespread discontent with the civilian government, chiefly because of its failure to cope with the agricultural crisis. The middle-class business groups were suffering under the heel of the big trusts and combines. Salaried employees in both business and government had experienced drastic reductions in income. Despite the industrial boom following the Manchurian adventure, working-class living standards remained considerably below the pre-depression level. Corruption had seeped into every sector of political life. As in the Italy of 1922 and the Germany of 1933, the youth of the country found the doors of opportunity closed. Led by the young officers of the army—who were mostly of middle-class or farm origin—a powerful movement had developed which demanded a "strong hand in control" of governmental policies and a purification of the Japanese state from liberal or Western influence.

Although the roots of Japan's military-fascist movement are primarily domestic, its activity has been greatest in the sphere of foreign policy. As in other countries, the fascist leaders have been unscrupulous in their exploitation of patriotic sentiment and have repeatedly instigated war scares in order to bolster their prestige. The Mukden incident of September 18, 1931, which precipitated the Japanese invasion of China, was planned by a small group of military leaders for the apparent purpose of creating a domestic crisis that would permit the army to dictate governmental policy. The Japanese people have been kept in a state bordering on hysteria by the military's constant stress on a coming national crisis—which presumably meant a war with the United States, the Soviet Union, or both. By resorting to the ancient slogan—used in every successful Japanese insurrection since the dawn of time—of "restoring the power of the Emperor," the fascist groups have been able to obtain the support of the influential feudal remnants who have never wholly accepted constitutional government.

Yet despite their great strength the military-fascist clique had never before made an open bid for power. Their failure to do so was partially due to a feeling that they were not ready for the responsibilities of office, and partially to the fact that their wrath had been cooled by the concessions granted by the Saito and Okada governments. At the suggestion of Prince Saionji, the last of the Elder Statesmen, both of these governments had been carefully chosen to represent a balance of power between the military and civilian elements. By common consent the military had been given virtually a free hand in foreign affairs, and the budgets for the defense forces, while trimmed slightly, had gone through practically unchallenged. In domestic affairs, on the other hand, the army has had comparatively little to say. The agricultural crisis has remained unsolved, and the position of the lower middle class has shown little improvement. This meant that fascism must either move forward to power or lose its hold on the masses.

It is difficult from this distance to learn why the revolt collapsed so ignominiously. The election returns indicate rather clearly, however, that public sympathy for the extremists has dwindled in recent months. The government has been aided by a slight improvement in general economic conditions. The military adventure on the Asiatic continent no longer inspires the same enthusiasm ■ existed three and four years ago. And above all, the various military, patriotic, and reactionary societies, despite agreement in policy, have been unable to form a united movement. The Tokyo insurgents do not appear to have had active support from any of the hundreds of organizations whose sympathies lay in the same direction.

Success of the revolt would undoubtedly have caused Japan to become even more intransigent in foreign policy. One can almost take it for granted that it would have been followed by a more aggressive policy in North China and Mongolia, culminating in an attack on Soviet Siberia. In most countries the failure of an attempted uprising against the government would lead public sentiment to turn against the rebels. If past experience is any criterion, however, this will not be the case in Japan. The series of political assassinations in 1932, which were inspired by considerations similar to those operating in the recent affair, only served to arouse public sympathy for the assassins and to force the government to accept much of the program which they advocated. It is quite possible that the same will be true now, although the crest of fascist popularity seems definitely to have passed. The activity of Prince Saionji in the selection of the new Cabinet suggests the probability of another of his typical compromises, giving the fascists certain concessions but leaving civilian elements in control of at least some of the strategic posts in the government. While it was just such a compromise which laid the basis for Hitler's rise to power in Germany, the disunity in the ranks of Japanese fascists gives reason to hope that the extremists will be checked before they plunge the entire world into chaos.

Toward Negro Unity

IT is heartening to record that about a thousand delegates of all varieties of political opinion attended the National Negro Congress at Chicago and presented ■ united front against a reactionary world. But it is also relevant, in a period in which formulas for future action are being discussed and decided, to examine in the cold light of the real world inhabited by the Negro masses the exact significance of the unity which the widely divergent groups managed to achieve. If one is to judge by the resolutions it produced, the Negro congress came dangerously close to being an adventure in confusion and loud cheers.

It is incontrovertible that the salvation of the Negro lies along the working-class road. His labor power is his greatest strength; once organized, and integrated with labor's power as a whole, it will eventually win for him that genuine equality which laws and resolutions can only describe. Any movement, therefore, undertaken in the name of Negro welfare must be judged in the light of this general principle. The fact that the Communist Party promoted, supported, and at least tried to direct the proceedings of the Chicago congress would imply the recognition of this primary premise. Yet the text of the resolutions, particularly in two cases, indicates either that the party influence was unavailing or that the united front has been stretched so far that it no longer snaps back to its working-class base.

In Chicago A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters delivered, by proxy since he himself was ill, a strong appeal for industrial unionism. This might well have been the theme of the entire congress. Instead, it was one note among many ranging from whole-hearted indorsement of the Negro churches to support of trade unionism—just as its delegates ranged from "high church dignitaries" to plain workers.

The Congress passed some excellent resolutions. It indorsed trade unionism and the struggle of the share-croppers; it declared itself against lynching, Jim Crowism, exploitation of women, and war and fascism; it resolved to defend civil liberties, to protect the interests of youth, and to fight for old-age pensions. At the same time, however, it passed two resolutions which can only add to the general confusion already existing among Negroes and may even offset the effect of its other pronouncements.

It is notorious that one of the bulwarks of white supremacy in the South is the Negro church manned by "Uncle Tom" ministers. But here is the resolution of the congress in regard to the church:

We still feel that the Negro church is the most potent agency to be used in the further progress and advancement of our people. We therefore recommend that the Negro shall continue to hold faith and confidence in God and the church. . . . The power of the gospel is supremely needed in a time like this.

As for Negro business, which exerts a highly reactionary influence in Negro life, in strictly Negro questions as well as in relation to the white world, the congress resolution runs as follows:

Whereas the development of sound and thriving Negro business is most indispensable to the general elevation of the Negro's social and economic security [italics ours], therefore be it resolved that all Negroes consider it their inescapable duty to support Negro business.

The resolution ended with a plea to Negro business to employ only union labor; in view of the small units of which Negro business is composed, this turns out to be a pious wish.

The left supporters of the congress maintain that the Negro masses must be reached. We agree and we should be the last to deny that the rank-and-file Negro can be reached only in terms of his own tradition and background. For that very reason the indorsement of the Negro church and Negro business is, to say the least, unfortunate. In that average representative of the Negro masses to whose welfare the congress was presumably addressed, the admonition "Fight war and fascism" may arouse a salutary but generalized emotion. "Support the church and Negro business" on the other hand carries a specific, immediate force. It will certainly be used by the "high church dignitaries" to bind the Negro worker more firmly to the most reactionary institutions in his heritage, and tend to cut him off even more completely from his natural allies—the working class.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, March 1

THE New Deal's Forgotten Woman has just edged herself into a seat at the table where Administration leaders are playing madly at the game of election-year politics. Madam Secretary has practically put out of business the major agency set up under the New Deal to safeguard the consumers' interest.

It was called the Consumers' Division, Department of Labor, when Miss Perkins first got her hands upon it a few weeks ago. Now it is the "Consumers' Project" and has some sort of indefinite status under the WPA. Its journal, the Consumer, has been suppressed—"suspended" is the official term—and its single weapon, publicity, has been further dulled by having its press officer forbidden henceforth to issue statements describing the results of its researches.

In addition, publication of the price studies ordered two years ago by President Roosevelt and conducted by Dr. Walton Hale Hamilton and a staff under the guidance of an interdepartmental committee have also been "suspended," although the committee a few months ago voted to have them printed forthwith. That vote was taken before the price studies were transferred to the Consumers' Division and before the division was put under Miss Perkins's twitchy thumb. Dr. Hamilton's preface to the studies, sent to the printers in the interim, has turned up mysteriously in the Secretary's office, where it has undergone heavy censorship by one of her aides to remove what the aide calls "politically injurious" phrases and passages.

Among the things found objectionable by the censor was a reference by Dr. Hamilton to the fact that the men employed under the NRA to safeguard the consumers' interest in the formulation of codes were, perforce, "amateurs" in comparison with the industrialists opposite them when it came to dealing with the intricacies of manufacturing and merchandising in fact rather than theory. The censor suggested that for this reference to "amateurs" there be substituted a reference to "experts" retained by the NRA. He also deleted a critical reference to the Supreme Court.

These and the other happenings noted have been brought about in the few weeks since Dr. Hamilton left the division to become director of the Social Security Board's bureau of research and statistics. His successor as director of the consumers' agency, Clarence Ayres, a Texas economist, is new to Washington and the ways of the New Deal. He has the will to fight but has not yet made up his mind to do so. He still thinks more can be accomplished through "cooperation." He has yet to learn that in Washington he who "cooperates" instead of fighting soon finds himself out on the street for all practical purposes. That's where Fannie herself is now—for all practical purposes.

Madam Secretary

She too is a "cooperator," but one without a will to fight. What she has done to the Consumers' Division she has done out of fear that the division might get her into a fight. She has done it also out of a desperate anxiety to avoid having under her wing any agency that might say or do something embarrassing to the Administration's current efforts to woo its way back into the favor of the rich tradesmen whose dough is badly needed to help finance the 1936 campaign. She may have been motivated, too, by Hearst's broadsides against the Consumers' Division and its works. Benjamin de Casseres, who wrote those broadsides, made a nasty crack in one of them about Fanny's expertness in the matter of hats and how to talk through them. She had the piece on her desk recently while evisceration of the Consumers' Division was getting under way.

ONE can overlook most of the smearing done at the WPA's expense by politicians, whether they be Democrats like Senator Holt or Republicans like Senator Hastings. But one cannot escape a feeling of nausea when the WPA smears itself as it has just done. It has allowed itself to be caught in the role of sweatshopper's "angel," financing erection in the state of Mississippi of a series of textile and garment factories disguised as "vocational-training schools" but designed by the local communities for private occupancy and use. The buildings represent an investment of WPA funds ranging from $22,000 to $45,000 per plant. There are at least four, probably six, and possibly more of these projects. The local communities have been contributing only a few thousand dollars to their cost and meanwhile entering into contracts with union-labor-dodging mills in the North to operate the "schools" as productive enterprises rent free. In one town, Philadelphia, arrangements had been made to sell the "school," a $65,000 property, to a knitting concern for $20,000.

Finding Hopkins's lieutenants acquainted with the situation but unwilling to promise corrective action, John Edelman, research director for the American Federation of Hosiery Workers, threatened to make the facts public. The threats reached Hopkins's ears, and with them the facts, and Hopkins promptly ordered work stopped on four projects. His aides then indulged themselves in a painful effort to convince inquirers that they had known nothing of the Mississippi situation until Edelman brought them the facts. A little research in newspaper files makes fluff of their protestations. It shows that the true nature of the projects had been amply and proudly publicized in the press of Mississippi and that some of these dispatches had reached at least the trade papers in New York weeks ago. The New York Journal of Commerce, for example, carried a February 10 dispatch from Ellisville, Mississippi, telling of the "vocational-school" project there and quoting local authorities on the private use to which the project would be put.

Furthermore, according to Edelman, the state WPA director, Wayne Alliston, a Hopkins appointee, confessed familiarity with the true nature of the projects but asserted he had learned it only after he had approved them. There has been no explanation from Mr. Alliston or anybody else in authority as to why the projects were not submitted to the state Board of Education for approval, as Mississippi law requires on school-construction work.

Edelman's researches also unearthed evidence that in order to provide "adequate female labor" for a garment plant newly moved to Columbus, Mississippi, the local authorities prevailed upon Oklahoma authorities to parole a hundred inmates of the state reformatory for women and ship them to Columbus. Contracts provided that the garment plant could deduct from the women's weekly wages sums to cover the expense of transporting them and to reimburse their employers for the plant investment.

MAURY MAVERICK'S ebullient, slapstick humors have proved detrimental to a project on which he has his heart set. The Texas Congressman wants to take away the ROTC's sex appeal, but his colleagues on the House Military Affairs Committee refuse to believe he is serious. As a result, if the bill he has introduced to achieve his objective is ever to obtain a hearing in committee, it will be only when and if a few hundred persons who see eye to eye with Maury have written commanding letters to their Congressmen.

Working on the theory that if we must train our children for killing other people's children we ought to prepare them to face the realities of international butchery, Maverick has drafted a bill to eliminate "sex appeal and false glory, the emotional by-products of militarism, from military training." It would ban the use of girls as "sponsors" or honorary officers of cadet corps and prohibit their

